START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT
CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

APRIL 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER:
BSO-56-025

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library

(August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks
(Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO Pops Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO Pops Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO Pops Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

REEL 25

Volume 47

BSO-POPS
1925-1926

TECHNICAL DATA

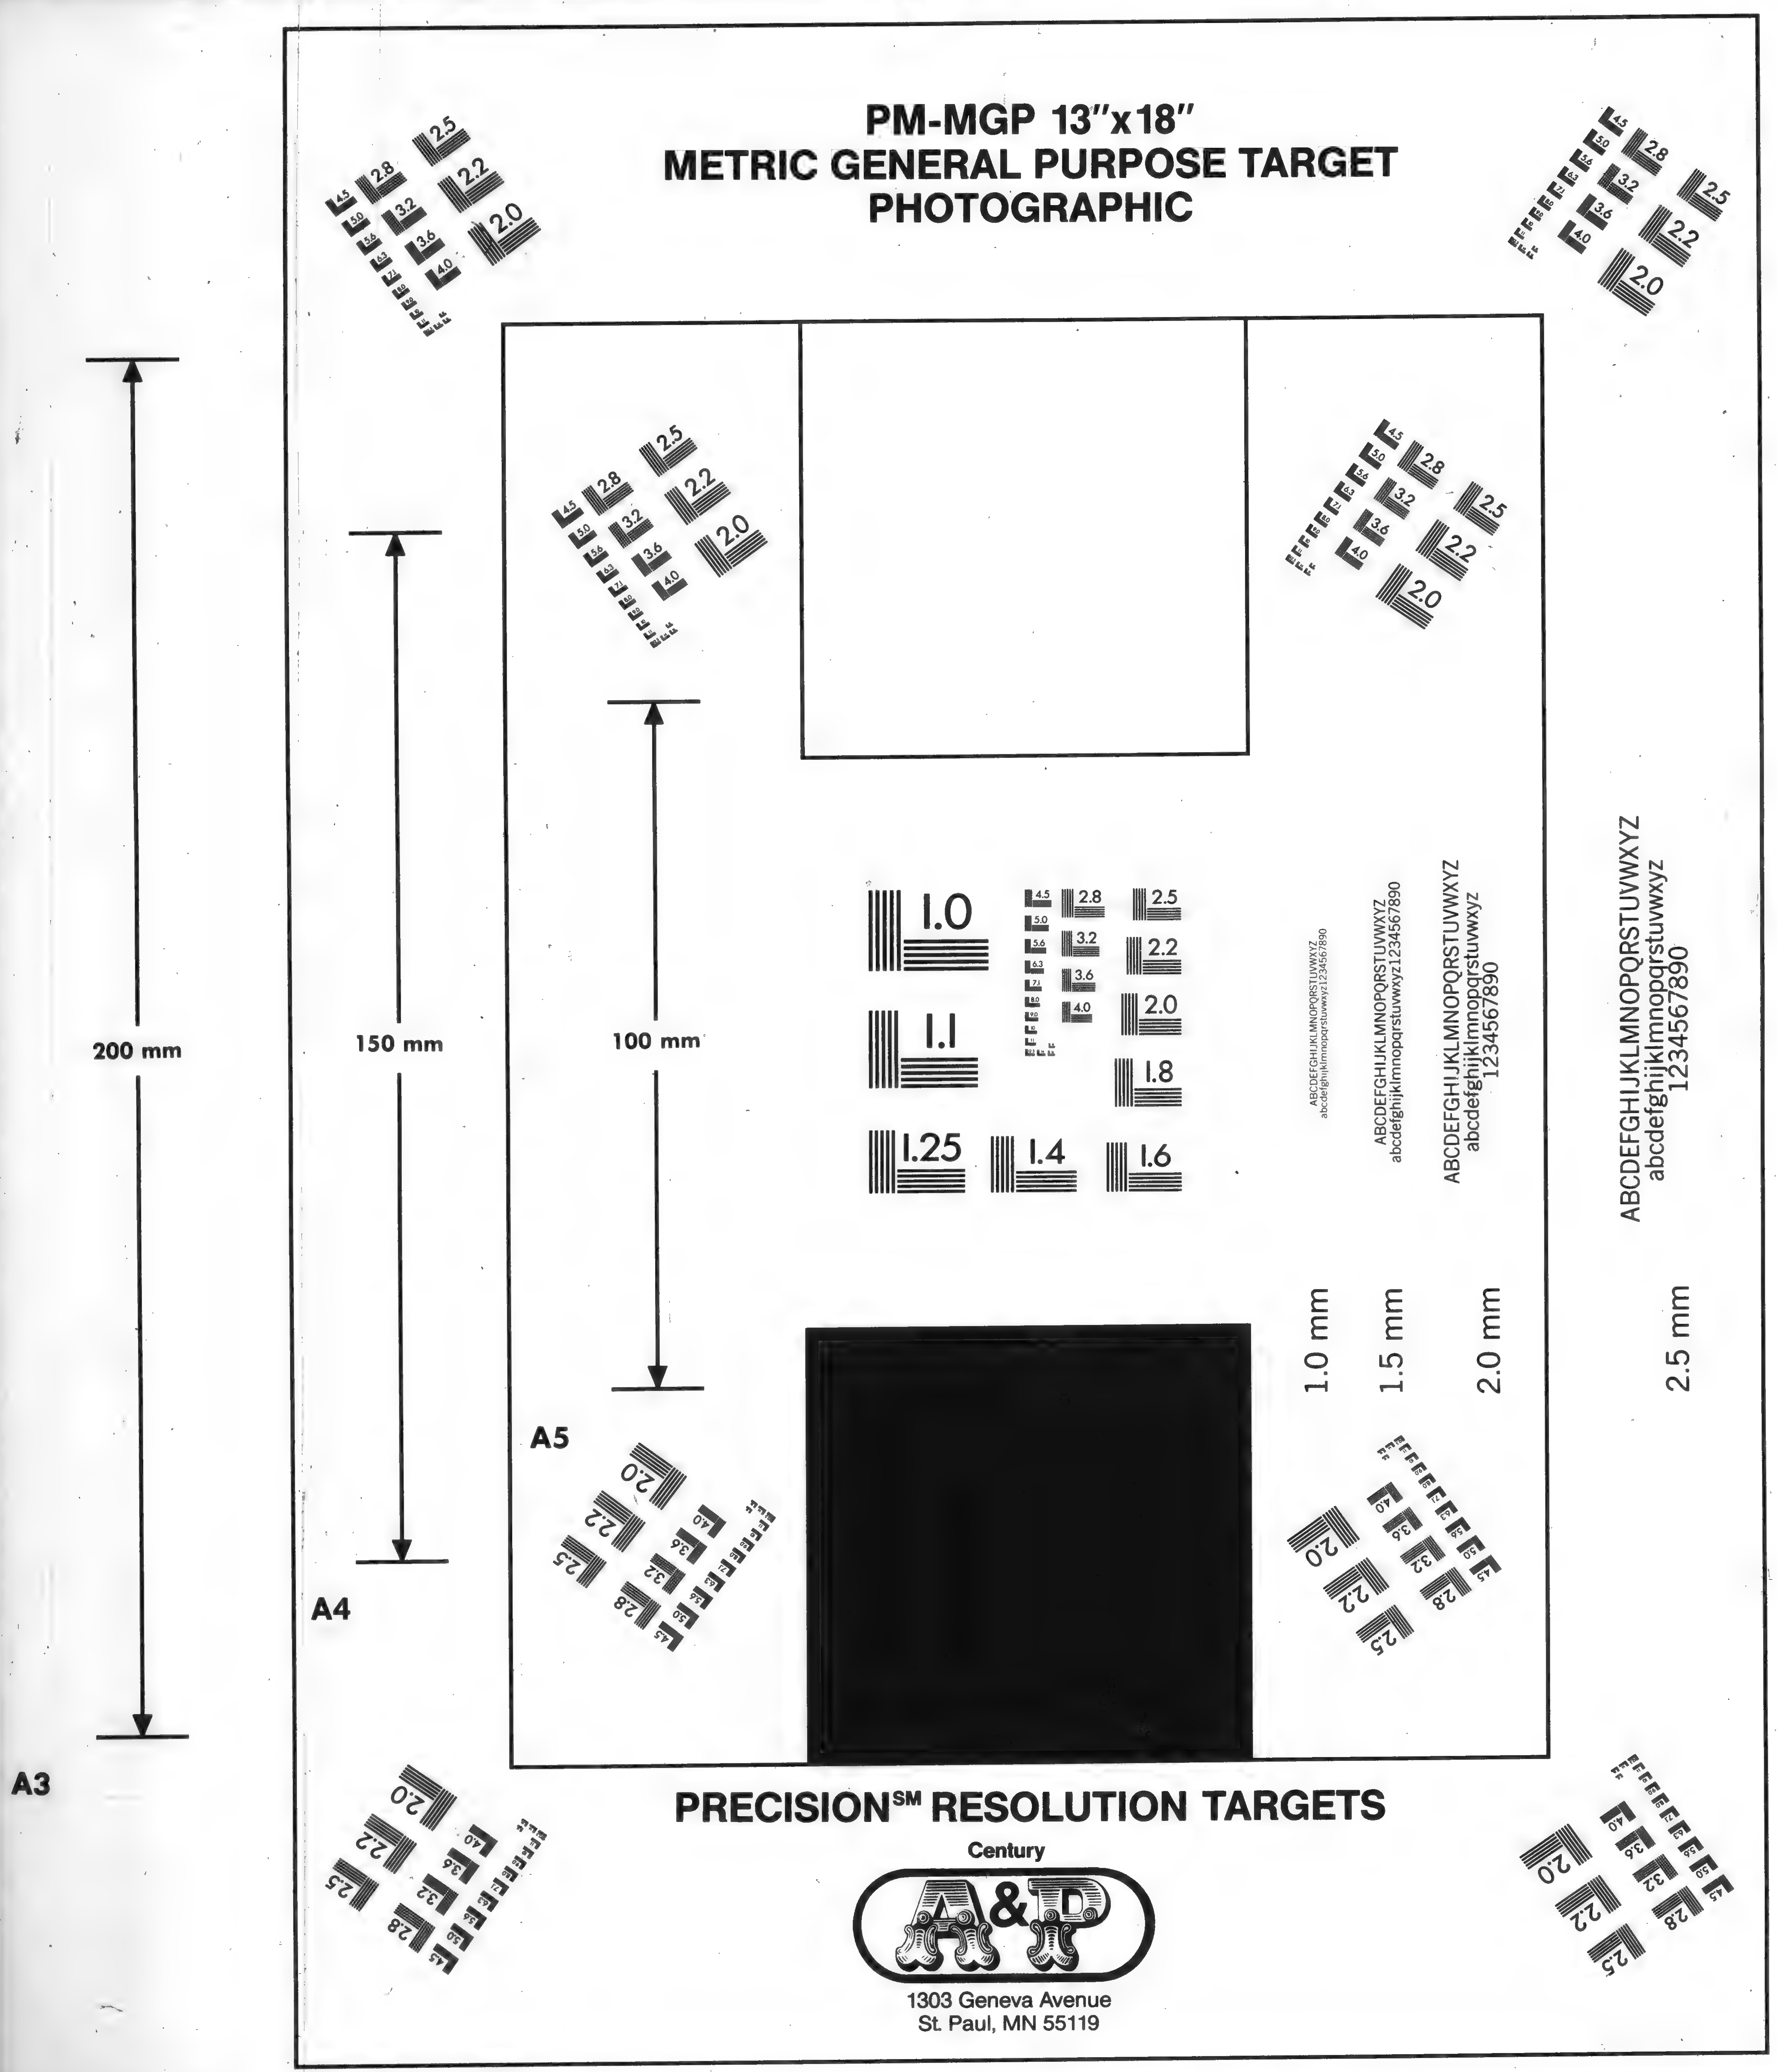
IMAGE PLACEMENT: [✓ IA] IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 12X

FILM STOCK:

Kodak
IMAGELINK™ HQ
MICROFILM
35mm x 30.5m • 100ft
Sp 425
DEVELOP BEFORE 03/1996
1461-0337-041-03
CAT 840 3594
09-07

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES
DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS
AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 47

BSO
Pops

1925 - 1926

THIS BOOK commences
Jan 1 - 1925
to Dec 1925

also Jan 3 to 1926 Page 202 & 158
to
Jan 31 "
Feb. " 169
Mar " 185

HILL, SMITH & CO.
(INC.)
STATIONERS
AND BLANK BOOK
MANUFACTURERS
8 MILK STREET,
BOSTON.
Job No. F1172
Duplicate this book by sending the above number.

KOUSSEVITZKY IN NEW YORK DEBUT QUICKLY LIONIZED BY EAGER THRONG

Personality of New Boston Symphony Conductor Is Found That of Reserved Musician Rather Than Showman—Exquisite Soft Effects Rather Than Big Climaxes Noted at First Concerts—Playing of Debussy Is High Mark of Programs—Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" Given as Novelty—Another Version of "Pacific 231"

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY has ceased to be a fable in New York. With the two concerts which served to auspiciate the Boston Symphony's Manhattan series last week, he became a quite tangible actuality instead of a somewhat remote object of réclame. And in this actualization, there was a winnowing of wings—the wings of myths taking flight.

The Russian conductor's first New York audiences included a liberal number of persons who had heard some of the celebrated Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris or London—with here and there one who could look back further to antebellum experiences in Muscovy. But for most of those who crammed Carnegie Hall to hear the programs of Nov. 27 and 29, the successor of Monteux came as a legend curiously different from the reality that was uncurtained at these two concerts. Perhaps the prevenient conceptions may find more justification later on. The chronicler can only make due entry now that there was a quite general readjustment of perspectives Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

New York's welcome to Mr. Koussevitzky was all that had been anticipated. After both concerts the audience remained to applaud him long and warmly, and he was recalled to the platform many times to bow his sober acknowledgements. Indeed, his hearers seemed more anxious to pay tribute than he was to receive it. Perhaps no conductor of recent memory has been more quick to employ effective devices to prevent or check handclapping in places where it usually occurs but is not altogether desirable—as between movements of a suite or concerto. But through one of those curious shapings of mass opinion, these audiences had made up their minds to have a "sensation" in Mr. Koussevitzky, and when his own rather reticent personality did not supply it, they had it anyway.

There was, indeed, something enigmatic and cryptic in the newcomer's individuality at these concerts. In appearance, his auditors found before them a well set-up and trim figure, rather military while conducting, but suggesting a self-conscious reserve when facing outward toward his applauders. On entering and leaving the stage, Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to desire to be as inconspicuous as possible.

[Continued on page 9]

Second Class Matter, January 25, 1906, at the Price, $4.00 a Year. Copyright 1924.

Famous Russian Leads Boston Symphony in Familiar Works and Presents Novelty by Prokofieff—Programs by Three New York Orchestras

[Continued from page 1]

The first impression he gave with the bâton Thursday evening was that of a precisionist and a detailist. There was very little which had any semblance of the sensational or the virtuosic. His technic with the stick was at once evident, as was musicianship of a very high order. His beat, for the most part, was unobtrusive—often an almost imperceptible wrist movement in which the arm had virtually no play. For the pianissimo effects on which he seemed to place unusual value, he held his left hand straight overhead. When more than the wrists and hands were called into action, the movement was a full arm swing—seldom a motion from the elbow. There was almost nothing of hair-tossing or bodily contortion.

Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky went a little further in what may be regarded as conductorial mannerisms—such as turning toward the violins as if his beat were exclusively for them. Also, he permitted the entire orchestra to play without his beat for some little time, something which so fine an organization as the Boston Symphony doubtless can do whenever called upon. Here, at least, the conductor's very quietude became a little ostentatious.

Of his ends and aims, clarity and finish seemed most sought after in Mr. Koussevitzky's readings. Tempestuous he was not. Exquisite he frequently was. Always he let the light shine through the structure of the music, even when details of his interpretations and unusual alterations of pace caused something of a strain on the edifice. He courted a pianissimo so soft it could be heard at times only through the most diligent listening, abetted by the imagination. His climaxes were not unusual in their power and there were intervening degrees of dynamics which he seemed not to use at all. He did not abjure the printed score, as Stokowski and Toscanini do, but his eyes were so seldom on it that one had no doubt of its superfluity.

* * *

The program of the evening of Nov. 27 comprised the following:

Concerto in D Minor, for Orchestra with Organ.............Vivaldi-Siloti
Overture to "Oberon"...........Weber
"Nuages" and "Fêtes"........Debussy
"Pacific 231"...............Honegger
"Poème de l'Extase"..........Scriabin

Firm, clean-cut, precisely outlined, classic in line and spirit, the Vivaldi concerto, as edited by Siloti, was very admirably played. Here was in sooth what Stravinsky desired in his Symphonies for Wind Instruments—music which sounded as if sculptured in marble—an effect which the tendency to austerity on the part of the Boston orchestra's strings accentuated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony

The "Oberon" Overture was markworthy for two things—the extreme softness of its opening and the unusual slowness with which the two chief melodies were taken in their original statement. Thereafter there was no lack of effective contrast. The presentation was one to prompt disagreement, but it possessed exceptional finish, balance and poise.

The most beautiful playing of the evening was that which gave an individual felicity to the two Debussy nocturnes. Here the conductor's flair for a pianissimo that was little more than a susurration was enchantingly utilized. Never has the writer heard so magical an effect made of the beginning of the phantasmal procession in "Fêtes."

"Pacific 231," no longer a novelty in New York, was given a new perspicuity of structure, but it scarcely gained in musical values. The cleverness of the opening bars, as the locomotive gets under way, was emphasized happily. After that, Honegger's juggernaut turned wheels of painted cardboard while it stood stock still, in spite of the high art of the performance given it.

As a long recognized paladin of Scriabin, Mr. Koussevitzky's "Poème de l'Extase" was expected to be a revelation. So it was, so far as clarity of detail and lucidity of form were concerned. But it lacked the soaring emotionalism which other conductors, particularly Albert Coates, have given it, and in its loss of what may be regarded as sheer sound and fury, it took on an access of that sickly feverishness which has never been altogether absent from it. One questions the normality of this ecstasy. Its promptings are more pathological than musical.

The Saturday afternoon program was as follows:

Overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla," Glinka
Prelude to "Khovantchina"..Moussorgsky
"Flight of the Bumble Bee"—Scherzo from "Tsar Saltan"..Rimsky-Korsakoff Scythian Suite, Opus 20.......Prokofieff
(First time in New York)
Symphony, No. 4, in E Minor...Brahms

This was not a particularly fortunate second program for Mr. Koussevitzky. The Glinka and Moussorgsky numbers were well played, but that would be taken for granted with almost any first class orchestra under any reasonably able conductor. The "Tsar Saltan" excerpt was a charming triviality, as the repetition given it served to underline. The Prokofieff suite proved a poor example of what the modernists are striving for—a noisy, but feeble relative of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps." It has its rhythmic moments—but they are not many. The Brahms Symphony led Mr. Koussevitzky and many of his audience to a mild parting of the ways. The Andante and the Allegro Giocoso were of attractive quality, but the first and last movements were more capricious than convincing. The last, particularly, lost continuity without acquiring that dramatic emphasis which presumably the conductor was seeking.

The concert was an object lesson, however, in the complete mastery which Mr. Koussevitzky has of the resources of the orchestra, and the high degree of polish and finesse he exacts from it. The ensemble has not the sensuous glow and the warmth of tone of at least one of its rivals, but it plainly is in the hands of a conductor who will tolerate no blemishes.

OSCAR THOMPSON.

Medtner with the Philharmonic

Philharmonic Orchestra, Willem van Hoogstraten, conductor; Nicholas Medtner, pianist, soloist, Carnegie Hall, Nov. 26, evening. The program:

Symphonic Poem, "The Island of the Dead" ....Rachmaninoff
Concerto in G for Piano and Orchestra ....Beethoven
Symphony No. 6 ("Pathetique"), Tchaikovsky

It was a rather melancholy Thanksgiving Eve at the Philharmonic, but it was the sort of sentimental melancholy that an audience revels in. "The Island of the Dead" does not wear well. It

[Continued on page 32]

NEW YORK 27

?

Issue of
JAN 1925

Koussevitzky with Boston Symphony Makes Decided Impression

The thirty-ninth New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began with the concert November 27, at Carnegie Hall, on which occasion Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of that body of players, appeared for the first time before a New York audience.

"The interest of the audience," says W. J. Henderson of the Sun, "inevitably centered itself on the conductor." Mr. Henderson proceeds to tell with admirable brevity, the things that the average music lover (if music lovers can ever be said to be average) wants to know about this distinguished Russian whose coming had been so much noised abroad that Carnegie Hall was sold from pit to galleries for his first appearance.

"Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky," Mr. Henderson says, "was born in 1874 in Vyshny Volotchk, Russia. He studied at the Moscow Conservatory and became a professor there. He developed first into a celebrated double bass virtuoso and afterward became a distinguished conductor. He has composed a concerto for double bass and founded a society for the promotion of Russian music in Berlin. He has conducted with great success in Paris and London as well as in other cities of Europe."

Beyond such details the critic for the Sun believes that what the public chiefly wants to know is "whether the Boston Symphony, in the language of the curbstone, is going to 'stage a comeback.'"

Consensus of critical opinion seems to be that the "comeback," under Mr. Koussevitzky has been set in motion, though the reviewers for the most part

---

Herald
Jan

afternoon.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is out of town, so there is a halt to the Russian invasion, and next week no Russian composer will be represented. The program as now arranged is as follows: Elgar's orchestral transcription of a fantasia and fugue by Bach; Respighi's Concerto Gregoriano for violin to be played by Albert Spalding—he has played it this season at Chicago and Detroit—the "Ride of the Valkyries," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Rienzi."

Hartford Courant?

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who comes to Hartford at the Capitol Theater on Sunday, 1, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick, one of the most important musical events of the season. (C) Garo.

"Best by attest"

HENRY ORIGINAL ROMEIKE

PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

JUN 28 1925

REMARKABLE LIBRARY OF MUSICAL INFORMATION

One of the most remarkable books on musical matters ever printed is the new "historical and descriptive notes" of "Program Books" of the Boston Symphony orchestra, compiled by [illegible] Hale. Actually, the work constitutes a library of musical knowledge the like of which is not to be found elsewhere. The average program note is a deadly, tiresome thing, little understood and little read. Mr. Hale has completely changed this formula. Under his pen, the program note has become a fine and exhilarating art, establishing the author as the master of an enlivened order of creative scholarship whose educational possibilities are illimitable.

It is almost 25 years since Mr. Hale began to contribute his annotations to the Boston Symphony Program Book. He succeeded the late W. F. Apthorp in 1901, in the consulship of Gericke. So, at the end of the season of 1925-26, he will have rounded out a quarter century as the scholar, wit and humanist who turned the writing of program notes from the most depressing and sodden of musical hackwork into a fine art. The book is one that every musician and lover of music should have, with its vast fund of musical data.

NEWS

JAN 2 1925

PROGRAM TO BE GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SUNDAY IN THE AUDITORIUM

The following notable program will be presented Sunday afternoon at 3.30 o'clock at the Auditorium by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association.

Haydn, Symphony in G major (Breitkopf and Hartel No. 13); I. Adagio, Allegro; II. Largo; III. Menuetto, Trio; IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito. De Falla, Suite from "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"); (Piano, Jesus Sanroma); Introduction and Scene—The "Gypsies" (Evening)—The Returning Spirit—Dance of Terror—The Magic Circle (Narrative of the Fisherman)—Midnight (Sorceries)—Ritual Dance of Fire (to Dispel Evil Spirits). Wagner, Bacchanale ("Der Venusberg") from "Tannhauser" Wagner, Funeral Music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung"; Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

NEW YORK 27

KOUSSEVITZKY IN NEW YORK DEBUT QUICKLY LIONIZED BY EAGER THRONG

Personality of New Boston Symphony Conductor Is Found That of Reserved Musician Rather Than Showman—Exquisite Soft Effects Rather Than Big Climaxes Noted at First Concerts—Playing of Debussy Is High Mark of Programs — Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" Given as Novelty—Another Version of "Pacific 231"

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY has ceased to be a fable in New York. With the two concerts which served to auspiciate the Boston Symphony's Manhattan series last week, he became a quite tangible actuality instead of a somewhat remote object of réclame. And in this actualization, there was a winnowing of wings—the wings of myths taking flight.

The Russian conductor's first New York audiences included a liberal number of persons who had heard some of the celebrated Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris or London—with here and there one who could look back further to ante-bellum experiences in Muscovy. But for most of those who crammed Carnegie Hall to hear the programs of Nov. 27 and 29, the successor of Monteux came as a legend curiously different from the reality that was uncurtained at these two concerts. Perhaps the prevenient conceptions may find more justification later on. The chronicler can only make due entry now that there was a quite general readjustment of perspectives Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

New York's welcome to Mr. Koussevitzky was all that had been anticipated. After both concerts the audience remained to applaud him long and warmly, and he was recalled to the platform many times to bow his sober acknowledgements. Indeed, his hearers seemed more anxious to pay tribute than he was to receive it. Perhaps no conductor of recent memory has been more quick to employ effective devices to prevent or check handclapping in places where it usually occurs but is not altogether desirable—as between movements of a suite or concerto. But through one of those curious shapings of mass opinion, these audiences had made up their minds to have a "sensation" in Mr. Koussevitzky, and when his own rather reticent personality did not supply it, they had it anyway.

There was, indeed, something enigmatic and cryptic in the newcomer's individuality at these concerts. In appearance, his auditors found before them a well set-up and trim figure, rather military while conducting, but suggesting a self-conscious reserve when facing outward toward his applauders. On entering and leaving the stage, Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to desire to be as inconspicuous as possible.

[Continued on page 9]

Second Class Matter, January 25, 1906, at the Price, $4.00 a Year. Copyright 1924.

Famous Russian Leads Boston Symphony in Familiar Works and Presents Novelty by Prokofieff—Programs by Three New York Orchestras

[Continued from page 1]

The first impression he gave with the bâton Thursday evening was that of a precisionist and a detailist. There was very little which had any semblance of the sensational or the virtuosic. His technic with the stick was at once evident, as was musicianship of a very high order. His beat, for the most part, was unobtrusive—often an almost imperceptible wrist movement in which the arm had virtually no play. For the pianissimo effects on which he seemed to place unusual value, he held his left hand straight overhead. When more than the wrists and hands were called into action, the movement was a full arm swing—seldom a motion from the elbow. There was almost nothing of hair-tossing or bodily contortion.

Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky went a little further in what may be regarded as conductorial mannerisms—such as turning toward the violins as if his beat were exclusively for them. Also, he permitted the entire orchestra to play without his beat for some little time, something which so fine an organization as the Boston Symphony doubtless can do whenever called upon. Here, at least, the conductor's very quietude became a little ostentatious.

Of his ends and aims, clarity and finish seemed most sought after in Mr. Koussevitzky's readings. Tempestuous he was not. Exquisite he frequently was. Always he let the light shine through the structure of the music, even when details of his interpretations and unusual alterations of pace caused something of a strain on the edifice. He courted a pianissimo so soft it could be heard at times only through the most diligent listening, abetted by the imagination. His climaxes were not unusual in their power and there were intervening degrees of dynamics which he seemed not to use at all. He did not abjure the printed score, as Stokowski and Toscanini do, but his eyes were so seldom on it that one had no doubt of its superfluity.

* * *

The program of the evening of Nov. 27 comprised the following:

Concerto in D Minor, for Orchestra with Organ	Vivaldi-Siloti
Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
"Nuagés" and "Fêtes"	Debussy
"Pacific 231"	Honegger
"Poème de l'Extase"	Scriabin

Firm, clean-cut, precisely outlined, classic in line and spirit, the Vivaldi concerto, as edited by Siloti, was very admirably played. Here was in sooth what Stravinsky desired in his Symphonies for Wind Instruments—music which sounded as if sculptured in marble—an effect which the tendency to austerity on the part of the Boston orchestra's strings accentuated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony

The "Oberon" Overture was markworthy for two things—the extreme softness of its opening and the unusual slowness with which the two chief melodies were taken in their original statement. Thereafter there was no lack of effective contrast. The presentation was one to prompt disagreement, but it possessed exceptional finish, balance and poise.

The most beautiful playing of the evening was that which gave an individual felicity to the two Debussy nocturnes. Here the conductor's flair for a pianissimo that was little more than a susurration was enchantingly utilized. Never has the writer heard so magical an effect made of the beginning of the phantasmal procession in "Fêtes."

"Pacific 231," no longer a novelty in New York, was given a new perspicuity of structure, but it scarcely gained in musical values. The cleverness of the opening bars, as the locomotive gets under way, was emphasized happily. After that, Honegger's juggernaut turned wheels of painted cardboard while it stood stock still, in spite of the high art of the performance given it.

As a long recognized paladin of Scriabin, Mr. Koussevitzky's "Poème de l'Extase" was expected to be a revelation. So it was, so far as clarity of detail and lucidity of form were concerned. But it lacked the soaring emotionalism which other conductors, particularly Albert Coates, have given it, and in its loss of what may be regarded as sheer sound and fury, it took on an access of that sickly feverishness which has never been altogether absent from it. One questions the normality of this ecstasy. Its promptings are more pathological than musical.

The Saturday afternoon program was as follows:

Overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla."	Glinka
Prelude to "Khovantchina"	Moussorgsky
"Flight of the Bumble Bee"—Scherzo from "Tsar Saltan"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Scythian Suite, Opus 20 (First time in New York)	Prokofieff
Symphony, No. 4, in E Minor	Brahms

This was not a particularly fortunate second program for Mr. Koussevitzky. The Glinka and Moussorgsky numbers were well played, but that would be taken for granted with almost any first class orchestra under any reasonably able conductor. The "Tsar Saltan" excerpt was a charming triviality, as the repetition given it served to underline. The Prokofieff suite proved a poor example of what the modernists are striving for—a noisy, but feeble relative of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps." It has its rhythmic moments—but they are not many. The Brahms Symphony led Mr. Koussevitzky and many of his audience to a mild parting of the ways. The Andante and the Allegro Giocoso were of attractive quality, but the first and last movements were more capricious than convincing. The last, particularly, lost continuity without acquiring that dramatic emphasis which presumably the conductor was seeking.

The concert was an object lesson, however, in the complete mastery which Mr. Koussevitzky has of the resources of the orchestra, and the high degree of polish and finesse he exacts from it. The ensemble has not the sensuous glow and the warmth of tone of at least one of its rivals, but it plainly is in the hands of a conductor who will tolerate no blemishes.

OSCAR THOMPSON.

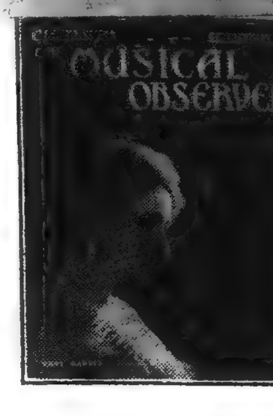
Medtner with the Philharmonic

Philharmonic Orchestra, Willem van Hoogstraten, conductor; Nicholas Medtner, pianist, soloist, Carnegie Hall, Nov. 26, evening. The program:

Symphonic Poem, "The Island of the Dead"	Rachmaninoff
Concerto in G for Piano and Orchestra	Beethoven
Symphony No. 6 ("Pathetique")	Tchaikovsky

It was a rather melancholy Thanksgiving Eve at the Philharmonic, but it was the sort of sentimental melancholy that an audience revels in. "The Island of the Dead" does not wear well. It

[Continued on page 32]



Issue of

JAN 1925

Koussevitzky with Boston Symphony Makes Decided Impression

The thirty-ninth New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began with the concert November 27, at Carnegie Hall, on which occasion Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of that body of players, appeared for the first time before a New York audience.

"The interest of the audience," says W. J. Henderson of the Sun, "inevitably centered itself on the conductor." Mr. Henderson proceeds to tell with admirable brevity, the things that the average music lover (if music lovers can ever be said to be average) wants to know about this distinguished Russian whose coming had been so much noised abroad that Carnegie Hall was sold from pit to galleries for his first appearance.

"Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky," Mr. Henderson says, "was born in 1874 in Vyshny Volotchk, Russia. He studied at the Moscow Conservatory and became a professor there. He developed first into a celebrated double bass virtuoso and afterward became a distinguished conductor. He has composed a concerto for double bass and founded a society for the promotion of Russian music in Berlin. He has conducted with great success in Paris and London as well as in other cities of Europe."

Beyond such details the critic for the Sun believes that what the public chiefly wants to know is "whether the Boston Symphony, in the language of the curbstone, is going to 'stage a comeback.'"

Consensus of critical opinion seems to be that the "comeback," under Mr. Koussevitzky has been set in motion, though the reviewers for the most part afternoon.

---

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is out of town, so there is a halt to the Russian invasion, and next week no Russian composer will be represented. The program as now arranged is as follows: Elgar's orchestral transcription of a fantasia and fugue by Bach; Respighi's Concerto Gregoriano for violin to be played by Albert Spalding—he has played it this season at Chicago and Detroit—the "Ride of the Valkyries," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Rienzi."

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, distinguished ductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wh to Hartford at the Capitol Theater on Sunday 1, under the management of Frank A. Sedgw one of the most important musical events of season. (C) Garo

---

"Best by attest"

HENRY ORIGINAL ROMEIKE

PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

JUN 26 1925

REMARKABLE LIBRARY OF MUSICAL INFORMATION

One of the most remarkable books on musical matters ever printed is the new "historical and descriptive notes" of "Program Books" of the Boston Symphony orchestra, compiled by Philip Hale. Actually, the work constitutes a library of musical knowledge the like of which is not to be found elsewhere. The average program note is a deadly, tiresome thing, little understood and little read. Mr. Hale has completely changed this formula. Under his pen, the program note has become a fine and exhilarating art, establishing the author as the master of an enlivened order of creative scholarship whose educational possibilities are illimitable.

It is almost 25 years since Mr. Hale began to contribute his annotations to the Boston Symphony Program Book. He succeeded the late W. F. Apthorp in 1901, in the consulship of Gericke. So, at the end of the season of 1925-26, he will have rounded out a quarter century as the scholar, wit and humanist who turned the writing of program notes from the most depressing and sodden of musical hackwork into a fine art. The book is one that every musician and lover of music should have, with its vast fund of musical data.

NEWS

JAN 2 1925

PROGRAM TO BE GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SUNDAY IN THE AUDITORIUM

The following notable program will be presented Sunday afternoon at 3.30 o'clock at the Auditorium by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association.

Haydn, Symphony in G major (Breitkopf and Hartel No. 13); I. Adagio, Allegro; II. Largo; III. Menuetto, Trio; IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito. De Falla, Suite from "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"); (Piano, Jesus Sanroma); Introduction and Scene—The "Gypsies" (Evening)—The Returning Spirit—Dance of Terror—The Magic Circle (Narrative of the Fisherman)—Midnight (Sorceries)—Ritual Dance of Fire (to Dispel Evil Spirits). Wagner, Bacchanale ("Der Venusberg") from "Tannhauser" Wagner, Funeral Music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung"; Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

KOUSSEVITZKY IN NEW YORK DEBUT QUICKLY LIONIZED BY EAGER THRONG

Personality of New Boston Symphony Conductor Is Found That of Reserved Musician Rather Than Showman—Exquisite Soft Effects Rather Than Big Climaxes Noted at First Concerts—Playing of Debussy Is High Mark of Programs — Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" Given as Novelty—Another Version of "Pacific 231"

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY has ceased to be a fable in New York. With the two concerts which served to auspiciate the Boston Symphony's Manhattan series last week, he became a quite tangible actuality instead of a somewhat remote object of réclame. And in this actualization, there was a winnowing of wings—the wings of myths taking flight.

The Russian conductor's first New York audiences included a liberal number of persons who had heard some of the celebrated Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris or London—with here and there one who could look back further to antebellum experiences in Muscovy. But for most of those who crammed Carnegie Hall to hear the programs of Nov. 27 and 29, the successor of Monteux came as a legend curiously different from the reality that was uncurtained at these two concerts. Perhaps the prevenient conceptions may find more justification later on. The chronicler can only make due entry now that there was a quite general readjustment of perspectives Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

New York's welcome to Mr. Koussevitzky was all that had been anticipated. After both concerts the audience remained to applaud him long and warmly, and he was recalled to the platform many times to bow his sober acknowledgements. Indeed, his hearers seemed more anxious to pay tribute than he was to receive it. Perhaps no conductor of recent memory has been more quick to employ effective devices to prevent or check handclapping in places where it usually occurs but is not altogether desirable—as between movements of a suite or concerto. But through one of those curious shapings of mass opinion, these audiences had made up their minds to have a "sensation" in Mr. Koussevitzky, and when his own rather reticent personality did not supply it, they had it anyway.

There was, indeed, something enigmatic and cryptic in the newcomer's individuality at these concerts. In appearance, his auditors found before them a well set-up and trim figure, rather military while conducting, but suggesting a self-conscious reserve when facing outward toward his applauders. On entering and leaving the stage, Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to desire to be as inconspicuous as possible.

[Continued on page 9]

Second Class Matter, January 25, 1906, at the Price, $4.00 a Year. Copyright 1924.

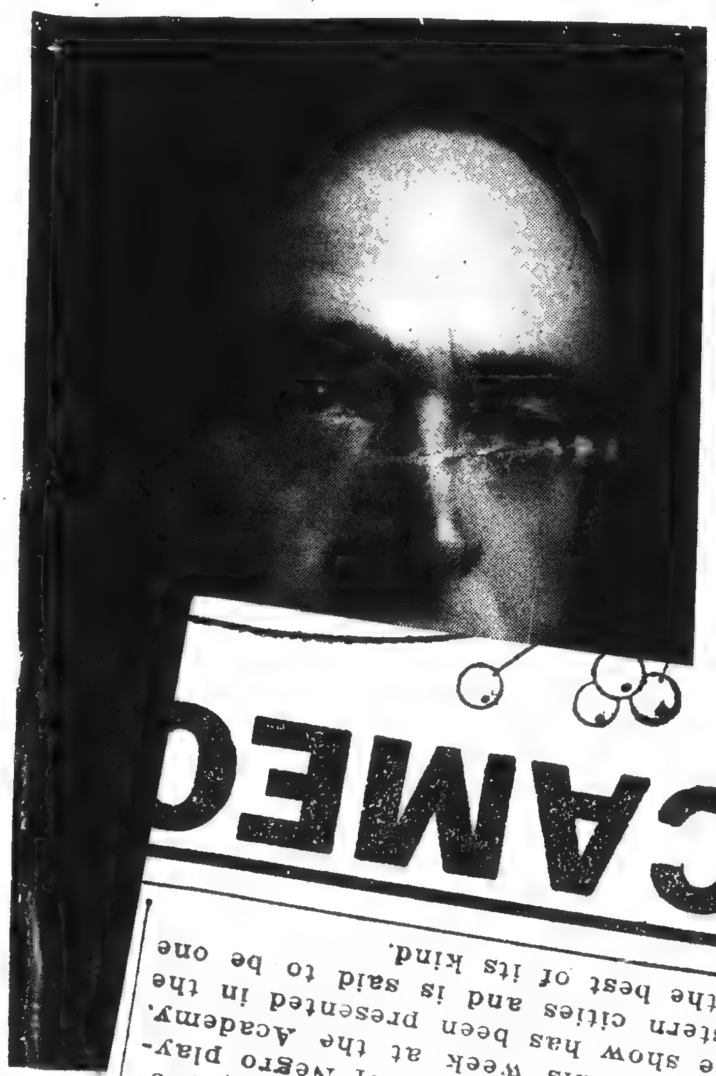
Famous Russian Leads Boston Symphony in Familiar Works and Presents Novelty by Prokofieff—Programs by Three New York Orchestras

[Continued from page 1]

The first impression he gave with the bâton Thursday evening was that of a precisionist and a detailist. There was very little which had any semblance of the sensational or the virtuosic. His technic with the stick was at once evident, as was musicianship of a very high order. His beat, for the most part, was unobtrusive—often an almost imperceptible wrist movement in which the arm had virtually no play. For the pianissimo effects on which he seemed to place unusual value, he held his left hand straight overhead. When more than the wrists and hands were called into action, the movement was a full arm swing—seldom a motion from the elbow. There was almost nothing of hair-tossing or bodily contortion.

Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky went a little further in what may be regarded as conductorial mannerisms—such as turning toward the violins as if his beat were exclusively for them. Also, he permitted the entire orchestra to play without his beat for some little time, something which so fine an organization as the Boston Symphony doubtless can do whenever called upon. Here, at least, the conductor's very quietude became a little ostentatious.

Of his ends and aims, clarity and finish seemed most sought after in Mr. Koussevitzky's readings. Tempestuous he was not. Exquisite he frequently was. Always he let the light shine through the structure of the music, even when details of his interpretations and unusual alterations of pace caused something of a strain on the edifice. He



Serge

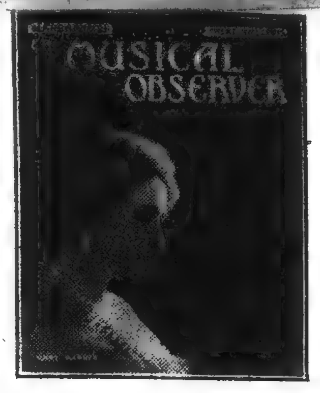
...be presented this week in the Ritz theater. Haines' first contract called for a salary of $50 per week, but after his great success in King Vidor's "Three Wise Fools," he was called up on the carpet and given a contract with a real salary attached to it.

William Haines.

Smart Musical Show.

Manager George Jaffe has engaged "How Come," a musical comedy presented by a company of Negro players, for this week at the Academy. The show has been presented in the eastern cities and is said to be one of the best of its kind.

CAMEO



Issue of

JAN 1925

Koussevitzky with Boston Symphony Makes Decided Impression

The thirty-ninth New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began with the concert November 27, at Carnegie Hall, on which occasion Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of that body of players, appeared for the first time before a New York audience.

"The interest of the audience," says W. J. Henderson of the Sun, "inevitably centered itself on the conductor." Mr. Henderson proceeds to tell with admirable brevity, the things that the average music lover (if music lovers can ever be said to be average) wants to know about this distinguished Russian whose coming had been so much noised abroad that Carnegie Hall was sold from pit to galleries for his first appearance.

"Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky," Mr. Henderson says, "was born in 1874 in Vyshny Volotchk, Russia. He studied at the Moscow Conservatory and became a professor there. He developed first into a celebrated double bass virtuoso and afterward became a distinguished conductor. He has composed a concerto for double bass and founded a society for the promotion of Russian music in Berlin. He has conducted with great success in Paris and London as well as in other cities of Europe."

Beyond such details the critic for the Sun believes that what the public chiefly wants to know is "whether the Boston Symphony, in the language of the curbstone, is going to 'stage a comeback.'"

Consensus of critical opinion seems to be that the "comeback," under Mr. Koussevitzky has been set in motion, though the reviewers for the most part were so much concerned with discussing details of Mr. Koussevitzky's program, which consisted of the Vivaldi concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ (Siloti edition), Weber's "Oberon" overture, Debussy's nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," Arthur Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," that their appraisals of the program as a whole are somewhat hidden.

Lawrence Gilman, of the Herald Tribune, however, gives us a few general characterizations of the new conductor which are worth quoting, as Mr. Gilman's comments usually are.

"The whole man is flamingly responsive and alive," says Mr. Gilman. "Clarity of conception, quick sensibility, a comprehensive grasp of structure, a fusing and projecting imagination—these virtues are his beyond denial."

Mr. Gilman finds that Mr. Koussevitzky "has two outstanding traits that make for vividness: He has a dramatizing imagination, and he has a passion for

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JAN 2 1925

PROGRAM TO BE GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SUNDAY IN THE AUDITORIUM

The following notable program will be presented Sunday afternoon at 3.30 o'clock at the Auditorium by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association.

Haydn, Symphony in G major (Breitkopf and Hartel No. 13); I. Adagio, Allegro; II. Largo; III. Menuetto, Trio; IV. Finale: Allegro con spirto. De Falla, Suite from "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"); (Piano, Jesus Sanroma); Introduction and Scene—The "Gypsies" (Evening)—The Returning Spirit—Dance of Terror—The Magic Circle (Narrative of the Fisherman)—Midnight (Sorceries)—Ritual Dance of Fire (to Dispel Evil Spirits). Wagner, Bacchanale ("Der Venusberg") from "Tannhauser" Wagner, Funeral Music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung"; Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

---

afternoon.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is out of town, so there is a halt to the Russian invasion, and next week no Russian composer will be represented. The program as now arranged is as follows: Elgar's orchestral transcription of a fantasia and fugue by Bach; Respighi's Concerto Gregoriano for violin to be played by Albert Spalding—he has played it this season at Chicago and Detroit—the "Ride of the Valkyries," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Rienzi."

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, distinguished new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose coming to Hartford at the Capitol Theater on Sunday, February 1, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick, marks one of the most important musical events of the entire season. (C) Garo

KOUSSEVITZKY IN NEW YORK DEBUT QUICKLY LIONIZED BY EAGER THRONG

Personality of New Boston Symphony Conductor Is Found That of Reserved Musician Rather Than Showman—Exquisite Soft Effects Rather Than Big Climaxes Noted at First Concerts—Playing of Debussy Is High Mark of Programs — Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" Given as Novelty—Another Version of "Pacific 231"

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY has ceased to be a fable in New York. With the two concerts which served to auspiciate the Boston Symphony's Manhattan series last week, he became a quite tangible actuality instead of a somewhat remote object of réclame. And in this actualization, there was a winnowing of wings—the wings of myths taking flight.

The Russian conductor's first New York audiences included a liberal number of persons who had heard some of the celebrated Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris or London—with here and there one who could look back further to antebellum experiences in Muscovy. But for most of those who crammed Carnegie Hall to hear the programs of Nov. 27 and 29, the successor of Monteux came as a legend curiously different from the reality that was uncurtained at these two concerts. Perhaps the prevenient conceptions may find more justification later on. The chronicler can only make due entry now that there was a quite general readjustment of perspectives Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

New York's welcome to Mr. Koussevitzky was all that had been anticipated. After both concerts the audience remained to applaud him long and warmly, and he was recalled to the platform many times to bow his sober acknowledgements. Indeed, his hearers seemed more anxious to pay tribute than he was to receive it. Perhaps no conductor of recent memory has been more quick to employ effective devices to prevent or check handclapping in places where it usually occurs but is not altogether desirable—as between movements of a suite or concerto. But through one of those curious shapings of mass opinion, these audiences had made up their minds to have a "sensation" in Mr. Koussevitzky, and when his own rather reticent personality did not supply it, they had it anyway.

There was, indeed, something enigmatic and cryptic in the newcomer's individuality at these concerts. In appearance, his auditors found before them a well set-up and trim figure, rather military while conducting, but suggesting a self-conscious reserve when facing outward toward his applauders. On entering and leaving the stage, Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to desire to be as inconspicuous as possible.

[Continued on page 9]

Second Class Matter, January 25, 1906, at the Price, $4.00 a Year. Copyright 1924.

Famous Russian Leads Boston Symphony in Familiar Works and Presents Novelty by Prokofieff—Programs by Three New York Orchestras

[Continued from page 1]

The first impression he gave with the bâton Thursday evening was that of a precisionist and a detailist. There was very little which had any semblance of the sensational or the virtuosic. His technic with the stick was at once evident, as was musicianship of a very high order. His beat, for the most part, was unobtrusive—often an almost imperceptible wrist movement in which the arm had virtually no play. For the pianissimo effects on which he seemed to place unusual value, he held his left hand straight overhead. When more than the wrists and hands were called into action, the movement was a full arm swing—seldom a motion from the elbow. There was almost nothing of hair-tossing or bodily contortion.

Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky went a little further in what may be regarded as conductorial mannerisms—such as turning toward the violins as if his beat were exclusively for them. Also, he permitted the entire orchestra to play without his beat for some little time, something which so fine an organization as the Boston Symphony doubtless can do whenever called upon. Here, at least, the conductor's very quietude became a little ostentatious.

Of his ends and aims, clarity and finish seemed most sought after in Mr. Koussevitzky's readings. Tempestuous he was not. Exquisite he frequently was. Always he let the light shine through the structure of the music, even when details of his interpretations and unusual alterations of pace caused something of a strain on the edifice. He be presented this week in the Ritz theater. Haines' first contract called for a salary of $50 per week, but after his great success in King Vidor's "Three Wise Fools," he was called up on the carpet and given a contract with a real salary attached to it.

Serge

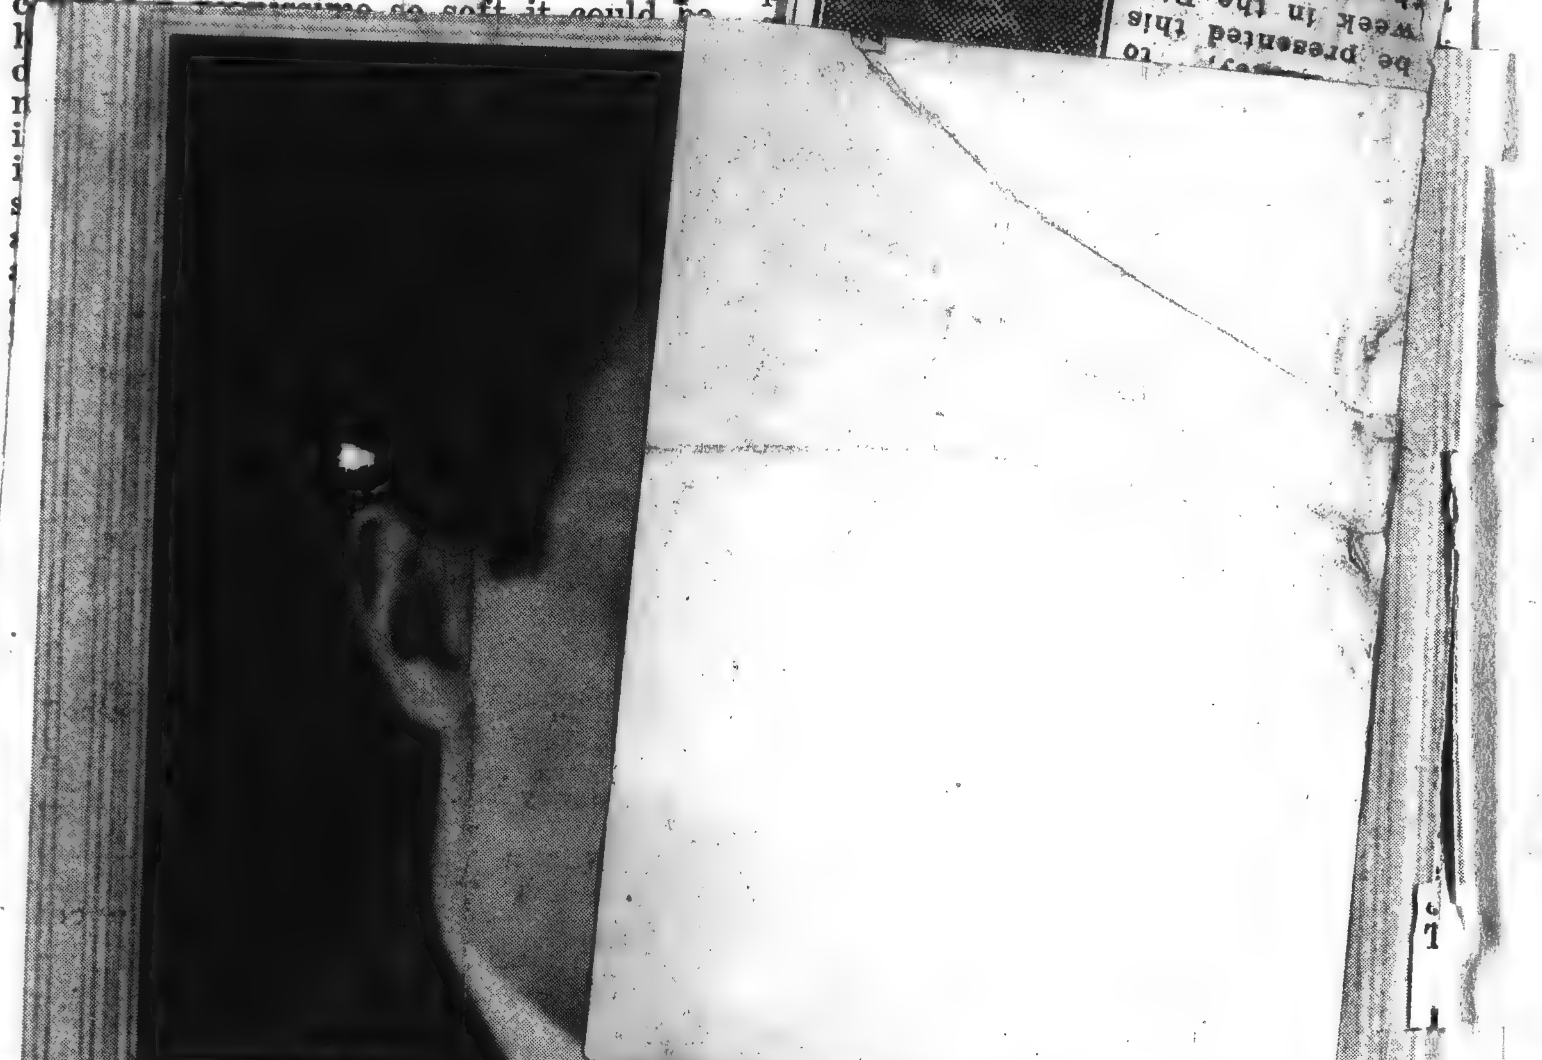
William Haines.

Smart Musical Show.

Manager George Jaffe has engaged "How Come," a musical comedy presented by a company of Negro players, for this week at the Academy. The show has been presented in the eastern cities and is said to be one of the best of its kind.

CAMEO



Issue of

JAN 1925

Koussevitzky with Boston Symphony Makes Decided Impression

The thirty-ninth New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began with the concert November 27, at Carnegie Hall, on which occasion Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of that body of players, appeared for the first time before a New York audience.

"The interest of the audience," says W. J. Henderson of the Sun, "inevitably centered itself on the conductor." Mr. Henderson proceeds to tell with admirable brevity, the things that the average music lover (if music lovers can ever be said to be average) wants to know about this distinguished Russian whose coming had been so much noised abroad that Carnegie Hall was sold from pit to galleries for his first appearance.

"Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky," Mr. Henderson says, "was born in 1874 in Vyshny Volotchk, Russia. He studied at the Moscow Conservatory and became a professor there. He developed first into a celebrated double bass virtuoso and afterward became a distinguished conductor. He has composed a concerto for double bass and founded a society for the promotion of Russian music in Berlin. He has conducted with great success in Paris and London as well as in other cities of Europe."

Beyond such details the critic for the Sun believes that what the public chiefly wants to know is "whether the Boston Symphony, in the language of the curbstone, is going to 'stage a comeback.'"

Consensus of critical opinion seems to be that the "comeback," under Mr. Koussevitzky has been set in motion, though the reviewers for the most part were so much concerned with discussing details of Mr. Koussevitzky's program, which consisted of the Vivaldi concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ (Siloti edition), Weber's "Oberon" overture, Debussy's nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," Arthur Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," that their appraisals of the program as a whole are somewhat hidden.

Lawrence Gilman, of the Herald Tribune, however, gives us a few general characterizations of the new conductor which are worth quoting, as Mr. Gilman's comments usually are.

"The whole man is flamingly responsive and alive," says Mr. Gilman. "Clarity of conception, quick sensibility, a comprehensive grasp of structure, a fusing and projecting imagination—these virtues are his beyond denial."

Mr. Gilman finds that Mr. Koussevitzky "has two outstanding traits that make for vividness: He has a dramatizing imagination, and he has a passion for

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JAN 2 1925

PROGRAM TO BE GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SUNDAY IN THE AUDITORIUM

The following notable program will be presented Sunday afternoon at 3.30 o'clock at the Auditorium by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association.

Haydn, Symphony in G major (Breitkopf and Hartel No. 13); I. Adagio, Allegro; II. Largo; III. Menuetto, Trio; IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito. De Falla, Suite from "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"); (Piano, Jesus Sanroma); Introduction and Scene—The "Gypsies" (Evening)—The Returning Spirit—Dance of Terror—The Magic Circle (Narrative of the Fisherman)—Midnight (Sorceries)—Ritual Dance of Fire (to Dispel Evil Spirits). Wagner, Bacchanale ("Der Venusberg") from "Tannhauser" Wagner, Funeral Music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung"; Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

Herald
Jan 1

afternoon.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is out of town, so there is a halt to the Russian invasion, and next week no Russian composer will be represented. The program as now arranged is as follows: Elgar's orchestral transcription of a fantasia and fugue by Bach; Respighi's Concerto Gregoriano for violin to be played by Albert Spalding—he has played it this season at Chicago and Detroit—the "Ride of the Valkyries," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Rienzi."

Hartford Courant

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, distinguished new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose coming to Hartford at the Capitol Theater on Sunday, February 1, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick, marks one of the most important musical events of the entire season. (C) Garo

A FAMOUS TOUR DOWN THE VOLGA

Legends Have Arisen About This Serge Koussevitzky Affair.

FAMOUS CONDUCTOR HERE FEBRUARY 1

Will Direct Boston Symphony Orchestra at Capitol Theater.

There are a number of interesting episodes in the career of Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to appear at the Capitol Theater here on Sunday February 1. But probably there is no incident so entirely out of the ordinary, as the musical world goes, as his three trips down the Volga. There might have been more, but as extra-musical disturbances would have it, his tour in the spring of 1914 was his last.

Some legends have arisen about these Volga tours. One is that the concerts were free. They were not. Koussevitzky never patronized these most unusual of symphony publics. They paid the regular theater prices, listened to the concerts in their own town theaters; and were served with regular symphony programs.

Even with box-office accounts, Koussevitzky's Volga tours involved an appalling deficit. It is no simple matter to hire a hundred fine musicians, charter a steamer with accomodations for two hundred (counting musicians' wives, crew and friends), and sail for 3500 miles, stopping at towns of all sorts along the way. The tour lasted about four weeks.

Such an excursion was of course a chance for a Russian to study his people, and it is not surprising that Stanislavsky of the Russian Art Theater was the guest of one of these tours. Soriabin also made the journey and had the unique experience of observing his Symphonies suddenly thrust upon an absolutely untutored and incredibly receptive people. Edward Risler went along, and played in Beethoven's two standard piano concertos. Koussevitzky gave them such symphonies as Beethoven's 3rd and 7th, Rachmaninoff's 2nd, Tchaikovsky's 5th, Liszt's "Maseppa", Rimsky Korsakov's "Russian Easter" Overture, etc. In a word, the programs were such as are regularly attended by the musically sophisticated in any great metropolis.

A. M. Abell, a guest on the last tour, thus describes the effect which this music made:

"I was deeply interested in observing the effect that such music, magnificently played, made on those audiences. Although musically uncultured they were very intelligent and highly receptive. They displayed an instinctive feeling far the lofty and the beautiful and reacted to Koussevitzky's spirited readings as a high strung horse does to a master hand at the bridle.

The enthusiasm was genuine and spontaneous and the auditors listened with rapt attention. It was like watching the face of an unspoiled child while listening to a beautiful fairy tale and, indeed, to those Russians on the remote Volga this was a veritable fairyland of beauty that Koussevitzky revealed to them. Before this advent they had never heard a symphony orchestra and had never even seen many of the instruments. At Saratow, a deputation of the citizens called on Koussevitzky at his hotel and requested that he place the harps at the front of the stage at the concert in order that the people could see and admire those beautiful golden instruments.

A few hundred miles north of Astrakhan we visited a tribe of Kalmucks, a wild nomadic people living in tents something after the manner of our Indians. Strange to say, these half-savage people were worshippers of Buddha and carried a Buddhist Temple about with them on their wanderings over the trackless steppes. When the tribe saw the big steamer approaching, their shore, they thought that the Czar had come to make them a visit and they turned out in full force to welcome us. The men proved to be very friendly and I took some interesting snapshots of them, but the women were very shy and would not be photographed, believing that the camera was an intrument of the devil."

The local concert will be given under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The seat sale is now in progress and tickets may be obtained at Sedgwick & Casey's music store No. 139 Asylum street.

JAPAN DEPARTMENT

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 2 1925

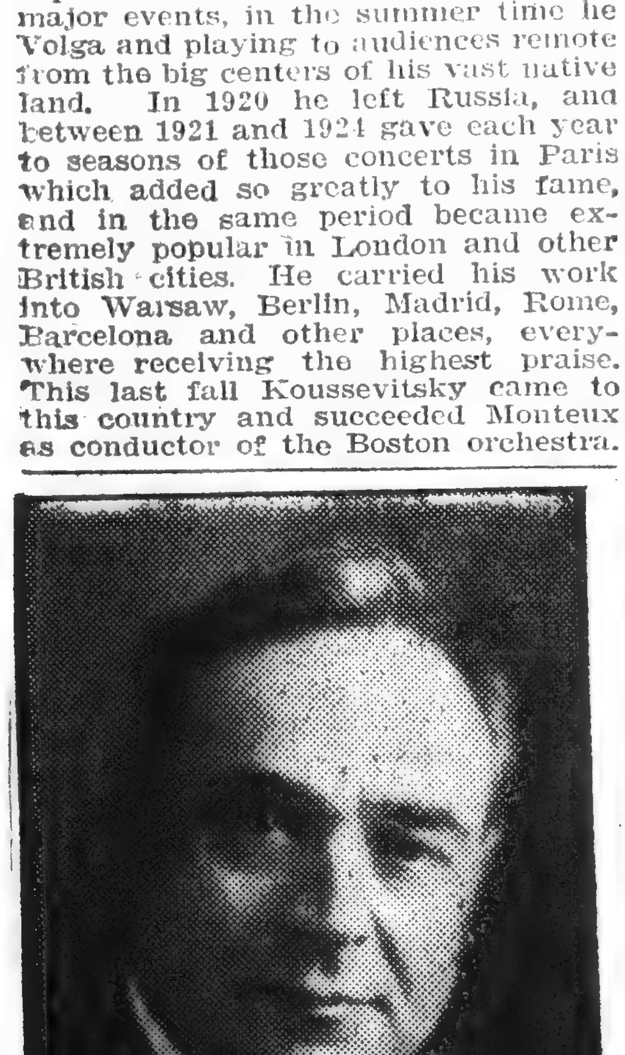
BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR MAKES BOW HERE SUNDAY

Serge Koussevitsky, Noted Leader, Will Bring Famous Orchestra For "Y" Auditorium Concert

Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will make his bow to a Springfield audience on Sunday afternoon at the Auditorium when the famous organization makes its annual visit to this city under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A.

A volume might be written about this remarkable Russian genius. Since he was 10, when he was appointed chef d'orchestra of his native town in North Russia, he has been composing and directing music, rising higher and higher in the scale of masters until his fame is equal at least to that of any other living conductor. Lovers of classic music have fallen under his spell in Russia, France, England, Germany and other European countries, and now judging from the reception he has received here, it seems to be America's turn to come into line.

The Koussevitsky orchestra, which was formed in 1909 of the best players from other Russian orchestras, quickly became famous, as also did his Moscow mixed chorus of 250 voices. He conducted the celebrated Archangelsky choir in Petrograd and also gave Bach, Beethoven, Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakog festivals in the capital cities of Russia. Besides these major events, in the summer time he Volga and playing to audiences remote from the big centers of his vast native land. In 1920 he left Russia, and between 1921 and 1924 gave each year to seasons of those concerts in Paris which added so greatly to his fame, and in the same period became extremely popular in London and other British cities. He carried his work into Warsaw, Berlin, Madrid, Rome, Barcelona and other places, everywhere receiving the highest praise. This last fall Koussevitsky came to this country and succeeded Monteux as conductor of the Boston orchestra.



SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

Noted Musician at Auditorium "Y" Concert

He has justified all that was claimed for him, both at Boston and New York city.

The side doors will be opened at 2 p. m.; the front doors at 2.45. The concert will commence at 3 sharp. Both season and free tickets can be obtained at the Y. M. C. A. and the principal music stores.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

JAN 2 — 1925

REALM OF MUSIC

By Frank H. Warren

MYRA HESS PIANIST
DUSOLINA GIANNINI
WILLIAM FURTWAENGLER GUEST CONDUCTOR PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA
MARIO CHAMLEE WITH SCHOLA CANTORUM.

THREE-QUARTERS of the Boston Symphony's program played last evening was all color, repose, beauty, charm and grace, a fitting musical introduction to a new year. This happy brew was distilled from Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and a symphony in three brief movements by Henri Rigel, who lived and sang when America was in the making, from 1741 to 1799.

Rigel spent much of his life in Paris, where he was known as a skillful clavecin player, a teacher, conductor and composer. He has six symphonies to his credit, all of them showing the influence of the French school of his day. The symphony heard last evening, that D minor, was being played, it was stated, for the first time in New York. Its movements, allegro, andante and presto, are the essence of grace; they exude lightness, fancy, humor and style and sound remarkably fresh. Conductor Koussevitzky handled them with a deft touch and the Boston men responded with equal delicacy. The Schubert symphony, too, was played with exceptional balance and feeling. There was a haunting sadness about it.

The final piece, Stravinsky's sensational "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring"), a picture of pagan Russia, put to rout all our good resolutions induced by the music of Schubert and Rigel. "Le Sacre," in fact, would put most anything to rout. This shrieking, groaning, rhythmical monster, since it was born in 1913 has worked its way up through the musical kingdom from a thing hissed and hooted until it is now generally accepted as Stravinsky's masterpiece and is greeted with admiration and applause. Pierre Monteux and the Boston Orchestra introduced it to us last January, repeating it at a March concert in response to insistent demands. The orchestra having played it close to twenty times, its technical intricacies are an open book to the musicians. The point last night, then, was what Mr. Koussevitzky would make of it.

It may have been that, with no glamour and excitement of a first hearing to stir us, our attention was inclined to wander and we missed the expected thrills; or it may have been that Mr. Koussevitzky failed to get that impulsive, primitive drive into the music his predecessor was so successful in catching. We found ourselves admiring the original effects and harmonic combinations the composer obtains without being moved by them and wondering at times whether he might not be spoofing us.

But none can gainsay the marvelous originality of the style of "Le Sacre," nor remain callous to its frequent passages of extreme beauty and the striking orchestral coloring. It describes a sacrificial spring rite of our primordial, protoplasmic ancestors, though one's fancy could apply it to the goings-on of a modern New Year's Eve celebration.

The composer himself will, in a few days, personally conduct it, when it may turn out to be something else again. But everybody interested in the progress of music and sound combinations should hear it.

PAPER-

DATE-

The Boston Symphony

Musi[illegible] Ernest Newman's [illegible]umn

Bost[illegible] [illegible]hony Orchestra

LISTENI[illegible] [illegible]ST night would like or dislike [illegible] oussevitzky's reading of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony according to whether they agreed or disagreed with him on certain general principles. As with all these old works, Koussevitzky, in my humble opinion, brings the symphony up to date by taking it back to date. The whole question is, "What is a classic?" Koussevitzky gives the seemingly paradoxical but perfectly correct answer—"A romantic." No classic was ever a classic to himself: He is only a classic to us, who see him so far down the avenue of time that he is perspectivized, generalized,—a creature of a simpler day than ours, a formula, a period, a style rather than a man. But to himself he was a romantic,—not a formula or a style but a highly charged complex of atoms. The usual way of playing a classic,—especially the German way, with its respect for what is called, with unconscious humor, "tradition"—is to make him fit the modern conception of what his own epoch must have been,—which obviously could not have been the conception the men who lived in that epoch had of it, for it is dead to us, while to them it was alive. Koussevitzky's way with the classic is to try to see him [illegible] have seen himself,—a method [illegible] results in, say, the [illegible] Beethoven. [illegible] Haydn or Mozart or any of the bigger men. Last night's performance showed Koussevitzky and the orchestra as perfect masters of the miniature style.

Of "Le Sacre du Printemps" we had a performance that for technical finish and understanding of Stravinsky's intentions could probably not be bettered. The work wears rather badly. It no longer has any novelty of manner or texture for us; we now sit as calmly through the dissonances and the hurly-burly of the orchestra as we do through, say, any work of Strauss'. The "Sacre" is really quite an old work now, and we are as capable of seeing it coolly and objectively as any other music of our day. More than ever is it evident that it is made up in about equal parts of amazing genius, plodding and puzzled dullness, and pitiful commonplace,—and the commonplace will go sadly against it as time goes on. If Stravinsky could have gone on developing from the best of the "Sacre" and the "Nightingale" we should indeed have had a whole new chapter to add to the history of modern music. As it is, we have only the hint of the chapter. After that, Stravinsky's genius gradually gave out, and the commonplace took more and more complete possession of him, till it landed him in that last sad failure, the new piano concerto. The tail-end of a concert notice, however, is not the place to discuss in detail the probable position of Stravinsky in musical history. The subject is one for a special article.

ERNEST NEWMAN.

NEW YORK TIMES 27

3

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HERALD

JAN 2 1925

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

Koussevitzky Conducts Schubert, Stravinsky and Others at Boston Symphony Concert

The redoubtable Mr. Koussevitzky, accompanied by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came to town again last night for his second pair of concerts in these parts.

There may have been Cossack blood in his eye as he planned the program for his Thursday night concert, for he put upon it one of the works with which he has stirred up in Europe thick and acrid clouds of controversial dust—Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. Even in Boston, where Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the "Unfinished" a week ago, the chilling word "liberties" was heard in certain critical quarters which have been most approvingly disposed toward Mr. Koussevitzky; and the just and sensitive Mr. Parker went so far as to declare roundly that "first, last and all the time we shall be at odds over the conductor's version of the first movement."

Hence, perhaps, the supposititious blood in the conductor's eye, and his determination to try his version of the "Unfinished" on the folk of the province which he seems to have conquered at his first assault.

* * *

We heard Mr. Koussevitzky conduct this symphony at one of his Paris concerts in the spring of 1923, and we then confided to the columns of this journal the opinion that if Schubert could have heard Mr. Koussevitzky's version he might have liked it—after he got used to it. For Mr. Koussevitzky feels this symphony as an intensely dramatic utterance—a thing of violent dynamic contrasts, vehement, highly colored, sharply contrasted; so that one is moved to look at the title page of the score to see if the composer's name does not read "Franz Peter Ilytch Schubert." A whiff from the too heavily scented pages of another symphony in B minor appears to have blown upon certain measures of the "Unfinished" in this Slavic version.

Mr. Koussevitzky, indeed, is eager to finish what Schubert left unfinished. Though not in respect of duration; for Mr. Koussevitzky seems at times to take too much to heart the vow of Flaubert: "May I die like a dog rather than hasten a phrase that isn't ripe." And for Mr. Koussevitzky this ripening is a deliberate process.

But we have in mind rather his tendency to declaim what Schubert confided; to insist where Schubert hinted; to italicize what Schubert intimated. Certain allegro passages that have a quite simple and subordinate place in the scheme of the first movement, for example, are transformed into portentious adagios. The wistfulness of Schubert, always a little naïve, always spontaneous, becomes empurpled, self-conscious: you fancy Schubert uncomfortable in buskins, his face twitching under his tragic mask.

* * *

Now we have no patience with the notion that Schubert was a sort of guileless, romantic moron, a sentimental innocent. Read his diary—read what he said under date of March 27, 1824, two years after he wrote the B minor symphony: "My compositions in music are the product of my mind and spring from my sorrow . . . No one understands the grief or joy of others. We always imagine we are approaching each other, whereas we travel on parallel lines. Oh, the misery of him who experiences this!"

That is not the utterance of an innocent. Sir George Grove found in the B minor Symphony "the history of cruel disappointments and broken hopes"; and who can listen to those wailing E minor phrases for the violins that are answered in imitation by the violas and bassoons, in the first movement, without hearing in them the plaint of one who was acquainted with grief? And how truly dramatic this music is!

But Mr. Koussevitzky is not content with letting Schubert flow through him: He tints the glass; he hangs crepe on the doorbell; and we hear a Schubert become a little shrill, a little melodramatic.

* * *

And yet, listening to Mr. Koussevitzky conduct Schubert's "Unfinished," we were not sure that we would have him do it differently. We remembered Montaigne: "The for and the against are both possible," he observed. There are fine and touching things in Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of this symphony; and we do not doubt that he really feels the music in that way.

"The more a soul conforms to the sanity of others, the more does it become insane," wrote Mary Webb, with striking sanity. The soul of Mr. Koussevitzky does not attempt to conform to the sanity of others; having made its own laws, it respects them, and so its power of self-government is unimpaired.

No music comes alive until it has passed through the personality of an interpreter. There is no such thing as getting Schubert, or any other composer, "straight." It must always be Schubert plus—Schubert plus Koussevitzky, or plus Stokowski, or plus Damrosch; and we are not of those who would insist in this instance that Koussevitzky has mixed too vitzky, what of it? The member in favor of his v it is consistent with its o it has true eloquence.

We have never heard play the famous 'cello tu movement as if it were a ment to the chords of and violas above it; we that this was essentially the 'cellos, with accompa but perhaps Mr. Koussevi and it is all the rest of u of step.

But how admirably he Andante; how lovingly h the detail of the beautifu and how sensitively he ko right! That little phrase o for the violas in the tw measure, for example, wit tial A, that is so often slur lified, had exactly the righ emphasis; and there were instances of a similar fine ception and delicacy of ea

* * *

The conductor was happ little ten-minute "sympho Joseph Riegel, that Fra contemporary of Mozart which he introduced to Ne work is inconsequential, beautifully played.

We own to being a bit in Mr. Koussevitzky's perf Stravinsky's "Sacre du with which he closed his p seemed to us that the perf the superb work which we winter under Mr. Monteu some respects, more thri dramatic.

Mr. Koussevitzky was throughout the first part —especially in the gorgeous climax of the "Rondes pr which for the third time o us and took us captive. frenzied sacrificial dance o it seemed to us that he music to sag; the victim w posed; for, after all, she herself to death, and we sh her excitement.

A huge house listened t cert, and applauded every out stint or discrimination, lioz's "Carnaval Romain," w it, to the "Sacre," which Stravinskyan glory.

---

old composer, for making him something other than what he was to himself, while Koussevitzky's apparent romanticization of him is really the genuine classicism, for it makes him walk the earth in 1925 as he must have done in, say, 1825. From this point of view, Koussevitzky's reading of the Unfinished Symphony is a remarkable raising of Schubert from the grave in which the false classicism of tradition has buried him.

The psychological key to the first movement of the symphony is surely to be found in the later tragic metamorphoses of the opening phrase. Here we see Schubert, as we so often do elsewhere, hag-ridden, working himself up into a paroxysm of terror and self-pity. Hence it is right to make the first enunciation of the theme, as Koussevitzky does, a mysterious foreboding of this terror, and to put an extra tincture of sweetness into the second subject each time it recurs—that theme that is manifestly Schubert's attempt to dream the terror and the horror away. If you do not agree with the psychological point of view, Koussevitzky's reading will be all wrong; if you do agree, the reading is the most impressive imaginable.

One cann[illegible]gmatize in these matters: one either [illegible] from the conductor's premises o[illegible] not. [illegible] those who, like myself, [illegible] this view of a great moveme[illegible]n turned by the generality o[illegible] conductors into a mere piece of musical sugar candy, the performance was a stupendous piece of work, alike in conception and in the orchestral execution. And in the slow movement the playing was equally beautiful. We may wish, in the abstract, that Schubert could have said what he had to say without so much repetition; but at any rate the repetitions gave us time to drink our fill of the sheer sensuous loveliness of the wood-wind tone.

In the slow preamble to the "Carnaval Romain" overture, again, there was some exquisite playing, and a curious rightness of tempo; the mere pulse of the accompanying chords was extraordinarily satisfying. The carnival proper went with tremendous fire, and Koussevitzky made his usual effect with the couple of explosive sforzandi near the end.

The D major symphony of Riegel is a charming little work that Koussevitzky has made familiar to European audiences. It is interesting not only in itself, but as a hint of the large number of works belonging to the symphony's age of infancy that must be well worth reviving. Riegel was not a great master, and in any case he was working in a form that was as yet hardly out of its swaddling clothes; but he certainly had individuality. As with Boccherini and Dittersdorf and others of the period, he brings into symphonic music a vein the [illegible] marks of [illegible] uivalent of which is not [illegible] those of co[illegible] d in

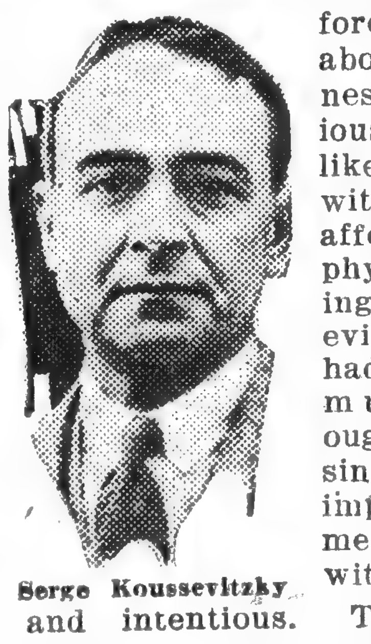
---

PAPER— N.Y. Amer.

DATE— Jan 2

THE first excitement attendant upon Serge Koussevitzky's debut appearances here being over, one could view his work a bit more judicially last evening at his Carnegie Hall concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky confirmed all the previous good things that have been written about him. As before he went about his business in a serious, workmanlike manner, without fuss, affectation, or physical posing, and it was evident that he had studied his music thoroughly, felt it sincerely, and impressed his men completely with his ideas and intentious. They carried them out with technical finish and fine qualities of tone. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays infinitely better than it did under its previous leader, Pierre Monteux.



Serge Koussevitzky

This was evident, especially in Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," in which Koussevitzky excelled his predecessor in precision, brilliancy and power of projecting a cohesive and eloquent musical story. It was conducting and orchestral interpretation and execution of the first order. The composition itself again impressed me as a pregnant, imaginative and gripping score.

Unfortunately, holiday exigencies made me miss the programmed Berlioz' "Roman Carnival," Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Riegel's unfamiliar C major Symphony.

As I was leaving the hall, still feeling the vital effect of the Stravinsky measures, a musician friend remarked: "Rotten stuff." That's what music does.

His personality is an extremely forceful one and it is without extravagance. Koussewitsky shows an admirable reticence of gesture; he does not impair the dignity of his bearing through rhapsodical writhings. It is quite evident that his work is thoroughly done at rehearsals, and that the players of the Boston Orchestra do not need the stimulus of posturing when the public concert comes to hand. A slight gesture is sufficient, a mere indication of a detail thoroughly worked out in rehearsal privacy.

This command exercised over the orchestra results in fine things. For it is the physical sign of the man's temperament and intellect. Mr. Koussewitsky has a vivifying musical intelligence; he has both the emotional and intellectual capacity of a great musician. His sensibility is large and is evident in the fervor, the singularly convincing utterance of the orchestra. Last evening's "Sacre du Printempts" was an elemental experience. One felt in this reading and this performance the vast forces that Strawinsky has unchained in his score.

Rigel's Symphony, discovered and given a first performance by Koussewitsky, is music of a pleasant, effortless sort. It has the lightness of Sixteenth Century Romanticism. The Schubert in performance was perhaps the least satisfactory moment of the evening. To it Koussewitsky lent a nuance of the sensational, and no one can accuse Schubert of sensationalism. The Berlioz overture was a brilliant bit of orchestral virtuosity. The audience, as we have hinted, left in complete satisfaction.

* * *

ON Wednesday evening, at the Opera House, Florence Easton gave a very capable performance of Butterfly. One continues to be amazed by the praiseworthy restraint that she exercises where more melodramatic technique would be so simple. Chamlee replaced Martinelli as Pinkerton and Scotti was, of course, the only possible Sharpless.

A "Parsifal" on Thursday afternoon marked the last appearance for the season of Margaret Matzenauer, who sang Kundry. Messrs. Laubenthal, Whitehill, Bender and Schutzendorf sang the male principals. In the evening Jeritza made her first subscription appearance as Fedora for this season.

* * *

THE matinee yesterday of the Symphony Society in Carnegie Hall had as its soloist Toti Dal Monte, coloratura of Italian fame, who has made two appearances with the Metropolitan Opera Company.

It is, of course, a concert curiosity to hear "Caro Nome" at an orchestral affair, but it is the sort of thing that Mme. Dal Monte can do with the air of art. Her discretion is as admirable as her voice, since she attempts no effects which do not lie within the range of her possibilities.

Mr. Damrosch conducted Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, Schumann's "Evensong," and a novelty by Maurice Ravel, which a "Parsifal" did not permit us to hear. The score will be played at the approaching Brooklyn matinee of the Symphony Society and will be considered on that occasion. The symphony received a choppy, pedestrian reading, and the Schumann transcription is one of those poisonous affairs that can have only one destiny. Pierne's "Entrance of the Little Fauns" was delightfully done.

EDWARD CUSHING.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN

JAN 2 1925

Boston Symphony's Concert

Plays Joseph Rigel's Symphony, a Composition with Ingenuous Charm.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Berlioz's overture "The Roman Carnival," Schubert's unfinished symphony, Henry Joseph Rigel's D major symphony and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." Rigel was an eighteenth century musician of whom we are told with some apparent pleasure that he is not mentioned in Grove's "Dictionary."

However, the curious may find sufficient information about him in Fetis's "Biographie Universelle." He was born in Wertheim and died in Paris in 1799. He wrote several symphonies, oratorios, operas, quartets and various other works. Gossec produced some of his symphonies in Paris and he himself conducted for a time the Concerts Spirituels. All of which goes to show that he was a considerable perswonage in his day.

Mr. Koussevitzy, who evidently aspires to be a discoverer, unearthed the symphony heard last evening and performed it in Europe last summer. Whether contemporaneous music lovers can be interested permanently in resurrected compositions of the past or not, such pieces when possessed of real merit should be accorded a chance for a second life. Mr. Sam Franko's concerts of old music used to bring to our acquaintance buried music well worth his trouble in digging it up.

A Brief Composition.

The Rigel symphony proved to be a very brief and naive composition with an ingenuous charm quite irresistible. It sounded as if it might have been composed by Haydn in his ch' hood, but it did not lack individ

The shmeless realism of the thing and its stupendous orchestral virtuosity make our blood dangerous to us. We are ready to rush out into Seventh avenue and bay at the street lamps till the prosaic policeman in front of the hall warns us of the terrors of a magistrate's inartistic realism. This music lover listened to the first part of the work only, but again rejoiced in the astounding power of the thing and the supreme mastery of his material shown by the composer.

We loved the simple diatonic passages and doted on the polytonal parts. Everything justified itself, even the beginning, which hinted that locomotives of the Pacific type ran through the spring too. The performance of the composition was magnificent. Mr. Koussevitky knew the score and had penetrated to its inner most purposes. The orchestra had been perfectly rehearsed. Result, something that would have staggered Commonwealth avenue and exploded the St. Botolph Club twenty years ago. But as Themistocles remarked to Antiphales: "Time, young man, has taught us both a lesson."

PAPER— Transcript

DATE— Jan 2

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Stravinsky and Strife

TO the schism over jazz succeeds the schism over Stravinsky—or, more accurately, over Mr. Koussevitzky's version of that composer on the pages of "The Rite of Spring." The Symphony Orchestra had hardly played the monstruous, thunderous chord that consummates the sacrifice, before the dispute began. Now it has arrayed on one side or the other nearly all the resident amateurs of modernist music, and quite all the connoisseurs in the art of conducting. The discussion pivots upon a single question: Did or did not Mr. Koussevitzky's version of "Le Sacre" better in December the remembered version of Mr. Monteux in the preceding January and April? More particularly: Did the Russian excel the Parisian with the intrinsic savagery of the music—the primeval voice in which it cries or broods; the barbaric frenzies with which it shouts and stamps? Or yet again: Did not Mr. Koussevitzky seek to poetize the piece; whereas Mr. Monteux was content with the naked letter of Stravinsky's pages?

The fact that the recent repetitions of "The Rite" were the fifth and the sixth performances of the tone-poem at Symphony Hall within a year, undoubtedly told against Mr. Koussevitzky. Audiences taut with anticipation, heard "Le Sacre" last January and, in degree, last April. A week ago, nine out of every ten hearers held the piece in more or less vivid remembrance. Unless sundry personal experiences and much comparing of notes go wrong, no subsequent hearing of Stravinsky's music quite renews the sensations of the first. Ever after, the savagery no longer surprises; the fangs of the monster bite not so deep. Reach a fourth or a fifth repetition within a brief interval (as many did in Symphony Hall last week), and in relatively cool blood not a few follow the signs and wonders of the Stravinskian frenzies. By so much was Mr. Koussevitzky handicapped, though he led an orchestra surer of itself with the tone-poem than it had ever been under Mr. Monteux.

Yet, as not a few believe, by the evidence of their own ears and the response of their own emotions, the Russian overcame this disadvantage. Memory is a treacherous thing; but it is hard to believe that Mr. Monteux ever made the harmonies and timbres, the progressions and modulations, cut and thrust, bite and sting, worm out and scream out, as did his successor. On that score Mr. Koussevitsky's performance was revelation, even to imaginative students of Stravinsky's pages. As Mr. Monteux played the piece, from moment to moment the listener tried to recall the setting and the action of the stage. Heard from Mr. Koussevitsky, the music sufficed almost always in itself. Especially in Part II., did he attain a mystery and dread, a releasing frenzy and mounting fury of sacrificial transport, quite beyond his predecessor's imagination. To one recollection, once and once only did Mr. Monteux exceed Mr. Koussevitsky in savage voice to the music—when, not far from the beginning of the tone-poem, the rhythm beats as though in myriad feet were the pulse of

NEW YORK 27

3

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HERALD

My

JAN 2 1925

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

Koussevitzky Conducts Schubert, Stravinsky and Others at Boston Symphony Concert

The redoubtable Mr. Koussevitzky, accompanied by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came to town again last night for his second pair of concerts in these parts.

There may have been Cossack blood in his eye as he planned the program for his Thursday night concert, for he put upon it one of the works with which he has stirred up in Europe thick and acrid clouds of controversial dust—Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. Even in Boston, where Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the "Unfinished" a week ago, the chilling word "liberties" was heard in certain critical quarters which have been most approvingly disposed toward Mr. Koussevitzky; and the just and sensitive Mr. Parker went so far as to declare roundly that "first, last and all the time we shall be at odds over the conductor's version of the first movement."

Hence, perhaps, the supposititious blood in the conductor's eye, and his determination to try his version of the "Unfinished" on the folk of the province which he seems to have conquered at his first assault.

* * *

We heard Mr. Koussevitzky conduct this symphony at one of his Paris concerts in the spring of 1923, and we then confided to the columns of this journal the opinion that if Schubert could have heard Mr. Koussevitzky's version he might have liked it—after he got used to it. For Mr. Koussevitzky feels this symphony as an intensely dramatic utterance—a thing of violent dynamic contrasts, vehement, highly colored, sharply contrasted; so that one is moved to look at the title page of the score to see if the composer's name does not read "Franz Peter Ilytch Schubert." A whiff from the too heavily scented pages of another symphony in B minor appears to have blown upon certain measures of the "Unfinished" in this Slavic version.

Mr. Koussevitzky, indeed, is eager to finish what Schubert left unfinished. Though not in respect of duration; for Mr. Koussevitzky seems at times to take too much to heart the vow of Flaubert: "May I die like a dog rather than hasten a phrase that isn't ripe." And for Mr. Koussevitzky this ripening is a deliberate process.

But we have in mind rather his tendency to declaim what Schubert confided; to insist where Schubert hinted; to italicize what Schubert intimated. Certain allegro passages that have a quite simple and subordinate place in the scheme of the first movement, for example, are transformed into portentious adagios. The wistfulness of Schubert, always a little naïve, always spontaneous, becomes empurpled, self-conscious: you fancy Schubert uncomfortable in buskins, his face twitching under his tragic mask.

* * *

Now we have no patience with the notion that Schubert was a sort of guileless, romantic moron, a sentimental innocent. Read his diary—read what he said under date of March 27, 1824, two years after he wrote the B minor symphony: "My compositions in music are the product of my mind and spring from my sorrow . . . No one understands the grief or joy of others. We always imagine we are approaching each other, whereas we travel on parallel lines. Oh, the misery of him who experiences this!"

That is not the utterance of an innocent. Sir George Grove found in the B minor Symphony "the history of cruel disappointments and broken hopes"; and who can listen to those wailing E minor phrases for the violins that are answered in imitation by the violas and bassoons, in the first movement, without hearing in them the plaint of one who was acquainted with grief? And how truly dramatic this music is!

But Mr. Koussevitzky is not content with letting Schubert flow through him: He tints the glass; he hangs crepe on the doorbell; and we hear a Schubert become a little shrill, a little melodramatic.

* * *

And yet, listening to Mr. Koussevitzky conduct Schubert's "Unfinished," we were not sure that we would have him do it differently. We remembered Montaigne: "The for and the against are both possible," he observed. There are fine and touching things in Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of this symphony; and we do not doubt that he really feels the music in that way.

"The more a soul conforms to the sanity of others, the more does it become insane," wrote Mary Webb, with striking sanity. The soul of Mr. Koussevitzky does not attempt to conform to the sanity of others; having made its own laws, it respects them, and so its power of self-government is unimpaired.

No music comes alive until it has passed through the personality of an interpreter. There is no such thing as getting Schubert, or any other composer, "straight." It must always be Schubert plus—Schubert plus Koussevitzky, or plus Stokowski, or plus Damrosch; and we are not of those who would insist in this instance that Koussevitzky has mixed too [illegible] vitzky, what of it? The point to remember in favor of his version is that it is consistent with its own laws; and it has true eloquence.

We have never heard any one else play the famous 'cello tune in the first movement as if it were an accompaniment to the chords of the clarinets and violas above it; we had supposed that this was essentially a melody for the 'cellos, with accompanying chords; but perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky is right, and it is all the rest of us who are out of step.

But how admirably he played the Andante; how lovingly he dealt with the detail of the beautiful movement, and how sensitively he kept the focus right! That little phrase of three notes for the violas in the twenty-seventh measure, for example, with its essential A, that is so often slurred and nullified, had exactly the right shape and emphasis; and there were many other instances of a similar fineness of perception and delicacy of ear.

* * *

The conductor was happy, too, in the little ten-minute "symphony" by Henri Joseph Riegel, that Franco-Teutonic contemporary of Mozart and Haydn, which he introduced to New York. The work is inconsequential, but it was beautifully played.

We own to being a bit disappointed in Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," with which he closed his program. It seemed to us that the performances of the superb work which we heard last winter under Mr. Monteux were, in some respects, more thrilling, more dramatic.

Mr. Koussevitzky was magnificent throughout the first part of the work—especially in the gorgeous ponnytonal climax of the "Rondes printanières," which for the third time overwhelmed us and took us captive. But in the frenzied sacrificial dance of the Finale it seemed to us that he allowed the music to sag; the victim was too composed; for, after all, she is dancing herself to death, and we should share her excitement.

A huge house listened to the concert, and applauded everything without stint or discrimination, from Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain," which began it, to the "Sacre," which ended it in Stravinskyan glory.

PAPER— N.Y. American

DATE— Jan 2

THE first excitement attendant upon Serge Koussevitzky's debut appearances here being over, one could view his work a bit more judicially last evening at his Carnegie Hall concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky confirmed all the previous good things that have been written about him. As before he went about his business in a serious, workmanlike manner, without fuss, affectation, or physical posing, and it was evident that he had studied his music thoroughly, felt it sincerely, and impressed his men completely with his ideas and intentions. They carried them out with technical finish and fine qualities of tone. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays infinitely better than it did under its previous leader, Pierre Monteux.

Serge Koussevitzky

This was evident, especially in Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," in which Koussevitzky excelled his predecessor in precision, brilliancy and power of projecting a cohesive and eloquent musical story. It was conducting and orchestral interpretation and execution of the first order. The composition itself again impressed me as a pregnant, imaginative and gripping score.

Unfortunately, holiday exigencies made me miss the programmed Berlioz' "Roman Carnival," Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Riegel's unfamiliar C major Symphony.

As I was leaving the hall, still feeling the vital effect of the Stravinsky measures, a musician friend remarked: "Rotten stuff." That's what music does.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 2 - 1925

MUSIC OF THE DAY

MR. KOUSSEWITSKY paid Carnegie Hall a second visit last evening, bringing with him his new orchestra. For the program he again selected such a medley of styles as distinguished his first Metropolitan appearances: The "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, a symphony by a predecessor of Mozart, Rigel, and Strawinsky's "Sacre du Printempts." The house which greeted this eminent Russian conductor showed no empty stalls, included most of the musicians in town and was of unbounded enthusiasm.

There no longer remains any reason for discussing Mr. Koussewitsky's right to distinction. He is undoubtedly the most salient personality now wielding a baton—his genius is as evident—if we may venture a vulgarity—as the nose on his face, and his faults are the marks of that genius. Nor can he be quarreled with for offering programs of such inclusive variety. He was preceded to America by sensational press matter, and he feels naturally called upon to evidence his ableness as a conductor. Variety in the orchestral program is, additionally, to be desired. We have heard sufficient of standardization, and if Mr. Koussewitsky cares to give us classic, romantic and modern music within the space of an evening he displays the marks of intelligence rather than those of courage.

His personality is an extremely forceful one and it is without extravagance. Koussewitsky shows an admirable reticence of gesture; he does not impair the dignity of his bearing through rhapsodical writhings. It is quite evident that his work is thoroughly done at rehearsals, and that the players of the Boston Orchestra do not need the stimulus of posturing when the public concert comes to hand. A slight gesture is sufficient, a mere indication of a detail thoroughly worked out in rehearsal privacy.

This command exercised over the orchestra results in fine things. For it is the physical sign of the man's temperament and intellect. Mr. Koussewitsky has a vivifying musical intelligence; he has both the emotional and intellectual capacity of a great musician. His sensibility is large and is evident in the fervor, the singularly convincing utterance of the orchestra. Last evening's "Sacre du Printempts" was an elemental experience. One felt in this reading and this performance the vast forces that Strawinsky has unchained in his score.

Rigel's Symphony, discovered and given a first performance by Koussewitsky, is music of a pleasant, effortless sort. It has the lightness of Sixteenth Century Romanticism. The Schubert in performance was perhaps the least satisfactory moment of the evening. To it Koussewitsky lent a nuance of the sensational, and no one can accuse Schubert of sensationalism. The Berlioz overture was a brilliant bit of orchestral virtuosity. The audience, as we have hinted, left in complete satisfaction.

* * *

ON Wednes[illegible]y evening, at the Opera H[illegible]se, Florence Easton gave a very c[illegible]ble performance of Butterfly. O[illegible] continues to be amazed by the [illegible]aiseworthy restraint that she exerc[illegible]s where more melodramatic tech[illegible]ue would be so simple. Chamle[illegible] replaced Martinelli as Pinkerton [illegible]and Scotti was, of course, the o[illegible] possible Sharpless.

A "Parsifa[illegible] on Thursday afternoon marked [illegible]e last appearance for the season of [illegible]argaret Matzenauer, who sang Ku[illegible]ry. Messrs. Laubenthal, Whiteh[illegible] Bender and Schutzendorf sang [illegible] male principals. In the evening [illegible]ritza made her first subscription [illegible]ppearance as Fedora for this seas[illegible]

* *

THE ma[illegible]ee yesterday of the Sympho[illegible] Society in Carnegie Hall had a[illegible]its soloist Toti Dal Monte, colo[illegible]ura of Italian fame, who has ma[illegible]two appearances with the Metropo[illegible]n Opera Company.

It is, of co[illegible]e, a concert curiosity to hear "Car[illegible]Nome" at an orchestral affair, bu[illegible] is the sort of thing that Mme. D[illegible]Monte can do with the air of art[illegible] Her discretion is as admirable as h[illegible] voice, since she attempts no effe[illegible] which do not lie within the rang[illegible]of her possibilities.

Mr. Damrosc[illegible]conducted Tschaikowsky's Fifth [illegible]Symphony, Schumann's "Evenso[illegible]," and a novelty by Maurice Rav[illegible] which a "Parsifal" did not perm[illegible]us to hear. The score will be playe[illegible]at the approaching Brooklyn mat[illegible]ee of the Symphony Society and [illegible]will be considered on that occasi[illegible]. The symphony received a choppy, [illegible]edestrian reading, and the Schuma[illegible]n transcription is one of those poiso[illegible]ous affairs that can have only one d[illegible]stiny. Pierne's "Entrance of the Little Fauns" was delightfully done.

EDWARD CUSHING.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN

JAN 2 1925

TO-DAY

[illegible]isted in To-day's Program:

WJY	WOO
WJZ	WOR
WLS	WRC
WLW	WRW
WMAQ	WWJ
WNAC	CKAC
WNJ	CNRA
WNYC	CNRE
WOAW
WOC

KDKA—Pittsburgh—326.

:00 A. M.—Morning exercises.
:20 P. M.—Sunday school lesson.
:15 P. M.—Concert.
:30 P. M.—Bedtime story.
:15 P. M.—"The Stock Market," Prof. Montfort Jones.
:30 P. M.—Emilie Cole, soprano; Glynn Jones, barytone; Ulric Cole, pianist.

WCAE—Pittsburgh—462.

:30 P. M.—Sunshine Girl.
:30 P. M.—Dinner concert.
:30 P. M.—Uncle Kaybee.
:30 P. M.—Musical program.
:00 P. M.—Fischer's Orchestra.

WRC—Washington—469.

:00 P. M.—Fashion Developments.
:10 P. M.—Piano, Eleanor Glynn.
:20 P. M.—Beauty Talk.
:30 P. M.—Tea music.
:00 P. M.—Children's hour.

WCAP—Washington—469.

:45 P. M.—"The Evolution of the Stars," Henry Norris Russell.
:00 P. M.—Fischer's Orchestra.
:00 P. M.—Dance music.

WHAS—Louisville—400.

:00 P. M.—Alamo Orchestra.
:30 P. M.—Concert.

WFAA—Dallas—476.

:30 P. M.—Address Dr. Rober
:30 P. M.—Mrs. George S. Wat[illegible] prano, Mrs. Jesse Lee J[illegible] contralto.

WBAP—Fort Worth—476.

PAPER— Transcript

DATE— Jan 2

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Stravinsky and Strife

TO the schism over jazz succeeds the schism over Stravinsky—or, more accurately, over Mr. Koussevitzky's version of that composer on the pages of "The Rite of Spring." The Symphony Orchestra had hardly played the monstruous, thunderous chord that consummates the sacrifice, before the dispute began. Now it has arrayed on one side or the other nearly all the resident amateurs of modernist music, and quite all the connoisseurs in the art of conducting. The discussion pivots upon a single question: Did or did not Mr. Koussevitzky's version of "Le Sacre" better in December the remembered version of Mr. Monteux in the preceding January and April? More particularly: Did the Russian excel the Parisian with the intrinsic savagery of the music—the primeval voice in which it cries or broods; the barbaric frenzies with which it shouts and stamps? Or yet again: Did not Mr. Koussevitzky seek to poetize the piece; whereas Mr. Monteux was content with the naked letter of Stravinsky's pages?

The fact that the recent repetitions of "The Rite" were the fifth and the sixth performances of the tone-poem at Symphony Hall within a year, undoubtedly told against Mr. Koussevitzky. Audiences taut with anticipation, heard "Le Sacre" last January and, in degree, last April. A week ago, nine out of every ten hearers held the piece in more or less vivid remembrance. Unless sundry personal experiences and much comparing of notes go wrong, no subsequent hearing of Stravinsky's music quite renews the sensations of the first. Ever after, the savagery no longer surprises; the fangs of the monster bite not so deep. Reach a fourth or a fifth repetition within a brief interval (as many did in Symphony Hall last week), and in relatively cool blood not a few follow the signs and wonders of the Stravinskian frenzies. By so much was Mr. Koussevitzky handicapped, though he led an orchestra surer of itself with the tone-poem than it had ever been under Mr. Monteux.

Yet, as not a few believe, by the evidence of their own ears and the response of their own emotions, the Russian overcame this disadvantage. Memory is a treacherous thing; but it is hard to believe that Mr. Monteux ever made the harmonies and timbres, the progressions and modulations, cut and thrust, bite and sting, worm out and scream out, as did his successor. On that score Mr. Koussevitsky's performance was revelation, even to imaginative students of Stravinsky's pages. As Mr. Monteux played the piece, from moment to moment the listener tried to recall the setting and the action of the stage. Heard from Mr. Koussevitsky, the music sufficed almost always in itself. Especially in Part II., did he attain a mystery and dread, a releasing frenzy and mounting fury of sacrificial transport, quite beyond his predecessor's imagination. To one recollection, once and once only did Mr. Monteux exceed Mr. Koussevitsky in savage voice to the music—when, not far from the beginning of the tone-poem, the rhythm beats as though in myriad feet were the pulse of an awakening earth.

Mr. Monteux in London

For the first appearance (sic) in London of the French conductor, Monteux, famous through his work in Paris as an exponent of Stravinsky and other modern composers, and for his four (sic) years in America as director of the eclectic program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, we have to thank the British Broadcasters. That he should be ranked amongst the three or four "great" conductors of the generation was not quite proved by his concert. His wealth of significant gesture fails to achieve the fullest results, perhaps through a slight lack of suppleness in the wrist. However, his conception of the music is always a big one, and one well thought out in detail, offering that paradoxical combination of telescopic and microscopic vision that is one of the requirements of a musical interpreter. Pace is well chosen, and instrumental balance controlled. [Percy Scholes in The Observer.

Forthcoming Programs

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra will play the following pieces at their second supplementary concert in Symphony Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 12:

Symphony in G major (B. & H. 3)....Haydn
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra..Beethoven
(Violinist: Mr. Burgin)
Bacchanal from "Tannhäuser"—Siegfried's Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung"—Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"... ...Wagner

For his concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 11, Mr. de Pachmann sets a program that might have adorned his palmiest years, viz.:

Concerto in the Italian Style............Bach
Fantasia in C minor..................Mozart
Nocturne in E minor—Waltz in C-sharp minor—Preludes in A minor, B minor, B major (Op. 28)—Mazurka in A-flat major—Scherzo in E major.........Chopin Night Piece in D-flat ....Schumann
Eclogue in A-flat.....................Liszt
Rhapsody in B minor.................Br[illegible]

4

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
TIMES
JAN 2 1925

MUSIC
By OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony.

Serge Koussevitsky made his third appearance ~~in New York~~ as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. An uncommonly distinguished audience welcomed and applauded and recalled him. It is evident that he has found favor with this public.

The performances were singularly interesting and uneven in quality. They furnished for the first time in this city a clue to the highly conflicting reports of Mr. Koussevitsky's characteristics as an interpreter which preceded him from Europe. It would not be easy, for example, to play Berlioz's "Roman Carnaval" overture, which opened the program, with more dash and flare and brilliancy. We have seldom heard the introduction given such warm and languorous feeling, or hearkened to a more vivid, breath-taking treatment of the whirling finale. And what a score! A work, it seems, which can never grow old.

There followed Schubert's B minor symphony, a novelty in the form of a "symphony," so called, by one Henry Joseph Reigel, a little known composer of the late eighteenth century, and finally that composition which is still an event and an occasion of agitation and contention in musical circles when it is performed in an American musical centre, the "Sacre du printemps" of Stravinsky.

The symphony was dramatized, and this, in at least one listener's opinion, to an extent not justified by the contents of the score. That the first movement of the "Unfinished" symphony is deeply felt, and is truly, even poignantly dramatic, is perfectly evident, and was evident before Mr. Koussevitsky emphasized this fact so heavily with his baton. The question is, how far a conductor may go in what is praised or condemned as his individual "reading" of a long-recognized masterpiece. In recent days Mr. Stokowski gave such a "reading" of Cesar Franck's symphony. Mr. Koussevitsky, who has characteristics in common with him, went even further last night with the composition of Schubert, and certainly with no more justification. He pushed this detail into high prominence, altered tempi where it did not seem necessary to do so, prolonged measures and rests in a way that doubled or tripled the calculations of the composer.

The native simplicity of Schubert fled before this treatment. The performances of this balance of the form was disturbed, and so, with intention, was the balance of the instrumentation. All this had a logic of its own, if one began by admitting the validity of such a proceeding with Schubert, but the interpretation of the slow movement of the symphony could hardly be endorsed by even such reasoning. The pace was so slow that the movement seemed interminable.

It was testimony to the wind players that they could sustain their phrases as well as they did under the circumstances, though more than once there was poor tone-quality in this department of the orchestra. But that would have been a negligible matter had the interpretation been eloquent or convincing. For at least one listener it was not so. For this listener Schubert suffered materially by Koussevitsky's alterations.

There was a delightful performance of an unpretentious but pleasing work—the Rieger symphony—played with eighteenth century grace and humor. This is probably one of a hundred like "symphonies" heard at the Concerts Spirituels in the late seventeen hundreds. As Philip Hale remarks in the program book, it shows clearly the influence of the French school of Riegel's day, and of Gluck. Also, perhaps, of Mozart. It is, however, a pleasant work of a period when composers wrote like courteous gentlemen, whether or not they had anything to say.

But the performance most eagerly awaited was that of the "Rite of Spring," played here so effectively by Pierre Monteux, with the same orchestra, last season. In his reading Mr. Koussevitsky differed greatly from his predecessor. To say that one of these conductors was right and the other wrong in his interpretation is to make a statement dangerously sweeping. Most compositions, and particularly, perhaps, one of the style of the "Rite of Spring," admit of more than one interpretation—granted reasonable consistency with the directions of the composer as usually found in the score. Mr. Stravinsky will himself appear and reveal his own conception of his work in the near future in this city. Then those interested in such distinctions may be in a position to ascertain which interpretation corresponded most nearly to the original idea of the music.

In general—and rather to the surprise of his audience—Mr. Koussevitsky was more solicitous of detail than his predecessor, and he did with Stravinsky's music what he had done in a different way with Scriabine's "Poème de l'Extase" at a previous concert—that is, he held the orchestra back and down for many passages, leaving plenty of room for accelerations and climaxes. Thanks to this method, a number of passages had a sharpness of delineation that was new, and the logic and coherence of Stravinsky's development of his ideas was the more apparent. The climax of the first part of the "Sacre" was not louder than Mr. Monteux's; perhaps it was not as loud, but it did have vertiginous frenzy and power. There was for us more lyrical feeling in this reading, more tenderness, more mystery, more melancholy. The climax of the second part, on the other hand, seemed less effective. Whether this was growing familiarity with the music, so that it no longer shocks and stimulates as it did, or whether it was due to the conductor's methods is, frankly, a matter that this writer has not decided.

The composition again amazed and thrilled in many of its parts, and its structure and force of development seemed more overpowering than ever. More evident than ever, also, is the great beauty of certain passages, and a primitive vagueness and wonder that remind one strikingly of canvases of Rurik on exhibition in this city. Other places fell a little short, were repetitious, not in their exact form, but in the kind of response they elicited from the hearer. But this is anticipating the arrival of Mr. Stravinsky. His countryman, last night, read his score with originality, sensibility, imagination. Perhaps he was more cautious than he need have been; certainly he was more restrained in places than the only other interpreter of the "Sacre du Printemps" that America knows. He remained a musical individuality of unexpected and arresting qualities, and an interpreter whose coming is evidently a significant chapter in the history of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
JAN 2 192

MUSIC
By Deems Taylor

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The most momentous number on last night's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came at ~~the end,~~ when Mr. Koussevitzky gave us Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." The lapse of ten months since its last hearing does not in any wise dim the greatness of this work. There is nothing else in art exactly comparable to the uncanny completeness with which this music evokes the primitive. Considered for what it is, for what it claims to portray, it is quite perfect. The paintings of Gauguin approach it most nearly, perhaps; yet Gauguin at his nakedest is ages younger that the "Danse de la Terre," for instance, or the wonderful introduction to the second part, its dark pages quivering with the mystery, the unquiet beauty, the nameless menace of the primeval night.

The performance was not up to the score. Mr. Koussevitzky grasped the Stravinskian nettles with discretion rather than valor, so that the music seemed to lose the scope and terrific propulsive force that other performances have revealed. His orchestra played with consummate virtuosity, but somehow without complete conviction. What, under harsher treatment, had seemed terrible, became at times almost vulgar; and passages whose acrid harmonies used to claw and bite sounded merely discordant. It was almost as if Mr. Koussevitzky did not quite approve of primitive man.

Nor was the performance of a quite antipodal work, Schubert's unfinished symphony, any more satisfying. Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was carefully wrought, fastidious and a little weary. The famous cello passage in the first movement emerged in such an anemic condition that it was almost buried beneath the flutes and clarinets of the accompaniment, and the violins throughout sounded juiceless and feeble. It was not a question of quiet playing, but of devitalized playing. The orchestra seemed to have just energy enough to play the appointed notes, with not a vitamin to spare.

There were fortes, of course, plenty of them; but even the climaxes had a quality of exhaustion, of nervous violence rather than power. The second movement went better. Its lyric quality was more authentic and its lines were more unbroken. Yet even here Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was not extraordinarily imaginative. The end of the movement—virtually literal reprise of the beginning—was totally uninteresting, a repetition not alone of the notes but of the mood. No fresh light was thrown upon the music and one's attention began to wander.

Mr. Koussevitzky's best work was done in the brilliant, reckless performance he gave of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, which opened his program. He followed the Schubert work with another symphony, in three movements, by Henri Joseph Rigel, who died in Paris in the year 1799. It is a nice little piece, more in the mood of a suite than a symphony, music to take or leave. Its chief virtue, in the subdued and rather colorless reading it had, was to prepare a soft and pebbleless stamping ground for Stravinsky's wild men.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM
JAN 2 1925

Mr. Koussevitzky Expatiates.

A man owning an Alma Tadema, a Giotto, a Murillo, a David, a Marcel Duchamp might string them along one wall of a room regardless, and, luring his guests before them, expatiate on each in turn. He would not on that account be called a prima donna. He would simply be a proprietor and host, acting within his legitimate rights. Serge Koussevitzky at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra expatiated in ~~Carnegie~~ Hall last evening on the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, the "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert, a symphony in D major by Henri Joseph Rigel, and Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps." Mr. Koussevitzky has an indisputable right to make such a program, if he wishes.

An exceedingly brilliant performance of the overture may be set down as the most admirable feature of a curiously uneven, in some respects a baffling, concert. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed bent on transforming the romantically beautiful symphonic torso of Schubert into a world catastrophe. Two warring elements fought their inappropriate battle through the opening allegro and the andante con moto, the latter often treated as a largo.

Lyric episodes, like the famous second theme of the first movement, were toned down to unimportance. Transition passages were dragged almost to the breaking point. The stronger outbursts lumbered raucously, screaming for power and more power. At times the performance of the familiar music grazed burlesque; at others it merely bored.

Rigel (born Riegel) probably was not even a name to more than twenty members of the audience that packed Carnegie last night until the program for this concert was sent out. A composer like a hundred others of the latter half of the eighteenth century, Rigel, though a German by birth, lived most of his productive life in Paris, where he died; therefore a French composer. Gluck, whom Germany likewise lent to France, is said to have influenced his style. But in this D major symphony not Gluck but Mozart starts at you from Rigel's pages. Indeed, the clean steal from Mozart's A major piano sonata in the last of the three movements is the only feature of the work that sets it apart from numberless other symphonies of the same period.

That period is riding a wave of popularity in our concert rooms just now. Yesterday's audience obviously liked the symphony, mediocre and plagiaristic though it is in matter, just because of its Louis XVI. manner. Mr. Koussevitzky, who dug it up and restored it to use in Paris a year ago last spring, led it with great care and evident affection, and the band played it in most expert fashion.

Of course, the "Sacre" was, as we used to say, the "piece de resistance" of the program, and of course it has always been a favorite battle horse of the Koussevitzky concerts in Paris and in London. Moreover, the "Sacre" has become almost a specialty of the Boston orchestra. Mr. Monteux led several performances of it in Boston and two in New York last winter and spring. Mr. Koussevitzky, just before coming to New York, had conducted it at a pair of the orchestra's Boston concerts. Technically, let it be said at once, the performance last evening was magnificent.

But where were the vaunted fires of Koussevitzky this cold New Year's night? In vigor, in acridity, in that impersonal ruthlessness which must match the ruthless, pagan spring, whose annual burgeoning takes no pitiful account of transient human joys or sorrows, this performance did not compare with the two by the same orchestra, in the same hall, which Mr. Monteux conducted last season, or with performances (danced by the Diaghileff troupe) which I have heard in Paris under the direction of Ernest Ansermet.

Many pages of the "Sacre," when an orchestra has once mastered them, are proof against a conductor—pages that have their way by sheer dint of resistless rhythm and the amazing color of Stravinsky's orchestra. But practically every softer passage Mr. Koussevitzky dragged out and sentimentalized, dwelling upon detail with finicky literalness. The "Ritual of the Ancestors," as he read the section, proved that however Stravinsky may feel about his "Fire Bird" now, in 1913 he did not despise it. The end of the "Sacre" which, when Monteux directed, came like a cannon shot, was this time positively tame.

The audience for the most part received the once horrific work of Stravinsky as sedately as if it had been an early Haydn symphony or a suite by C. P. E. Bach. Sic transit furor musicae!

A concert of curious collocations and discrepancies.

PITTS SANBORN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HERALD
JAN 3 1925

Change in Symphony Program

The sudden indisposition of Sergei Rachmaninoff, who was announced to play his second piano concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon, will cause a change from the published program, which will probably be altered, as in last night's Brooklyn concert, to read: Symphony in G major, No. 13, Haydn; Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser," Wagner! "Till Eulenspegel," Strauss; suite, "El Amo Brujo," de Falla; "La Valse," Ravel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
NEWS
JAN 3

Locomotive Now Enters Portals Of Better Music

THIS is a year marked by the invasion of the arts by that most material American product, the locomotive. First came the motion picture, "The Iron Horse," and now both New York and Boston have heard a musical idealization of the locomotive, entitled "Pacific, 231." It will be given here shortly by the Los Angeles Philharmonic orchestra.

Olin Downes, the New York Times critic, jested over the fact that this composition was written by a Frenchman, Arthur Honegger. Said he, "In America there has been raised the hue and cry of a national music which should be racy, authentic, contemporaneous in its accents. And lo and behold, it is a Frenchman who gives us, in tones, a quality of our civilization. Where, oh where, is the oppressed American composer?"

Another New York critic, Pitts Sanborn of the Telegram-Mail, made merry on the point that the New York Symphony orchestra had scored a "beat" on the Boston Symphony as to introducing first in New York this new work which the Boston band had played on its home grounds three weeks previously. Mr. Sanborn thus exulted: "Walter Damrosch has now done for Sergei Koussevitzky exactly what his revered father, the late Dr. Leopold Damrosch, did once for Theodore Thomas. Today it is Honegger's 'Pacific, 231'; then it was Brahms' C-minor symphony. But what it is or was is not the thing that matters. The important fact is that the Damrosch family always does it first!" To which the Bostonese folk would reply: "First in New York, perhaps; but we heard it three weeks earlier!"

It has been told of Honegger that he has always been fascinated by locomotives, and that he likes to exhibit in his rooms a collection of drawings and designs of these. "They stir in him lively sensation. Sooner or later, he hinted, he would translate them into music."

That is what he has done. The score of his "Symphonic Movement," as he calls it, contains this preface:

"I have always had a passionate love for locomotives. For me they are like living creatures, and I love them as others love women and horses. What I have sought to accomplish in this piece is not to imitate the noises of a locomotive, but rather to translate into music a visual impression and a feeling of physical joy. The music begins with an objective contemplation—the tranquil breathing of the machine in repose. Then follow the straining effort to start, the gathering speed, the progress from a lyric mood to the pathetic one of a 300-ton train hurling itself through the night at a speed of 120 miles an hour. As an example, I have chosen a locomotive of the 'Pacific' type (known as 231), used for heavy trains at high speed."

Despite the composer's disclaimer, the critics have found the piece to be onomatopoetic, for they declare that it really sounds like an engine functioning.

PAPER- N.Y. World
DATE- Jan 3

MUSIC
By Deems Taylor

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions.)

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The most momentous number on last night's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came at the end, when Mr. Koussevitzky gave us Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." The lapse of ten months since its last hearing does not in any wise dim the greatness of this work. There is nothing else in art exactly comparable to the uncanny completeness with which this music evokes the primitive. Considered for what it is, for what it claims to portray, it is quite perfect. The paintings of Gauguin approach it most nearly, perhaps; yet Gauguin at his nakedest is ages younger that the "Danse de la Terre," for instance, or the wonderful introduction to the second part, its dark pages quivering with the mystery, the unquiet beauty, the nameless menace of the primeval night.

The performance was not up to the score. Mr. Koussevitzky grasped the Stravinskian nettles with discretion rather than valor, so that the music seemed to lose the scope and terrific propulsive force that other performances have revealed. His orchestra played with consummate virtuosity, but somehow without complete conviction. What, under harsher treatment, had seemed terrible, became at times almost vulgar; and passages whose acrid harmonies used to claw and bite sounded merely discordant. It was almost as if Mr. Koussevitzky did not quite approve of primitive man.

Nor was the performance of a quite antipodal work, Schubert's unfinished symphony, any more satisfying. Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was carefully wrought, fastidious and a little weary. The famous cello passage in the first movement emerged in such an anemic condition that it was almost buried beneath the flutes and clarinets of the accompaniment, and the violins throughout sounded juiceless and feeble. It was not a question of quiet playing, but of devitalized playing. The orchestra seemed to have just energy enough to play the appointed notes, with not a vitamin to spare.

There were fortes, of course, plenty of them; but even the climaxes had a quality of exhaustion, of nervous violence rather than power. The second movement went better. Its lyric quality was more authentic and its lines were more unbroken. Yet even here Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was not extraordinarily imaginative. The end of the movement—virtually literal reprise of the beginning—was totally uninteresting, a repetition not alone of the notes but of the mood. No fresh light was thrown upon the music and one's attention began to wander.

Mr. Koussevitzky's best work was done in the brilliant, reckless performance he gave of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, which opened his program. He followed the Schubert work with another symphony, in three movements, by Henri Joseph Rigel, who died in Paris in the year 1799. It is a nice little piece, more in the mood of a suite than a symphony, music to take or leave. Its chief virtue, in the subdued and rather colorless reading it had, was to prepare a soft and pebbleless stamping ground for Stravinsky's wild men.

PAPER- Transcript
DATE- Jan 3

Orchestral

ON Friday afternoon and Saturda evening, the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting will be heard at Symphony Hall in these numbers: Elgar's arrangement of Bach' Fantasia and Fugue, in C minor, for Organ—new music hereabouts; Respighi's new Concerto Gregoriano for Violin; "The Valkyrs' Ride," the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Rienzi" from Wagner. In the Concerto, Mr. Spalding in the prime of his powers, will play the solo-part.

On Thursday evening, the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting, will revisit Sanders Theater in Cambridge to play these pieces: Haydn's Symphony in G major; Liszt's Concerto in E flat for Piano; Debussy's Nocturnes "Clouds" and "Fetes"; Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." In the Concerto, Mr. Borovsky lately heard in Boston, will play a solo part inviting his powers.

---

own that we have our suspicions, as confessed above; yet heaven forbid that we or any other student of Mr. Koussevitzky's methods should oppose the spirit of tolerance, free inquiry, enlightened curiosity.

Critics find it hard to believe that they have anything to learn, remarked Mr. J. Middleton Murray apropos of something or other; "they refuse to submit themselves with sufficient humility to a new work of art or a new conception of an old work of art." And so, although the Schubert of the "Unfinished" does not mean to us quite what it seems to mean to Mr. Kousse-

MONTREAL, CANADA

Star

JAN3 1925

Music in New York.

Conductors and Soloists.

New York, Jan. 2.

Face to face, Leopold Stokowski and Serge Koussevitsky would not admit there was any rivalry between them. Rivalry does not exist between men of importance, not to speak of musicians of importance, they would say. But they do not meet face to face. They come from their respective cities of Philadelphia and Boston at widely separated dates to teach New York. A reviewer is tempted, therefore, to suspect them of a polite rivalry.

The two important conductors voluntarily invite comparison. One would not compare Stokowski with Van Hoogstraten, or Sokoloff with Mengelberg, or Reiner with Koussevitsky, or Golschmann with Hadley. These are different types. But Stokowski and Koussevitsky became excited about much the same thing. Their attitude towards music is similar and their choice of program has a like quality of daring and that disregard for popular taste whlso pleases the public, if properly manoeuvred.

At the age of 60 Koussevitsky shows as much modernism as Stokowski, still a young man of 42. And, even more surprising, he reveals as much sentiment in his interpretations. Both men have the reputation of protagonists of the new, yet there are no other two leaders today more given to hesitate over a sweet phrase or to sing the melodies slowly. Stokowski plays Schoenberg and Koussevitsky plays the modern Russians, but the one also does the delicate ballets from Berlioz' "Faust" with profound delicacy and the other stoops often to the Unfinished Symphony of Schubert. They cherish the tear and the twinkle in the listener's eye as much as the hiss from the gallery.

Stokowski is younger and is visibly impressed with his work when he conducts. He comes out with long strides and goes at things with precision. None but an exacting leader could get the perfect co-operation among the instruments that is the Philadelphia's greatest glory today. Koussevitsky is quieter, in body, not in soul. His great dignity, from his bow to the motions of his baton, was a surprise for his first night audience.

As yet the populace has not ceased its idolatry of either one of the leaders. That two full orchestral series should play to sold-out houses has not been our habit before. But both the Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras have now achieved it.

Stokowski has the popularity and acclaim he must have visioned in his earlier days at the organ in a New York church. And Koussevitsky surely smiles as he thinks back to his contrabassist beginnings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

[illegible]

JAN 3 1925

Asked to recommend other program books useful for study, besides those written by Philip Hale for the Boston symphony and spoken of in these columns two weeks ago, I would suggest perusal of the Philadelphia and the Chicago symphony program notes. Like the Boston symphony these orchestras present a fairly large number of new works.

Lawrence Gilman, music reviewer for the New York Tribune-Herald and the successor of Krehbiel, late dean among musicoligists in journalism, writes the Philadelphia notes. Gilman is a thorough musician, an adept of the graphic arts, literateur and altogether in his mental "make-up" a good deal of a poet. His program notes have high literary qualities and reflect the correlation of arts that lives in him. He may write about a Tschaikowsky work and will draw poignant parallels with Byron for instance. His program studies on the moderns show keen and sympathetic understanding for his creative contemporaries. Perhaps, all the more, as Gilman has composed good music. As a rule this commentator combines the histrionic element with a poetic analysis, quotes from surprising and rarely accessible sources, while giving technical explanations with ample thematic and instrumental references their due space. Gilman, in conclusion is a suave writer, so that his notes make admirable and stimulating reading.

Felix Borowski, noted composer, eminent pedagogue, president of the Chicago Musical College, is the author of the Chicago Symphony program books. Borowski's contributions excel from an historic angle. His biographical knowledge is far-reaching and illuminated by salient quotations from authentic works on the various composers. Much room is given to penetrating theoretical dissertations. In this respect the Chicago notes are especially valuable because of every important, and, particularly, of [illegible] works, actual themes are printed in notation. Those searching also for the words of arias in the original and translation find them also in the Chicago notes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 3 1925

Music Events

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The last minute announcement that Sergei Rachmaninoff, the pianist, had become ill and would not appear, produced an audible murmur of disappointment last night at the Academy of Music. But the regret became very quickly erased.

A program of such splendor as can hardly be paralelled occurred at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. The evening was enriched from the very start by the addition of a number to take the place of the time that was to have been taken by Mr. Rachmaninoff.

The additional part was formed of excerpts from Wagner's Tannhaused. It provoked exclamations of delight.

Mr. Koussevitzky seems to sense, by fractional moments the impulses that must come from the strings of every instrument present. He conducts the compositions just precisely as if he had clairvoyant control.

These assertions might be made of other leaders, but in the case of Mr. Koussevitzky the literalness of his direction of the tone production under his baton, can hardly be exaggerated.

The Boston Symphony numbers 104 musicians. They perform with the cohesion of men infinitely trained.

The Wagnerian composition, embodying the style of revolt and fire for which this composer is recognized, was a fitting introduction. There followed a concerto in D minor, from Handel.

Thereafter the program drew upon Strauss, De Falls and Ravel compositions.

The suite from El Amor Brujo (Love the Sorcerer) by De Falla, seemed to evoke the most generous response. This composition describes evening scenes among the gypsies, the returning spirit, the dance of terror, the magic circle and a ritual dance of fire to dispel evil spirits.

A degree of interest attached to the entire concert particularly from the fact that its selections were made of those creations rarely heard on this side of the water.

The Handel concerto and that from Strauss for example were regarded by many of the hearers as new treats.

The Strauss composition was entitled "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old Fashioned Roguish Manner, in Rondo Form." It was a lively, whimsical fancy, just rippling with unexpected phrases, mirthful and jolly.

Altogether the concert seemed perfectly balanced. The attendance was virtually up to the Academy's capacity, with many persons occupying standing room. The storm had failed to mar the occasion.

—B. J. R.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 3 1925

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Boston Orchestra Under Serge Koussevitsky Here Tomorrow

The following program will be presented tomorrow afternoon at 3.30 o'clock at the Auditorium by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association:—

Haydn, Symphony in G major (Breitkopf and Hartel No. 13); I. Adagio, Allegro; II. Largo; III. Menuetto, Trio; IV. Finale: Allegro con spirto. De Falla, Suite from "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"); (Piano, Jesus Sanroma); Introduction and Scene—The "Gypsies" (Evening)—The Returning Spirit—Dance of Terror—The Magic Circle (Narrative of the Fisherman)—Midnight (Sorceries)—Ritual Dance of Fire (to Dispel Evil Spirits). Wagner, Bacchanale ("Der Venusberg") from "Tannhauser" Wagner, Funeral Music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung"; Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN3 1925

Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist and composer, was the soloist last evening in Brooklyn with the Boston Symphony orchestra. He is also appearing with the same orchestra in New York today.

MONTREAL, CANADA

Star

JAN3 1925

Music in New York.

Conductors and Soloists.

New York, Jan. 2.

Face to face Leopold Stokowski and Serge Koussevitsky would not admit there was any rivalry between them. Rivalry does not exist between men of importance, not to speak of musicians of importance, they would say. But they do not meet face to face. They come from their respective cities of Philadelphia and Boston at widely separated dates to teach New York. A reviewer is tempted, therefore, to suspect them of a polite rivalry.

The two important conductors voluntarily invite comparison. One would not compare Stokowski with Van Hoogstraten, or Sokoloff with Mengelberg, or Reiner with Koussevitsky, or Golschmann with Hadley. These are different types. But Stokowski and Koussevitsky became excited about much the same thing. Their attitude towards music is similar and their choice of program has a like quality of daring and that disregard for popular taste whiso pleases the public, if properly manoeuvred.

At the age of 60 Koussevitsky shows as much modernism as Stokowski, still a young man of 42. And, even more surprising, he reveals as much sentiment in his interpretations. Both men have the reputation of protagonists of the new, yet there are no other two leaders today more given to hesitate over a sweet phrase or to sing the melodies slowly. Stokowski plays Schoenberg and Koussevitsky plays the modern Russians, but the one also does the delicate ballets from Berlioz' "Faust" with profound delicacy and the other stoops often to the Unfinished Symphony of Schubert. They cherish the tear and the twinkle in the listener's eye as much as the hiss from the gallery.

Stokowski is younger and is visibly impressed with his work when he conducts. He comes out with long strides and goes at things with precision. None but an exacting leader could get the perfect co-operation among the instruments that is the Philadelphia's greatest glory today. Koussevitsky is quieter, in body, not in soul. His great dignity, from his bow to the motions of his baton, was a surprise for his first night audience.

As yet the populace has not ceased its idolatry of either one of the leaders. That two full orchestral series should play to sold-out houses has not been our habit before. But both the Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras have now achieved it.

Stokowski has the popularity and acclaim he must have visioned in his earlier days at the organ in a New York church. And Koussevitsky surely smiles as he thinks back to his contrabassist beginnings.

PAPER— America

DATE— [illegible]

SYMPHONY SOLOIST

With Albert Spalding as the s loist, the Boston Symphony Orche tra will be heard in the eleventh pai of regular concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The violinist will appear with the Orchestra in Respighi's Gregorian Concerto for violin and orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct J. S. Bach's Organ Fantasia and Fugue in C minor, arranged for orchestra by Albert Elgar; three Wagnerian excerpts—"The Ride of the Valkyries," the Prelude to Lohengrin" and the overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 3 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston (Mass.) Symphony orchestra, will make his bow to a Springfield, Mass., audience o Sunday afternoon at the auditoriu when the famous organization make its annual visit to Springfield unde the auspices of the Y. M. C. A.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JAN 4 1925

The Boston Symphony orchestr will give one concert in Washingto this season under the leadership its new conductor, Sergei Kouss vitsky, at Poli's theater, Tuesd afternoon, January 27, at 4:30, u der the management of Mrs. W son-Greene.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
TIMES

JAN 4 1925

Serge Koussevitzky Conducted.

It is difficult to appear consistent in writing of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is his characteristic that he has not appeared in a similar light at any two concerts he has given in New York and his distinction that he has never failed to be provocative and interesting. His performances of last Thursday were to some a disappointment and to others a bone of contention, but they received unqualified endorsement from very few. Admitting the highly subjective character of any artistic criticism, the differences of opinion that an unusual personality among interpreters is certain to excite, it is nevertheless hardly possible to speak in terms save those of very high praise of the concert given by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday.

Owing to the regrettable illness of Mr. Rachmaninoff, who would have played his C minor piano concerto with a familiar comrade-at-arms, the program was changed. It consisted of Haydn's G major symphony, the "Bacchanale" of "Tannhäuser, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel, a suite from de Falla's "Gitaneria," "Love the Sorcerer," heard for the first time here, and Ravel's "Le Valse." Whereas there had been widespread difference with Mr. Kousssvitzky's former reading of the Schubert "Unfinished" symphony, his performance of Haydn met yesterday with warm commendation for its restraint and sympathetic treatment on the part of experienced musicians who had been equally condemnatory of his earlier effort.

A performance which would have been a high light of any concert was that of "Till Eulenspiegel." This composition has been repeatedly and expertly interpreted, but the reading of yesterday was one that reached the finest essence of the work, which some of us rate as Strauss's greatest achievement. It was poetic in the extreme, mercurial—like Mozart in the introduction and the concluding measures. A musical fairy tale, but a telling which did not leave uncomprehended the mockery, the satire and the fantasy of the composition in which Strauss seems to have escaped all the grossness of his period and school. The wit of "Till Eulenspiegel" is barbed, but it is of incomparable drollery. Some conductors have succeeded in making even this music lumpish, bourgeois or sensational. We have never found such qualities in it.

The score is a model of fantasy and consummate workmanship. What Strauss has done with two short themes and the briefest hint of episodic material is in itself a volume for young composers. Mr. Koussevitzky's performance, in its fineness of quality, its logic, its flexibility of pace and nuance, with nevertheless compactness or coherence, impressed us anew with the wonder of this achievement, and the true genius which inspired it. Not often has there been such an imaginative and eloquent reading of "Till Eulenspiegel."

The music of Da Falla appeared to be played with equal sympathy and technical finish. It is a pity that only half of the suite was heard, since it is very interesting Spanish music, by a Spaniard inspired by his own country. It is not folk-music, but the inner spirit and the picturesque idiom of Spanish folk-music is present throughout. The instrumentation has a warmth and vividness, at times a stabbing brilliancy, at other times a depth of shadow, which would only be appropriate to such material. There is more than local color in this score.

There is an essence which has escaped most composers, in and out of Spain, who attempted to make tonal pictures of that country or tonal revelations of its spirit. The performance was a triumph for composer and conductor. The suite should be heard here again and in its entirety.

Ravel's "Le Valse" made an appropriate and effective ending of the program. The piece seems to us too long, and a little too evident in its satire. Mr. Koussevitzky gave it an unprecedented interest, which showed yet another aspect of a remarkable individuality among conductors. He had a different style for different composers—for Strauss, for De Falla, for Ravel. He createl atmosphere with remarkable skill in Ravel's composition, and his rubato would have brought joy to Strauss, the waltz king. The audience was very enthusiastic.

This was the most effective concert Mr. Koussevitzky has given here, the one in which he apparently came nearest to doing himself justice. He is unquestionably a great musician, an interpreter to be reckoned with.

PAPER— Globe

DATE— Jan 4

Music Notes and Comment

The version of the symphony program for this week current at the moment this is written omits Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto," for strings, leaving a "Pops" program except for Respighi's new "Gregorian Concerto," which Albert Spalding is playing this season for the first time in various American cities. The very first performance appears to have been at Hamburg, where Karl Muck was the conductor. The concerto was composed in 1921. The title "Gregorian" signifies the composer's intention to capture for his music the aloofness and solemnity, the purity of style of the best church music. The violin solo is the soloist, the orchestra the choir.

The second concert of the Monday series, Jan 12, offers a much finer symphony program than that to be heard the regular concerts, except that f the first time Koussevitzky has not pu any modern piece on it. It includes Haydn's G major symphony, Beethoven's violin concerto, and three Wagner excerpts, the "Bacchanale" from "Tannhauser," the "Funeral Music," from "Goetterdammerung," and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Richard Burgin is the solo violinist.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15—Boston Symphony Orchestra, 11th program. Fantasy and Fugue in C minor, Bach-Elgar; "Gregorian Concerto," for violin and orchestra, Respighi (first time in Boston); "Ride of the Valkyries," prelude to "Lohengrin," overture to "Rienzi," Wagner. Soloist, Albert Spalding.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 4 1925

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY COMES TO HARTFORD

Famed Conductor Leads Boston Symphony in Capitol Concert.

MANHATTAN CONCERT TRIUMPHANT SUCCESS

Carnegie Hall Audience Enthusiastic Over Continental Leader.

Music lovers will be delighted to hear that arrangements have been concluded for a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the celebrated Serge Koussevitsky as its conductor, at the Capitol Theater, Sunday afternoon, February 1. Deems Taylor, famed music critic of the New York "World," commented as follows upon Koussevitsky's triumph in his New York debut with the Boston orchestra:

"The applause that greeted Serge Koussevitsky as he came upon the platform at Carnegie Hall last night to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in New York was lengthy and cordial but, naturally, not significent. New York was glad to see at last in the flesh the hero of the famous "Concerts Koussevitsky" of Paris, the arch-expounder of Stravinsky and modern music in general, newly come over to take the helm in Boston and New York was wishing him well.

"But as the evening wore on, Mr. Koussevitsky must have noted a change in the character of the applause, an ever-quickening interest and enthusiasm that culminated in a torrent of handclaps and cheers at the end of the concert. Last night's audience had good reason to applaud and all other lovers of orchestral music may this morning take the President's Thanksgiving proclamation unreservedly, if a trifle belatedly, to heart. For the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in the hands of a musician of profound insight and extraordinary technical command, one who may cause it to equal, possibly surpass, its former glories."

The seat sale is now in progress at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. Mail orders will be taken from patrons living out of town and those unable to attend the sale in person. All checks and orders should be directel to Frank A. Sedgwick, manager.

PAPER— [illegible]

DATE— Jan 4

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the soloist, Albert Spalding, will be heard in the first performance here of Respighi's "Gregorian Concerto," for violin and orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky will open the concert with J. S. Bach's Organ Fantasia and Fugue in C minor, arranged by Edward Elgar. Also on the program are three Wagnerian excerpts—"The Ride of the Valkyries," the

---

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The second Monday night symphony concert will take place January 12. Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, will play Beethoven's violin concerto, Haydn's Symphony in G-major and three Wagner numbers, the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" and "Mastersingers" prelude, will also be directed by [illegible] Koussevitzky.

6

MADISON
WIS.
Journal

ISSUE OF

JAN 4 1925

Russian Conductor of Boston Symphony Is Talk of the East

What music critics see as rivalry between famous orchestral conductors was heightened by the debut in New York city of Serge Koussevitsky as director of the Boston Symphony. The metropolis, already engrossed in its three resident orchestras with their noted conductors, had further been thrilled by the virtuosity of Leopold Stokowski, leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

With the coming of its Russian leader, Koussevitsky, the Boston orchestra became again town talk and New York faced the enlivening prospect of standing-room-only for both visiting ensembles besides the devoted publics, respectively, of its Philharmonic and New York Symphony, as well as the newer State Symphony.

Stokowski and Koussevitsky are contrasted as to methods by a writer for the New York Times.

The conductors of the two visiting orchestras are contrasted as to methods by a writer for the New York Times.

"The personality of Stokowski is a little sharper of outline than that of his colleague. He is more of the martinet, it is said, with his men; they nevertheless admire him. In rehearsal Stokowski goes relentlessly and impersonally for what he wants. He usually sits on a high stool, with a carafe of water by his side, and works persistently, unromantically, with the most impersonal ardor for his artistic ends. He is oblivious to anything but the fact that there is a human machine before him that can, must, and will carry out his designs.

"Koussevitsky's methods are, in a certain large way, a little less precise and intensive. He is a man of boiling enthusiasms, of much sensibility and of general and buoyant disposition. He has always done things in a big way.

'Koussevitsky, the conductor, is acutely the master of himself when he leads the orchestra. His blood seems to run hot and cold at once. He will stir the men to a frenzy of enthusiasm and keep them at a white heat for hours. All the time he is watching the smallest details and he will stop the whole excited band at any second, for any number of times, to analyze in the most frigid and deliberate manner a technical detail or a shading that is not precisely what he wishes. He will at times exhort his men and give them some little illustrations of what he wants.

"He treats them as companions and colleagues, but not too much as colleagues, retaining control, causing not only respect but even trepidation from those who do not exactly obey him.

"Koussevitsky gained admission to the Conservatory by promising to study the double bass, an instrument that happened to be much needed at that time in the conservatory orchestra. He played the double bass as no man born in Russia—or perhaps anywhere else—had made it sound before."

MILWAUKEE,
WIS.
LEADER

JAN 4 - 1925

Polite Rivalry.

Face to face, Leopold Stokowski and Serge Koussevitzky would not admit there was any rivalry between them. Rivalry does not exist between men of importance, not to speak of musicians of importance, they would say. But they do not meet face to face. They come from their respectable cities of Philadelphia and Boston at widely separated dates to teach New York. A reviewer is tempted, therefore, to suspect them of a polite rivalry.

At the age of 60 Koussevitzky shows as much modernism at Stokowski, still a young man of 42. And, even more surprising, he reveals as much sentiment in his interpretations. Both men have the reputation of protagonists of the new, yet there are no other two leaders today more given to hesitate over a sweet phrase or to sing the melodies slowly. Stokowski plays Schoenberg and Koussevitzky plays the modern Russians, but the one also does the delicate ballets from Berliez' Faust with profound delicacy and the other stoops often to the Unfinished symphony of Schubert. They cherish the tear and the twinkle in the listener's eye as much as the hiss from the gallery.

Stokowski is younger and is visibly impressed with his work when he conducts. He comes out with long strides and goes at things with precision. None but an exacting leader could get the perfect co-operation among the instruments that is the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM WASHINGTON,
D. C.
STAR

JAN 4 1925

A WARNING as to what will happen to local music if the public does not support it financially is given by Washington's sister city. W. A. Albaugh, a leading concert manager, states that the results of the first half of the musical season just completed in Baltimore may lead to a curtailment of music next year and the absence of many vocal and instrumental celebrities who have appeared there annually. The radio is partly blamed for this falling off of attendance at concerts.

In Boston, too, the treasurer and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been figuring finances. The average seasonal deficit for the past three years was figured at $84,000. It is thought probable that the season of 1924-5 will see little increase or decrease in this amount. The present pledges are $70,300. Those "who believe the symphony concerts important in the life of Boston and who are willing to help them financially" are now appealed to for $13,700. Such is the dependence of art on finance.

HELEN FETTER.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
ADVERTISER

JAN 4 1925

News of the coming of the Boston Symphony Orcestra is received with great interest and enthusiasm by Portland Music lovers for it marks the first opportunity Portland has had to hear this great orchestra under the baton of its new conductor, Sergei Koussevitsky, who has leaped into popular favor so rapidly that he threatens the supremacy of Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra.

PAPER- Journal

DATE- Jan-4

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The second concert of the Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on Jan. 12 in Symphony hall. The soloist will be Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, who will play Beethoven's Concerto. Mr. Koussevitzky will open the program with Haydn's Symphony in G major, (B. & H., No. 13); and close it with three excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner—Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," Funeral Music of Siegfried from 'Dusk of the Gods," and prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JAN 5 1925

KOUSSIVITZKY MAKES HIS BOW WITH SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra in Concert Before Audience That Taxes Capacity of Huge Auditorium

The Auditorium was filled full of people who sat where they could and stood where there were no seats, even the Mahogany room, with all doors opened, was crowded to the windows, when Serge Koussevitzky tapped with his baton yesterday afternoon, to start a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The musicians had been brought to this city by the Young Men's Christian association, to play in the winter series of Sunday afternoon Auditorium entertainments.

For most of Springfield, the Boston Symphony offered one of the too-scarce opportunities to listen to excellent musicians playing worthy compositions. To those in closer touch with musical events, yesterday's concert gave a chance to study Koussevitzky, about whom favor and criticism have battled since he succeeded Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston organization. Koussevitzky has been sufficiently individual and sufficiently independent to stir deep controversy. But until he has been heard more than once, it must be unfair to take part in the discussion. For the present, only observations should be permitted.

The second movement of Haydn's G Symphony which opened the concert seemed exceptionally slow, protracted until interest wandered, and the reading was so exact, that the contrasts appeared to lack imaginative shading and to be almost stereotyped. The following movement, on the contrary, was swift to the point of being jumbled in its rapid pace. De Falla's Spanish point of being jumbled in its rapid pace. De Falla's Spanish descriptive work, which came next, was unfamiliar and if it did not please entirely, it is possible now to know whether the effect was due to the music or the interpretation of it.

Koussevitzky came onto popularly-known ground in three Wagner selections, to which he gave an unaccustomed reading. He seemed at times to leave the strings out of mind entirely, and to concentrate on brasses and tympani, to the loss of the sweeping under-melodies which distinguish, for instance, the "Goetterdaemmerung." For some reason, the Siegfried motif, even on loud brasses, did not thrill as much as usual. Venusberg, from "Tannhauser," was more full of loudness than of the melody which is certainly there. The third wasthe "Meistersinger" prelude.

After hearing Koussevitzky, it is easy to understand the agitation which he has caused in music circles since taking the leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He is distinctive and adventuresome. His success as shown in the single concert heard yesterday in the Auditorium can only be judged by the loose measure of his ability to please, and pleasure was apparent among the thousands who crowded to listen. So different a conductor cannot be appraised after a single performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NY
HERALD

JAN 5 1925

Koussevitzky Again

Surely Mr. Koussevitzky is the most uneven, the most undependable, of conductors! At the Boston Symphony matinee of Saturday we had from him a performance of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" which we are inclined to rank as almost the finest we have ever heard. Perhaps we should not bother about the "almost"; we have introduced it into the foregoing sentence only because of a jumpy, middle-aged nervousness in the face of an advancing superlative. Perhaps we have heard some other performance of "Till" that was an equally perfect image of the score as we have ideally conceived it; as witty and sharp edged, and at the same time as mellow and tender at the beginning and at the end; as startlingly dramatic at the catastrophe: but we cannot at the moment recall any such.

But this gorgeous performance had followed on the heels of an almost incredibly maladroit and misrepresentative performance of the "Bacchanale" from "Tannhäuser." What can Mr. Koussevitzky have meant by those senseless and deeply damaging ritardandos that he made in the full course of Wagner's fiery flood of tone in the frenetically sensuous early pages of the Bacchanale that picture the orgy in the Venusberg at its height? There is not the smallest warrant or excuse in Wagner's score for the things that Mr. Koussevitzky did to it. There is a point at which a "reading" becomes sheer intolerable perversion; and Mr. Koussevitzky in this Wagner performance, by his distortion of the essential spirit and clear purport of the music, passed quite beyond that point, with plenty of room to turn around in.

* * *

This notable feat having been accomplished, Mr. Koussevitzky played sympathetically some movements from an inconsequential suite derived from Manuel de Falla's "choreographic fantasy" entitled "El Amor Brujo," which Mr. Stokowski introduced to America (in Philadelphia) in 1922. The program came to an end with Ravel's "La Valse," that favorite battlehorse of Mr. Mengelberg. This number, and the Haydn symphony (No. 13, in G major) with which Mr. Koussevitzky began his concert, were admirably played. Especially in the delicious Finale of Haydn's spmphony was Mr. Koussevitzky at his best—light-wristed, sensitive, inimitably deft, a master of style.

FRANCIS JEFFREY.

"SI" AT THE SYMPHONY

As the World Wags:

Some time ago I was to Boston with Cousin Eli's child, Mari, and she was all for goin' ter the Symphony concert. I wasn't real anxious ter go; says I, "Let's go ter sumthin that'll make us laff." But Mari's a high-flyer, and besides she wanted ter git material fer an article that she's writin' for the Brick Hollow Woman's Club; subject: "Music in its less deadly form," so go we must, and did.

Onst there, I made out pretty well. Parts o' the music I could understand, and anyhow I enjowed seein' 'em go to it. There's a lot o' fiddlers there—more'n there is in the whole of Quahaug County, I expect. The leader is a Russian, a well-appearin' man. I'd hearn tell that in the old country he was a great perfessor on the double base viol, and I was hopin' that he'd brought it with him; I'd like ter seen him wrastle with a double base. Cap'n Obed Tyler uster play one in the Univarsilist meetin' when I was a boy. My Granther Bates played the single base along side of him. Cap'n Obed was in the Chiny trade, master o' the bark "Fortune." Wal, that double base went everywhere that he went, and when he was cast away on one o' the Cannibal Islands, the nigger king there went nigh crazy over his playin', and come time Cap'n Obed was rescued he wa'n't goin' ter let him go; was goin' ter keep him fer court musician or some thin'.

Then two young fellers played two planners to onst. Fust a piece by Bach. "Roodle-oodle-oodle" on this side, "roodle-oodle-ooodle" on t'other. Not real excitin', but bein' by an Old Master I presume 'twas good. But the next piece, by a man named Bliss, was some different. They jest spit on their hands and went tew it, lickity cut, while the horns blowed and the drums pounded like tunket. Excitin' while it lasted, but I didn't see much music in it; however, I didn't venture no opinion then. Where ignorance is Bliss, 'tis Folley tew be wise. I noticed that the boys changed planners for that piece; presume they want people to understand that each one hitches up as well on the nigh side as on the off.

The concert ended with a waltz. I uster be considered a good dancer in plain quadrilles—ladies' chain, eight hands raound, balance and all promenade, but any one who kin dance fer that waltz has got ter be a sight spryer 'n I be.

We don't git much music here to Poduckett. The third valve on Hawe Bradford's cornet got stuck, and he has ter play everything with the first two, so the brass band ain't what it was, and it's only onct in a while that a male quartet comes down from Brockton fer the lodge or the church, so not hearin' much I don't feel ter venture no opinion on the music, but as a spectacle 'twas well wuth the money. Your'n

Poduckett, Jan. 1 SI PRIME.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

For the Symphony Concerts of this week Mr. Koussevitsky has announced a programme that begins with Bach's Organ Fantasia and Fugue in C minor, arranged for orchestra by Edward Elgar, and ends with three Wagnerian excerpts: "The Ride of the Valkyries," the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Rienzi." Between times Albert Spalding, the soloist of the week, will play Respighi's "Gregorian Concerto" for violin and orchestra.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
~~ADVERTISER~~
Telegram

JAN 4 1925

Koussevitsky, the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, oddly enough, is an enthusiast about jazz, although needless to say he does not employ it on Boston Symphony programs. He does believe, however, that it is one of the most important elements of the new music.

Koussevitsky is a man of wealth, and so was able in 1909 to found an orchestra of his own with which he toured Russia giving free concerts. In 1920 he left Russia to give guest concerts in London and sprang at once into the worldwide fame which led to his being invited to become the Boston Symphony conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

JAN 4

At the same hour, at Carnegie Ha the Boston Symphony concert was proceeding valiantly with a suddenly altered program. The illness of Sergei Rachmaninoff left this orchestra without a soloist and the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" was hastily substituted for his own C minor Concerto. This switched the spot-light of interest to the De Falla Suite from "El Amor Brujo," a vivid, provocative Gipsy drama which Mr. Koussevitzky played in sudden, urgent gusts of brilliant recklessness. Handel's Concerto Grosso opened the program and was followed by an extremely robust and energetic "Till Eulenspiegel" "after the old-fashioned, rougish manner in Rondo form," "La Valse," that whirling, dazzling poem of Ravel's completed the afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WASHINGTON,
D. C.
STAR

JAN 4 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give one concert in Washington this season under the leadership of its new conductor, Sergei Koussevitsky, at Poli's Theater, January 27.

Wherever the orchestra has appeared thus far this season the seats are at a premium, and the general verdict of the New York and Boston critics is that this great orchestra is fully restored to its former glories.

Seats are on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, Thirteenth and G streets.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM

JAN 5 1925

Concert Notes.

Myra Hess played like her real and delightful self in her piano recital at Aeolian Hall Saturday afternoon. Her program began with the A major sonata of Mozart, of which she gave one of the most exquisite performances heard in this city for some time. Equally fine in its way was Cesar Franck's "Prelude, Aria, and Finale." Spanish pieces by de Falla and Granados followed, leading to a generous Chopin group, in all of which Mme. Hess displayed her customary musical sensitiveness and poetic penetration.

Serge Koussevitzky led another concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. A rearrangement of program, occasioned by the sudden illness of Sergei Rachmaninoff, resulted in a Haydn symphony, the "Bacchanale" from "Tannhaeuser," the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Richard Strauss, excerpts from de Falla's "El Amor Brujo," and Ravel's "La Valse" as the revised list. Except in the "Bacchanale," Mr. Koussevitzky did the most satisfactory conducting since his local debut, giving a particularly brilliant performance of "Till Eulenspiegel."

Ignatz Waghalter entered upon his career as conductor of the State Symphony at the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday afternoon in a program devoted to Brahms and Liszt. Meantime, at Carnegie Hall, that pianist of prowess, Moriz Rosenthal, made his first appearance of the season, playing with flamboyant virtuosity, as well as musical understanding, compositions that ranged from Mozart's A major sonata to pieces by de Falla and Mr. Rosenthal himself.

---

worst of "El Amor Brujo's it reminds us so often of "Th ree-Cornered Hat." Both works a cellent; but we become critical of a c ser who writes two works that are so h alike.

Koussevitzky

FOR SECOND TIME NEW YORK JUDGES MR. KOUSSEVITZKY

OVER TWO PIECES REVIEWERS ALL AT ODDS

The Conductor's View of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony Variously Questioned and Affirmed—Mr. Newman for the Defense — "The Rite of Spring" as It Sounds, or Fails to Sound, from Another Russian's Hands

ACCORDING to expectation, Mr. Koussevitzky's version of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, heard for the first time in New York last Thursday evening, stirred some of the reviewers mightily. One—Mr. Henderson in The Sun—was well content, saying briefly:

> Schubert's composition was performed with beautiful finish and with a fine appreciation of its classic romanticism. The conductor had some changes of tempi all his own, but his style was admirable.

Another—Mr. Taylor in The World—is merely contemptuous, setting down his scorn at more length:

> Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was carefully wrought, fastidious and a little weary. The famous 'cello-passage in the first movement emerged in such an anæmic condition that it was almost buried beneath the flutes and clarinets of the accompaniment; while the violins throughout sounded juiceless and feeble. It was not a question of quiet playing, but of devitalized playing. The orchestra seemed to have just energy enough to play the appointed notes, with not a vitamin to spare.
>
> There were fortes, of course, plenty of them; but even the climaxes had a quality of exhaustion, of nervous violence rather than power. The second movement went better. The lyric quality was more authentic and its lines were more unbroken. Yet even here Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was not extraordinarily imaginative. The end of the movement—virtually literal reprise of the beginning—was totally uninteresting, a repetition not alone of the notes but of the mood. No fresh light was thrown upon the music and one's attention began to wander.

In turn, Mr. Newman draws at length, in The Evening Post, the brief for the defense. "Listeners," he writes, "would like or dislike Koussevitzky's reading of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, according to whether they agreed or disagreed with him on certain general principles. As with all these old pieces, Koussevitzky, in my opinion, brings the symphony up to date by taking it back to date. The whole question is 'What is a classic?' Koussevitzky gives the seemingly paradoxical, but perfectly correct answer—'A romantic.' No classic was ever a classic to himself. He is only classic to us, who see him so far down the avenue of time that he is perspectivized, generalized—a creature of a simpler day than ours, a formula, a period, a style rather than a man. But to himself he was a romantic—not a formula or a style, but a highly charged complex of atoms. The usual way of playing a classic—especially the German way, with its respect for what is called, with unconscious humor, 'tradition'—is to make him fit the modern conception of what his own epoch must have been, which obviously could not have been the conception the men who lived in that epoch had of it; for it is dead to us, while to them it was alive. Koussevitzky's way with the classic is to try to see him as he must see himself—a method that has remarkable results in, say, the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.

"I would thus contend that it is the 'classic' conductors who romanticize an old composer, for they make him something other than what he was to himself; while Koussevitzky's apparent romanticization of him is really the genuine classicism, for it makes him walk the earth in 1925 as he must have done in, say, 1825. From this point of view, Koussevitzky's reading of the Unfinished Symphony is a remarkable raising of Schubert from the grave in which the false classicism of tradition has buried him.

"The psychological key to the first movement of the Symphony is surely to be found in the later tragic metamorphoses of the opening phrase. Here we see Schubert, as we so often do elsewhere, hag-ridden, working himself up into a paroxysm of terror and self-pity. Hence it is right to make the first enunciation of the theme, as Koussevitzky does, a mysterious foreboding of this terror, and to put an extra tincture of sweetness into the second subject each time it recurs—that theme that is manifesly Schubert's attempt to dream the terror and the horror away. If you do not agree with the psychological point of view, Koussevitzky's reading will be all wrong. If you do agree, the reading is the most impressive imaginable.

"One cannot dogmatize in these matters. One either starts from the conductor's premises or one does not. To those who, like myself, have always taken this view of a great movement that has been turned by the generality of conductors into a mere piece of musical sugar-candy, the performance was a stupendous piece of work, alike in conception and in the orchestral execution. And in the slow movement the playing was equally beautiful. We may wish, in the abstract, that Schubert could have said what he had to say without so much repetition; but at any rate the repetitions gave us time to drink our fill of the sheer sensuous loveliness of the wood-wind tone."

Finally, Mr. Gilman, in The Herald-Tribune, speaks for those that go the middle way of mingled assent and dissent. "Mr. Koussevitzky," he says, "feels this symphony as an intensely dramatic utterance—a thing of violent dynamic contrasts, vehement, highly colored, sharply contrasted; so that one is moved to look at the title page of the score to see if the composer's name does not read "Franz Peter Ilytch Schubert." A whiff from the too heavily scented pages of another symphony in B minor appears to have blown upon certain measures of 'The Unfinished' in this Slavic version.

"Mr. Koussevitzky, indeed, is eager to finish what Schubert left unfinished. Though not in respect of duration; for Mr. Koussevitzky seems at times to take too much to heart the vow of Flaubert: 'May I die like a dog rather than hasten a phrase that isn't ripe.' And for Mr. Koussevitzky this ripening is a deliberate process. But we have in mind rather his tendency to declaim what Schubert confided; to insist where Schubert hinted; to italicize what Schubert intimated. Certain allegro-passages that have a quite simple and subordinate place in the scheme of the first movement, for example, are transformed into portentious adagios. The wistfulness of Schubert, always a little naive, always spontaneous, becomes empurpled, self-conscious, You fancy Schubert uncomfortable in buskins, his face twitching under his tragic mask.

"Sir George Grove found in the Unfinished Symphony 'the history of cruel disappointments and broken hopes'; and who can listen to those wailing E-minor phrases for the violins that are answered in imitation by the violas and bassoons, in the first movement, without hearing in them, the plaint of one who was acquainted with grief? And how truly dramatic this music is! But Mr. Koussevitzky is not content with letting Schubert flow through him. He tints the glass; he hangs crepe on the doorbell; and we hear a Schubert become a little shrill, a little melodramatic. . . .

"No music comes alive until it has passed through the personality of an intrepreter. There is no such thing as getting Schubert, or any other composer, 'straight.' It must always be Schubert plus—Schubert plus Koussevitzky, or plus Stokowski, or plus Damrosch; and we are not of those who would insist in this instance that Mr. Koussevitzky has mixed too much vodka and honey with this draught from the Schubertian spring. We must own that we have our suspicions, as confessed above. Yet heaven forbid that we or any other student of Mr. Koussevitzky's methods should oppose the spirit of tolerance, free inquiry, enlightened curiosity. . . . And so, although the Schubert of The Unfinished does not mean to us quite what it seems to mean to Mr. Koussevitzky, what of it? The point to remember in favor of his version is that it is consistent with its own laws; and it has true eloquence. And how admirably he played the Andante; how lovingly he dealt with the detail of the beautiful movement, and how sensitively he kept the focus right! That little phrase of three notes for the violas in the twenty-seventh measure, for example, with its essential A, that is so often slurred and nullified, had exactly the right shape and emphasis. There were many other instances of a similar fineness of perception and delicacy of ear."

In the same concert of the Boston Orchestra in New York Mr. Koussevitzky included also his version of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." Again impressions and judgments were divided. Once more, Mr Henderson was altogether pleased:

> The performance was magnificent. Mr. Koussevitzky knew the score and had penetrated to the innermost purposes. The orchestra had been perfectly rehearsed. Result, something that would have staggered Commonwealth Avenue and exploded the St. Botolph Club twenty years ago. But as Themistocles remarked to Antiphales: "Time, young man, has taught us both a lesson."

And once more Mr. Taylor was wholly dissatisfied:

> The performance was not up to the score. Mr. Koussevitzky grasped the Stravinskian nettle with discretion rather than valor, so that the music seemed to lose the scope and terrific propulsive force that other performances have revealed. His orchestra played with consummate virtuosity, but somehow without complete conviction. What, under harsher treatment, had seemed terrible, became at times almost vulgar; and passages the acrid harmonies of which used to claw and bite sounded merely discordant. It was almost as if Mr. Koussevitzky did not quite approve of primitive man.

For his part, Mr. Newman was more occupied with the withering (as he believes) of Stravinsky's music than with the quality of a performance "that for technical finish and understanding of the composer's intentions could probably not be bettered." In turn, Mr. Gilman candidly ventures the comparison between Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Monteux that, of course, was in every listener's mind. "We own," he writes, "to being a bit disappointed in Mr. Koussevitsky's performance of Stravinsky's 'Sacre du Printemps.' It seemed to us that the performances of the superb music which we heard last winter under Mr. Monteux were, in some respects, more thrilling, more dramatic. Mr. Koussevitzky was magnificent throughout the first part of 'The Rite' —especially in the gorgeous polytonal climax of the 'Rondes Printanières,' which for the third time overwhelmed us and took us captive. But in the frenzied sacrificial dance of the Finale, it seemed to us that he allowed the music to sag; the victim was too composed; for, after all, she is dancing herself to death, and we should share her excitement."

THIS CLIPPING FROM ny POST
JAN 5 1925

Music

Ernest Newma Daily Column

Boston Symphony Orchestra

OW[illegible] TO THE dreadful state of th[illegible] York streets on Saturday afternoon I was unable to walk as usual to Carnegie Hall; and the slower method of travel by bus in New York led to my arriving just after the Haydn symphony had started, so that I heard that work only in snatches from the outside. A second disappointment was the news that Rachmaninov was unwell and would not be able to play the solo part in his second piano concerto.

I had never previously heard "Till Eulenspiegel" under Koussevitzky. He gave us a highly individual and curiously fascinating reading of the work, and one that could be objected to only by the type of mind that would censure a portrait by, say, Augustus John because it did not resemble the same sitter painted by, let us say, Sargent. Koussevitzky certainly showed us Till in some unfamiliar aspects. As usual, he saw his subject dramatically, and made the most of each scene without destroying the unity of the whole.

Koussevitzky never generalizes, never uses any of those standardized formulæ for expression that are the equivalent in music of the ready-made phrase in literature. He always paints with his eye on the object; and as he sees it intensely he paints it vividly. You may say, if you like, that this section of "Till" was taken more slowly than it generally is. The fitting answer to that would be Brahms' reply when some wiseacre pointed out to him that a certain theme in one of his works resembled a well-known theme of Wagner's—"Well, any fool can see that!" Koussevitzky no doubt adopts a slower tempo here because this section represents a religious procession, and a slower pace than the usual one gives it an extra touch of mock solemnity. The tailing off into pianissimo of another melody would also be intended, I imagine, to suggest Till receding further and further into the distance as he goes off whistling his perky street tune.

The hearer could like or dislike these and other points as he chose. For those who liked them, the reading was one of amazing imaginative and pictorial vitality. I, for one, cannot remember the tribunal scene ever having been painted before with such grisly realism; more than ever, after the seriousness to which this tuned us, did we realize Strauss' wisdom in writing that epilogue in which he restores comedy to her rights again, and takes leave of Till with a smile and a caress.

The Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" was painted in the richest colors, and with a touch of Russian fancy: certain sections of the canvas had a more brilliant color-note in them than perhaps Wagner ever imagined, the effect being obtained by a little extra insistence on some of the reds and purples in the sub-tissues of the orchestration. One could almost fancy one saw Bakst and Rimsky-Korsakov cooperating in the production of the ballet. But after all, the greatest thing in the performance was not the riot of color at the height of the delirium, but the long slow descent into quietude at the finish; to keep the rhythmic line unbroken through all those changes of mood and texture and dynamics was an astonishing feat, and one possible only to a conductor with a consummate plastic sense. We were conscious of the same thing in the handling of Ravel's "La Valse." Could not some friend of Ravel's, by the way, persuade him to rewrite the last quarter of the work? As it stands now, what should be one of the most exquisite pieces of music of our day loses all its charm, and goes off the stage like a noisy hobbledehoy.

The remainder of the concert consisted of a selection from Manuel de Falla's opera-ballet "El Amor Brujo." The music has all de Falla's high-bred charm and nervous grace; but one is bound to confess that with repeated hearings of it one begins to weary a little of its Spanish idiom. It is perhaps another reminder that the composer who keeps too close to a "national" folk-style becomes, in the end, a local rather than a universal composer; he writes only dialect music. The

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
~~TIMES~~ Mercury
JAN 5 1925

(Lawrence Gilman in the New York Herald-Tribune.)

The redoubtable Mr. Koussevitzky, accompanied by the Boston Symphony orchestra, came to town again last night for his second pair of concerts in these parts.

There may have been Cossack blood in his eye as he planned the programme for his Thursday night concert, for he put upon it one of the works with which he has stirred up in Europe thick and acrid clouds of controversial dust—Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. Even in Boston, where Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the "Unfinished" a week ago, the chilling word "liberties" was heard in certain critical quarters which have been most approvingly disposed toward Mr. Koussevitzky; and the just and sensitive Mr. Parker went so far as to declare roundly that "first, last and all the time we shall be at odds over the conductor's version of the first movement."

Hence, perhaps, the supposititious blood in the condlctor's eye, and his determination to try his version of the "Unfinished" on the folk of the province which he seems to have conquered at his first assault.

We heard Mr. Koussevitzky conduct this symphony at one of his Paris concerts in the spring of 1923, and we then confided to the columns of this journal the opinion that if Schubert could have heard Mr. Koussevitzky's version he might have liked it—after he got used to it. For Mr. Koussevitzky feels this symphony as an intensely dramatic utterance—a thing of violent dynamic contrasts, vehement, highly colored, sharply contrasted; so that one is moved to look at the title page of the score to see if the composer's name does not read "Franz Peter Ilytch Schubert." A whiff from the too heavily scented pages of another symphony in B minor appears to have blown upon certain measures of the "Unfinished" in this Slavic version.

Mr. Koussevitzky, indeed, is eager to finish what Schubert left unfinished. Though not in respect of duration; for Mr. Koussevitzky seems at times to take too much to heart the vow of Flaubert: "May I die like a dog rather than hasten a phrase that isn't ripe." And for Mr. Koussevitzky this ripening is a deliberate process.

But we have in mind rather his tendency to declaim what Schubert confided; to insist where Schubert hinted; to italicize what Schubert intimated. Certain allegro passages that have a quite simple and subordinate place in the scheme of the first movement, for example, are transformed into portentious adagios. The wistfulness of Schubert, always a little naive, always spontaneous, becomes empurpled, self-conscious; you fancy Schubert uncomfortable in buskins, his face twitching under his tragic mask.

Listening to Mr. Koussevitzky conduct Schubert's "Unfinished," we were not sure that we would have him do it differently. We remembered Montaigne: "The for and the against are both possible," he observed. There are fine and touching things in Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of this symphony; and we do not doubt that he really feels the music in that way.

"The more a soul conforms to the sanity of others, the more does it become insane," wrote Mary Webb, with striking sanity. The soul of Mr. Koussevitzky does not attempt to conform to the sanity of others; having made its own laws, it respects them, and so its power of self-government is unimpaired.

No music comes alive until it has passed through the personality of an interpreter. There is no such thing as getting Schubert, or any other composer, "straight." It must always be Schubert plus—Schubert plus Koussevitzky, or plus Stokowski, or plus Damrosch; and we are not of those who would insist in this instance that Mr. Koussevitzky has mixed too much vodka and honey with this draught from the Schubertian spring. We must own that we have our suspicions, as confessed above; yet heaven forbid that we or any other student of Mr. Koussevitzky's methods should oppose the spirit of tolerance, free inquiry, enlightened curiosity.

Critics find it hard to believe that they have anything to learn, remarked J. Middleton Murray apropos of something or other; "they refuse to submit themselves with sufficient humility to a new work of art or a new conception of an old work of art." And so, although the Schubert of the "Unfinished" does not mean to us quite what it seems to mean to Mr. Koussevitzky, what of it? The point to remember in favor of his version is that it is consistent with its own laws; and it has true eloquence.

We have never heard any one else play the famous 'cello tune in the first movement as if it were an accompaniment to the chords of the clarinets and violas above it; we had supposed that this was essentially a melody for the 'cellos, with accompanying chords; but perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky is right, and it is all the rest of us who are out of step.

But how admirably he played the Andante; how lovingly he dealt with the detail of the beautiful movement, and how sensitively he kept the focus right! That little phrase of three notes for the violas in the twenty-seventh measure, for example, with its essential A, that is so often slurred and nullified, had exactly the right shape and emphasis; and there were many other instances of a similar fineness of perception and delicacy of ear.

8

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 5 - 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY TRUE MASTER OF SYMPHONY

Auditorium Thronged to Hear Boston Orchestra Perform Under Leaership of Famous Russian

BY FRANCIS REGAL.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday in its annual concert, which is the great musical event of the Y. M. C. A. Sunday afternoon entertainments. It was of course inevitable that comparison should be made with his predecessor Pierre Monteux, whose patient and successful work in rebuilding this famous orchestra after a series of catastrophic upheavals has been followed with sympathy and admiration, but such a comparison is not in the least invidious. To develop it in detail one would need to hear the new conductor, like his predecessor, in many programs of different character, but yesterday's concert was enough to bring out some of the striking qualities of Mr Koussevitzky's conducting. A New York critic has called him "lazy," and after watching him allow the Haydn G major symphony to conduct itself, so to speak, it was possible to understand the impression although not to share it.

Certainly the Boston orchestra's new conductor does not, like some leaders, take upon himself the burden of forcibly extracting each note from the skilled musicians at his disposal, a method sometimes carried to the point of absurdity. At the other extreme is the familiar stunt of putting down the baton and showing the audience that the players have been so perfectly trained that they can go through their tricks without a leader. Both extremes are freakish and only occasionally justifiable Mr Monteux used fastidiously to avoid erring in either direction, modestly keeping to the conventional role of leader. Mr Koussevitzky is much more histrionic in temperament, but too artistic to overact a part which nevertheless he is incessantly embellishing.

In the simple straightforward music of Haydn the embellishment took the form of reverting to the 18th century style, in which a symphony was but slightly expanded chamber music, and an occasional hint from a violin bow was all the conducting needed. At a pause, transition, or change of pace the baton would come into action for a moment and subside as soon as the music was again flowing smoothly; no more was needed, why do more? But a very different technic appeared in the piquant Spanish suite from "El Amor Brujo" (Love the Sorcerer), by De Falla, which followed. Here every nuance of the supple and tricky rhythms was marked with the utmost delicacy and precision; and in the manipulation of the baton Mr Koussevitzky showed the innate virtuosity which made him, by accident, one might say, one of the most famous solo performers on that unwieldy instrument the double bass. At times, so delicate was his finesse, one might have taken the stiff stick for a gently waving plume, yet with never the slightest vagueness in the beat.

But still a third style was to appear in the Wagner group which filled the second half of the program with three great and powerful numbers the "Venusberg" Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," the funeral music of Siegfried from "Goetterdaemmerung," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg. Here there was no trace of what the most captious could call lackadaisical, and the fiery energy which had been repressed found full physical expression. At the great moments there was in Mr Koussevitzky's conducting a driving force seldom equaled and amply adequate to account for the great reputation which he has been gaining in Europe in recent years. In watching him at work one could easily imagine that for him conducting an orchestra was like playing the double-bass more or less of an accident and that his artistic personality far transcends any particular manifestation of it.

And what of the interpretations which this powerful personality and adroit skill served? Only in the "Meistersinger" prelude was a direct comparison possible, for the other numbers were either new or had not been heard here for a long time. It would be extreme to say that magnificent readings of the prelude heard in the past were surpassed yesterday; one or two might be recalled which in the retrospect seem even more impressive, perhaps because of the setting. Yesterday's program, while extremely interesting, was not id n all respects, and in particul d not lend itself to cum ce. The three big Wa se with Mo gre prin

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

JAN 5 1925

HUGE AUDIENCE HEARS SYMPHONY AT AUDITORIUM

Boston Symphony Orchestra Provides Rare Treat Under Leadership of Noted Conductor.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its annual visit to Springfield yesterday afternoon under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A., giving a program made up of works seldom if ever played here, and presenting for the first time its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

We have never heard the orchestra play better than it did under the inspiring leadership of this great Russian conductor. The string section was incomparable. There was a finish and brilliance to the playing which brought back memories of Boston Symphony concerts before the war. Today the orchestra has resumed its place as one of the three great symphony orchestras in this country, perhaps in the world.

One is prone to write much of Koussevitzky for he is one of the most dominating personalties imaginable. He is just enough of a prima-donna conductor to win him a popular following in the best sense of the term. He is tall, slim and elegant in dress. He walked modestly down the aisle, bowing right and left, and took his place before his stand. With his baton in his hand he was electrified. An imperious thrust of the arm, finger outstretched, gave the individual cues. None of his gestures is meaningless, yet some are so slight as to be almost unseen. At climaxes he is on tip toe, left hand upraised and baton swinging wide, then suddenly, leaning over his desk, he will draw out fine spun pianissimos. He is a master pantomimist. His baton is either held rigid or so lightly that it trembles like a leaf. When all is over, his arms drop to his side and he steps quietly down from the platform, acknowledges the applause with a slight bow and strolls off the stage.

Yesterday's program opened with the Hayden "Symphony in G major." It was a genial work for both orchestra and audience. The opening movement starts with a short, adagio movement, which is soon followed by the main body of the movement, an allegro, with a dainty theme announced by the strings and repeated by the full orchestra. The remaining themes are variations on the first. The second movement, a largo, brought forth a beautiful melody for oboe and cellos against an accompaniment of winds and strings. This lovely theme is further developed until its richness is given over to the full orchestra. Then follows a typical minuet, which was strongly played, and it in turn was followed by a spirited finale in rondo form based on a country dance. Hayden was fond of the rondo form, with its couplets and refrains and repetition of its chief theme.

The next number was a suite by Manuel De Falla, a Spanish composer. It was based on his choreographic fantasy for voice and small orchestra, known as "Gipsy Life." It was a colorful, radiant reading which Koussevitzky gave. The music itself is rich in thematic material as De Falla has built it on the modes, forms and cadences inspired by the Andalusian folk song. De Falla is called a poet of Spanish emotion. I'Sanroma played the piano part.

The last three numbers were devoted to Wagner, and included the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the "Funeral Music of Siegfried" from "Gotterdammerung" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers." In these numbers Koussevitzky was at his best. He built up great climaxes urging on his men, almost by brute strength, and then bringing the tone down to the finest of pianissimos. The final measures of the Bacchanale were scarcely more than a murmur—a magnificent achievement. The music from "Gotterdammerung," with its many themes, was superbly played and the prelude to "The Mastersingers" provided as monumental a finale as one could wish. This group of three numbers provided brilliant changes of mood, sensuous beauty of tone and mighty climaxes.

The audience was one of the largest we have ever seen in the Auditorium. Every seat was taken and hundreds were standing and even sitting on the stairways. One wonders where all these people are when other attractions come to the city. They owe a great debt of gratitude to the Y. M. C. A. for providing such a magnificent concert free of charge.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
JAN 5 1925

Koussevitzky Calls Auditorium Finest Concert Hall in America

Famous Russian Conductor, Here With Boston Symphony Orchestra, Spontaneous in Praise of Springfield Municipal Orchestra

This is the finest hall in America, Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, told a small group back-stage yesterday afternoon during the intermission of the program the Boston orchestra gave at the Auditorium. The noted Russian conductor spoke enthusiastically of the contour and acoustics of the Auditorium and declared that nowhere had he given a concert with better effect.

Mr Koussevitzky made many friends during his visit yesterday and took a personal interest in the work of the Springfield Symphony orchestra, which rehearsed in the afternoon at the Auditorium. It was through J. Bedetti, first 'cellist for the Boston orchestra, who played with the local musicians last year, that Arthur H. Turner, director of the Springfield orchestra and municipal organist, met Mr Koussevitzky yesterday during the intermission.

Mr Koussevitzky said he was in the hall at the time Mr Turner's men were rehearsing and fully enjoyed their work on Tschaikovsky's fourth symphony, which will be given at the Auditorium on the 21st. He commended the playing of the Springfield orchestra and said the city should be proud of such an organization and should give it great support. He expressed the wish that he could give all his concerts in a hall so suited to them as the Auditorium. "This hall is better than most of the best in this country and many in Europe," the famous Russian virtuoso and director declared. "I prefer it even to Carnegie hall in New York city."

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF

JAN 5 192

NEW MUSIC AT 2 ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS

Koussevitzky and Damrosch Introduce It—Seven Pianists Over Week-end.

Some new music by two of the better known hopefuls among the modernists was introduced to the town by Serge Koussevitzky and Walter Damrosch over the week-end. None of it is likely to grave itself on the tablets of time, and the reviewer's report on it to-day, therefore, will be brief.

Mr. Koussevitzky's adventure concerned the suite made by the Spaniard, Manuel de Falla, from his dance-pantomime (including a single voice part), "El Amor Brujo," which, translated, is "Love, the Magician." Only a relatively small part of the whole was given at this concert of the Boston Orchestra on Saturday. ~~Kurt Schin~~dler presented the voice part at one of the concerts of the Schola Cantorum a few seasons ago.

The music is very largely in the characteristic rhythmic and melodic idiom of the Spanish gypsy folk and when it isn't, it ceases to be either distinctive or interesting. It was more neatly than impulsively played by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men.

This was not, indeed, one of Mr. Koussevitzky's best days. For one thing, Sergei Rachmaninoff, who was to have been the soloist of the afternoon in his own second piano concerto, had fallen ill and the programme had to be changed at the last moment. Haydn's G major symphony was substituted for a Handel concerto grosso and the bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" for the Rachmaninoff concerto. The Haydn symphony went excellently well, but the bacchanale rather less so.

Thereafter, besides the de Falla suite, there were Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," which seemed to lack cohesion and, at times, something of coherence, too, nor did Mr. Koussevitzky seem to fall in very robustly with its spirit of low comedy; and Maurice Ravel's "La Valse," which was also not nearly as convincing as we have heard it. As we have said, it was decidedly one of this Russian's off days.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOUSTON,
TEXAS
PRESS

JAN 5 1925

IN LITTLE OLD NEW YORK

Boston Symphony, [illegible] ening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia Orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr. Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors — Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Furtwangler and Igor Stravinsky, the composer, with the Philharmonic, and Damrosch, Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschman with the Symphony. However, the battle for the pinnacle of public favor seems to rest between the visitors Stokowski and Koussevitsky.

And may the better pair of spats win!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 5 1

IT IS obviously impossible for a reviewer unequipped with seven-league boots or the psychic advantages of a dual personality to be present in two places, separated by a number of miles, at the same time, even in these days of traffic invention. Thus it happens that the writer, when several important events occur in the two boros in one evening, sometimes has to take into his confidence some person equipped for the task of keeping a critical eye on some part of the proceedings.

On Friday last we trusted a musical friend who informed us that Rachmaninoff had appeared at a concert at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Company, and he ~~lied~~ to us. We herewith offer our apologies.

EDWARD CUSHING.

---

ably deft, a master of style. Gilman in the Herald-Tribune

Mr. Bliss and Mr. Hill

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN

JAN 5 1925

Boston Symphony Concert.

In the afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second ~~matinee~~ was disarranged by the indisposition of Sergei Rachmaninov, the distinguished Russian composer and pianist, who was to have played one of his own concertos. The list as rearranged by Mr. Koussevitzky consisted of Haydn's D ~~major symphony~~, the baccanale from "Tannhaeuser," Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel," Manuel de Falla's suite "El Amor Brujo" and Ravel's "La Valse."

The suite of the Spanish composer was one of those panoramas of local color which rarely fail to please the hearer. De Falla writes with gusto and brilliant variety of orchestral tint. His rhythms are naturally clear cut and his music has life and communicative charm. The audience apparently enjoyed hearing it. So did this looker on in Verona.

Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to be more in command of himself than he had been at the Thursday evening concert. His reading of the "Till Eulenspiegel" was rich in delicacy of treatment, but nevertheless filled with the rollicking spirit and broad humor of the work. It was one of the best things he had done in this city, and his orchestra gave him everything he desired.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

JAN 5 192

The debut of Wilhelm Furtwaengler, guest conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra, effected Saturday night, was quite impressive. The visitor revealed himself a musician of fine parts and almost started something with his stirring and emotional interpretation of the First Brahms Symphony.

Myra Hess on Saturday had much applause and frequent recalls for her intelligent piano playing ;and Serge Koussevitsz opened up more discussion of his conducting powers at the Boston Symphony Concert. Mr. Rachmaninoff, the announced pianist for the concert, did not appear because of illness.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

JAN 5 1925

How Damrosch, Dean of Conductors, First Stood the Test

By JESSIE MacBRIDE.

News and music gossip! The orchestra, with grand opera nearby, brings us again into the big world of music.

The first symphony concert comes on January 13, with the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conducting.

The Philadelphia Orchestra comes the following week, and then the month closes with the one appearance this season of the Boston Symphony, with its new and great conductor, ussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE,
WIS.
SENTINEL

JAN 6 1925

There appears to be little doubt but that the tremendous success of the new conductor of the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky, is responsible for the ~~fact~~ that the entire winter's series of concerts is sold out to the last seat. The only exception is the 500 "rush seats," in order to get which students stand outside from early in the morning, awaiting the opening of the doors, when there is a wild scramble. Despite this situation, however, a deficit is certain, as the orchestra is not (like others), and never has been self-supporting.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 5 - 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY TRUE MASTER OF SYMPHONY

Auditorium Thronged to Hear Boston Orchestra Perform Under Leaership of Famous Russian

BY FRANCIS REGAL.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday in its annual concert. which is the great musical event of the Y. M. C. A. Sunday afternoon entertainments. It was of course inevitable that comparison should be made with his predecessor Pierre Monteux, whose patient and successful work in rebuilding this famous orchestra after a series of catastrophic upheavals has been followed with sympathy and admiration, but such a comparison is not in the least invidious. To develop it in detail one would need to hear the new conductor, like his predecessor, in many programs of different character, but yesterday's concert was enough to bring out some of the striking qualities of Mr Koussevitzky's conducting. A New York critic has called him "lazy," and after watching him allow the Haydn G major symphony to conduct itself, so to speak, it was possible to understand the impression although not to share it.

Certainly the Boston orchestra's new conductor does not, like some leaders, take upon himself the burden of forcibly extracting each note from the skilled musicians at his disposal, a method sometimes carried to the point of absurdity. At the other extreme is the familiar stunt of putting down the baton and showing the audience that the players have been so perfectly trained that they can go through their tricks without a leader. Both extremes are freakish and only occasionally justifiable Mr Monteux used fastidiously to avoid erring in either direction, modestly keeping to the conventional role of leader. Mr Koussevitzky is much more histrionic in temperament, but too artistic to overact a part which nevertheless he is incessantly embellishing.

In the simple straightforward music of Haydn the embellishment took the form of reverting to the 18th century style, in which a symphony was but slightly expanded chamber music, and an occasional hint from a violin bow was all the conducting needed. At a pause, transition, or change of pace the baton would come into action for a moment and subside as soon as the music was again flowing smoothly; no more was needed, why do more? But a very different technic appeared in the piquant Spanish suite from "El Amor Brujo" (Love the Sorcerer), by De Falla, which followed. Here every nuance of the supple and tricky rhythms was marked with the utmost delicacy and precision; and in the manipulation of the baton Mr Koussevitzky showed the innate virtuosity which made him, by accident, one might say, one of the most famous solo performers on that unwieldy instrument the double bass. At times, so delicate was his finesse, one might have taken the stiff stick for a gently waving plume, yet with never the slightest vagueness in the beat.

But still a third style was to appear in the Wagner group which filled the second half of the program with three great and powerful numbers the "Venusberg" Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," the funeral music of Siegfried from "Goetterdaemmerung," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg. Here there was no trace of what the most captious could call lackadaisical, and the fiery energy which had been repressed found full physical expression. At the great moments there was in Mr Koussevitzky's conducting a driving force seldom equaled and amply adequate to account for the great reputation which he has been gaining in Europe in recent years. In watching him at work one could easily imagine that for him conducting an orchestra was like playing the double-bass more or less of an accident and that his artistic personality far transcends any particular manifestation of it.

And what of the interpretations which this powerful personality and adroit skill served? Only in the "Meistersinger" prelude was a direct comparison possible, for the other numbers were either new or had not been heard here for a long time. It would be extreme to say that magnificent readings of the prelude heard in the past were surpassed yesterday; one or two might be recalled which in the retrospect seem even more impressive, perhaps because of the setting. Yesterday's program, while extremely interesting, was not i n all respects, and in particul d not lend itself to cum ce. The three big Wa se with Mo gre prin

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

JAN 5 1925

HUGE AUDIENCE HEARS SYMPHONY AT AUDITORIUM

Boston Symphony Orchestra Provides Rare Treat Under Leadership of Noted Conductor.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its annual visit to Springfield yesterday afternoon under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A., giving a program made up of works seldom if ever played here, and presenting for the first time its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

We have never heard the orchestra play better than it did under the inspiring leadership of this great Russian conductor. The string section was incomparable. There was a finish and brilliance to the playing which brought back memories of Boston Symphony concerts before the war. Today the orchestra has resumed its place as one of the three great symphony orchestras in this country, perhaps in the world.

One is prone to write much of Koussevitzky for he is one of the most dominating personalties imaginable. He is just enough of a prima-donna conductor to win him a popular following in the best sense of the term. He is tall, slim and elegant in dress. He walked modestly down the aisle, bowing right and left, and took his place before his stand. With his baton in his hand he was electrified. An imperious thrust of the arm, finger outstretched, gave the individual cues. None of his gestures is meaningless, yet some are so slight as to be almost unseen. At climaxes he is on tip toe, left hand upraised and baton swinging wide, then suddenly, leaning over his desk, he will draw out fine spun pianissimos. He is a master pantomimist. His baton is either held rigid or so lightly that it trembles like a leaf. When all is over, his arms drop to his side and he steps quietly down from the platform, acknowledges the applause with a slight bow and strolls off the stage.

Yesterday's program opened with the Hayden "Symphony in G major." It was a genial work for both orchestra and audience. The opening movement starts with a short, adagio movement, which is soon followed by the main body of the movement, an allegro, with a dainty theme announced by the strings and repeated by the full orchestra. The remaining themes are variations on the first. The second movement, a largo, brought forth a beautiful melody for oboe and cellos against an accompaniment of winds and strings. This lovely theme is further developed until its richness is given over to the full orchestra. Then follows a typical minuet, which was strongly played, and it in turn was followed by a spirited finale in rondo form based on a country dance. Hayden was fond of the rondo form, with its couplets and refrains and repetition of its chief theme.

The next number was a suite by Manuel De Falla, a Spanish composer. It was based on his choreographic fantasy for voice and small orchestra, known as "Gipsy Life." It was a colorful, radiant reading which Koussevitzky gave. The music itself is rich in thematic material as De Falla has built it on the modes, forms and cadences inspired by the Andalusian folk song. De Falla is called a poet of Spanish emotion. I'Sanroma played the piano part.

The last three numbers were devoted to Wagner, and included the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the "Funeral Music of Siegfried" from "Gotterdammerung" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers." In these numbers Koussevitzky was at his best. He built up great climaxes urging on his men, almost by brute strength, and then bringing the tone down to the finest of pianissimos. The final measures of the Bacchanale were scarcely more than a murmur—a magnificent achievement. The music from "Gotterdammerung," with its many themes, was superbly played and the prelude to "The Mastersingers" provided as monumental a finale as one could wish. This group of three numbers provided brilliant changes of mood, sensuous beauty of tone and mighty climaxes.

The audience was one of the largest we have ever seen in the Auditorium. Every seat was taken and hundreds were standing and even sitting on the stairways. One wonders where all these people are when other attractions come to the city. They owe a great debt of gratitude to the Y. M. C. A. for providing such a magnificent concert free of charge.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 5 1925

Koussevitzky Calls Auditorium Finest Concert Hall in America

Famous Russian Conductor, Here With Boston Symphony Orchestra, Spontaneous in Praise of Springfield Municipal Orchestra

This is the finest hall in America, Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, told a small group back-stage yesterday afternoon during the intermission of the program the Boston orchestra gave at the Auditorium. The noted Russian conductor spoke enthusiastically of the contour and acoustics of the Auditorium and declared that nowhere had he given a concert with better effect.

Mr Koussevitzky made many friends during his visit yesterday and took a personal interest in the work of the Springfield Symphony orchestra, which rehearsed in the afternoon at the Auditorium. It was through J. Bedetti, first 'cellist for the Boston orchestra, who played with the local musicians last year, that Arthur H. Turner, director of the Springfield orchestra and municipal organist, met Mr Koussevitzky yesterday during the intermission.

Mr Koussevitzky said he was in the hall at the time Mr Turner's men were rehearsing and fully enjoyed their work on Tschaikovsky's fourth symphony, which will be given at the Auditorium on the 21st. He commended the playing of the Springfield orchestra and said the city should be proud of such an organization and should give it great support. He expressed the wish that he could give all his concerts in a hall so suited to them as the Auditorium. "This hall is better than most of the best in this country and many in Europe," the famous Russian virtuoso and director declared. "I prefer it even to Carnegie hall in New York city."

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF

JAN 5 192

America's Grea

CONCERTS

Koussevitzky and Damrosch Introduce It—Seven Pianists Over Week-end.

Some new music by two of the better known hopefuls among the modernists was introduced to the town by Serge Koussevitzky and Walter Damrosch over the week-end. None of it is likely to grave itself on the tablets of time, and the reviewer's report on it to-day, therefore, will be brief.

Mr. Koussevitzky's adventure concerned the suite made by the Spaniard, Manuel de Falla, from his dance-pantomime (including a single voice part), "El Amor Brujo," which, translated, is "Love, the Magician." Only a relatively small part of the whole was given at this concert of the Boston Orchestra on Saturday. Kurt Schindler presented the voice part at one of the concerts of the Schola Cantorum a few seasons ago.

The music is very largely in the characteristic rhythmic and melodic idiom of the Spanish gypsy folk and when it isn't, it ceases to be either distinctive or interesting. It was more neatly than impulsively played by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men.

This was not, indeed, one of Mr. Koussevitzky's best days. For one thing, Sergei Rachmaninoff, who was to have been the soloist of the afternoon in his own second piano concerto, had fallen ill and the programme had to be changed at the last moment. Haydn's G major symphony was substituted for a Handel concerto grosso and the bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" for the Rachmaninoff concerto. The Haydn symphony went excellently well, but the bacchanale rather less so.

Thereafter, besides the de Falla suite, there were Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," which seemed to lack cohesion and, at times, something of coherence, too, nor did Mr. Koussevitzky seem to fall in very robustly with its spirit of low comedy; and Maurice

ably deft, a master of style. Gilman in the Herald-Tribune

Mr. Bliss and Mr. Hill

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOUSTON,
TEXAS PRESS

JAN 5 1925

IN LITTLE OLD NEW YORK

NEW YORK, Jan. 5.—battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia Orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr. Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors — Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Furtwangler and Igor Stravinsky, the composer, with the Philharmonic, and Damrosch, Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschman with the Symphony. However, the battle for the pinnacle of public favor seems to rest between the visitors Stokowski and Koussevitsky.

And may the better pair of spats win!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 5

IT IS obviously impossible for a reviewer unequipped with seven-league boots or the psychic advantages of a dual personality to be present in two places, separated by a number of miles, at the same time, even in these days of traffic invention. Thus it happens that the writer, when several important events occur in the two boros in one evening, sometimes has to take into his confidence some person equipped for the task of keeping a critical eye on some part of the proceedings.

On Friday last we trusted a musical friend who informed us that Rachmaninoff had appeared at a concert at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Company, and he ~~lied~~ to us. We herewith offer our apologies.

EDWARD CUSHING.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN

JAN 5 1925

Boston Symphony Concert.

In the afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second matinee was disarranged by the indisposition of Sergei Rachmaninov, the distinguished Russian composer and pianist, who was to have played one of his own concertos. The list as rearranged by Mr. Koussevitzky consisted of Haydn's D major symphony, the baccanale from "Tannhaeuser," Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel," Manuel de Falla's suite "El Amor Brujo" and Ravel's "La Valse."

The suite of the Spanish composer was one of those panoramas of local color which rarely fail to please the hearer. De Falla writes with gusto and brilliant variety of orchestral tint. His rhythms are naturally clear cut and his music has life and communicative charm. The audience apparently enjoyed hearing it. So did this looker on in Verona.

Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to be more in command of himself than he had been at the Thursday evening concert. His reading of the "Till Eulenspiegel" was rich in delicacy of treatment, but nevertheless filled with the rollicking spirit and broad humor of the work. It was one of the best things he had done in this city, and his orchestra gave him everything he desired.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

JAN 5 192

The debut of Wilhelm Furtwaengler, guest conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra, effected Saturday night, was quite impressive. The visitor revealed himself a musician of fine parts and almost started something with his stirring and emotional interpretation of the First Brahms Symphony.

Myra Hess on Saturday had much applause and frequent recalls for her intelligent piano playing; and Serge Koussevitsz opened up more discussion of his conducting powers at the Boston Symphony Concert. Mr. Rachmaninoff, the announced pianist for the concert, did not appear because of illness.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

JAN 5 1925

How Damrosch, Dean of Conductors, First Stood the Test

By JESSIE MacBRIDE.

News and music gossip! The orchestra, with grand opera nearby, brings us again into the big world of music.

The first symphony concert comes on January 13, with the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conducting.

The Philadelphia Orchestra comes the following week, and then the month closes with the one appearance this season of the Boston Symphony, with its new and great conductor, ussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE,
WIS.
SENTINEL

JAN 6 1925

There appears to be little doubt but that the tremendous success of the new conductor of the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky, is responsible for the ~~fact~~ that the entire winter's series of concerts is sold out to the last seat. The only exception is the 500 "rush seats," in order to get which students stand outside from early in the morning, awaiting the opening of the doors, when there is a wild scramble. Despite this situation, however, a deficit is certain, as the orchestra is not (like others), and never has been self-supporting.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JAN 6 1925

Storm Motif for Music

Igor Stravinsky, come back to conduct some concerts for the Philharmonic orchestra and to go out as soloist with the Boston Symphony, is now accepted not as a musical revolutionist but as the man who is just a step forward in current musical writing. But he is promising us something big and wonderful for the future. He came over through the worst of winter seas. His life for days was a succession of terrible storms where people were driven to silence by the mighty forces they were sailing through. He saw wind and wave and wild nature noises and fearful beatings of a great ship and he saw people awed before these things. But the power of man over the storm won. New York says he is going to try to put that into music. Suppose he should give us a genuine storm symphony? The great composers have immortalized thunder storms and summer squalls and they have made the limpid love lines of the clearing day beautiful themes in music.

But those composers never dared the North Atlantic at Christmas time when snow and cold and wild wind and the mighty ocean are all lashed together in the immensity of what storm may mean.

If Stravinsky can put this into music and give the truth of the storm, we might all shudder before it but in the end we should accept it for its superb reality. He says he is going to do this. Here's hoping he can and will.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 6 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its forty-fourth year, comes to Hartford for one concert this season under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick and will be heard in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February 1. This occasion will introduce to Hartford for the first time one of the greatest personalities in the musical world, the orchestra's new conductor, Serge Ko
His great success in Bosto York is the talk of th among music lovers. His conducting is interesting Taylor, critic of the World, says this of it:
sevitzky's beat is angul cisive, and must be easy
In quiet passages he be entirely from the wrist, small arc, widening the using his full arm only f of stress. His most indiv [illegible] is to thrust his left ly overhead, the palm o flat, to indicate a sudden (a dynamic change of whi fond). Although his con always electric with en pratice of keeping both planted and his body motio the impression of fundam and complete self-mastery vance sale for this notabl dicates that even the amp of the large Capitol Thea taxed to the utmost. The now on sale at Sedgwick music store, 139 Asylum orders will also be accep

BOSTO
HE

JAN 8

NOTES and L
By PHILIP HAL

The program of the Bosto orchestra's concerts this w clude two works that will b the first time in the city:
chestral transcription of B tasia and Fugue, C minor, and Respighi's Concerto Gre violin, to be played by Alber Elgar first orchestrated the it was brought out at one of sens's concerts in London, wh so much pleasure that a rep demanded and granted. Th was first played at the (Eng.) festival in 1922. Resp certo was brought out at ho when Mario Corti was the vio second movement has a Greg for a subject and the finale lula. Jacques Gordon, conce of the Chicago orchestra, p concerto in Chicago on Oct.
Mr. Spalding has played it at Wagner's "Ride of the V prelude to "Lohengrin" and o
"Rienzi" will complete the program.

PAPER- Transcript
DATE- Jan 7

early experience."

AS NEW YORK HEARD THEM

Koussevitzky Again

SURELY Mr. Koussevitzky is the most uneven, the most undependable, of conductors! At the Boston Symphony matinée of Saturday [last] we had from him a performance of Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" which we are inclined to rank as almost the finest we have ever heard. Perhaps we should not bother about the "almost." We have introduced it into the foregoing sentence only because of a jumpy, middle-aged nervousness in the face of an advancing superlative. Perhaps we have heard some other performance of "Til" that was an equally perfect image of the score as we have ideally conceived it; as witty and sharp edge and at the same time as mellow and tende at the beginning and at the end; a startlingly dramatic at the catastrophe but we cannot at the moment recall an such.

But this gorgeous performance had followed on the heels of an almost incredibl maladroit and misrepresentative performance of the "Bacchanal" from "Tannhäuser." What can Mr. Koussevitzky have meant by those senseless and deeply damaging ritardandos that he made in the full course of Wagner's fiery flood of tone in the frenetically sensuous early pages of the Bacchanal that picture the orgy in the Venusberg at its height? There is not the smallest warrant or excuse in Wagner's score for the things that Mr. Koussevitzky did to it. There is a point at which a "reading" becomes sheer intolerable perversion; and Mr. Koussevitzky in this performance, by his distortion of the essential spirit and clear purport of the music, passed quite beyond that point, with plenty of room to turn around in.

This notable feat having been accomplished, Mr. Koussevitzky played sympathetically some movements from an inconsequential suite derived from Manuel de Falla's "choreographic fantasy" entitled "Love the Sorcerer," which Mr. Stokowski introduced to America (in Philadelphia) in 1922. The program came to an end with Ravel's "The Waltz," that favorite battlehorse of Mr. Mengelberg. This number, and Haydn's symphony (No. 13, in G major) with which Mr. Koussevitzky began his concert, were admirably played. Especially in the delicious Finale of Haydn's symphony was Mr. Koussevitzky at his best—light-wristed, sensitive, inimit-

---

PAPER- Post.
DATE- Jan 7

HUB AND RUSSIA MUCH THE SAME

Wife of New Symphony Conductor Finds the Hospitality of Homeland Here--Likes All But Ice Cream

ME. NATHALIE KOUSSEVITZKY or of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who finds Bos- is like her native city of Moscow.

ably deft, a master of style. [Lawrence Gilman in the Herald-Tribune

world
manoffs first th like that mate here ky of her y like that

.Y" ith far-off us for the

"With the exception of a certain Anglo-Saxon restraint the people here are the most friendly of any I have ever met, except my own people," she declared. "Added to their hospitality is a simplicity of manner and an eas which is characteristic of my own people. This hospitality and simplicity of manner to which I have been accustomed makes the people in this city the most charming of hosts and most successful of entertainers.

"Their versatility may be compared to that of the Russians and while they may not show as much enthusiasm in conversation as do the Russians their interest in all subjects of discussion is just as intense. When comparing Bos tonians to Russians I refer particularly to people of Moscow. The culture an atmosphere of the two cities seems t me to be strikingly alike.

"Perhaps the chief reason for a similarity between Russians and Bostonians lies in the fact that both th United States and Russia are vast i size and vast in resources. To my min the largeness of a country makes for largeness and generosity of heart in people. It seems to give them breadt and vision which is not found other wise. Then prosperity makes for cu ture. I am not thinking of the prese day Russia because I am sure th Russia will eventually return to h former glory.

"Even the scenery of Boston appea familiar to me though I have nev seen it before. I cannot become lone for when I look out of my windows see the same trees and shrubbery whi I have always known. Your clima which is considered so hard to gr used to, is in reality exactly like t climate of Petrograd where we ha just as changeable weather as he As for Moscow it is steadily cold, course.

"Christmas here is very much l Christmas in Russia, with many ditional customs which I enjoyed. T idea of hanging wreaths in the windo and putting colored lights so th would show from the outside is son thing that I have never seen before.

"We have the same turkey din as you have. Of course there are s many American foods which I kn nothing about, but I have eaten famous Boston baked beans and c sider them very good. Pie is one our own dishes so it was not new me. Ice cream is perhaps the thing I have not cared for. I c sider it too sweet. In Russia we h both French and Russian cooking ser at the same time. While much of your cooking resembles Russian cooking you have nothing that resembles French dishes.

"It gives me great pleasure to find that the English which I learned 2 years ago is returning to me day b

25 trease Bose been gether etween or the livided e quos $84,- present igns o to be e 1924-ted the ged to mount, 300.99. action, cessary apital; who bets imon and hem fiay, as y have more than a; and one of rivate

PAPER- Transcript
DATE- Jan 7

early experience."

W YORK HEARD THEM

zky Again

SURELY Mr. Koussevitzky is the most uneven, the most undependable, of conductors! At the Boston Symphony matinée of Saturday [last] we had from him a performance of Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" which we are inclined to rank as almost the finest we have ever heard. Perhaps we should not bother about the "almost." We have introduced it into the foregoing sentence only because of a jumpy, middle-aged nervousness in the face of an advancing superlative. Perhaps we have heard some other performance of "Til" that was an equally perfect image of the score as we have ideally conceived it; as witty and sharp edged, and at the same time as mellow and tender at the beginning and at the end; as startlingly dramatic at the catastrophe; but we cannot at the moment recall any such.

But this gorgeous performance had followed on the heels of an almost incredibly maladroit and misrepresentative performance of the "Bacchanal" from "Tannhäuser." What can Mr. Koussevitzky have meant by those senseless and deeply damaging ritardandos that he made in the full course of Wagner's fiery flood of tone in the frenetically sensuous early pages of the Bacchanal that picture the orgy in the Venusberg at its height? There is not the smallest warrant or excuse in Wagner's score for the things that Mr. Koussevitzky did to it. There is a point at which a "reading" becomes sheer intolerable perversion; and Mr. Koussevitzky in this performance, by his distortion of the essential spirit and clear purport of the music, passed quite beyond that point, with plenty of room to turn around in.

This notable feat having been accomplished, Mr. Koussevitzky played sympathetically some movements from an inconsequential suite derived from Manuel de Falla's "choreographic fantasy" entitled "Love the Sorcerer," which Mr. Stokowski introduced to America (in Philadelphia) in 1922. The program came to an end with Ravel's "The Waltz," that favorite battlehorse of Mr. Mengelberg. This number, and Haydn's symphony (No. 13, in G major) with which Mr. Koussevitzky began his concert, were admirably played. Especially in the delicious Fi was Mr. Kou

deal ar it lative ner num-ert took a fresh start, were a little too much piled on top of each other—Ossa on Pelion and then a third peak which was by so much too much. Psychologically the culmination of the program was in the "Goetterdaemmerung" funeral music, the solemn pomp of which was made deeply impressive. After this the "Meistersinger" prelude brought the concert felicitously to a close but suffered somewhat from what had gone before. But even if on various grounds one might prefer other interpretations at some points, there could be no question as to the fresh, interesting and individual quality of the reading given yesterday.

At the other end of the scale, and of the program, was the Haydn symphony, where the conductor's artful self-effacement should not lessen his credit for a delightful performance of a charming and to most concertgoers a little known symphony. It was not in the least fussed up or exaggerated in any way, and no part of the concert inspired more pleasure. Haydn's simple and tuneful music also brought out delightfully the beautiful quality of the strings, which has been steadily improving in recent years and is now almost or quite at the pitch of perfection for which Maj Higginson's orchestra achieved a world-wide fame, an achievement won with infinite patience and tact by Mr Monteux.

It was a pleasure to hear the much praised work of the new Spanish composer De Falla, evidently a man of exceptional originality, who has turned to good account the fascinating rhythms and melodic turns of gipsy music without literal borrowing. It is curious that a country so rich in genius as Spain should have produced so meagerly of music and of art; it is no less striking that what it does produce should be of so outstanding a sort; with a different national history it might have rivaled Italy which produced masterpieces when the Spaniards were founding a world-empire. The Spanish magic is not lacking in this colorful suite made from "El Amor Brujo." The orchestration is light and in the brilliant parts sparkling, and effective use is made of the piano, played by Jesus Sanroma.

The Auditorium was of course crowded, and for the great majority of those present this was the one chance of the year to hear a symphony program by one of the world's greatest orchestras. At present we are put on meager rations, helped out by the three concerts of our own Springfield symphony orchestra. More are needed, but it is much that 4000 people once a year should be enabled to hear so magnificent a performance as was given yesterday by Mr Koussevitzky and his men.

PAPER- Herald
DATE- Jan 8

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts this week will include two works that will be played for the first time in the city: Elgar's orchestral transcription of Bach's Fantasia and Fugue, C minor, for organ; and Respighi's Concerto Gregoriano for violin, to be played by Albert Spalding. Elgar first orchestrated the Fugue and it was brought out at one of Mr. Goossens's concerts in London, where it gave so much pleasure that a repetition was demanded and granted. The Fantasia was first played at the Gloucester (Eng.) festival in 1922. Respighi's Concerto was brought out at home in 1922 when Mario Corti was the violinist. The second movement has a Gregorian tone for a subject and the finale is an Alleluia. Jacques Gordon, concert master of the Chicago orchestra, played the concerto in Chicago on Oct. 31, 1924. Mr. Spalding has played it at Detroit.

Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries," prelude to "Lohengrin" and overture to "Rienzi" will complete the program.

A STRAVINSKI STRAVAGANZA

Notes and Lines:

Something like 46 years ago my Uncle George saw fit on Christmas day to present me with a toy drum and my young brother, then aged 3, with a cane which had a harmonica in its handle. I need hardly add that Uncle George did not live with us. He abode in a safe place some 25 miles away, and he was furthermore not planning to attend our Chrstmas party. Otherwise his gifts might have been chosen otherwise.

I well remember the day as one marked by an incessant music in the impressionistic manner, which had deplorable results. By 5 o'clock in the afternoon my father, thoroughly fed up, put a heavy foot through the head of my drum, snapped my brother's cane in two and threw the harmonica part into the fire. The remaining end he used to excellent purpose on both my brother and me. Of all these things was I reminded while drinking in the strains of Stravinski's "Sacre du Printemps"—if that is the way to spell it—at a recent Symphony concert. There were parts of it which strongly recalled the joint efforts of my brother and myself at devising weird harmonies and still weirder dissonances on that memorable Christmas afternoon. But we played to an unappreciative public, which had not yet discovered that the worse noise you can contrive to make the greater genius you probably are.

Up around Mace's Crossing, where I live, there abides a prejudice in favor of a tune. We are old-fashioned people who still believe in lung-protectors and the sovereign properties of the rock-infested rye. We want our poems to scan, and we like them still better when they rhyme. We have a feeling that if music is worth while you will find yourself whistling a stave or two from it after you come home. I have been trying in vain to recall any parts of "The Rite of Spring" so that I may whistle them to my wife. I made a noise rather like Stravinski when I was putting out my galvanized iron barrels last Saturday, and hastened to call the missus so that she might catch the idea; but, alas! the next movement of the barrel was a disappointment, and like the man in the poem, I have sought vainly for the one lost chord divine.

I was interested to read what was said about this matter in the program book. It appeared that when the music was played in Paris there was a divided opinion. Part of the audiences resorted to boos (not the kind you are probably thinking of) and catcalls—the sort of thing we used to do when I lived in Goffstown, N. H., when a show failed to commend itself; I never before knew how much Goffstown is like Paris; and the other part of the audience applauded like mad and said things like "encore" and "bis" and "bravissimo." Some of them did this because they really enjoyed the music. Others, like Mr. Carl van Vechten, because they "somehow felt that free speech was at stake." People with names like that usually do feel that free speech is at stake; and we all know that speech has got to be freest of all when you haven't anything worth while to say.

Mr. van Vechten was excited and stood up. After a while he became conscious that another enthusiast behind him was beating violently on his (Mr. van Vechten's) head with both fists, keeping time with the intoxicating din of the music. The fact that he didn't notice this assault for a long time, and the further fact that when he did notice it he was not displeased, together testify to the excellence of Stravinski. If the same thing had happened during a performance of the Fifth Symphony, doubtless there would have been murder done then and there. I doubt that any other than Stravinski has this Orphic power to make assault and battery appropriate conduct in the circles of the polite. I doubt still more strongly that a century hence conductors will be including this curious hotchpot of cacophonies in their programs. I am willing to concede possible merits to innovators; but the test of this new verse, and cubist painting, and cacophonic music will eventually be its power to get into Familiar Quotations, and the Metropolitan Museum, and the steady-diet of symphony fans.

I met a nice lady named Gladys on my way out. She said she was crazy to learn to play the kettle-drums in Sacre du Printemps. I could see no reason why she couldn't, because it didn't seem that anything she did could possibly be wrong. Meantime I contemplate a little effort of my own, based on the themes I hear daily in the conduct of business at Mace's Crossing, where the Salem line diverges from that leading to Lowell Junction. It will be scored for three locomotives, 48 freight cars, six dozen milk cans, a crossing-gong and five automobiles,—one interchangeable with Ford.

PHINEAS REDUX

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JAN 6 1925

Storm Motif for Music

Igor Stravinsky, come back to conduct some concerts for the Philharmonic orchestra and to go out as soloist with the Boston Symphony, is now accepted not as a musical revolutionist but as the man who is just a step forward in current musical writing. But he is promising us something big and wonderful for the future. He came over through the worst of winter seas. His life for days was a succession of terrible storms where people were driven to silence by the mighty forces they were sailing through. He saw wind and wave and wild nature noises and fearful beatings of a great ship and he saw people awed before these things. But the power of man over the storm won. New York says he is going to try to put that into music. Suppose he should give us a genuine storm symphony? The great composers have immortalized thunder storms and summer squalls and they have made the limpid love lines of the clearing day beautiful themes in music.

But those composers never dared the North Atlantic at Christmas time when snow and cold and wild wind and the mighty ocean are all lashed together in the immensity of what storm may mean.

If Stravinsky can put this into music and give the truth of the storm, we might all shudder before it but in the end we should accept it for its superb reality. He says he is going to do this. Here's hoping he can and will.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 6 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its forty-fourth year, comes to Hartford for one concert this season under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick and will be heard in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February 1. This occasion will introduce to Hartford for the first time one of the greatest personalities in the musical world, the orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. His great success in Boston and New York is the talk of the moment among music lovers. His manner of conducting is interesting and Deems Taylor, critic of the New York World, says this of it: "Mr. Koussevitsky's beat is angular and decisive, and must be easy to follow. In quiet passages he beats almost entirely from the wrist, in a very small arc, widening the arc and using his full arm only in moments of stress. His most individual gesture is to thrust his left arm sharply overhead, the palm of the hand flat, to indicate a suddent pianissimo (a dynamic change of which he seems fond). Although his conducting is always electric with energy, his pratice of keeping both feet firmly planted and his body motionless gives the impression of fundamental poise and complete self-mastery." The advance sale for this notable event indicates that even the ample capacity of the large Capitol Theater will be taxed to the utmost. The seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, 139 Asylum street. Mail orders will also be accepted.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

JAN 8 1925

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts this week will include two works that will be played for the first time in the city: Elgar's orchestral transcription of Bach's Fantasia and Fugue, C minor, for organ; and Respighi's Concerto Gregoriano for violin, to be played by Albert Spalding. Elgar first orchestrated the Fugue and it was brought out at one of Mr. Goossens's concerts in London, where it gave so much pleasure that a repetition was demanded and granted. The Fantasia was first played at the Gloucester (Eng.) festival in 1922. Respighi's Concerto was brought out at home in 1922 when Mario Corti was the violinist. The second movement has a Gregorian tone for a subject and the finale is an Alleluia. Jacques Gordon, concert master of the Chicago orchestra, played the concerto in Chicago on Oct. 31, 1924. Mr. Spalding has played it at Detroit.

Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries," prelude to "Lohengrin" and overture to "Rienzi" will complete the program.

PAPER- Post.

DATE- Jan 7

HUB AND RUSSIA MUCH THE SAME

Wife of New Symphony Conductor Finds the Hospitality of Homeland Here--Likes All But Ice Cream

MME. NATHALIE KOUSSEVITZKY
Wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who finds Boston is like her native city of Moscow.

Bostonians are like Russians, in the opinion of Mme. Nathalie Koussevitzky, wife of the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. Even the New England climate here reminds Mme. Koussevitzky of her native land and is especially like that of Petrograd, she says.

"MOST FRIENDLY"

In comparing Boston with far-off Russia and her cities famous for the most brilliant society in the world before the downfall of the Romanoffs Mme. Koussevitzky mentioned first the hospitality of Bostonians as like that of her countrymen.

"With the exception of a certain Anglo-Saxon restraint the people here are the most friendly of any I have ever met, except my own people," she declared. "Added to their hospitality is a simplicity of manner and an ease which is characteristic of my own people. This hospitality and simplicity of manner to which I have been accustomed makes the people in this city the most charming of hosts and most successful of entertainers.

"Their versatility may be compared to that of the Russians and while they may not show as much enthusiasm in conversation as do the Russians their interest in all subjects of discussion is just as intense. When comparing Bostonians to Russians I refer particularly to people of Moscow. The culture and atmosphere of the two cities seems to me to be strikingly alike.

"Perhaps the chief reason for a similarity between Russians and Bostonians lies in the fact that both the United States and Russia are vast in size and vast in resources. To my mind the largeness of a country makes for a largeness and generosity of heart in a people. It seems to give them breadth and vision which is not found otherwise. Then prosperity makes for culture. I am not thinking of the present day Russia because I am sure that Russia will eventually return to her former glory.

"Even the scenery of Boston appears familiar to me though I have never seen it before. I cannot become lonely for when I look out of my windows I see the same trees and shrubbery which I have always known. Your climate, which is considered so hard to grow used to, is in reality exactly like the climate of Petrograd where we have just as changeable weather as here. As for Moscow it is steadily cold, of course.

"Christmas here is very much like Christmas in Russia, with many additional customs which I enjoyed. The idea of hanging wreaths in the windows and putting colored lights so they would show from the outside is something that I have never seen before.

"We have the same turkey dinner as you have. Of course there are still many American foods which I know nothing about, but I have eaten the famous Boston baked beans and consider them very good. Pie is one of our own dishes so it was not new to me. Ice cream is perhaps the one thing I have not cared for. I consider it too sweet. In Russia we have both French and Russian cooking served at the same time. While much of your cooking resembles Russian cooking you have nothing that resembles French dishes.

"It gives me great pleasure to find that the English which I learned 25 years ago is returning to me day by

---

DES MOINES, IA.
REGISTER

JAN 8 1925

Boston Transcript: The treasurer and the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra have been doing sums. They added together the annual differences between income and expenditures for the past three years. They divided the total by three, and the quotient, in round figures, was $84,000—the average of the present seasonal [illegible] by the signs of the times, it is not likely to be much more or appreciably [illegible] the current musical year, 1924-25. Next the trustees counted the subscriptions already pledged to offset this loss, and the amount, on Tuesday last, was $70,300.99. After a final sum in subtraction, they set $14,000 as the necessary addition to this working capital: and now ask it "of those who believe the symphony concerts important in the life of Boston and who are willing to help them financially." They do not say, as they might wisely and truly have said, that the orchestra is more economically administered than any similar body in America; and that its annual deficit is one of the lowest on public or private record.

PAPER- Transcript

DATE- Jan 7

early experience."

NEW YORK HEARD THEM

Koussevitzky Again

SURELY Mr. Koussevitzky is the most uneven, the most undependable, of conductors! At the Boston Symphony matinée of Saturday [last] we had from him a performance of Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" which we are inclined to rank as almost the finest we have ever heard. Perhaps we should not bother about the "almost." We have introduced it into the foregoing sentence only because of a jumpy, middle-aged nervousness in the face of an advancing superlative. Perhaps we have heard some other performance of "Til" that was an equally perfect image of the score as we have ideally conceived it; as witty and sharp edged, and at the same time as mellow and tender at the beginning and at the end; as startlingly dramatic at the catastrophe; but we cannot at the moment recall any such.

But this gorgeous performance had followed on the heels of an almost incredibly maladroit and misrepresentative performance of the "Bacchanal" from "Tannhäuser." What can Mr. Koussevitzky have meant by those senseless and deeply damaging ritardandos that he made in the full course of Wagner's fiery flood of tone in the frenetically sensuous early pages of the Bacchanal that picture the orgy in the Venusberg at its height? There is not the smallest warrant or excuse in Wagner's score for the things that Mr. Koussevitzky did to it. There is a point at which a "reading" becomes sheer intolerable perversion; and Mr. Koussevitzky in this performance, by his distortion of the essential spirit and clear purport of the music, passed quite beyond that point, with plenty of room to turn around in.

This notable feat having been accomplished, Mr. Koussevitzky played sympathetically some movements from an incon[illegible] from Manuel de Falla's "choreographic fantasy" entitled "[illegible] the Sorcerer," which Mr. Stokowski introduced to America (in Philadelphia) in 1922. The program came to an end with Ravel's "The Waltz," that favorite battlehorse of Mr. Mengelberg. This number, and Haydn's symphony (No. 13, in G major) with which Mr. Koussevitzky began his concert, were admirably played. Especially in the delicious Finale of [illegible] phony was Mr. Koussevitzky

---

PAPER- [illegible]

DATE- [illegible]

Prophetic rumor hints at the first performances in Boston of Stravinsky's tone poem, "The Song of the Nightingale," transformed version of his Chinese opera, after Andersen," when the composer is guest at the Symphony Concerts of Jan. 23 and 24.

FOR BROOKLINE SCHOOL BOARD

PAPER- Herald

DATE- Jan 8

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts this week will include two works that will be played for the first time in the city: Elgar's orchestral transcription of Bach's Fantasia and Fugue, C minor, for organ; and Respighi's Concerto Gregoriano for violin, to be played by Albert Spalding. Elgar first orchestrated the Fugue and it was brought out at one of Mr. Goossens's concerts in London, where it gave so much pleasure that a repetition was demanded and granted. The Fantasia was first played at the Gloucester (Eng.) festival in 1922. Respighi's Concerto was brought out at home in 1922 when Mario Corti was the violinist. The second movement has a Gregorian tone for a subject and the finale is an Alleluia. Jacques Gordon, concert master of the Chicago orchestra, played the concerto in Chicago on Oct. 31, 1924. Mr. Spalding has played it at Detroit.

Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries," prelude to "Lohengrin" and overture to "Rienzi" will complete the program.

A STRAVINSKI STRAVAGANZA

Notes and Lines:

Something like 46 years ago my Uncle George saw fit on Christmas day to present me with a toy drum and my young brother, then aged 3, with a cane which had a harmonica in its handle. I need hardly add that Uncle George did not live with us. He abode in a safe place some 25 miles away, and he was furthermore not planning to attend our Christmas party. Otherwise his gifts might have been chosen otherwise.

I well remember the day as one marked by an incessant music in the impressionistic manner, which had deplorable results. By 5 o'clock in the afternoon my father, thoroughly fed up, put a heavy foot through the head of my drum, snapped my brother's cane in two and threw the harmonica part into the fire. The remaining end he used to excellent purpose on both my brother and me. Of all these things was I reminded while drinking in the strains of Stravinski's "Sacre du Printemps"—if that is the way to spell it—at a recent Symphony concert. There were parts of it which strongly recalled the joint efforts of my brother and myself at devising weird harmonies and still weirder dissonances on that memorable Christmas afternoon. But we played to an unappreciative public, which had not yet discovered that the worse noise you can contrive to make the greater genius you probably are.

Up around Mace's Crossing, where I live, there abides a prejudice in favor of a tune. We are old-fashioned people who still believe in lung-protectors and the sovereign properties of the rock-infested rye. We want our poems to scan, and we like them still better when they rhyme. We have a feeling that if music is worth while you will find yourself whistling a stave or two from it after you come home. I have been trying in vain to recall any parts of "The Rite of Spring" so that I may whistle them to my wife. I made a noise rather like Stravinski when I was putting out my galvanized iron barrels last Saturday, and hastened to call the missus so that she might catch the idea; but, alas! the next movement of the barrel was a disappointment, and like the man in the poem, I have sought vainly for the one lost chord divine.

I was interested to read what was said about this matter in the program book. It appeared that when the music was played in Paris there was a divided opinion. Part of the audiences resorted to boos (not the kind you are probably thinking of) and catcalls—the sort of thing we used to do when I lived in Goffstown, N. H., when a show failed to commend itself; I never before knew how much Goffstown is like Paris; and the other part of the audience applauded like mad and said things like "encore" and "bis" and "bravissimo." Some of them did this because they really enjoyed the music. Others, like Mr. Carl van Vechten, because they "somehow felt that free speech was at stake." People with names like that usually do feel that free speech is at stake; and we all know that speech has got to be freest of all when you haven't anything worth while to say.

Mr. van Vechten was excited and stood up. After a while he became conscious that another enthusiast behind him was beating violently on his (Mr. van Vechten's) head with both fists, keeping time with the intoxicating din of the music. The fact that he didn't notice this assault for a long time, and the further fact that when he did notice it he was not displeased, together testify to the excellence of Stravinski. If the same thing had happened during a performance of the Fifth Symphony, doubtless there would have been murder done then and there. I doubt that any other than Stravinski has this Orphic power to make assault and battery appropriate conduct in the circles of the polite. I doubt still more strongly that a century hence conductors will be including this curious hotchpot of cacophonies in their programs. I am willing to concede possible merits to innovators; but the test of this new verse, and cubist painting, and cacophonic music will eventually be its power to get into Familiar Quotations, and the Metropolitan Museum, and the steady-diet of symphony fans.

I met a nice lady named Gladys on my way out. She said she was crazy to learn to play the kettle-drums in Sacre du Printemps. I could see no reason why she couldn't, because it didn't seem that anything she did could possibly be wrong. Meantime I contemplate a little effort of my own, based on the themes I hear daily in the conduct of business at Mace's Crossing, where the Salem line diverges from that leading to Lowell Junction. It will be scored for three locomotives, 48 freight cars, six dozen milk cans, a crossing-gong and five automobiles,—one interchangeable with Ford.

PHINEAS REDUX

10

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 8 1925

DIRECTOR OF FAMOUS ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY.

Who Will Make His First Appearance as Director of Boston Symphony Orch.

There is a lively interest hereabouts concerning the forthcoming Boston Symphony concert at the Capitol theater, on Sunday afternoon, February 1, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The coming of the world's greatest orchestra is an event in itself but this occasion is garnished by the first appearance in Hartford of the orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, a gigantic personality in the realm of music. He is the first Russian to lead this famous organization. Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky was born in 1874 in Vyshny Volotchk, Russia. He studied at the Moscow Conservatory and became a professor there. He developed first into a celebrated double bass virtuoso and afterward became a distinguished conductor. He has composed a concerto for double bass and founded a society for the promotion of Russian music in Berlin. He has conducted with great success in Paris and London as well as other cities of Europe. He came to America for the first time last September and his few American appearances have been greeted by the wildest enthusiasm. The tickets for the local concert are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's music store No., 139 Asylum street. The brief announcement of the orchestra coming has occasioned one of the largest advance sales in the history of concert giving in the city of Hartford. All indications point to a sold out house.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 10 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL PLAY HERE JANUARY 20

Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor to Be Presented.

Features of the third visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence at a concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 20, will be the performance of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor, under Koussevitsky's direction, and the appearance as soloist of Roland Hayes, the celebrated negro tenor.

Tchaikovsky's Symphony was the principal number at the recent Pension Fund concert by the orchestra in Boston, when Serge Koussevitsky was first heard in the music of his countryman. The performance made nothing less than a magnificent impression and, according to the critical verdict, revealed new powers in the conductor and a new eloquence in the music which, they concluded, may well outlast the other Symphonies of this composer.

The concert will open with Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto for Orchestra in D major (arranged by Maximillian Steinberg).

The music in which Roland Hayes will appear with the orchestra, is Berlioz's Air, "The Repose of the Holy Family," from "The Flight Into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch, the accompaniment orchestrated by Busoni. A considerable part of the remarkable success in America of Roland Hayes in the last two seasons has been several appearances with orchestras. He sang with this orchestra in Boston and also with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS

JAN 10 1925

ROLAND HAYES TO SING HERE JAN. 20

Features of the third visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence at a concert in Infantry hall, Tuesday evening, Jan. 20 will be the performance of Tchaikovsky's "Fifth Symphony in E-minor" under Koussevitzky's direction, and the appearance as soloist of Roland Hayes, the celebrated Negro tenor.

The music in which Roland Hayes will appear with the orchestra is Berlioz' air, "The Repose of the Holy Family" from "The Flight Into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of the "104th Sonnet of Petrarch," the accompaniment orchestrated by Busoni. A considerable part of the success in America of Roland Hayes in the last two seasons has been his several appearances with orchestras. He sang with this orchestra in Boston and also with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

JAN 10 192

The British Broadcasting Company started a new season of International Symphony concerts at Covent Garden Dec. 10, with Pierre Monteux, late of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducting. Ernest Ansermet leads the second, and Bruno Walter is down for the third concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 10 1925

RUSSIAN TO DIRECT BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitsky First of That Nationality to Lead Orchestra.

This fourty-fourth season, Serge Koussevitsky, called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris, has come to America for the first time, to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, and as an artist of impassioned convictions.

Mr. Koussevitsky's earlier career in Russia was perhaps most conspicuous in the famous orchestra, which he organized in Moscow. He assembled his country's best musicians, subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free, and drilled them into a remarkable organization. In Moscow and Petrograd, Beethoven and Bach festivals figured among his concerts. He likewise championed music of genius from living composers.

It was in 1920, that circumstances took him westward. In Paris he organized what have come to be broadly known as the "Koussevitsky Concerts," which for the last four seasons have been the most prominent in that city. In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra. Serge Koussevitsky is the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra. His debut in New York some two weeks ago was sensational. Local concert goers will have the opportunity to judge for themselves for Frank A. Sedgwick has completed arrangements for one concert which will be heard in the Capitol theater on Sunday afternoon, February 1. The seat sale is now open and tickets may be obtained at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. Mail orders will also be accepted.

His Eye on the Object

Ottorino Respighi

Composer of "Roman Fountains," "The Gnomes' Ballad" and the Gregorian Concerto To Be Played at the Symphony Concerts

(From the Program-Book of the Ann Arbor Music Festival)

PAPER–

DATE–

In the Ears of Mr. Newman

On Wednesday afternoon that embodiment of speed, certainty, efficiency, "pep" and the glorious "go-getting" of this noble Nation—the United States Mails—actually delivered in Boston the New York Evening Post of last Monday. Consequently on Thursday this department is able to print the illuminating note of Mr. Ernest Newman about Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor, last Saturday in New York, with Strauss's "Eulenspiegel," the Bacchanal from "Tannhäuser" and Ravel's tone-poem of the waltz. Says he:

> I had never previously heard "Til Eulenspiegel" under Koussevitzky. He gave us a highly individual and curiously fascinating reading of the music, and one that could be objected to only by the type of mind that would censure a portrait by, say, Augustus John, because it did not resemble the same sitter painted by, let us say, Sargent. Koussevitzky certainly showed us Til in some unfamiliar aspects. As usual, he saw his subject dramatically, and made the most of each scene without destroying the unity of the whole.
>
> Koussevitzky never generalizes, never uses any of those standardized formulas for expression that are the equivalent in music of the ready-made phrase in literature. He always paints with his eye on the object; and as he sees it intensely he paints it vividly. You may say, if you like, that this or that section of "Til" was taken more slowly than it generally is. The fitting answer to that would be Brahms's reply when some wiseacre pointed out to him that a certain theme in one of his pieces resembled a well-known theme of Wagner: "Well, any fool can see that!" Koussevitzky no doubt adopts a slower tempo, in one division, because it represents a religious procession, and a slower pace than usual gives it an extra touch of mock solemnity. The tailing off into pianissimo of another melody would also be intended, I imagine, to suggest Til receding further and further into the distance as he goes off whistling his perky street tune.
>
> The hearer could like or dislike these and other points as he chose. For hose who liked them the reading was ne of amazing imaginative and pic- orial vitality. I, for one, cannot re- nember the trial ever having been a n:ed before with such grisly real- sm; more than ever, after the serious- less to which this tuned us, did we ealize Strauss's wisdom in writing hat epilogue in which he restores omedy to its rights again, and takes ave of Til with a smile and a caress. The Bacchanal from "Tannhäuser" as painted in the richest colors, and ith a touch of Russian fancy. Cer- in sections of the canvas had a more rilliant color-note in them than per- aps Wagner ever imagined, by a lit- e extra insistence on some of the ds and purples in the sub-tissues of e orchestration. One could almo fancy one saw Bakst and Rimsky-Ko sakov coöperating in the production the ballet. But after all, the greate thing in the performance was not th riot of color at the height of the de lirium, but the long, slow descent into quietude at the finish; to kep the rhythmic line unbroken through all those changes of mood and texture and dynamics was an astonishing feat, and one possible only to a conductor with a consummate plastic sense. We were conscious of the same thing in the handling of Ravel's "Waltz." Could not some friend of Ravel, by the way, persuade him o rewrite the last quarter of the music? As it stands now, what should be one of the most exquisite pieces of our day loses its charm, and goes off the stage like a noisy hobble- dehoy.

W, from Respighi

rom Symphony Hall comes the follo note about Respighi's Gregorian Co o for Violin and Orchestra to be play the first times in Boston, tomorrow

Concerto is one of the most recent pieces of the Italian composer, having been written in 1921 and played for the first time under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck at Hamburg. Respighi gave it the title, "Concerto Gregoriano," not only because the music was inspired by the Gregorian chants of the Roman Church, but also because he has sought to give it the purity and sobriety of religious music in the Middle Ages. It may at first appear strange that the composer has chosen the form of a violin-concerto to transport hearers into the atmosphere of church-music in the Middle Ages—music far removed from the complexities and virtuosities of our last two centuries, an age of instrumental music; but, closely scrutinizing the score, one sees that the piece has few of the conventional traits which generally characterize the instrumental style. The solo-violin plays, so to speak, the part of Cantor in the old religious services, while the orchestra represents the choir of believers. Every element of virtuosity, in the strict sense of the word, is excluded from the Concerto—a condition, nevertheless, that does not hinder it from being advantageous to the violinist.

"After introductory measures played by the orchestra to which the harmonization gives a religious character, the principle theme enters played by the oboe and accompanied by the English horn. There follows a violin-solo with the principle theme in the same tonality, after which appears the second theme, more energetic and lively. The first part of the Concerto is rather short and the form approaches that of a great "præludium." It closes with a recitative which by thematic cadence joins the first part to the second.

"The second division of the Concerto is based on a broad melody harmonized with a rare limpidity. In perusing the score measure by measure the reader is surprised at Respighi's feeling for the individuality of his instruments and at his skill and invention with effects for them. The theme of the finale is an allegro, puissant and joyous, played by four horns in unison. This gladsome and energetic mood dominates the whole closing division in which the scoring has a characteristic virtuosity. The different motives develop from the principle theme with plentiful imagination. Very curious are the large and imposing figures of the 'quintolets' which have an important part in the development of the climax." Respighi marks the movements: Allegro Tranquillo; Allegro Molto Moderato; Andante Espressivo e Sostenuto; Allegro Energico (Alleluia). Last spring in Paris, Mr. Spalding played the violin part with Mr. Koussevitzky.

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Koussevitzky, who has a changeable habit with programs—trying or amusing as the bystander chooses to view it—has restored to the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, the third of Bach's Brandenburg Concertos for Strings. It was originally announced as opening piece; then withdrawn; now will be such again.

For the next pair of Symphony Concerts on Jan. 16 and 17, the conductor proposes this entertaining grist of miscellany: the Overture to Glinka's opera, "Ruslan and Ludmila"; the Eighth Symphony of Glazunov, hitherto unheard in Boston; fragments of "The Three Pintos," Weber's comic opera, as revised by Mahler for the Viennese stage; two parts of Franck's tone-poem, "Psyche"; the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Preludes." It was [illegible]

At Mr. [illegible]ing's orchestral concert for children in [illegible] Hall on Saturday morn-

---

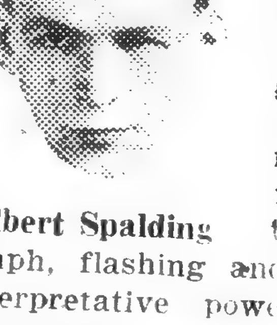
PAPER–

DATE– Jan 10

SPALDING IN NEW TRIUMPH AT SYMPHONY

By E. F. HARKINS.

Albert Spalding, foremost American violinist, is the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts.



Albert Spalding

He received an ovation after his brilliant performance in Respighi's "Gregorian Concerto" at yesterday's matinee. His was not merely a technical triumph, flashing and dazzling. His interpretative power was equally impressive.

It was indeed a pleasure to see a native-born artist fairly sharing honors with the famous Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky. Both soloist and orchestra did splendid work.

NOVEL CONCERTO

The Resphigi concerto, now being played here for the first time, is a modern masterpiece with a fine sustaining of the Gregorian mood; a unique work for violin and orchestra, here and there somewhat strained and matter-of-fact, but withal beautifully designed and executed. The performance was worthy of it.

WAGNER GLORIFIED

Other remarkable features of the concert yesterday were Koussevitzky's masterly interpretations of two Wagner numbers, "The Ride of the Valkyries," which under the gifted Russian became once more a marvelous tone picture, and the "Lohengrin" prelude, which the conductor filled with almost unearthly euphony. There was a stirring climax, by way of contrast, evoked in Koussevitzky's most dramatic manner, but the most memorable effect was the exquisite beauty achieved in the measures that have been compared to soft golden clouds.

Another Wagner piece, the "Rienzi" overture; J. S. Bach's third Brandenburg concerto and Elgar's arrangement of Bach's organ fantasia and fugue in C minor are also on this 11th program, which will be repeated tonight. It is an unusual program, superbly performed from beginning to end.

10

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 8 1925

DIRECTOR OF FAMOUS ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY.

Who Will Make His First Appearance as Director of Boston Symphony Orch.

There is a lively interest hereabouts concerning the forthcoming Boston Symphony concert at the Capitol theater, on Sunday afternoon, February 1, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The coming of the world's greatest orchestra is an event in itself but this occasion is garnished by the first appearance in Hartford of the orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, a gigantic personality in the realm of music. He is the first Russian to lead this famous organization. Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky was born in 1874 in Vyshny Volotchk, Russia. He studied at the Moscow Conservatory and became a professor there. He developed first into a celebrated double bass virtuoso and afterward became a distinguished conductor. He has composed a concerto for double bass and founded a society for the promotion of Russian music in Berlin. He has conducted with great success in Paris and London as well as other cities of Europe. He came to America for the first time last September and his few American appearances have been greeted by the wildest enthusiasm. The tickets for the local concert are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's music store No., 139 Asylum street. The brief announcement of the orchestra coming has occasioned one of the largest advance sales in the history of concert giving in the city of Hartford. All indications point to a sold out house.

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS

JAN 10 1925

ROLAND HAYES TO SING HERE JAN. 20

Features of the third visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence at a concert in Infantry hall, Tuesday evening, Jan. 20 will be the performance of Tchaikovsky's "Fifth Symphony in E-minor" under Koussevitzky's direction, and the appearance as soloist of Roland Hayes, the celebrated Negro tenor.

The music in which Roland Hayes will appear with the orchestra is Berlioz' air, "The Repose of the Holy Family" from "The Flight Into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of the "104th Sonnet of Petrarch," the accompaniment orchestrated by Busoni. A considerable part of the success in America of Roland Haye in the last two seasons has been hi several appearances with orchestra He sang with this orchestra in ton and also with the Detroit phony Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 10 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL PLAY HERE JANUARY 20

Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor to Be Presented.

Features of the third visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence at a concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 20, will be the performance of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor, under Koussevitsky's direction, and the appearance as soloist of Roland Hayes, the celebrated negro tenor.

Tchaikovsky's Symphony was the principal number at the recent Pension Fund concert by the orchestra in ~~Boston,~~ when Serge Koussevitsky was first heard in the music of his countryman. The performance made nothing less than a magnificent impression and, according to the critical verdict, revealed new powers in the conductor and a new eloquence in the music which, they concluded, may well outlast the other Symphonies of this composer.

The concert will open with Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto for Orchestra in D major (arranged by Maximillian Steinberg).

The music in which Roland Hayes will appear with the orchestra is Berlioz's Air, "The Repose of the Holy Family," from "The Flight Into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch, the accompaniment orchestrated by Busoni. A considerable part of the remarkable success in America of Roland Hayes in the last two seasons has been several appearances with orchestras. He sang with this orchestra in Boston and also with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

JAN 10 192

The British Broadcasting Company started a new season of International Symphony concerts at Covent Garden Dec. 10, with Pierre Monteux, late of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducting. Ernest Ansermet leads the second, and Bruno Walter is down for the thir

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 10 1925

RUS
BO

RE ROOM SPRING SKIRT

by Designers and It Will B Extensively.

Kou
Na

either side. This is surmounted by short godet jacket trimmed with lettuc green leather. Over this is worn a cap of white and green checks, its lines be ing lengthened by long wide pleats. Th figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris, has come to America for the first time, to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, and as an artist of impassioned convictions.

Th
Kouss

Mr. Koussevitsky's earlier career in Russia was perhaps most conspicuous in the famous orchestra, which he organized in Moscow. He assembled his country's best musicians, subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free, and drilled them into a remarkable organization. In Moscow and Petrograd, Beethoven and Bach festivals figured among his concerts. He likewise championed music of genius from living composers.

It was in 1920, that circumstances took him westward. In Paris he organized what have come to be broadly known as the "Koussevitsky Concerts," which for the last four seasons have been the most prominent in that city. In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as gues'

PAPER- Tran
DATE- Jan 1

In the Ears of Mr. Newman

On Wednesday afternoon that embodiment of speed, certainty, efficiency, "pep" and the glorious "go-getting" of this noble Nation—the United States Mails—actually delivered in Boston the New York Evening Post of last Monday. Consequently on Thursday this department is able to print the illuminating note of Mr. Ernest Newman about Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor, last Saturday in New York, with Strauss's "Eulenspiegel," the Bacchanal from "Tannhäuser" and Ravel's tone-poem of the waltz. Says he:

> I had never previously heard "Til Eulenspiegel" under Koussevitzky. He gave us a highly individual and curiously fascinating reading of the music, and one that could be objected to only by the type of mind that would censure a portrait by, say, Augustus John, because it did not resemble the same sitter painted by, let us say, Sargent. Koussevitzky certainly showed us Til in some unfamiliar aspects. As usual, he saw his subject dramatically, and made the most of each scene without destroying the unity of the whole.
>
> Koussevitzky never generalizes, never uses any of those standardized formulas for expression that are the equivalent in music of the ready-made phrase in literature. He always paints with his eye on the object; and as he sees it intensely he paints it vividly. You may say, if you like, that this or that section of "Til" was taken more slowly than it generally is. The fitting answer to that would be Brahms's reply when some wiseacre pointed out to him that a certain theme in one of his pieces resembled a well-known theme of Wagner: "Well, any fool can see that!" Koussevitzky no doubt adopts a slower tempo, in one division, because it represents a religious procession, and a slower pace than usual gives it an extra touch of mock solemnity. The tailing off into pianissimo of another melody would also be intended, I imagine, to suggest Til receding further and further into the distance as he goes off whistling his perky street tune.
>
> The hearer could like or dislike these and other points as he chose. For those who liked them the reading was one of amazing imaginative and pictorial vitality. I, for one, cannot remember the trial ever having been painted before with such grisly realism; more than ever, after the seriousness to which this tuned us, did we realize Strauss's wisdom in writing that epilogue in which he restores comedy to its rights again, and takes leave of Til with a smile and a caress.
>
> The Bacchanal from "Tannhäuser" was painted in the richest colors, and with a touch of Russian fancy. Certain sections of the canvas had a more brilliant color-note in them than perhaps Wagner ever imagined, by a little extra insistence on some of the reds and purples in the sub-tissues of the orchestration. One could almost fancy one saw Bakst and Rimsky-Korsakov coöperating in the production of the ballet. But after all, the greatest thing in the performance was not the riot of color at the height of the delirium, but the long, slow descent into quietude at the finish; to kep the rhythmic line unbroken through all those changes of mood and texture and dynamics was an astonishing feat, and one possible only to a conductor with a consummate plastic sense. We were conscious of the same thing in the handling of Ravel's "Waltz." Could not some friend of Ravel, by the way, persuade him o rewrite the last quarter of the music? As it stands now, what should be one of the most exquisite pieces of our day loses its charm, and goes off the stage like a noisy hobbledehoy.

w, from Respighi

rom Symphony Hall comes the follo note about Respighi's Gregorian Co to for Violin and Orchestra to be play the first times in Boston, tomorrow

His Eye on the Object

Ottorino Respighi

Composer of "Roman Fountains," "The Gnomes' Ballad" and the Gregorian Concerto To Be Played at the Symphony Concerts

(From the Program-Book of the Ann Arbor Music Festival)

Concerto is one of the most recent pieces of the Italian composer, having been written in 1921 and played for the first time under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck at Hamburg. Respighi gave it the title, "Concerto Gregoriano," not only because the music was inspired by the Gregorian chants of the Roman Church, but also because he has sought to give it the purity and sobriety of religious music in the Middle Ages. It may at first appear strange that the composer has chosen the form of a violin-concerto to transport hearers into the atmosphere of church-music in the Middle Ages—music far removed from the complexities and virtuosities of our last two centuries, an age of instrumental music; but, closely scrutinizing the score, one sees that the piece has few of the conventional traits which generally characterize the instrumental style. The solo-violin plays, so to speak, the part of Cantor in the old religious services, while the orchestra represents the choir of believers. Every element of virtuosity, in the strict sense of the word, is excluded from the Concerto—a condition, nevertheless, that does not hinder it from being advantageous to the violinist.

"After introductory measures played by the orchestra to which the harmonization gives a religious character, the principle theme enters played by the oboe and accompanied by the English horn. There follows a violin-solo with the principle theme in the same tonality, after which appears the second theme, more energetic and lively. The first part of the Concerto is rather short and the form approaches that of a great "prælude." It closes with a recitative which by thematic cadence joins the first part to the second.

"The second division of the Concerto is based on a broad melody harmonized with a rare limpidity. In perusing the score measure by measure the reader is surprised at Respighi's feeling for the individuality of his instruments and at his skill and invention with effects for them. The theme of the finale is an allegro, puissant and joyous, played by four horns in unison. This gladsome and energetic mood dominates the whole closing division in which the scoring has a characteristic virtuosity. The different motives develop from the principle theme with plentiful imagination. Very curious are the large and imposing figures of the 'quintolets' which have an important part in the development of the climax," Respighi marks the movements: Allegro Tranquillo; Allegro Molto Moderato; Andante Espressivo e Sostenuto; Allegro Energico (Alleluia). Last spring in Paris, Mr. Spalding played the violin part with Mr. Koussevitzky.

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Koussevitzky, who has a changeable habit with programs—trying or amusing as the bystander chooses to view it—has restored to the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, the third of Bach's Brandenburg Concertos for Strings. It was originally announced as opening piece; then withdrawn; now will be such again.

For the next pair of Symphony Concerts on Jan. 16 and 17, the conductor proposes this entertaining grist of miscellany: the Overture to Glinka's opera, "Ruslan and Ludmila"; the Eighth Symphony of Glazunov, hitherto unheard in Boston; fragments of "The Three Pintos," Weber's comic opera, as revised by Mahler for the Viennese stage; two parts of Franck's tone-poem, "Psyche"; the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Preludes." It was [illegible]

At Mr. [illegible]ing's orchestral concert for children in [illegible] Hall on Saturday morn-

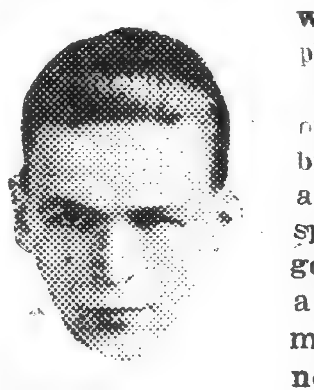
---

PAPER- Adv
DATE- Jan 10

SPALDING IN NEW TRIUMPH AT SYMPHONY

By E. F. HARKINS.

Albert Spalding, foremost American violinist, is the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts.



Albert Spalding

He received an ovation after his brilliant performance in Respighi's "Gregorian Concerto" at yesterday's matinee. His was not merely a technical triumph, flashing and dazzling. His interpretative power was equally impressive.

It was indeed a pleasure to see a native-born artist fairlp sharing honors with the famous Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky. Both soloist and orchestra did splendid work.

NOVEL CONCERTO

The Resphigi concerto, now being played here for the first time, is a modern masterpiece with a fine sustaining of the Gregorian mood; a unique work for violin and orchestra, here and there somewhat strained and matter-of-fact, but withal beautifully designed and executed. The performance was worthy of it.

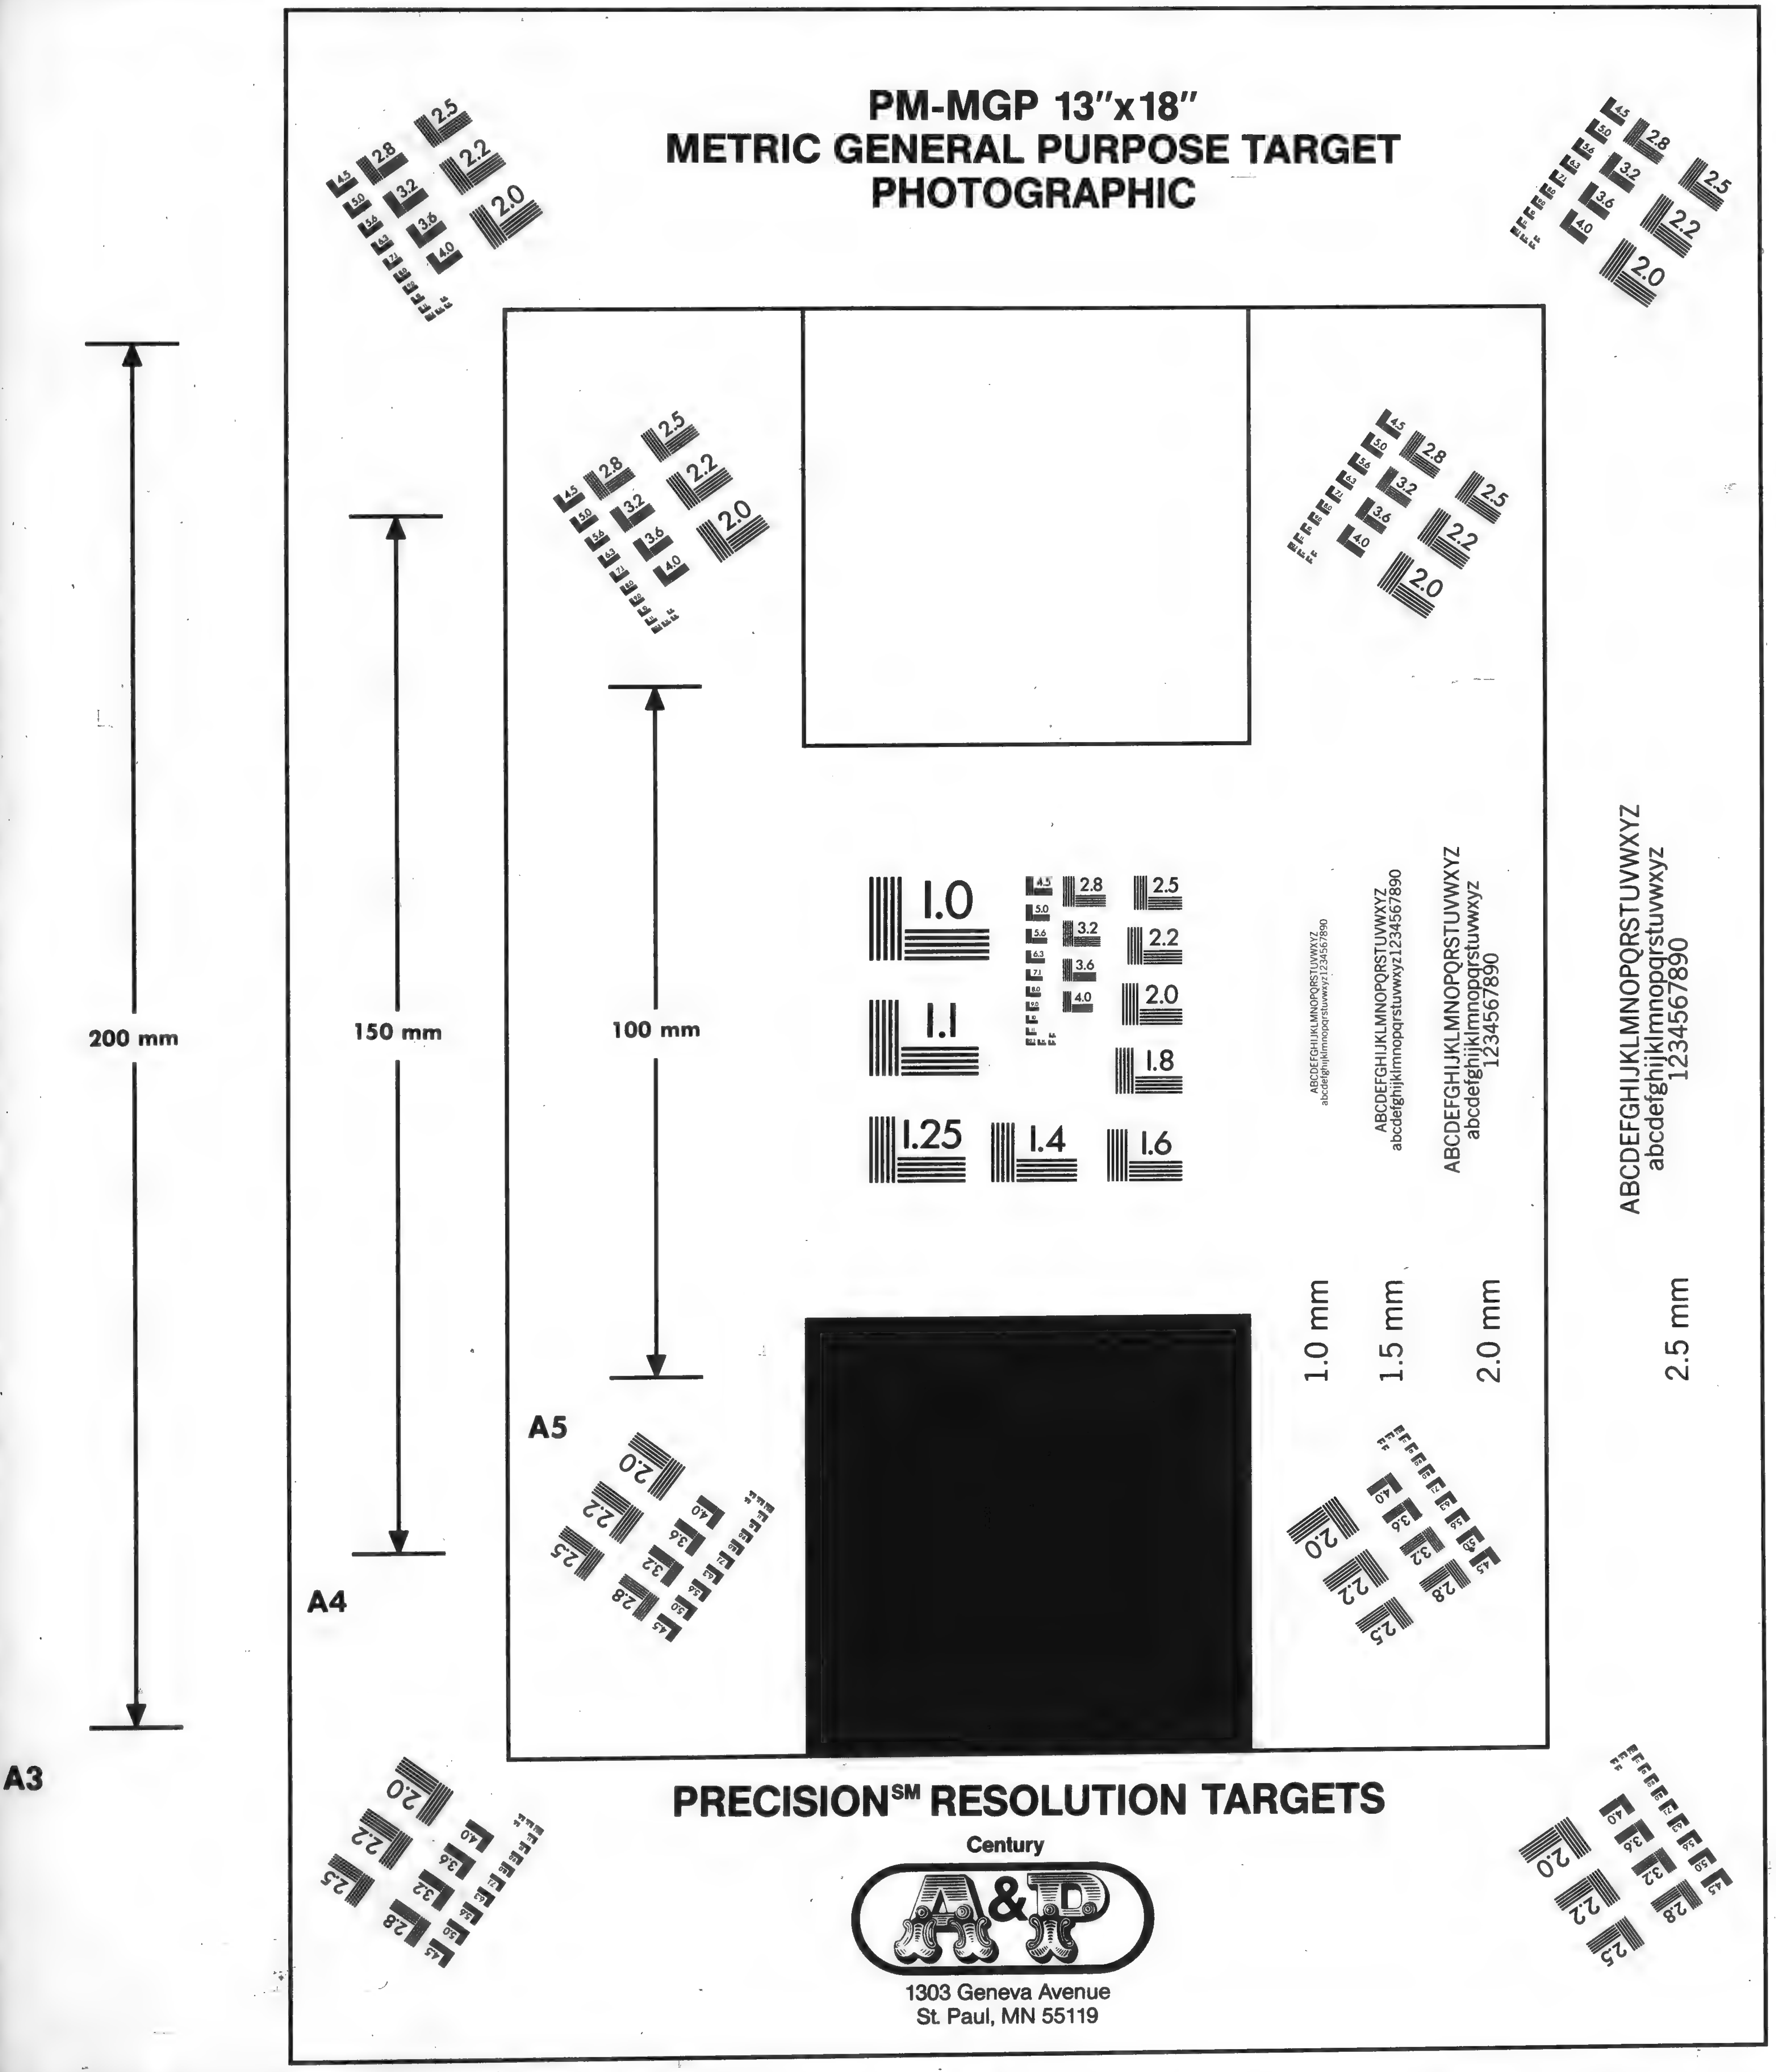
WAGNER GLORIFIED

Other remarkable features of the concert yesterday were Koussevitzky's masterly interpretations of two Wagner numbers, "The Ride of the Valkyries," which under the gifted Russian became once more a marvelous tone picture, and the "Lohengrin" prelude, which the conductor filled with almost unearthly euphony. There was a stirring climax, by way of contrast, evoked in Koussevitzky's most dramatic manner, but the most memorable effect was the exquisite beauty achieved in the measures that have been compared to soft golden clouds.

Another Wagner piece, the "Rienzi" overture; J. S. Bach's third Brandenburg concerto and Elgar's arrangement of Bach's organ fantasia and fugue in C minor are also on this 11th program, which will be repeated tonight. It is an unusual program, superbly performed from beginning to end.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

PAPER- Transcript

DATE- Jan 9

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

At Acme

ELSEWHERE than to Cambridge Mr. Koussevitzky may advisedly bear the four pieces that he arrayed last evening in Sanders Theater—the Symphony in G major from Haydn's Parisian series; "Clouds" and "Fêtes" from the Nocturnes of Debussy; Strauss's tone-poem of "Till Eulenspiegel." In none does he stretch idiosyncrasy too far and make the composer dance to the tune of the conducting temperament; while upon the positive side, from each music outshines one or another signal ability. Through the Symphony of Haydn, he is past master of the matter and the manner of eighteenth-century pages. Through the Nocturne of Clouds, he fuses beauty of line, color, mood. His version of "Fêtes" is a marvel of luminosity in tones; while from Strauss's Rondo emerges Till charactered and dramatized to the utmost power of symphonic music. With the conductor shines also the orchestra—in lightness, suppleness, fleetness and precision for Haydn; in play of shadings and euphonies over "Clouds," of rhythm and glow through "Fetes"; in virtuosity become imagination and incarnation with the musical life and death of Eulenspiegel. Last evening, moreover, there were the round body and the wooden walls of Sanders to do the usual offices. That is to say, they sharpened every accent and deepened every suavity of Haydn; seemed as sensitive as the conductor to the tremors and tints of "Clouds"; yet too closely confined the incandescence of "Fêtes" and were nigh to bursting with the tumults of "Till."

Possibly Mr. Koussevitzky languishes ever so little with the returns of Haydn's slow song The depth, richness, transparency of it are temptation hard to resist. Yet he makes amplest amends in the first leap of the Finale upon the air; in the flying pace with which it flings forward and back, the flick of the rhythm, the dart of phrase into phrase. Since Dr. Muck's day there has been no such matching of conductor, orchestra and composer in a race of virtuosity. Hear, too, the simple accents, straightforward flow, precise rhythm of the Minuet; or the line of the first movement, endlessly sensitive, sustained over every transition or modulation, limpid as crystal—and then say whether this is not Haydn veritably conveyed through both a divining and an enhancing temperament. Consider the radiance and the rhythm of the beginning of "Fêtes"; the suspense, the iridescence, the uncanny tonal body, of the aerial march; the stinging return to more earthly glow and pulse. Set beside these impressions the vaporous tone that suffuses the course of "Clouds"; the light and shadow dappling it; the pace at which the measures steal upon the ear; the rhythm that caresses as it propels; the rare and deep illusion of stillness in sound—and the answering imagination is drenched in the beauty and the poetry of Debussy's pages: Debussy young, avid of sensation, infinitely choice in expression. Pass to "Till" and that knave chortles and swaggers from tonal tumult to tonal tumult; wears guise upon guise of impudence through a music become as changeful as his airs and tricks; is tried most melodramatically; squeaks away, with a pat from composer and conductor, into the limbo of likable scamps. The creating genius of Strauss but likewise the transmitting genius of Mr. Koussevitzky. For such a conductor he was, through the length and breadth of this concert at the university.

Continued on Page Ten

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Continued From Page Seven

And not least through the Concerto of Liszt, in which Mr. Borovsky, again assisting the orchestra, played the piano-part. It was the Concerto in E-flat, the battle-horse, the spavined battle-horse, of countless pianists. It dates from 1849, said the omniscient program-book. and near seventy years have they bestrode and spurred it. Yet now it became conductor's steed, and a conductor taking Liszt at his word and to the foot of the letter. At Mr. Koussevitzky's hands the beginning was imposing—Liszt proclaiming amid many trappings a principal melody. The slow division sang sensuously—Liszt stroking his imagination and also the piano. A Scherzo tinkling and crackling gently—Liszt's invitation to the fireworks. Allegro Marziale—and now we go, decidedly rhythming our steps. Finally, all the pin-wheels, rockets and flower-pots that ten fingers, two feet, one grand pianoforte and Franz Liszt, as rhapsodic tonal chemist, can set gyrating and exploding. In fine, the Concerto in E-flat taken for what it is—a romantic rhapsody all hollow within, all glint and gusto without. And Mr. Koussevitzky juggling and glamouring this tinsel as though he were showman born and bred. A feat of imagination quite comparable in kind with his version of the Nocturnes or of "Till." To the best of recollection, the assisting Mr. Borovsky also chimed in.

H. T.

Middle Ground

Amusements

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

CINCINNATI,
OHIO
BILLBOARD

JAN 10 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the second concert of the New York season in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening. January 1, opening with Berlioz overture The Roman Carnival, played in brilliant fashion. The Schubert "Unfinished" Symphony followed, to which Mr. Koussevitzky gave a careful and pleasing reading. Rigel's Symphony in D-Major was played for the first time in New York and the program closed with Stravinsky's LaSacre du Printemps, which the Boston players presented to New York last season under Pierre Monteux's direction. Mr. Koussevitzky's vigorous directing was given hearty applause and he has certainly found favor with New York audiences.

PAPER- Transcript

DATE- Jan 10

Orchestral

FOR the next pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, Mr. Koussevitzky proposes this entertaining grist of miscellany; the Overture to Glinka's opera "Ruslan and Ludmila"; the Eighth Symphony of Glazunov, hitherto unheard in Boston; entra'actes in "The Three Pintos," Weber's comic opera, as revised by Mahler for the Viennese stage; two parts of Franck's tone-poem, "Psyche"; the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Preludes." was bound to come.

On Monday evening, in Symphony Hall befalls the second of the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts, with the orchestra in full force and high mettle, with Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor of insight, imagination and individuality, through music and players transmuting large powers into communicating fires. Mr. Richard Burgin, first violinist of the band, will play Beethoven's Concerto. The orchestral numbers are Haydn's Symphony in G major; and from Wagner, the Bacchanal in "Tannhäuser," Siegfried's Funeral-Music from "Götterdämmerung," the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

At its concert in the St. James Theat

SPALDING PLAYS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Respighi's "Gregorian Concerto" Pleases

Globe Jan. 10

Albert Spalding, an American violinist deservedly much admired, was cordially applauded by yesterday's Symphony audience both before and after he played the solo part in Respighi's new "Gregorian Concerto." The rest of the program was by Bach and Wagner. The concerto as well as the player pleased, though as usual Respighi has written more tastefully than originally.

Any addition to the scanty list of violin concertos which are of value as music is welcome. Mr Spalding, a fine musician, and therefore bored by mere show pieces, has sought diligently and successfully on more than one occasion for new pieces.

Respighi is said to have called the concerto "Gregorian" because "he sought to give the music the purity and sobriety style of the religious music of the Middle Ages." The themes are alleged to be taken from Gregorian chants. Yet one could not help thinking the finale akin to Dvorak's "New World" symphony rather than to such scraps of the music of the Middle Ages as have come one's way.

However that may be, the concerto is ingratiating, never bombastic, never trivial, in another musical world from the Bruch, Saint-Saens and Tchaikovsky with which one is so often afflicted. The performance was a beautiful example of controlled but intense emotion from Mr Spalding and the orchestra. He is a really great violinist.

Koussevitzky began the program with Bach. In the two allegros of the "Brandenburg Concerto" in G he made the exuberant vitality, the tremendous driving power of the music felt as it should be felt. The first allegro is one of the very greatest pieces of music ever composed, and among the most joyous. Here the strong man exults in his strength. Those who call Bach "dry" should hear both this piece and the organ fantasy in C minor with the accompanying fugue arranged by Sir Edward Elgar for orchestra, which followed on yesterday's program.

Elgar has managed to make the orchestra sound like the organ of one's dreams. One felt that Bach would have approved this arrangement. It uses many instruments which he never heard, but always in the spirit of the music of Bach. It takes a man like Elgar, himself a composer of genius, to arrange Bach. Nobody can now follow the letter of his music very consistently, because our instruments are so far from the ones he knew. And not every learned musician can catch the spirit of Bach.

Koussevitzky devoted the rest of the concert following the intermission to Wagner fragments. "The Ride of the Valkyries," taken too fast, but with much spirit, was vehemently applauded. It is not artistically complete enough in itself to justify concert performance on esthetic grounds. One wonders how far Koussevitzky believes in occasionally giving his public what he is sure it will like and applaud (as a matter not of art but of policy).

The prelude to "Lohengrin," with a brilliant climax not quite steadily built up, and the overture to "Rienzi" proved once more that Koussevitzky's remarkable nervous intensity, his phenomenal sense of rhythm, and his dramatic, almost melodramatic, imagination fit him for giving compellingly brilliant Wagner performances. In the "Rienzi" overture he put as much frenzy into the theme "Rienzi, dir sei Preis," as though he and his audience had not been disillusioned about that sort of tune, as Wagner himself later in life became, through overfamiliarity with the banalities of Italian opera.

P. R.

PAPER- Transcript

DATE- Jan 10

GLORIES OF BACH, WAGNER ASSORTED, ALSO SWEET STUFF

FARE AND SUM OF THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Koussevitzky Surpasses Himself with a Brandenburg Concerto Flooded with Life—Elgar as Transcriber and Transmitter—Respighi Does It Again in a Violin-Piece and Mr. Spalding Transfigures Him — "Lohengrin" and Also "Rienzi"

THERE is no theory and no practice—it is possible to say in haste—in the making of programs for symphony concerts. Conductors are believed to ponder them lengthily, deeply—to draft, revise, substitute, and erase again. Very likely: since some of them affirm that they follow a logic in the process and, with a little persuasion, will set forth "guiding principles." Yet, since human nature remains obstinately such, as often as not impulse may whip in a piece, and there is no other criticism than the outcome with the music, the orchestra and the audience. Consider, for example, the third of Bach's Brandenburg Concertos which was originally to begin the Symphony Concert of yesterday and which actually did begin it. Mr. Koussevitzky is said to think thrice, and even four times, about his programs. He inclined to this Concerto in G major; reconsidered once and withdrew it; reconsidered twice and restored it. Be it impulsive or pondered, who, after the performance, thrilling above all the orchestral Bach of recent years in Boston, could have regretted the final decision? None—unless it be the eminent and learned editor of the program-book, unable late in the day to give it space upon his ample pages. Yet as cold blood will have it, symphony concerts, and the programs thereof, exist for the pleasure of audiences rather than for the convenience of program-books. And, who—to question again—did not receive pleasure from that performance beyond compare?

The Rigels come and go with their little symphonies, and, may be, the listener is amused. The Corellis pass laden with their Concerti Grossi, and most hearers are frankly bored. The sons of the great Johann Sebastian may not avoid an audible unevenness. Yet their father abides most question, and Handel also endures. Pass to them, play their pieces as this Brandenberg Concerto was played yesterday, and almost every caviller is ready to agree with Mr. Koussevitzky that almost every concert should begin with an eighteenth-century music. Yet—there is not a doubt of it—this very Concerto was all in the day's work for Bach. To the best of recollections, no "authority" has ever counted it among his masterpieces, although twice two thousand of us, having heard such a performance as Mr. Koussevitzky's, will be ready to swear that there it ought to be.

For Bach is not Bach until he has been made to sound, and precisely that office the conductor fulfilled for him. The letter will not do the deed, since most of us remember hard experience with studious and faithful "exponents" of the all-father of music. Reverence falls as far short, since it sits prim and dry and docile, daring not. Reverence—it is possible also to suspect—is the last homage that the sturdy and human old cantor could ever have desired. It were best left to "thoughtful people," which is our twentieth-century locution for prigs. What Bach craves is the life that he wrought into his music: the life to be released from it; the life that yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky and the string choir outpoured.

When in this town has Bach ever sounded from an orchestra with such propulsive force and splendor of rhythm? Never in twenty years of recollection; while as rarely has he glowed with the sonorities in which the conductor and the singing strings now clothed him. Here went precision, resonance and above all else an instant plasticity, as certain as it was eager. Mr. Koussevitzky's pace was as a current, secure and supple, steady and deep. It shaped and sped the music. His hand unfolded gradients, tone that thrilled the ear. His accents, his modulations, struck fire to the listening fancy. Out of transitions, sonorities leapt or rhythms strode anew. The smallest figure and the farthest-flung phrase alike kept place and office. The pattern of the music opened, divided, dissolved and re-formed, while molten was every strand.

Not once did Mr. Koussevitzky let slip the line; but inexhaustible, within Bach's limits, was the play of his imagination. The vitality of the performance was emotion in itself. A music was recreated upon two thousand ears in the passion that may release and express itself because it is also of the mind, controlled. Bach incandescent; Bach in the superbest of strides; Bach bursting and splendid with sonorities. And all out of a mere concerto for a little group of instruments. What a composer! And much more than incidentally what a conductor and what a choir! Down the winds of imagination and power went the wizened wisps of the literal, the reverent, the thoughtful—with Bach. Here was a music re-floed with its own pulsing life, in its habit as it lived. Mr. Koussevitzky's way with the classics is to vitalize them. So also, when his hand was hot upon the music paper wrote the composer—even the Bach of "reverence."

Yet Johann Sebastian has kept better company with transcribers than he did with Sir Edward Elgar enlarging to modern orchestra the Fantasia and Fugue in C minor, for organ. Probably Bach were best left to himself with the instruments of his choice. Certainly there was no excuse for Busani transferring the Chaconne from violin to piano, and not too much for Liszt or Busoni again, lifting likewise from the organ. Yet the organ-pieces have long been accounted fair game for the transcribers to orchestra. Other hands preceded Elgar's. Schönberg's and Mr. Stokowski's have latterly done the deed. Nor with lack of understanding and sympathy, of scholarship or resource, may Sir Edward be reproached. His misfortune is merely Bach behind. Thickly woven into many strands, sonorous of voice, large of progress are the pages of the transcribed Fantasia. Insistently full-voiced and emphatic is the orchestra. Somehow under such handling even Bach coagulates—and the music will not flow. Length of life there is; breadth also, and thickness; but light and shade will not traverse them. Massive and concrete, but hardly plastic does the infinitely supple Bach become. For the first time, the listener suspects him as burgher-like, even stodgy.

More clearly, sounds the transcribed Fugue upon the ear with little background of organ-music. Elgar keeps the subjects sinewy and in stride. feels Bach's propulsive vigors; through the orchestra winds and unwinds the strands; gains the tang of harmonies, timbres, even dissonance. If Bach must don this reverberant mask Sir Edward fashions it understandingly. The wealth, the sweep of utterance sound unlessened. The new speech enlarges the old—enlarges, not deepens. Better Bach by himself and Elgar by himself—and through fourteen years the Boston Orchestra has not hitherto played so much as a page of the Briton's music. New lamps for old. Our Englishmen are Bax, Bliss, Vaughan Williams.

The excellent Respighi is the Jason among living composers, not exactly finding the golden fleece, but achieving the golden mean. He did it, first, in the tone-poem of the Roman fountains. The stiffest-backed dowager of these matinées relaxed before the piece. The tenderest of maidens—if there are any such—clapped their pretty little hands. The eldest classicist heard the mu

Nearing the Goal

The Guarantee-Fund of the Symphony Orchestra Passes $83,000

BY report of the program-book at the Symphony Concert of yesterday, the fund that offsets the annual deficit in the working of the orchestra is now virtually gathered. The Trustees set the difference between receipts and expenditures at $84,000. On Dec. 31 last, they had received pledges of $83,165.99—only $834 below their minimum. By this time, probably, subscriptions have exceeded that modest sum. The more the better, since the wisest management may not foresee all the charges that a given year may lay upon a costly institution. There are emergencies, and subscriptions may well continue from those who believe the Symphony Orchestra—and Mr. Koussevitzky—"important in the life of Boston." The list of recent subscribers names:

Agassiz, Mrs. G. R.
Bradlee, S. C.
Conant, Mrs. William C.
Coonley, Mr. and Mrs. Howard
Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P.
Forbes, Mrs. Waldo E.
Frost, Horace W.
Gaston, Mrs. William A.
Guild, Courtenay
Holmes, Mr. and Mrs. E. J.
Jaques, Helen L.
Lasell, Elizabeth
Lothrop, Mrs. Thornton K.
Lothrop, Mrs. W. S. H.
Lyman, Mrs. G. H., Jr.
Milliken, Lois H.
Morey, Mrs. Edwin Morse, Frances R.
Music Fund, The
Nichols, Mrs. Henry G.
Potter, Mrs. Murray A.
Robb, Russell
Sayles, Robert W.
Spaulding, Emma F.
Sturges, Mrs. Howard O. (Providence)
Swift, Lucy W.
Warren, Bentley W.
Winsor, Mrs. Alfred

Subscriptions in any sum, should be sent to E. B. Dane, Treasurer, at 6 Beacon Street.

toward Debussy; but h his own and an uncan writing of a music temporary; yet in all ears sang tured. And now in the Gregorian Concerto for Violin, played yesterday by Mr. Spalding, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, Respighi has gone and done it again. (No other phrase quite fits the fact). The eminent and learned "programmist," this time unvexed by changeable conductor, recited the composer's graver purposes. There are Gregorian motives in the Concerto, especially in the second division of slow song. The composer cultivates the voice of a music medieval and churchly—by details more evident in the reading than in the hearing of his measures. He dreams his solo-violin back into the middle ages—into the shadows of the cathedral at Chartres or the basilica at Ravenna; finally into stained-glass glows. The solo-violin becomes as celebrant of rites of prayer and praise. The orchestra—devout congregation—salutes and sustains it.

Yes, indeed! Il Signore Respighi is a composer of scholarship and imagination, taking thought, from time to time, of the music of many men. The ear of the flesh was also listening to him on this Friday afternoon; and, as receptive organ, it can be exceeding matter-of-fact. What it actually heard was the "linked sweetness long drawn out" of mellifluous and adroit measures for the violin. The fiddle was singing celestial praises; but it must have blended with them a terrestrial joy in Messire Otterino Respighi. It sang over gentle, flowing pages; achieved a pleasing, modest cadenza—and the first movement was over-passed. It sang succulently and sinuously, albeit from Gregorian motiv. It sang again at length over gentle, flowing pages—and the second movement was accomplished. For a third time, it sang, no longer gently, but with bursts of energy, less concerned now with prayer and meditation than with praise and purple alleluias. The orchestra and Signor Respighi helped to gather and concentrate the music. The violin soared; the other voices also winged upward—and the Concerto was ended.

Never was applause more certain and not a little of it was of right for Mr. Spalding. He plays Concertos from living pens, and they do not always regale him too richly. He also played Respighi's violin-part with a mingling of songful sweetness and graver austerity; of reticence without and exaltation within that transfigured the Concerto beyond desert. Mr. Spalding studied in Italy and there gained a fine-strung, lustrous sweetness of tone. Mr. Spalding has become a serious, sensitive, studious, finely touched musician. The Spalding of the younger and the elder day met matured in the Concerto, and to its greater glory. Yes: Il Signore Respighi has gone and done it again—tuning those Gregorian chants to his concord of sweet sounds violin-like. By all means when the music is published, cherubs' heads should deck the cover.

So to the Wagnerian epilogue to a concert by no means brief. It began with "The Valkyrs' Ride"—a piece that both gains and loses by transfer from the theater. The eye and the imagination are unvexed by silly simulations of the Warrior-Maids speeding the skies. Yet in the concert-hall the music precipitates the hearer upon them; whereas, in the opera house, the whole course of "Die Walküre" has been keying him. Of course, Mr. Koussevitzky set his orchestra a-clanging; flung out the melody when at last it is set in array; slashed and clashed through the storm-music, driving at the rhythms, hammering at the figures. There is no other way. Wagner has prescribed it. Conductors are but the prescription in different degrees. . . . Next ensued the Prelude to "Lohengrin," faultlessly sustained in descent and ascent; a marvel of adjustment from group to group of instruments; touched with a quiver of tone, like to the radiance of the Holy Cup; yet curiously subdued, and also quickened, by Mr. Koussevitzky through the moments of earthly tumult as though he was loth to lose and eager to regain the loveliness of tonal texture. . . . Finally the Overture to "Rienzi" to the last bursting inch—piercing trumpets, full-throated instrumental song; cantilena and clangor; rhythms sharpened; ritards galore; this, that and the other "effect" with pace, transition, climax. To grin and to chortle was the only listening to such tonal melodrama. For a moral certainty, Mr. Koussevitzky has led the massed bands of the Moscow garrison through these "noble numbers."

H. T.

INSTRUMENTAL AR

---

has not heard it on an orchestra of at least 200 hundred players." There was about half that number in the orchestra yesterday. Yet we in turn can confidently assert that our old and esteemed friend Apollo Belvedere heard the music distinctly perched high at the other end of the hall.

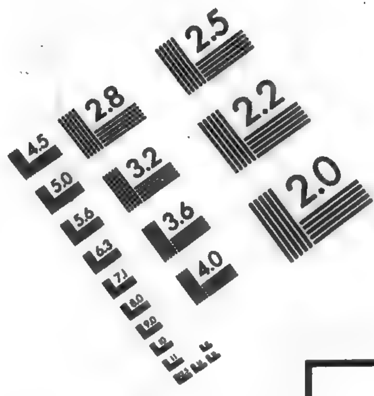
The long crescendo in the prelude to "Lohengrin" was carefully and effectively worked. As for the overture to "Rienzi" this blatant, bombastic, vulgar piece should not shoulder its way into a symphony concert. It is for a brass band on Boston Common, Braves Field, any place where one can hear it at a great distance, with plenty of room for a dignified exit at an early moment.

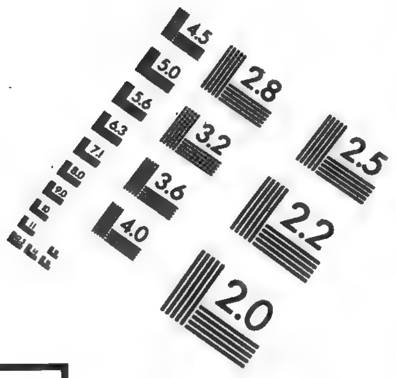
The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Glinka, overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla"; Glazounov, Symphony No. 8, E flat; Weber-Mahler, entr'acte from "The Three Pintos"; Franck, two movements from "Psyche"; Mendelssohn, Scherzo from the music to "Midsummer Night's Dream"; Liszt, "The Preludes."

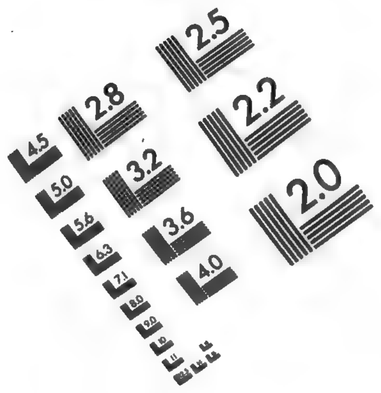
Volunteer Co-op. Bank
120 Tremont St. Main 4200
Reserve Funds $229,000

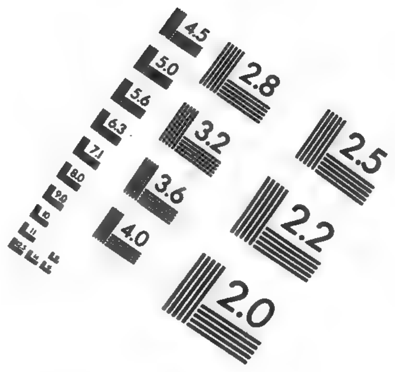
REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





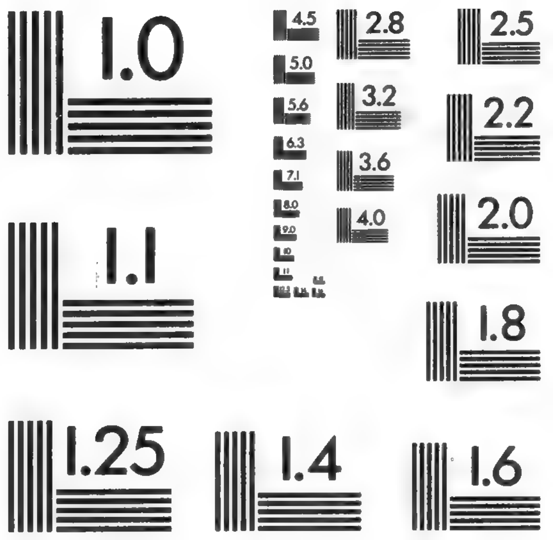




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

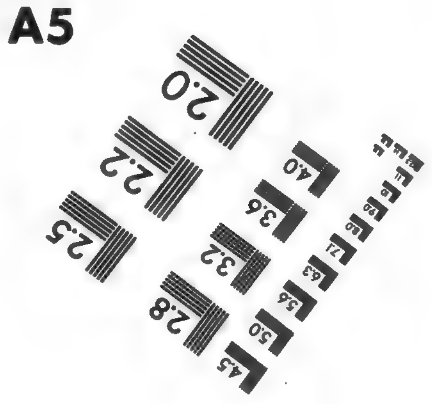
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

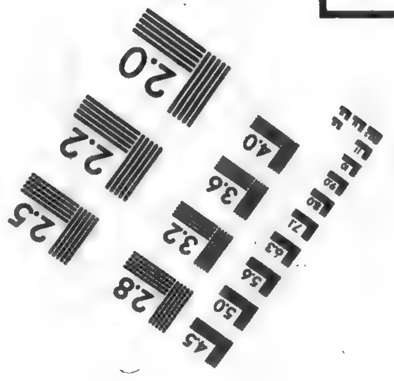
2.5 mm

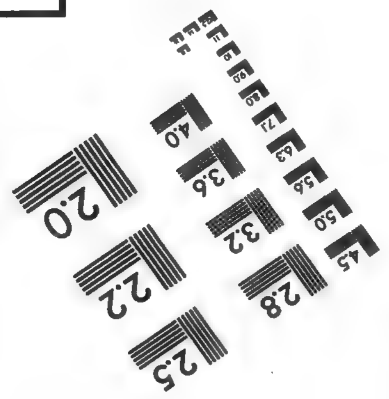
A5



A4

A3





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

1

MEMORANDA
JOHN BURK
SYMPHONY HALL BOSTON, MASS.
Back Bay 1492

T may 1

Boston Herald

ed Jan 10

11TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Bach, Respighi and Wagner Works Make Up the Program

"RIDE OF VALKYRIES" GOES AT RAPID PACE

By PHILIP HALE

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. Albert Spalding was the solo violinist. The program was as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3, G major, for string orchestra; Bach-Elgar, organ fantasia and Fugue, C minor (first time in Boston); Respighi, Concerto Gregoriano for violin and orchestra (first time in Boston); Wagner, The Ride of the Valkyries) Prelude to 'Lohengrin" and Overture to "Rienzi."

Mr. Koussevitzky is in the habit of arranging interesting programs. Bach's Concerto was at first announced for this concert, then dropped, finally restored, but the announcement of the restoration was after the Program Book had gone to press. Although this old music was finely played, it might better have been omitted on the program of this concert, as Elgar's transcription of the Fantasia and Fugue followed immediately, and there was too much Bach without contrast. As the concerto is in two quick movements, some conductors have inserted as a second movement Bachrich's arrangement of an Andante from one of Bach's Sonatas for violin solo. Mr. Koussevitzsky used the score of the Bach Society's edition, whereas in some former performances in Symphony hall the harpsichord played the "continuo" part.

Elgar was not the first to orchestrate music written by Bach for the organ; Vincent Novello arranged the Prelude to the "St. Ann's" fugue as far back as 1812. Transcriptions by Esser and Abert have been played here at Symphony concerts. There is no irreverence in this, Bach himself did not scruple to exercise his ingenuity in transcriptions. The question is simply whether the orchestration is well done and whether the labor was worth while. Perhaps we are old-fogyish, but we prefer Bach's Preludes and Fugues in their naked beauty or grandeur to the doubtful adornment of modern and gaudy dress. Elgar was more successful in his treatment of the Prelude than in the brazen liberties he took with the fugue, for which he wrote with a pomp and circumstances that might inspire a military band to blow their wind and crack their cheaks. It is an old and thoroughly erroneous idea that the organ fugues should be played by organists from beginning to end with the full power of the instrument. We know from musicians who heard Bach that he was very skilful in registration, in blending timbres, in the use of solo stops. Elgar first transcribed the fugue and the first performance fired the British heart so that a repetition was demanded. The Fanta[illegible] scored afterwords, [illegible]d not caus[illegible] much excitement, [illegible] it shows [illegible]ner workmanship.

Respighi's concerts, first played by Mario Corti at Rome [illegible]arly in 1922, is an interesting work, often beautiful, at times impressive. The opening is charming in its pastoral mood. If here there is the suggestion of shepherds of the Campagna, in the later movements there is the reminder of a Roman basilica, intoning priests, the solemn and magnificent ceremonies of the Holy Church. The concerto is not for the glory of a virtuoso alone. Here is no display-piece to arouse gaping wonder. Respighi has written a symphonic work for violin and orchestra. The orchestral score is as important as are the solo measures. The second movement connected with the first by a cadenza is too long-spun out for its contents, and the attention wanders before the ending. This is a common fault in modern compositions; prolixity, the inability to stop at the dramatic or psychological moment; the composer's evident pleasure in his own musical flow even when it is shallow. Mr. Spalding gave an admirable performance, admirable in every way, technically and æsthetically. He richly deserved the tribute paid him by conductor, orchestra and audience.

The Ride of the Valkyries was taken at such a rapid pace that it might have been entered on the program as "The Galop of the Valkyries." We prefer a little slower tempo, not so slow as to suggest the passing of work horses past the reviewing stand but surely not so [illegible] that one asks whether Wotan's [illegible]hters were able to keep seated. Mr. Newman wrote not long ago: [illegible]

PAPER- Post

DATE- Jan 10

"RIENZI" CLIMAXES SYMPHONY

Spaulding's Masterly Playing Also a Feature

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Above Albert Spalding's masterly playing of the solo part in Respighi's "Gregorian Concerto" for violin and orchestra, above Elgar's inflated transcription of an organ Fantasia and Fugue of Bach, in its first performance here, above even the perfectly achieved performance of the Prelude to "Lohengrin," stood Mr. Koussevitzy's dramatic reading of Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi" as the crown and climax of the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon.

MADE IRRESISTIBLE

Since the days when Dr. Muck made much of it as one of the highest-mettled of his war-horses a Boston audience has heard no such playing of the youthful Wagner's robustious piece. There was no vain attempt on Mr. Koussevitzky's part to mitigate the blatant commonness of the circus-trimmings that bedeck the main body of the Overture: rather in those portions did he lay on and spare not, till the very vigor of the music proved its own justification. And in the truly eloquent introduction the music attained, under Mr. Koussevitzky's hand, a rhetorical breadth and largeness wholly irresistible.

Respighi's Concerto aside, Bach and Wagner divided between them yesterday's programme—and on the whole the older master had hardly the better of it. Faintly suggestive of that immortal message "off again, on again, gone again, Finnegan," was the appearance, the disappearance, and the final reappearance upon this programme of Bach's third Brandenburg Concerto, in G major. And so far as one listener's pleasure in the concert was concerned, this piece, which represents Bach in the seemingly mechanical process of grinding out counterpoint by the yard might well have been "off again" once more.

Better for Organ Score

Again, Elgar's arrangement of the Fantasia and Fugue seemed none too happy venture, although the music itself is of inherent greatness. But it were better, it would seem, to have left this music in the medium for which it was composed—and to which it is altogether suited—than to transfer it to the modern orchestra, with the tuba snorting out the pedal phrases and a bass drum enforcing the accents.

As has already been intimated, the performance of the "Lohengrin" Prelude was one of uncommon beauty. In flawless progress the music swelled to its mighty climax, and as flawlessly receded to its final breath of tone. So perfectly executed a crescendo and decrescendo are rarely to be heard in this or any other piece. Nor was yesterday's performance merely a dynamic tour de force. It was withal richly expressive, and of surpasing tonal beauty.

Not a Symphony Piece

Hardly less eloquent in kind, for the matter of that, was Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the "Ride of the Valkyries." Yet once again it must be urged that this music, graphic and stirring though it is in its rightful setting, no more belongs in a symphony concert than does many another effective piece of theatre-music of less exalted authorship.

To come belatedly to the soloist of the afternoon and to his novel Concerto, it should first be said, and forcibly, that it is high time that Mr. Spalding was hailed as a violinist of the first importance. Indeed, had he first come to us from Russia or from Bohemia it is altogether likely that his name would long ago have been one with which managers might conjure.

Free From Showiness

A musician of serious aims and of high ideals, Mr. Spalding has in the main elected to identify himself with unfamiliar music of interest rather than to be party to the ten-millionth performance of a concerto of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Tchaikovsky or Saint-Saens. Thus on the occasion of his last appearance with our Symphony Orchestra he introduced to us the Concerto of Dohnanyi, while yesterday he was responsible for the Boston premiere of that of Respighi

In this "Gregorian Concerto" there are pages that might easily be spared, pages that have somewhat the effect of a soporific. Yet largely considered, this music commands respect. It is pervadingly lofty in thought and con ception, and often it is rarely eloquent in expression. Deliberately religious in its atmosphere, purposely medieval in spirit if not in execution, this Concerto is gratifyingly free from any suggestion of showiness or empty display. Moreover, in the Andante Respighi achieves a cloistered beauty of utterance that is an unusual note in contemporary music, while a spiritual exaltation shines forth in the final Allelúja.

That Mr. Spalding's playing of a concerto which nowhere truckles to popular favor should have received the acclaim bestowed upon it yesterday, is token not only of the innate worth of the music but also of the mastery, the fine fervor, the musicianly insight, of his performance of it.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 11 1925

FAMOUS CONDUCTOR

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

The world-famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make his local debut at the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon, February 1.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

JAN 11 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Sergeo Koussevitzky conductor, will be heard in one concert at Poli's Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 27, at 4:30, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Few remaining seats now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's concert [illegible]

[illegible] to be play[illegible] [illegible]oston, tomorrow [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 11 1925

FAMOUS CONDUCTOR IN CONCERT HERE

Serge Koussevitsky to Direct Boston Symphony Orchestra.

AT CAPITOL THEATER ON FEBRUARY 1

Made Vivid Impression on British and French Audiences.

Th's the fourty-fourth season Serge Koussevitsky, called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris, has come to America for the first time, to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, and as an artist of impassioned convictions.

Mr. Koussevitsky's earlier career in Russia was perhaps most conspicuous in the famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow. He assembled his country's best musicians, subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free, and drilled them into a remarkable organization. In Moscow and Petrograd, Beethoven and Bach festicals figured among his concerts. He likewise championed music of genius from living composers.

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward. In Paris he organized what have come to be broa[illegible]ly known as the "Koussevitsky Concerts" which for the last four seasons have been the most prominent in that city. In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitsky is the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His debut in New York some two weeks ago was sensational. Local concert-goers will have the opportunity to judge for themselves for Frank A. Sedgwick has completed arrangements for one concert which will be heard in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February 1. The seat sale is now open and tickets may be obtained at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. Mail orders will also be accepted.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

JAN 11 19

periods.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTR

Roland Hayes, the celebrated neg tenor and admired here, will be the sol ist of the evening at the third Bosto Symphony Orchestra concert of the se son in Providence to be given in Infantr Hall, Tuesday evening, Jan. 20. Anothe feature of this concert will be Tchaikov sky's Fifth Symphony in E-minor. Koussevitzky was first heard in a symphon of his countryman when he gave a Tchaikovzky program at the Pension Fund Concert of the orchestra in Boston last month. This symphony, the principal number, made an enormous impression upon the audience, and the critics concluded their praise of the performance with the opinion that the Fifth Symphony will outlast the Fourth and Sixth of the Russian composer.

Koussevitzky will introduce the concert with Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto for Orchestra in D-major (arranged by Maximillian Steinberg)

The music in which Roland Hayes will appear with the orchestra is Berlioz's Air, "The Repose of the Holy Family," from "The Flight Into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch, the accompaniment orchestrated by Busoni. A considerable part of the remarkable success in America of Roland Hayes in the last two seasons has been several appearances with orchestras. He sang with this orchestra in Boston and also with the Detr[illegible] Symphony Orchestra. In each case [illegible] was applauded perhaps more than a[illegible] other soloist of the season. This year [illegible] is to sing in Carnegie Hall, New York, both with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New York Symphony Society.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 11 1925

* * *

Hayes with Boston Symphony

With Roland Hayes as soloist, the B[illegible]ton Symphony Orchestra comes for [illegible] third concert here on Jan. 20. Mr. Koussevitsky's big number on the programme will be Tschaikowski's Fifth Symphony in E-minor. Another number is Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's concerto for orchestra in D-major, arranged by Maximillian St[illegible]berg.

Mr. Hayes will sing Berlioz's air, "[illegible] Repose of the Holy Family," from "[illegible] Flight Into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of Petrarch's 104th sonnet, the accompaniment orchestrated by Busoni. The singer has had notable success as soloist in orchestral concerts. With the Boston Symphony last season in Boston it is said he was applauded probably more than any other soloist of the year. He has sung with the Detroit Symphony and has two New York orchestral engagements scheduled.

The Fifth is the first symphony [illegible] Tschaikowski in which the composer [illegible] countryman was heard in this countr[illegible] It was played by Koussevitsky at [illegible] pension fund concert last month [illegible] evoked applause and cheers from the [illegible]dience and the same in writing from [illegible] critics. It was considered by many t[illegible] among the composer's highest ach[illegible]ments.

* * *

121

1

MEMORANDA
JOHN BURK
SYMPHONY HALL BOSTON, MASS.
Back Bay 1492

T May 1

Boston Herald

ed Jan 10.

11TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Bach, Respighi and Wagner Works Make Up the Program

"RIDE OF VALKYRIES" GOES AT RAPID PACE

By PHILIP HALE

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. Albert Spalding was the solo violinist. The program was as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3, G major, for string orchestra; Bach-Elgar, organ fantasia and Fugue, C minor (first time in Boston); Respighi, Concerto Gregoriano for violin and orchestra (first time in Boston); Wagner, The Ride of the Valkyries) Prelude to "Lohengrin" and Overture to "Rienzi."

Mr. Koussevitzky is in the habit of arranging interesting programs. Bach's Concerto was at first announced for this concert, then dropped, finally restored, but the announcement of the restoration was after the Program Book had gone to press. Although this old music was finely played, it might better have been omitted on the program of this concert, as Elgar's transcription of the Fantasia and Fugue followed immediately, and there was too much Bach without contrast. As the concerto is in two quick movements, some conductors have inserted as a second movement Bachrich's arrangement of an Andante from one of Bach's Sonatas for violin solo. Mr. Koussevitzky used the score of the Bach Society's edition, whereas in some former performances in Symphony hall the harpsichord played the "continuo" part.

Elgar was not the first to orchestrate music written by Bach for the organ; Vincent, Novello arranged the Prelude to the "St. Ann's" fugue as far back as 1812. Transcriptions by Esser and Abert have been played here at Symphony concerts. There is no irreverence in this, Bach himself did not scruple to exercise his ingenuity in transcriptions. The question is simply whether the orchestration is well done and whether the labor was worth while. Perhaps we are old-fogyish, but we prefer Bach's Preludes and Fugues in their naked beauty or grandeur to the doubtful adornment of modern and gaudy dress. Elgar was more successful in his treatment of the Prelude than in the brazen liberties he took with the fugue, for which he wrote with a pomp and circumstances that might inspire a military band to blow their wind and crack their cheaks. It is an old and thoroughly erroneous idea that the organ fugues should be played by organists from beginning to end with the full power of the instrument. We know from musicians who heard Bach that he was very skilful in registration, in blending timbres, in the use of solo stops. Elgar first transcribed the fugue and the first performance fired the British heart so that a repetition was demanded. The Fanta[illegible] scored afterwords, [illegible] not caus[illegible] much excitement, [illegible] it shows [illegible] workmanship.

Respighi's concerto, first played by Mario Corti at Rome early in 1922, is an interesting work, often beautiful, at times impressive. The opening is charming in its pastoral mood. If here there is the suggestion of shepherds of the Campagna, in the later movements there is the reminder of a Roman basilica, intoning priests, the solemn and magnificent ceremonies of the Holy Church. The concerto is not for the glory of a virtuoso alone. Here is no display-piece to arouse gaping wonder. Respighi has written a symphonic work for violin and orchestra. The orchestral score is as important as are the solo measures. The second movement connected with the first by a cadenza is too long-spun out for its contents, and the attention wanders before the ending. This is a common fault in modern compositions; prolixity, the inability to stop at the dramatic or psychological moment; the composer's evident pleasure in his own musical flow even when it is shallow. Mr. Spalding gave an admirable performance, admirable in every way, technically and aesthetically. He richly deserved the tribute paid him by conductor, orchestra and audience.

The Ride of the Valkyries was taken at such a rapid pace that it might have been entered on the program as "The Galop of the Valkyries." We prefer a little slower tempo, not so slow as to suggest the passing of work horses past the reviewing stand but surely not so [illegible] that one asks whether Wotan's [illegible]hters were able to keep seated. Mr. Newman wrote not long ago.

PA PER— Post

DATE— Jan 10

"RIENZI" CLIMAXES SYMPHONY

Spaulding's Masterly Playing Also a Feature

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Above Albert Spalding's masterly playing of the solo part in Respighi's "Gregorian Concerto" for violin and orchestra, above Elgar's inflated transcription of an organ Fantasia and Fugue of Bach, in its first performance here, above even the perfectly achieved performance of the Prelude to "Lohengrin," stood Mr. Koussevitzy's dramatic reading of Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi" as the crown and climax of the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon.

MADE IRRESISTIBLE

Since the days when Dr. Muck made much of it as one of the highest-mettled of his war-horses a Boston audience has heard no such playing of the youthful Wagner's robustious piece. There was no vain attempt on Mr. Koussevitzky's part to mitigate the blatant commonness of the circus-trimmings that bedeck the main body of the Overture: rather in those portions did he lay on and spare not, till the very vigor of the music proved its own justification. And in the truly eloquent introduction the music attained, under Mr. Koussevitzky's hand, a rhetorical breadth and largeness wholly irresistible.

Respighi's Concerto aside, Bach and Wagner divided between them yesterday's programme—and on the whole the older master had hardly the better of it. Faintly suggestive of that immortal message "off again, on again, gone again, Finnegan," was the appearance, the disappearance, and the final reappearance upon this programme of Bach's third Brandenburg Concerto, in G major. And so far as one listener's pleasure in the concert was concerned, this piece, which represents Bach in the seemingly mechanical process of grinding out counterpoint by the yard might well have been "off again" once more.

Better for Organ Score

Again, Elgar's arrangement of the Fantasia and Fugue seemed none too happy venture, although the music itself is of inherent greatness. But it were better, it would seem, to have left this music in the medium for which it was composed—and to which it is altogether suited—than to transfer it to the modern orchestra, with the tuba snorting out the pedal phrases and a bass drum enforcing the accents.

As has already been intimated, the performance of the "Lohengrin" Prelude was one of uncommon beauty. In flawless progress the music swelled to its mighty climax, and as flawlessly receded to its final breath of tone. So perfectly executed a crescendo and decrescendo are rarely to be heard in this or any other piece. Nor was yesterday's performance merely a dynamic tour de force. It was withal richly expressive, and of surpasing tonal beauty.

Not a Symphony Piece

Hardly less eloquent in kind, for the matter of that, was Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the "Ride of the Valkyries." Yet once again it must be urged that this music, graphic and stirring though it is in its rightful setting, no more belongs in a symphony concert than does many another effective piece of theatre-music of less exalted authorship.

To come belatedly to the soloist of the afternoon and to his novel Concerto, it should first be said, and forcibly, that it is high time that Mr. Spalding was hailed as a violinist of the first importance. Indeed, had he first come to us from Russia or from Bohemia it is altogether likely that his name would long ago have been one with which managers might conjure.

Free From Showiness

A musician of serious aims and of high ideals, Mr. Spalding has in the main elected to identify himself with unfamiliar music of interest rather than to be party to the ten-millionth performance of a concerto of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Tchaikovsky or Saint-Saens. Thus on the occasion of his last appearance with our Symphony Orchestra he introduced to us the Concerto of Dohnanyi, while yesterday he was responsible for the Boston premiere of that of Respighi

In this "Gregorian Concerto" there are pages that might easily be spared, pages that have somewhat the effect of a soporific. Yet largely considered, this music commands respect. It is pervadingly lofty in thought and conception, and often it is rarely eloquent in expression. Deliberately religious in its atmosphere, purposely medieval in spirit if not in execution, this Concerto is gratifyingly free from any suggestion of showiness or empty display. Moreover, in the Andante Respighi achieves a cloistered beauty of utterance that is an unusual note in contemporary music, while a spiritual exaltation shines forth in the final Allelúja.

That Mr. Spalding's playing of a concerto which nowhere truckles to popular favor should have received the acclaim bestowed upon it yesterday, is token not only of the innate worth of the music but also of the mastery, the fine fervor, the musicianly insight, of his performance of it.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 11 1925

FAMOUS CONDUCTOR

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

The world-famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make his local debut at the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon, February 1.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

JAN 11 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Sergee Koussevitzky conductor, will be heard in one concert at Poli's Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 27, at 4:30, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Few remaining seats now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's concert [illegible]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

JAN 11 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Roland Hayes, the celebrated neg tenor and admired here, will be the sol ist of the evening at the third Bosto Symphony Orchestra concert of the season in Providence to be given in Infantr Hall, Tuesday evening, Jan. 20. Anothe feature of this concert will be Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E-minor. Koussevitzky was first heard in a symphony of his countryman when he gave a Tchaikovzky program at the Pension Fund Concert of the orchestra in Boston last month. This symphony, the principal number, made an enormous impression upon the audience, and the critics concluded their praise of the performance with the opinion that the Fifth Symphony will outlast the Fourth and Sixth of the Russian composer.

Koussevitzky will introduce the concert with Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto for Orchestra in D-major (arranged by Maximillian Steinberg)

The music in which Roland Hayes will appear with the orchestra is Berlioz's Air, "The Repose of the Holy Family," from "The Flight Into Egypt," and Liszts setting of the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch, the accompaniment orchestrated by Busoni. A considerable part of the remarkable success in America of Roland Hayes in the last two seasons has been several appearances with orchestras. He sang with this orchestra in Boston and also with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. In each case he was applauded perhaps more than another soloist of the season. This year he is to sing in Carnegie Hall, New York, both with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New York Symphony Society.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 11 1925

* * *

Hayes with Boston Symphony

With Roland Hayes as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes for third concert here on Jan. 20. Mr. Koussevitsky's big number on the program will be Tschaikowski's Fifth Symphony E-minor. Another number is Carl Phil Emanuel Bach's concerto for orchestra D-major, arranged by Maximillian Ste berg.

Mr. Hayes will sing Berlioz's air, " Repose of the Holy Family," from " Flight Into Egypt," and Liszt's setting Petrarch's 104th sonnet, the accompan ment orchestrated by Busoni. The singer has had notable success as soloist in orchestral concerts. With the Boston Symphony last season in Boston it is said he was applauded probably more than any other soloist of the year. He has sung with the Detroit Symphony and has two New York orchestral engagements scheduled.

The Fifth is the first symphony

Tschaikowski in which the composer countryman was heard in this countr It was played by Koussevitsky at pension fund concert last month evoked applause and cheers from the dience and the same in writing from critics. It was considered by many among the composer's highest ach ments.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 11 1925

FAMOUS CONDUCTOR IN CONCERT HERE

Serge Koussevitsky to Direct Boston Symphony Orchestra.

AT CAPITOL THEATER ON FEBRUARY 1

Made Vivid Impression on British and French Audiences.

This the fourty-fourth season Serge Koussevitsky, called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris, has come to America for the first time, to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, and as an artist of impassioned convictions.

Mr. Koussevitsky's earlier career in Russia was perhaps most conspicuous in the famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow. He assembled his country's best musicians, subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free, and drilled them into a remarkable organization. In Moscow and Petrograd, Beethoven and Bach festicals figured among his concerts. He likewise championed music of genius from living composers.

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward. In Paris he organized what have come to be broadly known as the "Koussevitsky Concerts" which for the last four seasons have been the most prominent in that city. In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitsky is the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His debut in New York some two weeks ago was sensational. Local concert-goers will have the opportunity to judge for themselves for Frank A. Sedgwick has completed arrangements for one concert which will be heard in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February 1. The seat sale is now open and tickets may be obtained at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. Mail orders will also be accepted.

13

PAPER- Herald

DATE- Jan 11

Mr. Ernest Newman, the accomplished music critic of the New York Evening Post, discussed Mr. Koussevitzky's beautifully poetic interpretation of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony when the Boston Symphony orchestra visited New York. Mr. Newman's remarks are worth reading and re-reading:

"Listeners last night would like or dislike Koussevitzky's reading of Schubert's unfinished symphony according to whether they agreed or disagreed with him on certain general principles. As with all these old works, Koussevitzky, in my humble opinion, brings the symphony up to date by taking it back to date. The whole question is, 'What is a classic?' Koussevitzky gives the seemingly paradoxical but perfectly correct answer —'A romantic.' No classic was ever a classic to himself: He is only a classic to us, who see him so far down the avenue of time that he is perspectivized, generalized,—a creature of a simpler day than ours, a formula, a period, a style rather than a man. But to himself he was a romantic,—not a formula or a style, but a highly charged complex of atoms. The usual way of playing a classic,—especially the German way, with its respect for what is called, with unconscious humor, 'tradition'—is to make him fit the modern conception of what his own epoch must have been,—which obviously could not have been the conception the men who lived in that epoch had of it, for it is dead to us, while to them it was alive. Koussevitzky's way with the classic is to try to see him as he must have seen himself,—a method that has remarkable results in, say, the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.

"I would thus contend that it is the 'classic' conductors who romanticize an old composer, for they make him something other that what he was to himself, while Koussevitsky's apparent romanticization of him is really the genuine classicism, for it makes him walk the earth in 1925 as he must have done in, say, 1825. From this point of view, Koussevitzky's reading of the unfinished symphony is a remarkable raising of Schubert from the grave in which the false classicism of tradition has buried him.

"The psychological key to the first movement of the symphony is surely to be found in the later tragic metamorphoses of the opening phrase. Here we see Schubert, as we so often do elsewhere, hag-ridden, working himself up into a paroxysm of terror and self-pity. Hence it is right to make the first enunciation of the theme, as Koussevitzky does, a mysterious foreboding of this terror, and to put an extra tincture of sweetness into the second subject each time it recurs—that theme that is manifestly Schubert's attempt to dream the terror and the horror away. If you do not agree with the psychological point of view, Koussevitzky's reading will be all wrong; if you dc agree, the reading is the most impressive imaginable.

"One cannot dogmatize in these matters: one either starts from the conductor's premises or one does not. To those who, like myself, have always taken this view of a great movement that has been turned by the generality of conductors into a mere piece of musical sugar candy, the performance was a stupendous piece of work, alike in conception and in the orchestral execution. And in the slow movement the playing was equally beautiful. We may wish, in the abstract, that Schubert could have said what he had to say without so much repetition; but at any rate the repetitions gave us time to drink our fill of the sheer sensuous loveliness of the wood-wind [illegible]

P. [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

JOURNAL

JAN 11 1925

Music of Interest at Public Library

Works to be played by the Boston Symphony at its next concert here on the 20th possessed by the Providence Public Library are the "104th Sonnet of Petrarch" by Liszt and the miniature score for "Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Op. 64," by Tschaikowsky. The "Repose of the Holy Family," from the "Flight Into Egypt," by Berlioz, and the "Concerto in D-major" by C. P. E. Bach have been ordered. The programme for the concert has been posted on the bulletin board in the music library where various accounts of Mr. Hayes, the soloist, may be consulted. There also is the library's collection of music by Kreisler, placed on a table for easy access.

The amusing variations for piano on "Mary Had a Little Lamb," in the style of 10 composers, by Edward Ballantine, is a recent addition to the music collection. This will be of interest to those who hear the De Reszke Singer's group, "Studies in Imitation," by Herbert Hughes, this afternoon.

The library has nearly all the music conducted by Igor Stravinsky at his appearances with the New York Philharmonic the latter part of last week in New York. They include the "Song of the Volga Boatmen," transcribed for wind instruments and percussion; his "Oiseau de Feu," "Fireworks," "Le Chant de Rossignol" and "Le Sacre du Printemps." The "Scherzo Fantastique" has been ordered and also his "Concerto for Piano," which Stravinsky is to perform for the first times in America on Feb. 5 and 6, when he will be soloist, and William Mengelberg will conduct.

For the next two weeks the music by Stravinsky has been placed on a table in the music library, as well as articles about him in the music periodicals. A recent account of him in the Musical Digest for Dec. 30, gives the impressions of Carlos Salzedo, the French harpist, of his art and personality. "A Symposium on Stravinsky," by three prominent French critics (reprinted in part from La Revue Musicale) in the same periodical will also be of interest. On the bulletin board has been posted a clipping from the New York Post of Sept. 5, about this exponent of modern music.

PAPER- Prov Journal

DATE- Jan 11

Hayes with Boston Symphony

With Roland Hayes as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes for its third concert here on Jan. 20. Mr. Koussevitsky's big number on the programme will be Tschaikowski's Fifth Symphony in E-minor. Another number is Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's concerto for orchestra in D-major, arranged by Maximillian Steinberg.

Mr. Hayes will sing Berlioz's air, "The Repose of the Holy Family," from "The Flight Into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of Petrarch's 104th sonnet, the accompaniment orchestrated by Busoni. The singe[r] has had notable success as soloist in o[r]chestral concerts. With the Boston Sym[]phony last season in Boston it is said [he] was applauded probably more than a[ny] other soloist of the year. He has su[ng] with the Detroit Symphony and has t[wo] New York orchestral engagements sche[d]uled.

The Fifth is the first symphony [of] Tschaikowski in which the compos[er's] countryman was heard in this count[ry]. It was played by Koussevitsky at [the] pension fund concert last month a[nd] evoked applause and cheers from the [au]dience and the same in writing from [the] critics. It was considered by many to [be] among the composer's highest achie[ve]m[ents]

Music of Interest at Public Library

Works to be played by the Boston Sy[m]phony at its next concert here on the 20[th] possessed by the Providence Public L[i]brary are the "104th Sonnet of Petrarch[''] by Liszt and the miniature score fo[r] "Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Op. 64," b[y] Tschaikowsky. The "Repose of the Hol[y] Family," from the "Flight Into Egypt," by Berlioz, and the "Concerto in D-major" by C. P. E. Bach have been or[]dered. The programme for the concer[t] has been posted on the bulletin board i[n] the music library where various account[s] of Mr. Hayes, the soloist, may be consulted. There also is the library's collection of music by Kreisler, placed on a table for easy access.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

UNION

JAN 11 1925

People are still talking about the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Koussevitzky. In fact the man is getting more talked about than the orchestra. It is not remarkable that this is so for a more fascinating personality and dominating presence has not visited here for many years. It is to his credit that for the first time in the memory of the writer some one in the audience didn't burst into applause at the wrong time. He held his audience just as surely as he held the attention of his players.

It is only when visiting conductors and artists come to Springfield that one really begins to appreciate the Auditorium. Koussevitzky like the rest found it all together to his liking, comparing it favorably to the halls in Europe and other parts of this country. He also heard the Springfield Symphony Orchestra in rehearsal at the Hotel Kimball and was much interested in the program to be given and expressed this interest personally to Conductor Arthur H. Turner. It was a visit which the 5000 people who heard the concert will not soon forget. It is unfortunate that Springfield receives only one visit a year from a symphony orchestra but one is prone to wonder how many of the 5000 people who attended the concert last Sunday would have been present had there been an admission fee

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

EAGLE

Bklyn, N.Y.

JAN 11 1925

At the next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy, to be given Friday evening, Jan. 30, under the direction of Serge Koussewitsky, Roland Hayes, the celebrated negro tenor, will appear as soloist. The recital which Mr. Hayes gave at the Academy in the early fall was the first important musical event in Brooklyn for the current season. He possesses one of the most remarkable tenor voices ever heard in concert, and his appearance with the orchestra will be of much interest.

PAPER- Herald

DATE- Jan 11

MONDAY SYMPHONY

Richard Burgin will be the soloist at the second concert of the Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall tomorrow at 8:15 P. M. He will play Beethoven's Violin Concerto. Mr. Koussevitzky will also present the following numbers at this concert: Haydn's Symphony in G major (B and H, No. 13), and three Wagnerian excerpts—Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," funeral music of Siegfried from "Dusk of the Gods," and Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program for the regular pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 16 and 17, will be as follows: Glinka's Overture to "Ruslan & Ludmilla"; Glazounov's eighth Symphony in E flat; Entr'acte from Weber's opera, "Die Drei Pintos" (Edited by G. Mahler;) Two Movements from Franck's "Psyche"; Mendelssohn's Scherzo from the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WASHINGTON, D. C.

POST

JAN 11 1925

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Sergei Koussevitzky conductor, will be heard in one concert at Poli's theater Tuesday afternoon, January 27, at 4:30 under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

BALTIMORE, MD.

SUN

JAN 11 1925

Boston Symphony Will Play At Lyric January 28

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under leadership of its new director, Serge Koussevitsky, will give its only concert of the season in Baltimore January 28, at the Lyric. Koussevitsky has been the center of interest wherever the orchestra has appeared this season, and the Russian is looked upon as a real acquisition to the musical world of this country.

PAPER Transcript

DATE Jan 11

MONDAY SYMPHONY.

Richard Burgin will be the soloist at the Symphony concert in Symphony Hall tomorrow night, playing Beethoven's violin concerto. Serge Koussevitzky will also present Haydn's symphony in G major, and three Wagnerian excerpts, the bacchanale from "Tannhauser," funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" "Mastersingers" prelude.

PAPER- Transcript

DATE- Jan 12

Emancipated

A Light Word About Current Orchestral Amours

WHEREAS twenty years ago a conductor and an orchestra took each other for better or worse, with never a thought of divorce, today such unions are the exception rather than the rule. The love-matches between Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra and Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra are the only notable survivals. The Boston Orchestra, espoused in its days of misfortune by the patient Mr. Monteux, has deserted him and run off with a handsome Russian. The New York Symphony, after years of happy monogamy, is now carrying on scandalously with French and Bavarian lights-o'-love under the very nose of the indulgent Mr. Damrosch. The Philharmonic, having been Joan to Mr. Stransky's Darby for upward of a decade, suddenly took up psycho-analysis and threw all her inhibitions out of the window. First there was the indulgence in mild flirtations, which soon ripened into something deeper, culminating in an open break, with Mr. Mengelberg and Mr. Hadley both mentioned. Mr. van Hoogstraten was soon included within the family circle, but even this polyandrous arrangement could no longer content the Philaharmonic, now fully emancipated. Even condoning the Spiering, Casals and Waghalter affairs, what can a commentator find to say regarding our heroine's present conduct when, Mr. Mengelberg in Europe and Mr. Hadley and Mr. van Hoogstraten absent on business trips, she arranges a clandestine Saturday-night meeting with one guest-conductor and makes a date with another for next Thursday? [Deems Taylor in The New York World

---

PAPER- Advertiser

DATE- Jan 13

BURGIN SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Richard Burgin played Beethoven's violin concerto with finely sustained spirit at last night's Symphony concert. Haydn's G major symphony was delightfully conducted by Koussevitzky. Three Wagner numbers, the "Tannhauser" Bacchanale "Dusk of the Gods" funeral music and "Meistersingers" prelude, were other enjoyable features.

PAPER- Herald

DATE- Jan 13

SYMPHONY PLAYS SECOND OF SERIES

Richard Burgin, Violinist, Is the Soloist

Last evening in Symphony hall came the second concert of the Monday series, the soloist being Richard Burgin, violinist. The program was made up of the Haydn G major symphony (Breitkopf and Haertel No. 13), Beethoven's violin concerto, and by Wagner the Baccanaie from "Tannhaueser," Siegfried's funeral music from the "Dusk of the Gods" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg."

Mr. Koussevitzky's exquisitely euphonious and at the same time stirringly vital performance of the Haydn symphony has been recently commented upon in The Herald, and so has his way with the Wagner excerpts. The only "novelty" last night was the Beethoven concerto.

Mr. Burgin played it well, doing full justice to such melodies as came his way, tossing off the theme of the rondo with dash and snap, managing the interminable array of runs and trills and passages smoothly and with sweet tone. The audience liked the performance heartily. This sincere compliment having been paid Mr. Burgin, let a suggestion be risked.

In these days, when nobody sees harm in laying hands on any piece of music and twisting it out of shape, tricking out an organ fantasy by Bach, say, with orchestral dress plus glockenspiel and drums—why should not some composer with a knack at writing for orchestras, but with no great stock of musical ideas in his head, help himself out and also do the public a good turn by making over this violin concerto into an honest piece for orchestra?

There is music enough in it in plenty, and fine music, too, beautifully melodious, of charming sentiment and of sprightly brightness,, all, it may be taken for granted, written for orchestra with Beethoven's masterly skill. But there is the solo violin forever holding the proceedings back, demanding a hearing for its long roulades. Let some ambitious and daring soul try the experiment of retaining what is worth while in the role of the solo violin and, doing away with the rest. It never would be missed.

The next Monday concert will take place Feb. 9. The soloist will be John Charles Thomas, baritone. R. R. G.

SOMERVILLE

PAPER- Monitor

DATE- Jan 13

MUSIC

"Extra" Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the second of its series of supplementary Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall last night, with Richard Burgin, concertmaster, as soloist in the Beethoven violin concerto. The other numbers were Haydn's Symphony in G major (B. & H. No. 13) and Wagner's Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser," Siegfried's Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung" and the Prelude to "Meistersinger."

This concert served to introduce Mr. Koussevitzky to the Monday evening audiences, as he was unable to appear at the first concert of the series. He was warmly welcomed, and warmly applauded for his rendition of the symphony and the Wagner excerpts. Justly so, for he again proved his poetic musicianship and his dramatic imagination in these numbers. Lucidly spoke the voices of the symphony, lightly stepped its spirited measures, movingly sang its gentle melodies. Never was the scene on the Hill of Venus more vividly set before us, never the "Meistersinger" Prelude more thrillingly played. These two items won the heartiest plaudits of the three, but the "Ring" motives swelled quite as stirringly and called up quite as clearly the impressive scene from "The Twilight of the Gods." Magnificent is not too strong a word for Mr. Koussevitzky's realizations of these familiar masterpieces.

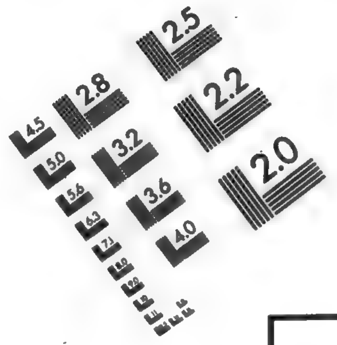
Mr. Burgin likewise was cordially received. He played the difficult (and tiresome) first movement of the concerto with his usual technical ability, and brought warmth of tone to the Larghetto and sprightliness to the Rondo. Yet it seems a pity he did not choose to display his abilities in a less hackneyed and more musically interesting work. Nowadays when this piece is played one must turn for enjoyment to the orchestral accomplishment, which by the way, was also excellen

REDUCTION

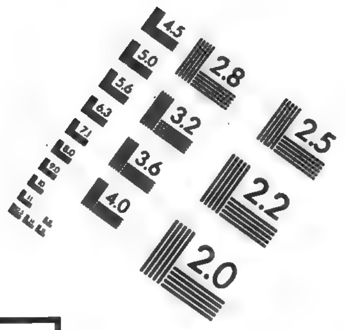
RATIO

14x

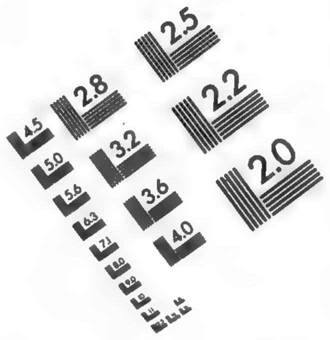
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



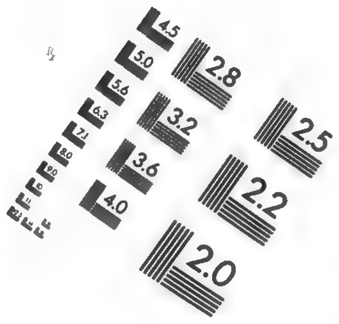
2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1



2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
2.0
4.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0

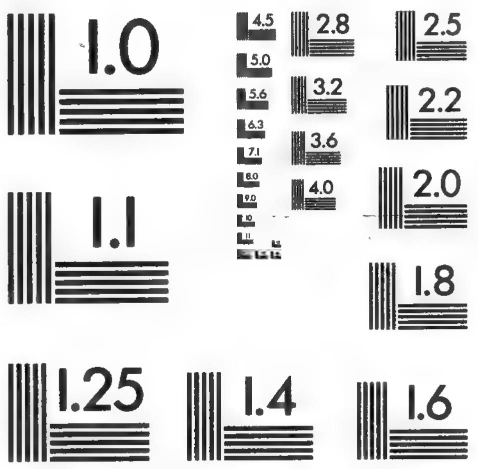


2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
2.0
4.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

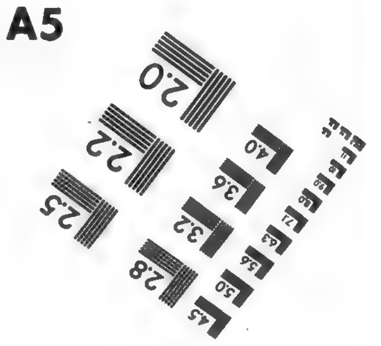
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

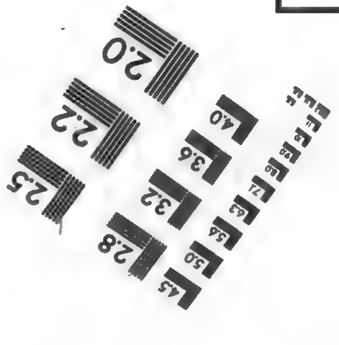


2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8

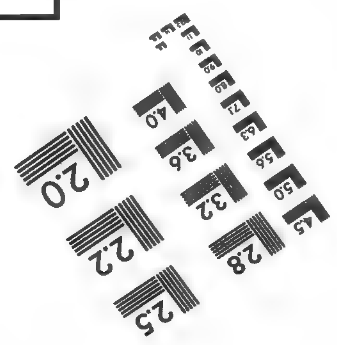
2.0
4.0
3.6
2.2
3.2
2.5
2.8

A4

A3



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8



2.0
4.0
3.6
2.2
3.2
2.5
2.8

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

14

PAPER- Globe

DATE- Jan 13

idea of perpetual motion.

BURGIN SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of the Monday series last evening in Symphony Hall. To many of the audience this was Koussevitzky's debut since illness prevented his conducting the first concert. They let their enthusiasm be shown in no uncertain terms. Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist.

Mr Burgin chose to play that great favorite of the violinists, Beethoven's Concerto in D major. Franz Kneisel played it four times in Boston during the latter part of the last century, Kreisler as many in the present one. This is Mr Burgin's second performance. There have been others. Yet small wonder that it is done so often for where, except perhaps in the Brahms concerto, can one find so noble a conception and one so free from sham or mere tawdry display? If any concertos are for musicians this is surely one of them.

The performance left some things to be desired. The soloist was apparently very nervous at the start. In the final Rondo his tone scarcely seemed to measure in volume to the demands of the hall. On the other hand beginning with the swinging cadenza of the first movement, he gained confidence and with it precision and grace. Again in the end passage of the second movement where the solo violin sings the theme he reached near to the ideal. As a whole the performance was competent if not inspiring. Yet how many in an audience really experience the luxury of thrills in their backs over a concerto anyway?

For the remainder of his program Mr Koussevitzky set Haydn's symphony in G major and three excerpts from the Wagnerian music-dramas, the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the Siegfried Funeral Music and the Prelude to "The Meistersinger."

Haydn's symphony has now been on the program of every one of the various Boston series and deservedly. It seems to gain new beauties on every hearing. The largo which the first time seemed a bit slow and overlong now scarcely lingers long enough. The gallantly syncopated measures of the Minuet seem important where first they escaped with scant notice. Above all, the genial lilt of the finale brings a smile even in anticipation. Surely this is one of the best of Mr Koussevitzky's 18th-century readings.

There is much weight of critical opinion to hold that Koussevitzky tortures the Venusberg music. The writer with all deference cannot subscribe. Undoubtedly this is a different tradition, lingering long in the realm of the "Liebestod," but is it the less stirring for that? Was Wagner after all more interested in Venus or the goblins?

Whatever may be differences on that score there can hardly be any as to the thrilling sonority of the Siegfried Funeral Music or the breadth of vision Koussevitzky brings to the Meistersinger Prelude. Here at last was the thrill. And here fittingly the concert ended.

"The Tornado" Pictu

PAPER Herald

DATE Jan 15

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening is as follows: Beethoven's overture to Collin's "Coriolanus"; "Pastoral" Symphony and Seventh Symphony, which Wagner called the apotheosis of the dance, at which Vincent d'Indy laughed derisively and said: "Here is another pastoral symphony with the opening theme of the first movement suggested by a bird call, while the finale is a village festival and nothing more." Thus do deep thinkers differ, to the confusion and dismay of laymen, all those that are "fond of music" and "know what they like."

◆

And next week there will be a one-man program, composed of Stravinsky's "Song of the Volga Boatmen" for wind instruments and percussion—it was played here this season at a children's concert conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky; the piano concerto with Mr. Stravinsky, the pianist; and the "Fire Bird" and "Petrouchka" Suites. There will be curiosity to see Mr. Stravinsky, and perhaps there would be still greater curiosity if he were to conduct one of his compositions.

Debussy, who generally admired him, wrote amusingly about him in a letter: "I saw Stravinsky recently. He said, 'My Fire Bird,' my 'Rite' as a child says 'My top,' my hoop.' And he is precisely like a spoiled child, who, occasionally, is ill-mannered in dealing with music. He is also a young savage who wears inordinate neckties and kisses a lady's hand, treading on her toes at the same time. When old, he will be unbearable. I mean, he will tolerate no music, but meanwhile he is wonderful, positively wonderful."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BALTIMORE, MD.

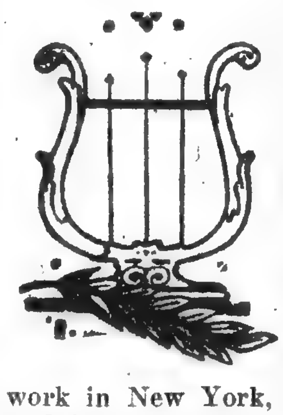
EVE. SUN

JAN 16 1925

Music

By F. W. S.

THE appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 28 in its only concert to be given here this season is looked forward to with the greatest interest not only because of the commanding position which this organization formerly held among local concert-goers, but even more in that it will mark the debut of the new director, Serge Koussevitzky, who has attracted so much attention by his work in New York, where he has been acclaimed as a conductor with a distinct tendency toward the moderns, though he has also shown enough conservatism to satisfy those lovers of music who cling to the older and more conventional forms of music. The first impression he made upon the critics on his appearance in New York was highly favorable, and brought out the suggestion that here was a man who might be expected to restore the Boston Symphony to its former position of pre-eminence. A second hearing tended to modify this attitude of almost unqualified admiration. According to one of the reviewers on the Metropolitan press, Koussevitzky's reading of the Scriabine "Le Sacre du Printemps" was not at all up to the inspirational height that had been anticipated, and others also were disposed to manifest a measure of conservatism as to the influence of the conductor upon current musical trends.



These verdicts, of course, serve to make Baltimore symphony patrons all the more anxious to determine how the Bostonians will bear themselves under their new leader, and they will have an opportunity to hear his reading of older as well as newer works, the program being unusually varied.

The program will include the Fantasia and Fugue in C minor of Bach, the "Bacchanale" from Wagner's "Tannhæuser," works by the Russian composers Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff and the Symphony in A major, No. 7, opus 92, by Bethoven, a list of such widely differing character as to test the versalility of the conductor.

PAPER- Traveler

DATE- Jan 17

SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Igor Stravinsky will be the guest of honor and the soloist at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 23 and 24, playing the piano part in his new Concerto.

Serge Koussevitsky will also conduct this composer's Song of the Volga Boatmen, and Suites from his Ballets, "Petrouchka" and "The Fire-Bird."

All-Beethoven Program Played

For this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged an all-Beethoven program, including the overture to "Coriolanus" and the sixth and seventh symphonies.

The "Coriolanus" overture, written not for Shakespeare's tragedy but for one by the German Collin, is intensely dramatic music, and therefore of a sort for Koussevitzky to revel in. The performance was one of much fire, cutting the outlines sharply.

The "Pastoral" Symphony, charming in its simplicity, was read with exquisits grace. Particularly the third movement, with its "jolly gathering of country folk," and the storm, was played in masterly fashion. The basses that announce the storm excelled themselves. The audience, unable to repress natural emotions, braved conductorial displeasure by applauding between the movements.

Programs devoted to one composer seem over-ardous for the average concert-goer, and how much more so programs containing two symphonies. This one was too much for the Friday afternoon program-rustlers, who flocked out in numbers between movements of the Seventh Symphony. Yet the interpretation was anything but dull. Mr. Koussevitzky pursued his much-discussed penchant for taking liberties, taking the allegretto at a swift pace that caused a hum of excited comment. At the end there was much enthusiasm.

The concert will be repeated tonight at Symphony Hall.

Herald Jan 17

SYMPHONY GIVES 12TH CONCERT

Program of Beethoven's Music Presented by Leader Koussevitzky

STRAVINSKY TO BE FEATURE NEXT WEEK

By PHILIP HALE

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program consisted of Beethoven's overture to Collin's "Coriolanus," and the "Pastoral" and the Seventh Symphonies.

This program took us back to student days in the Berlin of the early 80's, when Benjamin Bilse at the "Concert Haus," facing the audience, led with stiff and military gestures his justly famous orchestra of "prominent artists," young virtuosi, with older and approved musicians. Honest Bilse, a sound disciplinarian with a catholic taste, but not a poetic, imaginative conductor, would set apart certain nights in the month for the glorification of this or that composer: "Beethoven Abend," "Brahms Abend," "Mozart Abend," "Rabb Abend," and so on through the list of the dead and the living thought worthy of this distinction.

It was not so bad, but chiefly for this reason: one could eat and drink and smoke. Vast quantities of pig in various forms; weiner schnitzel, plain, garnished, or crowned with an egg, not always fresh, for eggs in Berlin, like Hannibal, had crossed the Alps; goose, caviare, all sorts of dishes, cooked or raw. Young couples spooned in the open German fashion while the mothers sat by, knitting. It was a cheerful sight after one was accustomed to the intrepid knife-swallowing, and much good music was heard at a very reasonable price. Those were the days when Tchaikovsky was regarded as a dangerous fellow and contemporaneous French composers were surely immoral.

Consideration of the program and the sound of Beethoven's music took us back to Bilse and the "Concert Haus." A Beethoven afternoon. Not that for a moment we would liken Mr. Koussevitzky to the German pedestrian conductor. Not that we would liken the audience to the men and women, officers, students, lovers, sitting happy and gorging in clouds of rank tobacco smoke. In Symphony hall there was more or less well-bred composure until the time came to be enthusiastic, and high on the walls gods, godesses, fauns and nymphs—yea, the glorious Apollo Belvedere himself—looked down approvingly.

Well, Beethoven and Chopin can stand the test of concerts devoted to their works; that is, if the performance by orchestra or pianist be eloquent, as was that of yesterday.

Gone forever, except in Germany, is the idea that only a German conductor can "understand" and "interpret" the works of Beethoven. We have had Nikisch, the Hungarian; the Frenchmen Rabaud and Monteux, who gave admirable performances of Beethoven's overtures and symphonies, and now comes Mr. Koussevitzky, who proves to us, if proof were necessary, that the music of "the deaf man of Bonn" is not "old hat," as certain wild-eyed critics and amateurs, who date the birth of music, art and literature 1914, would have us believe.

Did any one expect that Mr. Koussevitzky would "Russianize" Beethoven's music? That the strong drink of Beethoven would turn out to be vodka? That the beauty and grandeur of the overture and the symphonies would be comparable to the scenic decorations of Bakst? If this expectation was in the breast of any one, there was bitter disappointment.

There were no eccentric liberties with the text; there was no painful effort to obtain unexpected effects by strange tempi or emphasis of unimportant voices. The interpretation was as sane as it was eloquent; as reverential as it was impressive. For once the "Pastoral" was not a long-winded bore; it was a continuous revelation of simple charm and village rejoicing broken only by the thunderstorm with its mutterings and grumblings, its lightning flashes and its peals of thunder. Not a melodramatic tempest, but a musical as well as a dramatic one.

And once again the glory of the Seventh symphony was revealed, whether one accepted Wagner's theory that it is the apotheosis of the dance, or thinks with Vincent d'Indy that the music was inspired by impressions of Nature, and is, in a way, a second "Pastoral" symphony.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The concert next week will be for the glorification of Igor Stravinsky: Song of the Volga Bargemen for wind orchestra; Suite from "Petrouchka"; Concerto for piano and wind orchestra (Mr. Stravinsky, pianist); Suite from "The Fire-Bird." Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct.

PAPER- Transcript

DATE- Jan 17

Symphony Concert

DAY OF BEETHOVEN, DAY OF CONDUCTOR, DAY OF SURPRISES

THRICE THE COMPOSER RECEIVES MR. KOUSSEVITZKY

The New Point of View at the Symphony Concerts—The Overture "Coriolanus," the Pastoral and the Seventh So Heard and Applauded—Music Rejuvenated and Revealed—Music Also Considered and Contrived

CONDUCTORS change, and we hearers change with them. With most, the process is too gradual to be heeded; while fewer still are at pains to define to themselves the new point of view, the new source of sensation and pleasure. Yet both stood clear at the Symphony Concert yesterday, when the series rounded the mark into the second half of the season. A year ago, the musically inclined were seeking Symphony Hall on Friday afternoons to hear the numbers that Mr. Monteux happened to have in hand. He had chosen a favorite item from the "standard repertory"; or he was returning to pages long overlooked; or he had set in array pleasing examples of both the ancients and the moderns; or he had pitched upon some piece hitherto unheard in Boston, written by a "new man" according to the faith and practice of the younger generation; or with fresh handiwork an established composer was proving afresh his deserts and vitality. Out of long experience with Mr. Monteux, most hearers could anticipate the quality of the performance; though, now and again, he and the orchestra could and did surprise them. Usually expectation on that score was fulfilled in their ears, and they departed in praise, blame or indifference for the music that they so heard. Upon Mr. Monteux, program-maker, rather than upon Mr. Monteux, conductor, turned the tea-table chatter or the dinner-table debate.

Now, however, these same listeners flock to Symphony Hall on a Friday, or on a Saturday as well, to hear Mr. Koussevitzky, as conductor; incidentally to look upon him; along the way to measure the response of the orchestra to his will and urge. It is the program, not the performance, that passes for granted, unless at mid-week, or even later, alterations have re-shaped it. Few note that for the most part, Mr. Koussevitzky is still playing his own repertory—that is to say, pieces in which he excels; in which he has gained no little glory; music that turns from facet to facet the crystal of his powers. As complaisant are the majority to his predilection for a piece of ancient music at the outset of many a concert; his frequent inclination to brief, displayful, semi-detached fragments; his abundance with Beethoven and Wagner; his warmth upon Debussy and Ravel, various "romantics," a modernist or two; his neglect, so far of various establised or unestablished composers, interesting to hear via England, Italy, where not; his possible indifference toward the sort of music they write or typify.

Enough for most of us on the floor or in the galleries of Symphony Hall that Mr. Koussevitzky has set a program according to his own promptings and brought the music to voice in his own image. The conductor as disclosed in the music—not the music filtering through the conductor—now engages us. Of his attributes as they enhance the fortunate composer, do we now hold debate. Again a "personality" reigns not only over the orchestra, but also the audiences, of Symphony Hall. Like that of Nikisch in the Bostonian nineties, it subdues all things to itself and is content. Unlike that of Dr. Muck "before the war," it does not reach also toward catholicity and comprehension up and down the widest fields of music. Mr. Koussevitzky plays upon Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra in Mr. Koussevitzky's program at Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts—and the signs and wonders thereof engross all within earshot and tongueshot. The vogue, the fame of the Symphony Concerts rise anew; the receipts keep touch and time. American fashion, there is no more to ask. Let music as such take its chances—and daily give thanks for a Heaven-sent medium and mirror.

So disposed, expectant and speedily pleasured sat the audience of yesterday before the conductor's afternoon of Beethoven. It is not necessary to inquire into the inclinations or the compulsions prompting Mr. Koussevitzky to such choice. There the program stood—the Overture, "Coriolanus"; the Pastoral Symphony; the Seventh Symphony. The intending listener could take it or leave it—and every one took it except a few habitués of the second balcony where, for the first time this season, seats stood untenanted. For outset, the Overture did not quite justify the conductor's scheme or keep the pace with the two Symphonies. Seemingly, he would begin with Beethoven dramatic. If so, why not the third "Leonora" Overture since that to "Egmont" had been recently played? For to some hearers this "Coriolanus" is not of the composer's mighty, far-flung, white-hot and, thus far, everlasting music. In such ears, the tumults contrapuntal and instrumental that fill so many pages are beginning to sound hollow, willed, labored, of another time and manner. Mr. Koussevitzky lavished himself upon them; the orchestra gave him back power for power. Yet Beethoven prevailed not—as he does with "Egmont" or with at least two of the four "Leonoras." Worse still, there are those to whom the gentler, longing, so-called feminine theme of "Coriolanus" sounds more like the voice of a matron of Vienna, not too far past her youth, than of the Tragic Muse austere and buskined. As usual, too, Mr. Koussevitzky refined upon her with languors and soft euphonies. Of him and of Beethoven puissant were the great chords of the beginning and the close; the sombre passion, submission, extinction of the end—music of fatality if ever composer wrote it.

With the Pastoral Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky's heyday began; indeed, touched and held the climax. Not within the longest and the fullest memory had the music been so perceivingly, imaginatively and revealingly played. Here it was, after a hundred-odd years in the "standard repertory," still poem of Beethoven's moods, fancies, voice; yet warm upon his singing lips. As animate and poetizing was the instrument upon which composer and conductor sang their song of memoried delights. In the second division in particular, little masters abounded in the woodwinds, and the horns—above all Mr. Laurent, fullest and richest of all the flute-players. As one man in zest, intent and accomplishment were the sixty-odd strings. In unity and reciprocity, in beauties and ardors, sensibilities and euphonies of tone, the band outdid itself. Mr. Koussevitzky did not spare his vigors, but he might merely have touched the orchestra with his finger-tips, so susceptible was it to his and the composer's lightest will. And only the other evening, at the concert of "The Flonzaleys," some of the men were repining at "this endless rehearsal of Beethoven." They had reason now to behold and hear what this inspired industry had wrought.

Veritably, for Beethoven, as well as for the orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky was the leader in the deed. He quickened the second movement—the dreamers beside the brook. He phrased it as a singer, equally blessed with skill and imagination might phrase his song. From the band he drew and blended and balanced its utmost beaut of tone. The outcome was a loveliness without flaw; a simplicity without blemis a delicious sense of fantasia when towar the close the music stirs with woodland sounds. As animating, as re juvenating, was the conductor's plast hand upon pace and rhythm in the first movement. Little crescendos blew over th music; a finger-stroke of emphasis upo this accent or that was life-giving; ne details disclosed themselves; remembere charms were deepened; the whole musi expanded in tonal and spiritual delight. There were humor and homeliness, as well as freedoms and vivacities, in the Scherzo tho sturdy rusticity, the folk-poetry tha Beethoven—the mood upon him—liked to embody and release. So apt and imagina tive was Mr. Koussevitzky's proportionin that the little thunder-storm rolled pas formidable to simple ears and heart Threaded with brightness waxing was th transition into the Finale; while out o it full-throated sang a whole countr side. Under such artful ardors, such ou pourings of tone a-pulse and a-glow Bee thoven's repetitions seemed not on to erable but imperative. With simplicit and the riches of simplicity, with e de light that out of Beethoven's hea san into loveliness. Mr. Koussevitzky rothe the Pastoral Symphony after these man years of crusts and formulas an tons flannels. Who would have believe it that clear-voiced music? It was as houg Beethoven himself had done the de

With the Seventh Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky, orchestra and audience fare well, better, and also less well, s not a few the illustrious memory M Toscanni, eloquent beyond compare th music, still haunts. The Russian m the Italian in the overwhelming the careering pace, the careening ryt the leap and frenzy and outcry—a myriad Bacchantes upon the vin-cla dripping hills—with which he charg an surcharged the finale. A brass farthing f the pure and pious, the droning and dogmatic d'Indy imagining this race of sound and fury a "village festival"; even a village festival "strongly characterized." Has Saint-Vincent of the Schola never dreamed or known a Bacchic rout? It is high time that he re-read Euripides and with reopened ears listened to Beethoven, likewise rending the reverberant air.

Graphic of contrast, imaginative with the swellings of tone, the sharpenings of rhythm, was Mr. Koussevitzky when the two melodies of the Scherzo are in play. Yet now and again the sense of effect contrived, considered, applied, would sti even in the impressed listener. The pace the rhythm, the gradation and modulatio of the Allegretto arrested and enfolded t ear, though here again the sense of a c scious manipulation would not quite do Try as the listener might, there was se of Beethoven, reined to a conductor's pa even though those paces illuded ear imagination. Freer, winged, less s within a listening concert-hall, it was sible to wish the composer.

And in the first movement, beside Toscanini, Mr. Koussevitzky was n "second in Rome." Once he had w the slow introduction as calm yet s sive prelude, elaborately he prepar way for the entrance of the themes insistently he opened the music to subsequent progress. Yet nowhere bourgeoning, impregnating, overspr bourgeoning, impregnating, over sp and finally possessing the music; wh dom did the rhythm slither and penetrate as with an infectious, mounting joy of beat and motion. And these were Mr. Toscanini's masteries of, by, and for Beethoven. In the Pastoral Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky divined and transfigured; in the Seventh—the Finale aside—he took thought and contrived. The more discernible the means, the less impinging was the outcome.

Passing the Mark

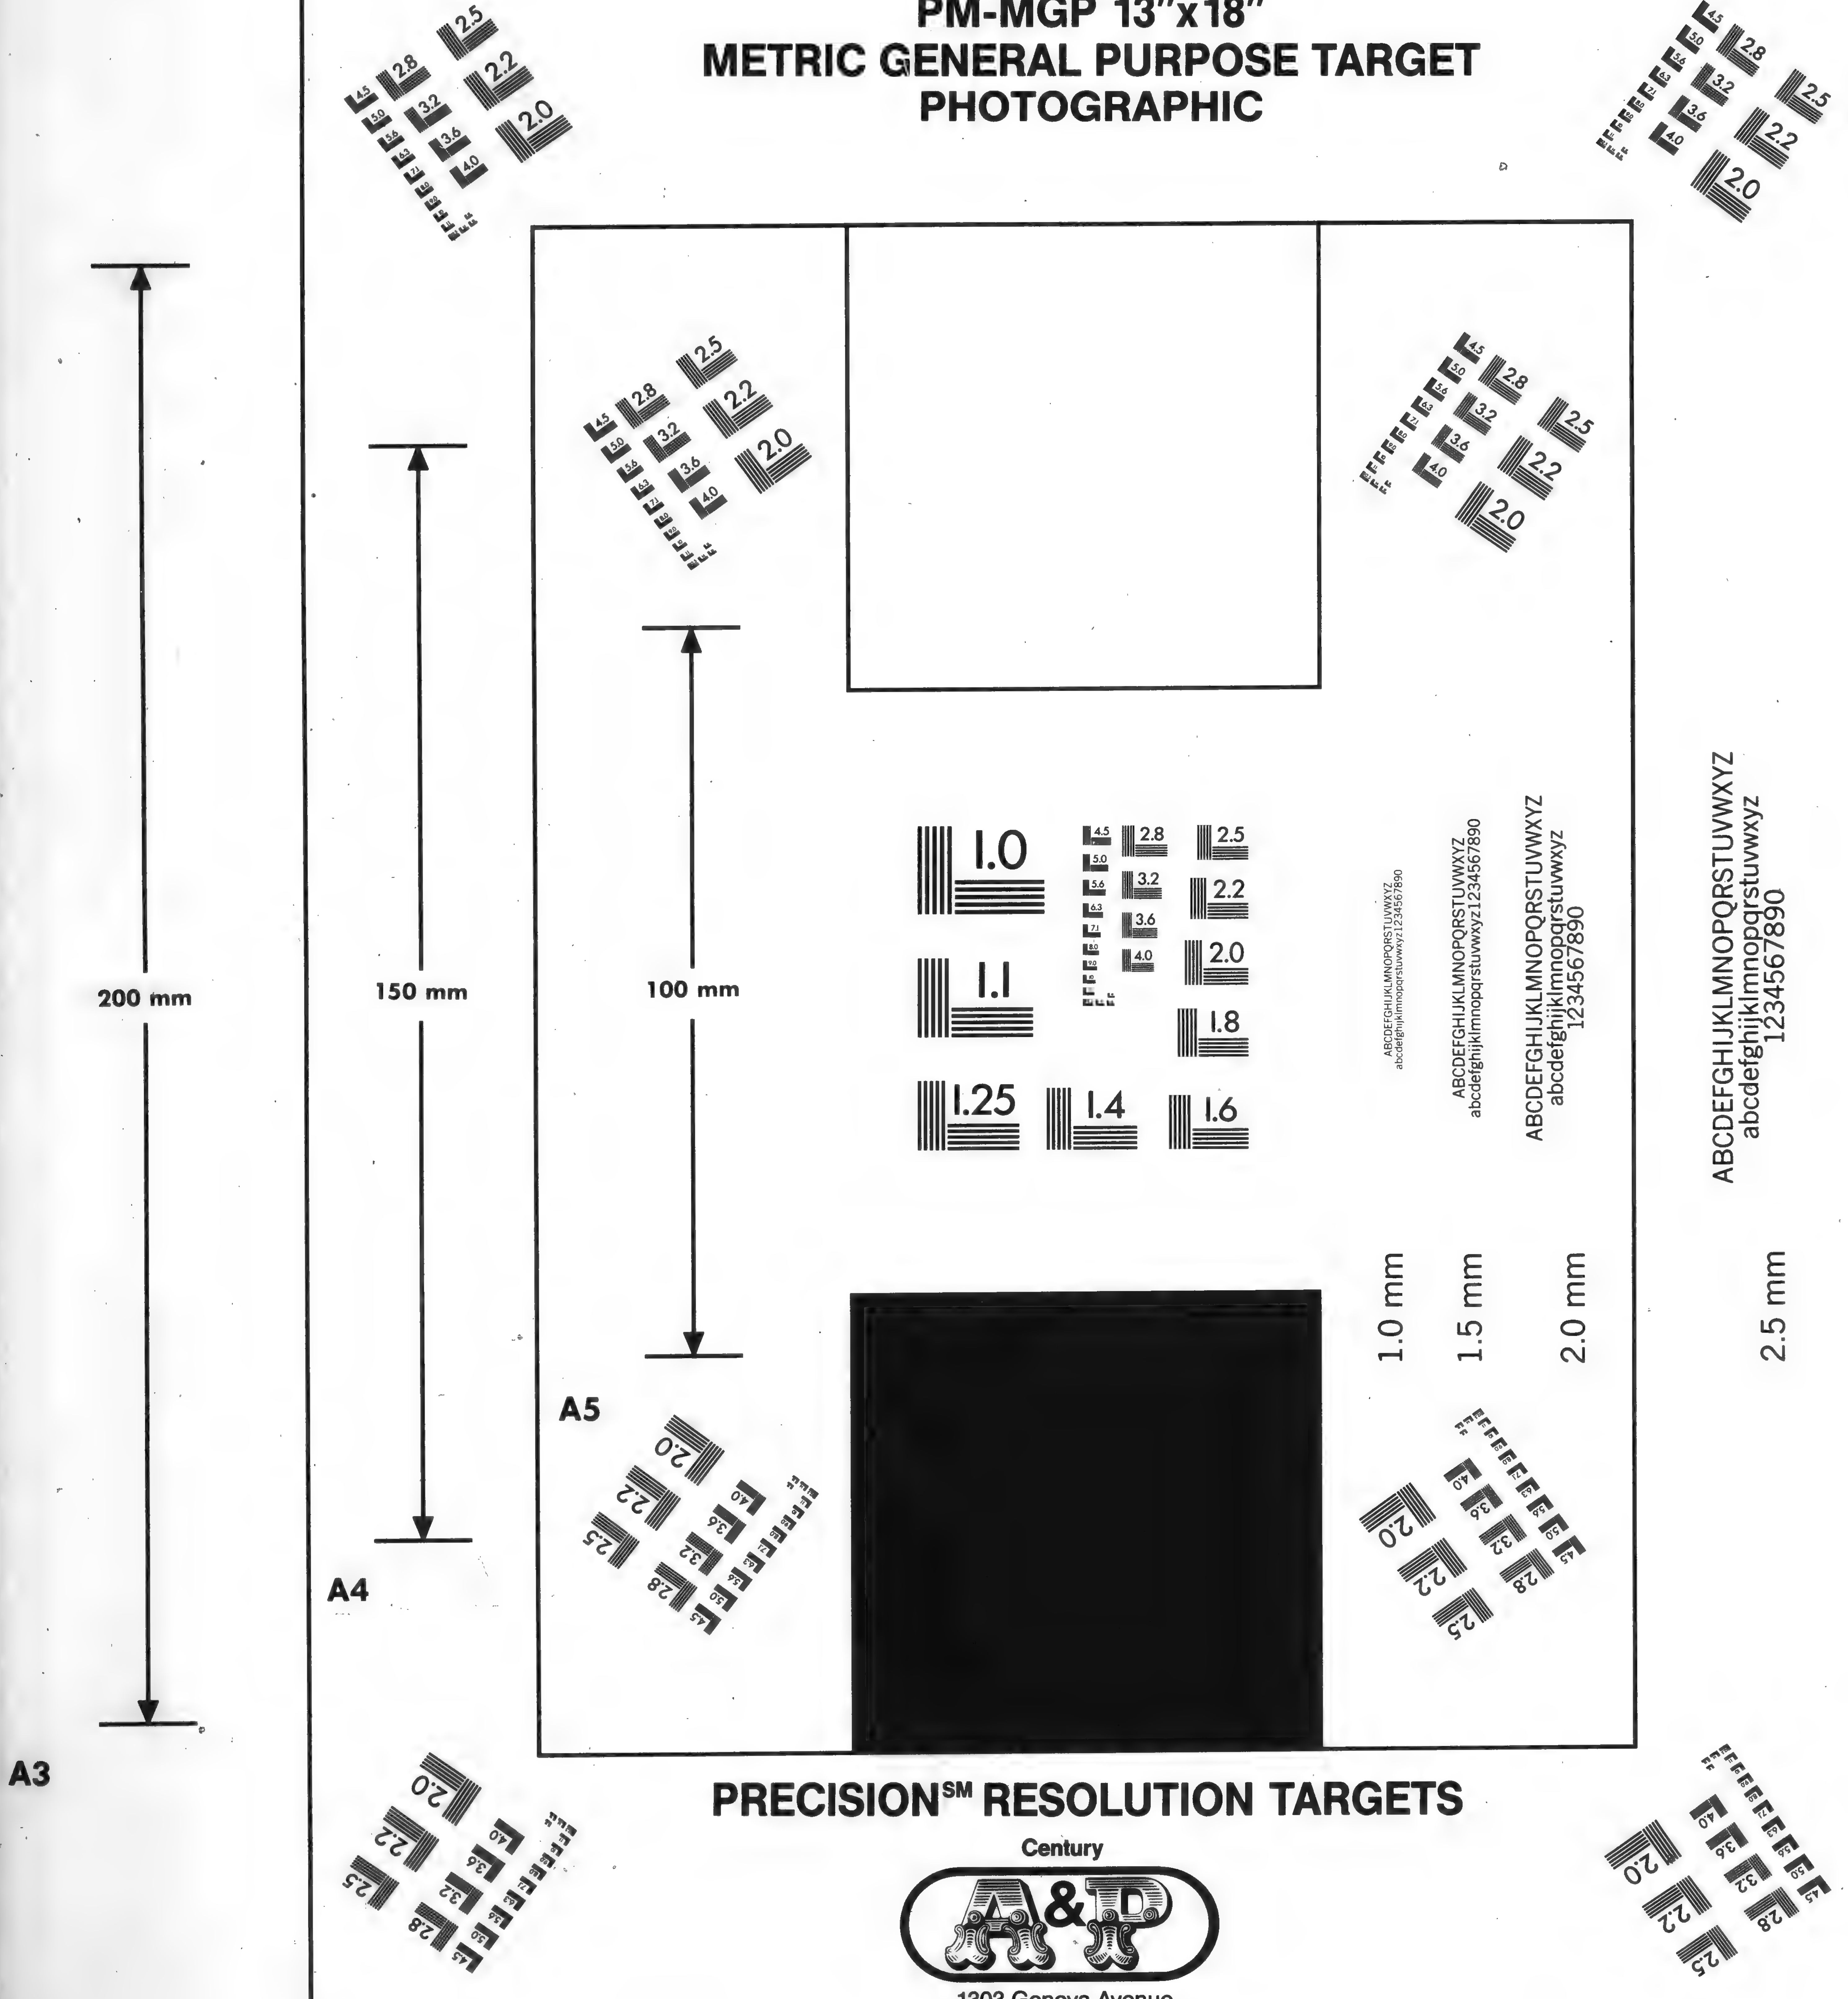
By More Than $84,000 the Symphony Concerts Are Now Guaranteed

BY $265.99, the pledges to the fund covering the deficit in the working of the Symphony Orchestra for the current year, now exceed the $84,000 originally sought by the trustees. The margin of excess, however, is so small that additional subscriptions will be welcomed—the more since unforeseen and costly emergencies are always possible. Accordingly, Mr. E. B. Dane, treasurer, still sits in the receipt of custom at 6 Beacon Street. According to the program-book at the concert of yesterday, recent contributors to the Guarantee Fund are:

Dabney, Mr. and Mrs. George B.
Forbes, Bertha
Harrington, Mrs. Frances B.
Lee, Bertha
Lilly, Mrs. Channing
Loeffler, Mrs. C. M.
Mason, Fanny P.
Merrill, Mrs. C. H. S.
McKibben, Emily W.
Peirce, Alice Foster
Pickman, Dudley L.
Proctor, Mrs. Henry H.
Putnam, Marian C.

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

15

MIDDLETOWN
CONN.
PRESS
ISSUE OF
JAN 17 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There is a particular interest locally in the forthcoming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Capitol theatre, Hartford, on Sunday afternoon, February 1st, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. This famous orchestra returns to Hartford after an absence of two years and the occasion will introduce Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra's new conductor and one of the leading celebrities of Europe. The orchestra retains intact the remarkable personnel of last season numbering 104 musicians.

Serge Koussevitsky is called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris, and this is his first visit to America. He is described as a leader of rare charm and forcefulness and as an artist of impassioned convictions. He is the first Russian to lead this famous orchestra. His coming to Hartford is easily one of the outstanding musical events of the season.

The demand for seats is very heavy and early application is advisable. The seat sale is now in progress at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, 139 Asylum street, Hartford. Mail orders will also be taken. All orders and checks should be made payable and directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, manager.

PAPER- American

DATE- Jan 17

KOUSSEVITZKY CHANGES PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY

The feature of yesterday's Symphony Concert was the daring courage of Serge Koussevitzky in changing his originally announced program to an all Beethoven one. On top of that, he put two symphonies on the program, an almost unheard of innovation. Beethoven's Sixth and Seventh were the Symphonies, and the only other music was that composer's great Overture "Coriolanus."

The performance of the two Symphonies was similarly excellent, both on the part of the conductor and on that of the orchestra. Here he did not stray quite so far from convention, except in the Allegretto of the Seventh.

Next week there will be an all-Stravinsky program, with the composer present as assisting artist. It should create quite an uproar.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 17 1925

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

JAN 17 1925

Koussevitzky and Beethoven

By STUART MASON

THE program of the twelfth Symphony concert, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, consisted of Beethoven's Overture to Collin's tragedy, "Coriolanus," and the same composer's Sixth and Seventh symphonies.

This was not the program as originally announced. Mr. Koussevitzky is a conductor of surprises. Not only does he change his programs at short notice, but his conducting of them is not lacking in that element also. It is worth noticing that the first and most natural thought in connection with the symphony concerts these days concerns Mr. Koussevitzky. Rightly or not, in spite of ourselves, his personality has become all pervading.

Several times he has played the music of Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert or Weber in a manner which was unmistakably original if not always conformable with preconceived ideas or so-called traditions. He has even played such music in a manner which was to say the least whimsical and capricious.

A Greater Koussevitzky

Yesterday's program offered him abundant opportunity for the further display of those qualities which have distinguished him in the past. Yet here Mr. Koussevitzky must have surprised those who were looking forward to more of those often strangely distorted versions of familiar pieces. Yesterday a much greater Koussevitzky was revealed to the public, a Koussevitzky with a broader and nobler conception of Beethoven than was to be observed in the playing of either of the Third or the Fifth symphonies at past concerts.

Yet the performance was not ultra conservative and the impress of the conductor's individuality was not lacking. The music was played in the true romantic style. His conception of it was poetic and imaginative but fancy was duly restrained and never overstepped the bounds of good taste. Proportions were well observed and it is doubtful if a more satisfying interpretation of these two symphonies could be desired by the most fastidious.

Possibly the last movement of the Seventh symphony might have gained in rhythmical incisiveness had it been at a slightly slower pace, but never has it been our good fortune to hear the Sixth played with such a fortunate choice of tempi. This symphony, until yesterday, has always seemed a tiresome work full of needless repetitions, often childish in the character of its themes and in its imitations of the sounds of nature.

Not so yesterday. Mr. Koussevitzky succeeded in bringing out what must have been the original intentions of the composer. By taking the opening allegro and the scene by the brookside at a faster pace than has been customary with his predecessors he brought out the broad lines on which these movements are constructed as no other conductor has done. By playing the music of the tempest in a more subdued manner he suggested the storm to the imagination rather than attempted to paint it graphically, and by broadening the measures of the final hymn of thanksgiving he lent a dignity to these pages which has heretofore been lacking.

Symphony Transformed

The symphony as a whole was transformed. It became under his hands once more a vital music, a music which touched the heart, which set the imagination aglow, a music once more vivid and pulsing with life, a music touched with the genius of the great master who penned its measures.

In like manner was the interpretation of the Seventh symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky did not attempt to read into its measures meanings which were foreign to them. It was a conception of this music which was supremely sane and straightforward, a conception which was satisfying, which left the hearer with the impression that this and no other was the manner in which it should be played.

This was playing which restored faith in Beethoven's music, which made it possible to once more understand its greatness and beauty, its universal appeal. Oftentimes it had seemed faded and worn. After yesterday's performance we know that it is blessed with eternal youth.

Strange to say, Mr. Koussevitzky was unduly restrained in the dramatic Overture to "Coriolanus." Here those theatrical qualities which have served him in many another piece of similar nature were not in evidence. He is truly a man of surprises, of unusual and unexpected ways with music, yet withal capable of touching the heights.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

JAN 17 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming

Announcement is formally made of a coming visit to Worcester by the Boston symphony orchestra. The date selected for the concert in Mechanics hall is Tuesday evening, Feb. 17. It will be the first appearance in this city of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, who has created a sensation wherever he has been seen. When he took the conductorship of this remarkable organization it was at the height of perfection, made so under the direction of Pierre Monteaux and Koussevitsky has kept the organization up to the same high standard. He has also given some of his own interpretations of the scores.

PAPER- Globe

DATE- Jan 17

BEETHOVEN FILLS SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Koussevitzky's Homage to the Classics

Next week's Symphony program is to be all-Stravinsky, with the composer present and playing the piano part in his new concerto, but Mr Koussevitsky doing the conducting. Perhaps this fact explains why Koussevitsky selected yesterday to do homage to the greatest of the classics for orchestra.

He is holding the balance between ancients and moderns even, and trying to satisfy both those to whom the history of music ended with Brahms and those for whom it began with Debussy and has culminated in Stravinsky. Yesterday's program, for the first time in 15 years, contained no music not of the very greatest. Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, his Sixth, and his Seventh symphony filled the afternoon.

Why anyone should dislike either an all-Bethoven or an all-Stravinsky program is not very plain. Beethoven's greatest masterpieces, such as those heard yesterday, are openly denounced only by the youngest and rashest modernists, whatever any candid 20th century listener may think of the music from "The Ruins of Athens" and other mediocre works from his pen. Stravinsky, if not a great composer, is at least one of the foremost now living. Anybody to whom music is not a dead art should be eager to hear his work often enough and fully enough to be able to decide whether or not it is permanently pleasurable.

Yet there are many who repine over having to hear two Bethoven symphonies in an afternoon. Jaded musical palates, such as those of persons whose profession requires them to hear, to make, or to teach too much music, may require a succession of more or less spicy titbit novelties if any concert program is to interest them. But surely any person normally sensitive to music and not already sated with it must find great masterpieces sustaining and consoling.

Koussevitzky as usual did not conduct according to what passes for the tradition. He was not successful with the introduction and first movement of the Seventh Symphony, which he misconceived as akin to the "Eroica" and Fifth in mood. Elsewhere his interpretations were vivid and deeply moving, though not always according to the directions in the orchestral score about tempi, dynamics, etc.

The introduction to the Seventh Symphony is really majestic: he made it hurried and anxious; the first movement is really a graceful, spirited, flowing poem, not, as he tried to make it, tragic.

In the finale of the Sixth Symphony, on the other hand, Koussevitzky's reading makes the design of the whole movement plain as no other reading has done in years. It is all developed from the little motive in horns and clarinets at the beginning, a fact the beauty of the first lyric episode obscures if the whole movement is not conceived and performed cumulatively. The audience applauded with what seemed genuine enthusiasm at every break in the program.

It is futile to try to describe in words the genius of Bethoven. At least a dozen themes and passages played at this concert are among the most beautiful things in the world. But it is not by "elegant extracts" that great poetry in tones like this really endures in history, actually goes on moving the hearts of men through many generations. Beethoven is greater than Schubert, not because his melodies are any more beautiful, but because his music has design and proportion; because also it was not written with ease and cannot be heard at all by the careless listener.

At least one listener found yesterday's program the most enthralling of any heard in 15 years of Symphony going. For this the credit goes to Beethoven.

P. R.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 18 1925

he Symphony n Tuesday

With Roland Hayes as soloist, the Boson Symphony Orchestra and Serge Kousevitzky will give their third concert of he season here next Tuesday night in nfantry Hall. Mr. Hayes will sing two umbers, "The Repose of the Holy Famly," from Berlioz's oratorio, "The Flight Into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of Perarch's 104th sonnet, with the accompaniment arranged for orchestra by Busoni. He will repeat these songs with the Boston orchestra in New York and Brooklyn. Mr. Hayes will soon complete the Eastern portion of this his second American tour, and will then make his first visit to the Pacific coast. In the spring he returns to Europe to fulfill numerous engagements there.

Mr. Koussevitzky will open his programme with the Concerto for Orchestra in D-major by Carl Philip Emmanuel Bach. His closing and principal number will be Tschaikowski's Fifth Symphony in E-minor. Here is a poetic expression of the effect of Tschaikowski's music by H. G. Dwight, reprinted from the Century:

I have heard music, and I cannot sleep.
I have been in some sad and distant land
Where silent steppes to dim horizons creep
And long, slow rivers wind through choking sand.

I have heard voices sobbing in the dark night.
I have heard waters wailing for away.
I have heard forests trumpet in their might,
And moan together at the break of day.

I have heard voices sobbing in the dark
Because of love and loneliness and pain.
I have heard singing when I seemed to hark
To twilight fields and low skies gray with rain.

I have heard marching and the roll of drums
Across those steppes, within those forests dim;
And I have felt the sudden thrill that comes
Upon the chanting of a mighty hymn.

I have heard music, and I cannot sleep:
My heart shall know nor peace nor pity yet;
For in me whirl, like clouds across a deep,
Things I can neither utter nor forget.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

JAN 18 1925

Snuday Music

With Roland Hayes as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under ~~Serge~~ Koussevitzky, its brilliant new conductor, will make the third visit of the season to Providence for a concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. The principal number on Koussevitzky's program will be the Fifth Symphony in E minor by his countryman, Tchaikovsky. The eloquence of the interpretation of this magnificent score by the new conductor of the orchestra is such as to make it one of the outstanding features of an already very eventful season. Koussevitzky will close the program with this Symphony and open it with Bach's Concerto for Orchestra in D major, re-edited by Maximilian Steinberg.

Roland Hayes will appear with the orchestra in "The Repose of the Holy Family" from Berlioz' oratorio "The Flight into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch, the accompaniment of which has been arranged for lists Roland Hayes prominently on their "Hall of Fame" page. The tribute follows:

"We nominate for the Hall of Fame: Roland Hayes. Because he has been acclaimed throughout Europe and America as a great concert tenor; because he brings to his recitals not merely a lyric voice of great flexibility and beauty, but also a scholarly understanding of music and a gracious and compelling interpretation; because he puts to shame the average vocal artist by a positive mastery of the five languages in which he sings; because his singing of the Negro Spirituals has in it a quality of revelation; because he is just making his second concert tour of America preparatory to his fifth European Tour."

FEODOR CHALIAPIN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MERIDEN,
CONN.
RECORD
JAN 17 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming To Hartford Feb. 1

There is a particular interest locally in the forthcoming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater in Hartford on Sunday afternoon, February 1, under the management of Frank A Sedgwick. This famous orchestra returns to this section after an absence of two years and the occasion will introduce Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra's new conductor and one of the leading celebrities of Europe. The orchestra retains intact the remarkable personnel of last season numbering 104 musicians.

Serge Koussevitsky is called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris, and this is his first visit to America. He is described as a leader of rare charm and forcefulness and as an artist of impassioned convictions. He is the first Russian to lead this famous orchestra.

The demand for seats is very heavy and early application is advisable. The sale is now in progress at Sedgewick and Caseys' music store, 139 Asylum street, Hartford. Mail orders will also be taken. All orders and checks should be made payable and directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, manager.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 17 1925

NEW YORK ACCLAIMS S. KOUSSEVITSKY

New Director of Boston Symphony Cordially Received.

Deems Taylor, musical critic of New York World, wrote the following notice concerning the debut of Serge Koussevitsky with the Boston Symphony [illegible] on the evening

[illegible] not significant. New York was glad to see at last in the flesh the hero of the famous 'Concerts Koussevitsky' of Paris, the arch expounder of Stravinsky and modern music in general, newly come over to take the helm in Boston and New York was wishing him well. But as the evening wore on, Mr. Koussevitsky must have noted a change in the character of the applause, an ever-quickening interest and enthusiasm that culminated in a torrent of handclaps and cheers at the end of the concert. Last night's audience had good reason to applaud and all other lovers of orchestral music may this morning take the President's thanskgiving p lamation unreservedly, if a trifle belatedly, to heart. For the Boston Symphony orchasert is in the hands of a musician of profound insight and extraordinary technical command, one who may cause it to equal, possibly surpass, its former glories."

Arrangements have been concluded by Frank A. Sedgwick for the only local appearance of this famous orchestra for this season. The concert wil be heard in the spacious and beautiful Capitol theater on Sunday afternoon, February 1. The seat sale is now

MIDDLETOWN
CONN.
PRESS
ISSUE OF
JAN 17 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There is a particular interest locally in the forthcoming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Capitol theatre, Hartford, on Sunday afternoon, February 1st, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. This famous orchestra returns to Hartford after an absence of two years and the occasion will introduce Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra's new conductor and one of the leading celebrities of Europe. The orchestra retains intact the remarkable personnel of last season numbering 104 musicians.

Serge Koussevitsky is called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris, and this is his first visit to America. He is described as a leader of rare charm and forcefulness and as an artist of impassioned convictions. He is the first Russian to lead this famous orchestra. His coming to Hartford is easily one of the outstanding musical events of the season.

The demand for seats is very heavy and early application is advisable. The seat sale is now in progress at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, 139 Asylum street, Hartford. Mail orders will also be taken. All orders and checks should be made payable and directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, manager.

PAPER-
DATE- Jan 17

KOUSSEVITZKY CHANGES PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY

The feature of yesterday's Symphony Concert was the daring courage of Serge Koussevitzky in changing his originally announced program to an all Beethoven one. On top of that, he put two symphonies on the program, an almost unheard of innovation. Beethoven's Sixth and Seventh were the Symphonies, and the only other music was that composer's great Overture "Coriolanus."

The performance of the two Symphonies was similarly excellent, both on the part of the conductor and on that of the orchestra. Here he did not stray quite so far from convention, except in the Allegretto of the Seventh.

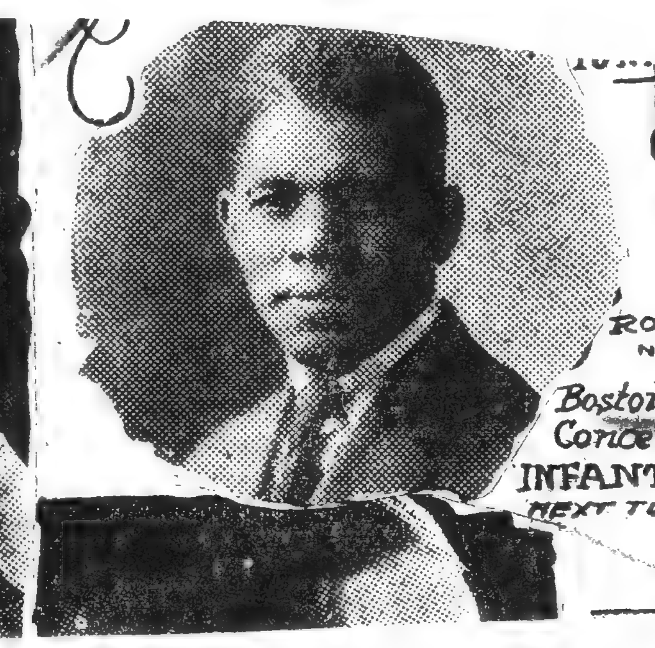
Next week there will be an all-Stravinsky program, with the composer present as assisting artist. It should create quite an uproar.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
JAN 17 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming

Announcement is formally made of a coming visit to Worcester by the Boston symphony orchestra. The date selected for the concert in Mechanics hall is Tuesday evening, Feb. 17. It will be the first appearance in this city of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, who has created a sensation wherever he has been seen. When he took the conductorship of this remarkable organization it was at the height of perfection, made so under the direction of Pierre Monteaux and Koussevitsky has kept the organization up to the same high standard. He has also given some of his own interpretations of the scores.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 17 1925



ROLAND HAYES
NEGRO TENOR with Boston Symphony's
Concert
INFANTRY HALL
NEXT TUES. EVE
JAN 20

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
JAN 17 1925

Koussevitzky and Beethoven

By STUART MASON

THE program of the twelfth Symphony concert, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, consisted of Beethoven's Overture to Collin's tragedy, "Coriolanus," and the same composer's Sixth and Seventh symphonies.

This was not the program as originally announced. Mr. Koussevitzky is a conductor of surprises. Not only does he change his programs at short notice, but his conducting of them is not lacking in that element also. It is worth noticing that the first and most natural thought in connection with the symphony concerts these days concerns Mr. Koussevitzky. Rightly or not, in spite of ourselves, his personality has become all pervading.

Several times he has played the music of Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert or Weber in a manner which was unmistakably original if not always conformable with preconceived ideas or so-called traditions. He has even played such music in a manner which was to say the least whimsical and capricious.

A Greater Koussevitzky

Yesterday's program offered him abundant opportunity for the further display of those qualities which have distinguished him in the past. Yet here Mr. Koussevitzky must have surprised those who were looking forward to more of those often strangely distorted versions of familiar pieces. Yesterday a much greater Koussevitzky was revealed to the public, a Koussevitzky with a broader and nobler conception of Beethoven than was to be observed in the playing of either of the Third or the Fifth symphonies at past concerts.

Yet the performance was not ultra conservative and the impress of the conductor's individuality was not lacking. The music was played in the true romantic style. His conception of it was poetic and imaginative but fancy was duly restrained and never overstepped the bounds of good taste. Proportions were well observed and it is doubtful if a more satisfying interpretation of these two symphonies could be desired by the most fastidious.

Possibly the last movement of the Seventh symphony might have gained in rhythmical incisiveness had it been at a slightly slower pace, but never has it been our good fortune to hear the Sixth played with such a fortunate choice of tempi. This symphony, until yesterday, has always seemed a tiresome work full of needless repetitions, often childish in the character of its themes and in its imitations of the sounds of nature.

Not so yesterday. Mr. Koussevitzky succeeded in bringing out what must have been the original intentions of the composer. By taking the opening allegro and the scene by the brookside at a faster pace than has been customary with his predecessors he brought out the broad lines on which these movements are constructed as no other conductor has done. By playing the music of the tempest in a more subdued manner he suggested the storm to the imagination rather than attempted to paint it graphically, and by broadening the measures of the final hymn of thanksgiving he lent a dignity to these pages which has heretofore been lacking.

Symphony Transformed

The symphony as a whole was transformed. It became under his hands once more a vital music, a music which touched the heart, which set the imagination aglow, a music once more vivid and pulsing with life, a music touched with the genius of the great master who penned its measures.

In like manner was the interpretation of the Seventh symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky did not attempt to read into its measures meanings which were foreign to them. It was a conception of this music which was supremely sane and straightforward, a conception which was satisfying, which left the hearer with the impression that this and no other was the manner in which it should be played.

This was playing which restored faith in Beethoven's music, which made it possible to once more understand its greatness and beauty, its universal appeal. Oftentimes it had seemed faded and worn. After yesterday's performance we know that it is blessed with eternal youth.

Strange to say, Mr. Koussevitzky was unduly restrained in the dramatic Overture to "Coriolanus." Here those theatrical qualities which have served him in many another piece of similar nature were not in evidence. He is truly a man of surprises, of unusual and unexpected ways with music, yet withal capable of touching the heights.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MERIDEN,
CONN.
RECORD
JAN 17 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming To Hartford Feb. 1

There is a particular interest locally in the forthcoming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater in Hartford on Sunday afternoon, February 1, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. This famous orchestra returns to this section after an absence of two years and the occa-

CH'S
Service and Quality

last season numbering 104 musicians.

Serge Koussevitzky is called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris, and this is his first visit to America. He is described as a leader of rare charm and forcefulness and as an artist of impassioned convictions. He is the first Russian to lead this famous orchestra.

The demand for seats is very heavy and early application is advisable. The sale is now in progress at Sedgwick and Caseys' music store, 139 Asylum street, Hartford. Mail orders will also be taken. All

---

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 17 1925

NEW YORK ACCLAIMS S. KOUSSEVITSKY

New Director of Boston Symphony Cordially Received.

Deems Taylor, musical critic of New York World, wrote the following notice concerning the debut of Serge Koussevitsky with the Boston Symphony orchestra in New York on the evening of November 27:

"The applause that greeted Serge Koussevitsky as he came upon the platform at Carnegia Hall last night to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra for the first time in New York was lengthy and cordial, but, naturally, not significant. New York was glad to see at last in the flesh the hero of the famous 'Concerts Koussevitsky' of Paris, the arch expounder of Stravinsky and modern music in general, newly come over to take the helm in Boston and New York was wishing him well. But as the evening wore on, Mr. Koussevitsky must have noted a change in the character of the applause, an ever-quickening interest and enthusiasm that culminated in a torrent of handclaps and cheers at the end of the concert. Last night's audience had good reason to applaud and all other lovers of orchestral music may this mor take the President's thanskgiving p lamation unreservedly, if a trifle belatedly, to heart. For the Boston Symphony orchasert is in the hands of a musician of profound insight and extraordinary technical command, one who may cause it to equal, possibly surpass, its former glories."

Arrangements have been concluded by Frank A. Sedgwick for the only local appearance of this famous orchestra for this season. The concert wil be heard in the spacious and beautiful Capitol theater on Sunday afternoon, February 1. The seat sale is now

---

PAPER-
DATE- Jan 17

BEETHOVEN FILLS SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Koussevitzky's Homage to the Classics

Next week's Symphony program is to be all-Stravinsky, with the composer present and playing the piano part in his new concerto, but Mr Koussevitsky doing the conducting. Perhaps this fact explains why Koussevitsky selected yesterday to do homage to the greatest of the classics for orchestra.

He is holding the balance between ancients and moderns even, and trying to satisfy both those to whom the history of music ended with Brahms and those for whom it began with Debussy and has culminated in Stravinsky. Yesterday's program, for the first time in 15 years, contained no music not of the very greatest. Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, his Sixth, and his Seventh symphony filled the afternoon.

Why anyone should dislike either an all-Bethoven or an all-Stravinsky program is not very plain. Beethoven's greatest masterpieces, such as those heard yesterday, are openly denounced only by the youngest and rashest modernists, whatever any candid 20th century listener may think of the music from "The Ruins of Athens" and other mediocre works from his pen. Stravinsky, if not a great composer, is at least one of the foremost now living. Anybody to whom music is not a dead art should be eager to hear his work often enough and fully enough to be able to decide whether or not it is permanently pleasurable.

Yet there are many who repine over having to hear two Bethoven symphonies in an afternoon. Jaded musical palates, such as those of persons whose profession requires them to hear, to make, or to teach too much music, may require a succession of more or less spicy titbit novelties if any concert program is to interest them. But surely any person normally sensitive to music and not already sated with it must find great masterpieces sustaining and cor to the laundry of Wing Lee at 80 Walnut av, special police officers, headed by Capt William Tappan, tonight searched the premises.

Six ounces of opium and an opium lamp were found, the authorities say. Wing Lee was arrested on a charge of having narcotic drugs in his possession illegally, and will be arraigned in District Court tomorrow morning.

PROF ROBINSON GIVES SONG hurried and anxious; the first movement is really a graceful, spirited, flowing poem, not, as he tried to make it, tragic.

In the finale of the Sixth Symphony, on the other hand, Koussevitzky's reading makes the design of the whole movement plain as no other reading has done in years. It is all developed from the little motive in horns and clarinets at the beginning, a fact the beauty of the first lyric episode obscures if the whole movement is not conceived and performed cumulatively. The audience applauded with what seemed genuine enthusiasm at every break in the program.

It is futile to try to describe in words the genius of Bethoven. At least a dozen themes and passages played at this concert are among the most beautiful things in the world. But it is not by "elegant extracts" that great poetry in tones like this really endures in history, actually goes on moving the hearts of men through many generations. Beethoven is greater than Schu-

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 18 1925

he Symphony n Tuesday

With Roland Hayes as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will give their third concert of the season here next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall. Mr. Hayes will sing two numbers, "The Repose of the Holy Family," from Berlioz's oratorio, "The Flight Into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of Petrarch's 104th sonnet, with the accompaniment arranged for orchestra by Busoni. He will repeat these songs with the Boston orchestra in New York and Brooklyn. Mr. Hayes will soon complete the Eastern portion of this his second American tour, and will then make his first visit to the Pacific coast. In the spring he returns to Europe to fulfill numerous engagements there.

Mr. Koussevitzky will open his programme with the Concerto for Orchestra in D-major by Carl Philip Emmanuel Bach. His closing and principal number will be Tschaikowski's Fifth Symphony in E-minor. Here is a poetic expression of the effect of Tschaikowski's music by H. G. Dwight, reprinted from the Century:

I have heard music, and I cannot sleep.
I have been in some sad and distant land
Where silent steppes to dim horizons creep
And long, slow rivers wind through choking sand.

I have heard voices sobbing in the dark night.
I have heard waters wailing for away.
I have heard forests trumpet in their might,
And moan together at the break of day.

I have heard voices sobbing in the dark
Because of love and loneliness and pain.
I have heard singing when I seemed to hark
To twilight fields and low skies gray with rain.

I have heard marching and the roll of drums
Across those steppes, within those forests dim;
And I have felt the sudden thrill that comes
Upon the chanting of a mighty hymn.

I have heard music, and I cannot sleep.
My heart shall know nor peace nor pity yet;
For in me whirl, like clouds across a deep,
Things I can neither utter nor forget.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
JAN

Snuday Music

With Roland Hayes as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under ~~Serge~~ Koussevitzky, its brilliant new conductor, will make the third visit of the season to Providence for a concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. The principal number on Koussevitzky's program will be the Fifth Symphony in E minor by his countryman, Tchaikovsky. The eloquence of the interpretation of this magnificent score by the new conductor of the orchestra is such as to make it one of the outstanding features of an already very eventful season. Koussevitzky will close the program with this Symphony and open it with Bach's Concerto for Orchestra in D major, re-edited by Maximilian Steinberg.

Roland Hayes will appear with the orchestra in "The Repose of the Holy Family" from Berlioz' oratorio "The Flight into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch, the accompaniment of which has been arranged for orchestra by Busoni. The great tenor is now completing the eastern part of his second American tour which has embraced the principal cities of our eastern and southern States and of Canada. He will shortly go to the Pacific Coast for the first time, and thence in the spring will return to Europe to fulfill numerous engagements there.

Vanity Fair, in the current number, lists Roland Hayes prominently on their "Hall of Fame" page. The tribute follows:

"We nominate for the Hall of Fame: Roland Hayes. Because he has been acclaimed throughout Europe and America as a great concert tenor; because he brings to his recitals not merely a lyric voice of great flexibility and beauty, but also a scholarly understanding of music and a gracious and compelling interpretation; because he puts to shame the average vocal artist by a positive mastery of the five languages in which he sings; because his singing of the Negro Spirituals has in it a quality of revelation; because he is just making his second concert tour of America preparatory to his fifth European Tour"

FEODOR CHALIAPIN.

16

PAPER- Prov. Journal

DATE- Jan 18

Hageman.

* * *

The Symphony on Tuesday

With Roland Hayes as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will give their third concert of the season here next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall. Mr. Hayes will sing two numbers, "The Repose of the Holy Family," from Berlioz's oratorio, "The Flight Into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of Petrarch's 104th sonnet, with the accompaniment arranged for orchestra by Busoni. He will repeat these songs with the Boston orchestra in New York and Brooklyn. Mr. Hayes will soon complete the Eastern portion of this his second American tour, and will then make his first visit to the Pacific coast. In the spring he returns to Europe to fulfill numerous engagements there.

Soloist at the Co at [illegible] Theatre Next Sunday

Mr. Koussevitzky will open his programme with the Concerto for Orchestra in D-major by Carl Philip Emmanuel Bach. His closing and principal number will be Tschaikowski's Fifth Symphony in E-minor. Here is a poetic expression of the effect of Tschaikowski's music by H. G. Dwight, reprinted from the Century:

I have heard music, and I cannot sleep.
  I have been in some sad and distant land
Where silent steppes to dim horizons creep
  And long, slow rivers wind through choking sand.

I have heard voices sobbing in the dark night.
  I have heard waters wailing for away.
I have heard forests trumpet in their might,
  And moan together at the break of day.

I have heard voices sobbing in the dark
  Because of love and loneliness and pain.
I have heard singing when I seemed to hark
  To twilight fields and low skies gray with rain.

I have heard marching and the roll of drums
  Across those steppes, within those forests dim;
And I have felt the sudden thrill that comes
  Upon the chanting of a mighty hymn.

I have heard music, and I cannot sleep.
  My heart shall know nor peace nor pity yet;
For in me whirl, like clouds across a deep,
  Things I can neither utter nor forget.

Roland Hayes

Negro Tenor Reappears Here as Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday.

PAPER- Herald

DATE- Jan 18

STRAVINSKY SOLOIST

Igor Stravinsky will be the guest of honor and piano soloist at the symphony concerts this week. The program will be entirely devoted to his compositions. He will appear as pianist with the orchestra in his new concerto for piano and wind orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky will open the concert with Stravinsky's arrangement of the "Song of the Volga Boatmen," and will also conduct suites from the two ballets, "Petrouchka" and "The Fire Bird."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

JAN 18 1925

NEXT week provides, in addition to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Gounod's Solemn Mass, sung at the Peabody by the combined choirs of the city under the direction of Edmund S. Ender, on Tuesday night; Myra Hess at the Peabody for the Friday afternoon recital, Mabel Garrison on Friday night at the Lyric and on Saturday the season's first children's concert by the Municipal Orchestra.

The new Boston conductor comes widely heralded—in fact, as much discussed as any conductor who has been here for long. He is determined not to shock Baltimore, and has provided for us a program of Bach, Wagner, Rimsky, Moussorgsky and the A Major Symphony of Beethoven, placed over recent protests at the end of the program.

Miss Garrison is to sing under the auspices of the Baltimore committee of the American Institute of Operatic and Allied Arts. The local members of the committee are Miss Elizabeth Ellen Starr, Mrs. John W. Garrett and Harold Randolph. On the local committee are representatives of the Baltimore Opera Society, the Meyerbeer Vocal Ensemble, the Baltimore Music Club, the Treble Clef Club, the Maryland Institute, the Friends of Art, the Peabody Conservatory, the Carol Lynn Dance Studio, the Maryland Federation of Women's Clubs, the Maryland Colonial Dames, the Daughters of the American Revolution and a group of individual patrons of art.

The Institute has as its object "the bringing together for training American operatic talent of all kinds and the furnishing of young singers, instrumentalists, conductors and librettists, and decorative artists and ballet dancers an opportunity for appearing under the best circumstances, and thus to supply high-class opera at reasonable rates to cities throughout the country.

NEW YORK
WORLD

JAN 18 1925

Koussevitzky Programs.

The third pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 29 and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 31.

A feature of the Thursday concert will be the appearance of Roland Hayes as soloist in "The Repose of the Holy Family" from "The Flight into Egypt," by Berlioz, and the 104th Sonnet of Petrach as set by Liszt.

The Thursday program will also include Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto for orchestra in D major, edited by Maximilian Steinberg, and the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky in E minor.

The matinee will also include Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, Op. 6, No. 10, for strings, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 18 1925

Roland Hayes Soloist With Boston Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make their third visit of the season to Brooklyn for a concert to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 30. The soloist of the evening will be Roland Hayes. Serge Koussevitzky has put as the principal number on the program Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor.

The numbers which Roland Hayes will sing are Berlioz's "The Repose of the Holy Family," from "The Flight into Egypt," and the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch as set by Liszt. The program will also include Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto for Orchestra in D major as edited by Maximilian Steinberg.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 18 1925

Roland Hayes

Negro Tenor Reappears Here as Soloist with ~~Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra Next Tuesday.

PAPER- Globe

DATE- Jan 18

"As soon as Stravinsky's 'Le Sacre' became generally accessible and audible it began to be recognized that it was a work of very mixed quality. It was absurd to talk of only the future being able to grasp it; there was nothing in it to puzzle any musician. It was simply the Stravinsky of 'Petrouchka' developing a step further, with all the former Stravinsky's excellencies and limitations. His musical gift is really a rather small one. Left to himself he can invent comparatimely little that is vital, as we can see in the new piano concerto. For his best thematic material he has always been largely dependent upon Russian folksong or popular song, as in 'L'Oiseau de Feu' and 'Petrouchka,' where the best tunes are not his own. His limitations are many. His qualities are few, but remarkable. He has brought a new psychology into music—the psychology of the primitive soul. He has created a texture entirely his own; and we can never weary of admiring the superb certainty of his orchestration."—Ernest Newman, New York Evening Post.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15 Boston Symphony Orchestra, 13th program. Stravinsky program. Mr Koussevitzky will conduct. "Song of the Volga Boatmen," concerto for piano and wind orchestra, suite from the ballet "Petruschka," suite from the ballet "The Firebird." Soloist, Igor Stravinsky.

Stravinsky will play the piano part in his own concerto at this week's Boston Symphony concerts. Mr Koussevitzky will conduct an all-Stravinsky program in honor of the distinguished visitor, who is certainly one of the foremost living composers. In New York Stravinsky himself conducted a concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra, not altogether with success if carping reviewers may be trusted. He is composer, not conductor. Not until last year in Paris did he play the piano in public, and then it was the same piano concerto which Boston is to hear this week.

PAPER- World

DATE- Jan 18

Koussevitzky Programs.

The third pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 29 and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 31.

A feature of the Thursday concert will be the appearance of Roland Hayes as soloist in "The Repose of the Holy Family" from "The Flight into Egypt," by Berlioz, and the 104th Sonnet of Petrach as set by Liszt.

The Thursday program will also include Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto for orchestra in D major, edited by Maximilian Steinberg, and the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky in E minor.

The matinee will also include Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, Op. 6, No. 10, for strings, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

JAN 18 1925

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will make his first appearance in Baltimore on the evening of January 28, when the orchestra, after an absence of several years, will give a concert at the Lyric.

N.Y.
HERALD

JAN 18 1925

Boston Symphony Back Next Week; Local Orchestras

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will make its third New York visit of the season next week, playing at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 29, and Saturday afternoon, January 31. A feature of the Thursday concert will be the appearance of Roland Hayes as soloist in "The Repose of the Holy Family" from Berlioz's "The Flight Into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of Petrarch's 104th sonnet. Other numbers will be Emmanuel Bach's Concerto for orchestra in D major, as edited by Maximilian Steinberg, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

The novelty of the Saturday matinee will be Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," its first performance here in the orchestral arrangement made by Ravel especially for Mr. Koussevitsky. Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, No. 10, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will complete the program.

CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN. 18 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING

The Boston symphony orchestra is to make its annual visit to Worcester Tuesday evening, Feb. 17. It will be the first appearance of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, in this city, and will be an event worth while. While the Boston symphony has had some remarkable conductors there are none who have created quite so much enthusiasm on first appearance as Koussevitsky. Announcements of this engagement will be made in a few days.

PORTLAND,
ME.
~~ADVERTISER~~ Telegram

JAN 18 1925

The following news of Boston's great Symphony Orchestra is interesting: "For the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the season's series of concerts is sold out. The same situation prevails for the double series of concerts in New York. This means for Boston that the orchestra's Friday afternoon and Saturday night programs, like the concerts on Monday evenings, are closed so far as reserved seats are concerned. This condition does not, however, affect 505 rush seats are concerned. This on Friday afternoons, nearly 1,000 enthusiasts brave the elements and patiently wait from early morning until the box-office opens in the hope of gaining entrance to the second balcony.

Long before Mr. Koussevitzky arrived the demand for seats was manifest and the favorable impression made on his first appearance increased the sale. How long his tenure of office exceeds the present season only the powers that be know, and they are not enlightening the general public.

Yet, in spite of the present happy situation, the trustees know that a deficit looms on the horizon. The orchestra is not self-supporting, nor was it ever so. Henry L. Higginson, its founder, repeatedly supplied the wherewithal for the orchestra's perpetuation, and since his death public support, other than the sale of season tickets, is still essential for the orchestra's existence.

Mrs. Mortimer Harris of Loveitts

CINCINNATI,
OHIO
~~TIMES~~ [illegible]

JAN 18 1925

Igor Stravinsky, who is to be guest conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of March 6 and 7, is proving himself exceptionally versatile on his American tour, which began less than two weeks ago in New York. He appeared in the double role of composer and conductor at a concert of the orchestra of the New York Philharmonic Society, for the concert he directed was made up entirely of his own works. He is to appear in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing his own piano concerto. And besides being composer, conductor and piano soloist, he is putting in his spare time making new versions of his works for American mechanical reproducing instruments. He is arranging forty-four of his compositions for this purpose.

17

PAPER- N. Y. Herald-Tribune

DATE- Jan. 18

Boston Symphony Back Next Week; Local Orchestras

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will make its third New York visit of the season next week, playing at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 29, and Saturday afternoon, January 31. A feature of the Thursday concert will be the appearance of Roland Hayes as soloist in "The Repose of the Holy Family" from Berlioz's "The Flight Into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of Petrarch's 104th sonnet. Other numbers will be Emmanuel Bach's Concerto for orchestra in D major, as edited by Maximilian Steinberg, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

The novelty of the Saturday matinee will be Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," its first performance here in the orchestral arrangement made by Ravel especially for Mr. Koussevitzky. Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, No. 10, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will complete the program.

PAPER- [illegible]

DATE- [illegible]

Stravinsky Next Soloist With Symphony

IGOR STRAVINSKY will be guest of honor and piano soloist at the Symphony concerts this week. The program will be entirely devoted to his compositions. He will take part in the performance of his new concerto for piano and wind orchestra. Stravinsky's arrangement of the "Song of the Valga Boatmen" and suites from his "Petrouchka" and "Fire-Bird" ballets will also be conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky.

APPLAUSE "PUTS

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE N Y TIMES

JAN 18 1925

Roland Hayes returns with the Boston Symphony on Jan. 29 in an excerpt from Berlioz's "Flight into Egypt."

BALTIMORE MD. NEWS

JAN 20 1925

BOSTON ORCHESTRA COMING NEXT WEEK

Serge Koussevitzky, the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, recognized as the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris, has in the short while since assuming the leadership of the Boston players, taken a high place for himself in this country. Recognized as the only great orchestral conductor who had not appeared in the United States prior to this season, Koussevitzky has literally stormed the music citadels of the places where he and the wonderful orchestra have appeared this season.

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony will give their only concert of the year in Baltimore a week from next Wednesday night at the Lyric, and the event gives every indication of being one of the outstanding occasions of the musical year.

CONCORD N. H. Monitor

ISSUE OF JAN 19 1925

Negro Singer Made Way from Obscurity To Fame

Roland Hayes, Son of Former Slave, Won High Honors Abroad Despite Handicaps

Roland Hayes, who will sing here Thursday, spent his boyhood in Curryville, Georgia, on the small farm of his mother, an ex-slave. Despite poverty, he managed to educate himself, and attended Fisk University, at Nashville.

When he traveled with the Fisk Jubilee Singers, his voice attracted particular attention and was given a complete training.

The young man gave tentative recitals in Boston and other cities, and meeting with warm encouragement, decdied to try his fortune in Europe.

Arriving in London in 1920, he had scarcely enough money to announce a recital. But immediately the musical attention of England was upon him. He sang 15 more recitals that season to packed London audiences, and was summoned to sing before King George V, in Buckingham Palace.

Then came an invitation from Gabriel Pierne, the noted Parisian conductor, who wanted him to sing with the Colonne Orchestra. This appearance, together with a number of public and salon recitals, set all Paris to talking about the remarkable newly found tenor.

Next Vienna heard him, and incredulity changed to admiration. This city even exceeded the others in praising him with one voice.

Each country judged his diction and command of style in the songs of their language as a model for their own singers. Each city was at a loss to describe his silken, ethereal tones, which were not quite like anything they had ever heard before. And in the Negro Spirituals he laid a strange and wonderful treasury before them.

Then came his return tour of America last season, which put the seal on his greatness. There were overflowing audiences at concert after concert, demonstrations when he appeared with the Boston and Detroit Symphony Orchestra, numberless eulogies, articles in the magazines. No singer in years has had such a reception.

Last spring his debut in Berlin proved another great event in his career.

He was awarded the Spingarn Medal for 1924.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PROVIDENCE, R. I. NEWS

JAN 20 1925

NEGRO TENOR TO TAKE SOLO ROLE

Roland Hayes, negro tenor, will be the soloist tonight at the third Providence concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in ~~Infantry~~ Hall.

A feature of the concert program will be the rendition of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E-minor under Koussevitsky's direction. Tchaikovsky's Symphony was the principal number at the recent Pension Fund concert in Boston, when Serge Koussevitsky was heard in the music of his countrymen.

The concert tonight will open with Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto for orchestra, in D-major, arranged by Maximillian Steinberg. The music in which Roland Hayes will appear with the orchestra is Berlioz's air, "The Repose of the Holy Family," from "The Flight Into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch, the accompaniment orchestrated by Busoni.

HARTFORD, CONN. TIMES

JAN 20 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra to Appear February 1 at Capitol Theater.

When the Boston Symphony orchestra returns to Hartford on Sunday afternoon February 1 after an absence of two years it will be heard under the most favorable circumstances in its long and honorable career. The Capitol theater is the locale and needless to say the best auditorium in the city as to accoustics and comfort, and then again the house is large which permits a scale of prices that is well within the reach of all. This orchestra treat is further enhanced by the first local appearance of Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra's new conductor and the only Russian who has lead the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitsky came to this country at the beginning of the season and his every appearance has called forth the most glowing praise for his masterly and artistic direction. His coming is one of the outstanding musical events of the year. The Boston Symphony concert is positively the only orchestra event of the season. The seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's, 139 Asylum street. The advance sale indicates a sold out house although at this time it is still possible to obtain good seats.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

WORCESTER MASS. POST

JAN 31 192[illegible]

SYMPHONY PLAYS FAMOUS SCHERZO

City to Hear Number That Charmed Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its annual concert at Mechanics Hall in Worcester the evening of Tuesday, Feb. 17. It will be the first appearance in this city of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, who came to this country last fall to assume the baton of the Boston Symphony, after four years at the head of the famous orchestras of Paris and London. He is a Russian, was formerly at the head of his own symphony orchestra, and is one of the greatest musicians in the world.

Koussevitzky has made a most favorable impression with the Boston Symphony, and the critics of Boston and New York have given it the best of their praise. His programs are as original as they are attractive Several novelties have been introduced that are rather new to music lovers of this country.

His Worcester program includes Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor, a composition that is not often played in this country, but under Koussevitzky's baton is made a work to be admired. He will open his program with a Bach Concerto in three movements, and will also play three novelties, one a Berlioz overture, the second a prelude to a Russian opera, and the third the now famous scherze, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from the opera, "Tsar Saltan." This he played in Boston several weeks ago, and it created so much of a sensation that he repeated it, the first time the Boston Symphony has played an encore since its organization, 40 years ago.

The public sale of seats for the concerts opens at Steinert's Monday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PROVIDENCE, R. I. TRIBUNE

JAN 21 1925

Storm Does Not Deter Symphony Audience

Patrons Well Rewarded for Bravery by an Excellent Concert; Roland Hayes, Soloist

A heavy storm and snow-swept streets could not keep a large audience from Infantry Hall last night, where they were well rewarded for their bravery by an excellent concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of M. Serge Koussevitsky, with Roland Hayes the soloist. The following program was given:

Bach, C. P. E., Concerto for orchestra in D major (arranged by Maximilian Steinberg), 1, Allegro moderato, 2, Andante lento moto, 3, Allegro; Berlioz, air, "The Repose of the Holy Family" from "The Flight Into Egypt;" Liszt, 104th Sonnet of Petrarch (accompaniment arranged for orchestra by Busoni), soloist, Roland Hayes; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64, 1, Andante; Allegro con anima, 2, Andante-Cantabile, con alcuna licenza, 3, Valse, Allgero moderato, 4, finale, Andante maestoso; allegro vivace.

When Roland Hayes had finished his two solos, applause that resembled only the trite thunderous called him back and back for bows. What a splendid artist this young colored man is. The simplicity and the quietness of Berlioz's air, "The Repose of the Holy Family," were caught by him in happy manner An air that does not require the width or the range of his voice, with no bravura passages, he made it as effective as though he had used all his faculties. The Liszt arrangement of Petrach's 104th Sonnet, written to Laura, gave Mr. Hayes an opportunity to show the rich quality of his voice as well as his sharp musical intelligence in interpretation. He has paid special attention to his enunciation, and every word came clearly and distinctly. His fine pronunciation of French and Italian shows that he has mastered the details of his art.

The Bach Concerto, composed by the son of the immortal Johann Sebastian and arranged by Maxmillian Steinberg shows all the defects usually associated with any great composer's son. It was totally uninspired and while it had passages of beauty in the whole it was precise and exact and interesting only to students of technique. Its continuity was rudely broken when between the second and third movements the doors were opened to let in the horde of late comers, while M. Koussevitsky leaned wearily against his stand.

The Fifth Symphony of Tchaikowsky's, one of the most beautiful ever written, was ripe material for M. Koussevitsky's art. It is a symphony that has no dull or colorless spots. Its theme, majestic and noble, is transformed into passages of haunting melodies, such as those of the Andante Cantabile. The strength and the sentiment of the symphony are not likely to be forgotten. The terrific ending, with M. Koussevitsky urging his men on to a grand climax, left one with a most pleasant memory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WASHINGTON, D. C. ~~NEWS~~

JAN 21 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tuesday.

The program for next Tuesday in which Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor, will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concert at Poli's Theater at 4:30 p.m. will include Emanuel Bach's "Concerto for Orchestra in D Major," arranged by Maximillian Steinberg, and Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony in A Major," together with Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," and Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals."

Seats are on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, Thirteenth and G streets.

PROVIDENCE, R. I. BULLETIN

JAN 21 1925

ANOTHER FINE CONCERT BY SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Koussevitsky and Virtuosi Score Triumph.

That Boston Symphony patrons pay little heed to weather conditions which might be expected to discourage the average concert-goer was shown last evening when Serge Koussevitsky and his players gave the third concert of their series at Infantry Hall. There were few vacant seats when the concert began and these were soon filled by late comers, who, no doubt, were tardy through difficulties of transportation. After playing a few measures of the second movement of the Bach Concerto for orchestra, Mr. Koussevitsky stopped proceedings until the late contingent found their seats.

It was another splendid concert, another triumph for Koussevitsky and his band of virtuosi. Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor and Maximilian Steinberg's arrangement of the Carl Philip Emanuel Bach concerto were the orchestral numbers. Roland Hayes, tenor, scored a success in his solos.

The programme was arranged as follows:

Bach, C. P. E.............................
.........Concerto for Orchestra in D-major
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg)
Allegro moderato.
Andante lento moto.
Allegro.
Berlioz...............Air, "The Repose of the Holy Family" from "The Flight into Egypt"
Liszt.....104th Sonnet of Petrarch (accompaniment arranged for orchestra by Busoni)
Tschaikowsy ....
.........Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Op. 64
Andante; Allegro con anima.
Andante Cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
Valse; Allegro moderato.
Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.

The formal, unimaginative concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach, even when dressed becomingly by the skilful hands of the modern Steinberg, is interesting rather than impressive. In such a work there is little chance for the temperamental Koussevitsky to reveal qualities that arouse an audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm. Its beauty, or interest resides in the technical skill with which the various parts are woven together. Its uninspired melody and academic flavor were not entirely obscured even by the orchestra's fine playing. The final "Allegro" is most effective.

The music of Tschaikowsky's symphony drew upon the artistic resources of Mr. Koussevitsky and his players and furnished refreshing and inspiring musical entertainment. This symphony, at its first public performance, was not highly regarded by its composer, who thought it "patchy" and lacking in inspiration. In a sense this is true for the two last movements do not equal the strength and imaginative beauty of the magnificent first movement and the following "Andante Cantabile."

The first movement of the symphony is of surpassing grandeur and presents Tschaikowsky at the height of creative genius. Here is music that springs from the heart. It expresses the yearnings, the hopes, the fears, the despair of a nature to which powerful emotion was a natural outlet. To hear it interpreted by Koussevitsky fires the imagination. One may, with intense feeling, search with the Tschaikowsky for some unattainable desired end. The music tells of the striving of the human soul to reach beyond its earthly fetters. It mounts, higher and higher, with fierce endeavor only to fall to earth. One is carried with the tide of music to shores which are found only in the realm of fancy.

The Adante Cantabile" opens with a melody sung by the mellow note of the horn. This portion of the symphony brings rest after the emotional tempests of the preceding movement. The melody persists in various forms throughout the "Andante" appearing in delightful manner in the different instrumental voices. Koussevitsky provides remarkable effects of color and contrast in each movement. His players seem to be a part of himself so perfectly do they respond to every interpretative idea.

Roland Hayes sang two numbers that were nicely contrasted. His lyric quality is well shown in such an aria as that from the Berlioz "The Flight Into Egypt." A double quartet of female voices off stage assisted in the final measures of this number.

The Liszt sonnet, more dramatic in character and not so well fitted to his voice nevertheless showed Mr. Hayes's fine in-

INFORMATION OBSCURED

18

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS

JAN 2 1 1925

HAYES CAPTURES MUSIC AUDIENCE

Large Throng Attends Concert of Boston Symphony Despite Weather

A really great tenor!

This is the tribute paid to Roland Hayes by Providence music lovers.

All the great tenors of the world have visited Providence during the last decade, but none has carved a deeper niche into the city's heart than the talented singer from the Southland.

Last night he appeared in Infantry Hall as the soloist for the Boston Symphoyn Orchestra and was accorded a wonderful reception. The tenor has visited here before, but last night he appeared to be more intimately associated with Providence than on previous visits.

Yes, it was a great evening for music lovers. The Boston organization under the firey and brilliant Serge Koussevitzky was at its best, but first honors must be given to Hayes. We know that the gifted Kousevitsky and his artists are big enough to forego praise today and give first place to the soloist.

Sings Two Numbers

Hayes sang two numbers and while the audience would have been much more pleased with three or four, the tenor proved that he is one of the great singers of the world. It is idle to compare Hayes with any other tenor because such comparison would be absurd and unfair, not only to Hayes, but to other singers of note.

There has been just one Caruso and just one McCormick and ten years from now the music world will say the same thing concerning Hayes. In a word, this unaffected singer from the romantic Southland possesses an individuality that is his own. He has made no effort to draw from other artists and because of that stands out in bold relief against the coterie that has relied on imitation to win a place in the world of music.

Large Attendance

The large attendance was a triumph over inclement weather conditions and a tribute to the attraction. The concert was the third of the Players' series.

Orchestral numbers included Steinberg's arrangement of the Bach concerto. Although the orchestra was perfection itself in the rendition of Bach's work it was the music of Tschaikowsky that drew forth the greatest amount of apprecation.

In this, the artistry of Koussevitsky was paramount. His players responded to his leadership with a fervor that carried the difficult passages to the heights of distinct musical achievement.

Roland Hayes sang an aria from the Berlioz, "The Flight Into Egypt," a double quartet of female voces off stage assisting in the final measures. The Liszt sonnet gave Mr. Hayes unusual opportunity for interpretation.

Both the symphony and the soloist received an ovation at the conclusion of the program.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

JAN 2 1 1925

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES THIRD CONCERT

Roland Hayes, Tenor, Soloist with Famous Boston Organization.

Despite the extremely unfavorable weather conditions, a large audience heard the third concert in the Boston Symphony orchestra series last evening in Infantry Hall, Providence. Director Koussevitsky conducted, and the soloist was Roland Hayes, the young negro singer who is steadily growing in public favor and winning recognition as one of the foremost tenors of the present day.

Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony in E-minor was the principal orchestral number, and this splendid work was beautifully played under the inspiring direction of the leader, himself a Russian and naturally a devoted follower of Tschaikowsky. At the close of the beautiful first movement, played with a splendor that held the audience spellbound, the director and his players received a tremendous ovation, and the applause was repeated at the close of each of the four movements.

The other number for orchestra, Philip Emanuel Rach's concert in D-major, is a less inspiring work, but it was skilfully played, particularly the closing movement.

The two numbers by Mr. Hayes were finely sung, but the Berlioz air, from "The Flight Into Egypt," was probably the most effective as more suited to the singer's voice. In this number he was assisted by a double quartette of female voices off-stage, and the effect, with the orchestra accompaniment was thoroughly pleasing. Mr. Hayes, the orchestra and the director were warmly applauded at the close. The programme of the concert follows:

ach, C. P. E. —.—.—.—.—.
..Concerto for Orchestra in D-major (Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg) llegro moderato.
dante lento moto.
legro.
oz.......Air, "The Repose of the ly Family," from "The Flight into ypt."
.. 104th Sonnet of Petrarch (acpaniment arranged for orchestra Busoni) ikowsky ....
.. Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, 64.
ante: Allegro con anima.
ante Cantabile, con alcuna li-
a.
e: Allegro moderato.
le: Andante maestoso; Allegro
ce.

Newman wrote not long ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 2 2 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

One hundred and four picked musicians under the leadership of one of the world's foremost conductors is the alluring attraction at the Capitol Theater, Sunday afternoon, February 1. For in this popular theater and on this date Frank A. Sedgwick will offer the only symphonic concert of the season and the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra is the medium of expression. Added zest is given this affair as it marks the first local appearance of Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished Russian conductor newly come to America after sensational European appearances. The orchestra has been absent from the list of Hartford musical events for two years and its return has been gleefully hailed by music lovers. The advance seat sale indicates that the largest audience that has ever heard a Boston Symphony concert in this city will be on hand in the Cauitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 1. The seat sale is now in progress at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. Mail orders will be received from patrons unable to attend the sale in person. Early application is advisable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

JAN 2 2 1925

Boston Symphony

The first program Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present in Washington, at Poli's Theater, Tuesday afternoon, January 27, will open with Emanuel Bach's Concerto for Orchestra in D major, arranged by Maximillian Steinberg, and close with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major. The other numbers will be Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival," and Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals."

Remaining seats on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, Droop's, Thirteenth and G streets.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 2 1 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

That Boston Symphony patrons pay little heed to weather conditions which might be expected to discourage the average concert-goer was shown last evening when Serge Koussevitsky and his players gave the third concert of their series at Infantry Hall. There were few vacant seats when the concert began and these were soon filled by late comers, who, no doubt, were tardy through difficulties of transportation. After playing a few measures of the second movement of the Bach Concerto for orchestra, Mr. Koussevitsky stopped proceedings until the late contingent found their seats.

It was another splendid concert, another triumph for Koussevitsky and his band of virtuosi. Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor and Maximilian Steinberg's arrangement of the Carl Philip Emanuel Bach concerto were the orchestral numbers. Roland Hayes, tenor, scored a success in his solos.

The programme was arranged as follows:

Bach, C. P. E.............................
.........Concerto for Orchestra in D-major (Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg).
Allegro moderato.
Andante lento moto.
Allegro.
Berlioz..............Air, "The Repose of the Holy Family" from "The Flight into Egypt"
Liszt.....104th Sonnet of Petrarch (accompaniment arranged for orchestra by Busoni)
Tschaikowsy ....
.........Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Op. 64
Andante; Allegro con anima.
Andante Cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
Valse; Allegro moderato.
Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.

The formal, unimaginative concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach, even when dressed becomingly by the skilful hands of the modern Steinberg, is interesting rather than impressive. In such a work there is little chance for the temperamental Koussevitsky to reveal qualities that arouse an audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm. Its beauty, or interest resides in the technical skill with which the various parts are woven together. Its uninspired melody and academic flavor were not entirely obscured even by the orchestra's fine playing. The final "Allegro" is most effective.

The music of Tschaikowsky's symphony drew upon the artistic resources of Mr. Koussevitsky and his players and furnished refreshing and inspiring musical entertainment. This symphony, at its first public performance, was not highly regarded by its composer, who thought it "patchy" and lacking in inspiration. In a sense this is true for the two last movements do not equal the strength and imaginative beauty of the magnificent first movement and the following "Andante Cantabile."

The first movement of the symphony is of surpassing grandeur and presents Tschaikowsky at the height of creative genius. Here is music that springs from the heart. It expresses the yearnings, the hopes, the fears, the despair of a nature to which powerful emotion was a natural outlet. To hear it interpreted by Koussevitsky fires the imagination. One may, with intense feeling, search with the Tschaikowsky for some unattainable desired end. The music tells of the striving of the human soul to reach beyond its earthly fetters. It mounts, higher and higher, with fierce endeavor only to fall to earth. One is carried with the tide of music to shores which are found only in the realm of fancy.

The Adante Cantabile" opens with a melody sung by the mellow note of the horn. This portion of the symphony brings rest after the emotional tempests of the preceding movement. The melody persists in various forms throughout the "Andante" appearing in delightful manner in the different instrumental voices. Koussevitsky provides remarkable effects of color and contrast in each movement. His players seem to be a part of himself so perfectly do they respond to every interpretative idea.

Roland Hayes sang two numbers that were nicely contrasted. His lyric quality is well shown in such an aria as that from the Berlioz "The Flight Into Egypt." A double quartet of female voices off stage assisted in the final measures of this number.

The Liszt sonnet, more dramatic in character and not so well fitted to his voice nevertheless showed Mr. Hayes's fine interpretive talent. Both he and Mr. Koussevitsky and orchestra were the recipients of tumultous applause.

A. F. P.

CLIPPING FROM

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JAN 2 2 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The program is announced in which Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be first heard in Washington when this orchestra visits this city for a concert at Polis theater Tuesday afternoon, January 27.

The program will open with Emanuel Bach's "Concerto for Orchestra" in D major, arranged by Maximillian Steinberg, and close with Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" in A major. The other numbers will be Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," and Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals."

PAPER- Prov Journal

DATE- Jan 2

BOSTON SYMPHONY

That Boston Symphony patrons pay little heed to weather conditions which might be expected to discourage the average concert-goer was shown last evening when Serge Koussevitsky and his players gave the third concert of their series at Infantry Hall. There were few vacant seats when the concert began and these were soon filled by late comers, who, no doubt, were tardy through difficulties of transportation. After playing a few measures of the second movement of the Bach Concerto for orchestra, Mr. Koussevitsky stopped proceedings until the late contingent found their seats.

It was another splendid concert, another triumph for Koussevitsky and his band of virtuosi. Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor and Maximilian Steinberg's arrangement of the Carl Philip Emanuel Bach concerto were the orchestral numbers. Roland Hayes, tenor, scored a success in his solos.

The programme was arranged as follows:

Bach, C. P. E.............................
.........Concerto for Orchestra in D-major
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg)
Allegro moderato.
Andante lento moto.
Allegro.
Berlioz..............Air, "The Repose of the Holy Family" from "The Flight into Egypt"
Liszt.....104th Sonnet of Petrarch (accompaniment arranged for orchestra by Busoni) Tschaikowsky ....
.........Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Op. 64
Andante; Allegro con anima.
Andante Cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
Valse; Allegro moderato.
Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.

The formal, unimaginative concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach, even when dressed becomingly by the skilful hands of the modern Steinberg, is interesting rather than impressive. In such a work there is little chance for the temperamental Koussevitsky to reveal qualities that arouse an audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm. Its beauty, or interest resides in the technical skill with which the various parts are woven together. Its uninspired melody and academic flavor were not entirely obscured even by the orchestra's fine playing. The final "Allegro" is most effective.

The music of Tschaikowsky's symphony drew upon the artistic resources of Mr. Koussevitsky and his players and furnished refreshing and inspiring musical entertainment. This symphony, at its first public performance, was not highly regarded by its composer, who thought it "patchy" and lacking in inspiration. In a sense this is true for the two last movements do not equal the strength and imaginative beauty of the magnificent first movement and the following "Andante Cantabile."

The first movement of the symphony is of surpassing grandeur and presents Tschaikowsky at the height of creative genius. Here is music that springs from the heart. It expresses the yearnings, the hopes, the fears, the despair of a nature to which powerful emotion was a natural outlet. To hear it interpreted by Koussevitsky fires the imagination. One may, with intense feeling, search with the Tschaikowsky for some unattainable desired end. The music tells of the striving of the human soul to reach beyond its earthly fetters. It mounts, higher and higher, with fierce endeavor only to fall to earth. One is carried with the tide of music to shores which are found only in the realm of fancy.

The Adante Cantabile" opens with a melody sung by the mellow note of the horn. This portion of the symphony brings rest after the emotional tempests of the preceding movement. The melody persists in various forms throughout the "Andante" appearing in delightful manner in the different instrumental voices. Koussevitsky provides remarkable effects of color and contrast in each movement. His players seem to be a part of himself so perfectly do they respond to every interpretative idea.

Roland Hayes sang two numbers that were nicely contrasted. His lyric quality is well shown in such an aria as that from the Berlioz "The Flight Into Egypt." A double quartet of female voices off stage assisted in the final measures of this number.

The Liszt sonnet, more dramatic in character and not so well fitted to his voice nevertheless showed Mr. Hayes's fine interpretive talent. Both he and Mr. Koussevitsky and orchestra were the recipients of tumultous applause.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

CINCINNATTI, OHIO
BILLBOARD

JAN2 4 1925

Washington To Hear Boston Smphony Orchestra

Under the leadership of the new director, Sergei Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give one concert in Washington, D. C., this season. This has been announced for Tuesday afternoon, January 27, at Poli's Theater, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

JAN 2 3 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMES HERE MARCH 25

Will Come to City Hall Under Music Commission Auspices

Pre-eminent among the musical events of the Winter will be the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Portland March 25 for a concert at City Hall under the auspices of the Music Commission.

Only in the days of Dr. Muck, so the critics say, did the Boston Symphony have such a leader as Serge Koussevitsky, the dynamic new wielder of the baton, The reputation of the conductor and orchestra have mounted with each succeeding concert of the Winter, and those who have not heard the orchestra with Koussevitsky have a stimulating experience in store for them when he comes to Portland.

Koussevitsky is an interesting figure on the platform. He had an air of complete confidence, ease and quiet command. There is distinction in his bearing. His graying hair, his very mobile features, the sparkling eye and sensitive hands carry out the effect. He often conducts without score, and usually with but the scantest attention to the score when it is before him. His gestures are conspicuously expressive but not superfluous.

His magnetism is remarkable. No audience can fail to be interested in him. Under his leadership Portland will see such a Boston Symphony as it has not heard for several seasons. It is again the peer among orchestras, and its coming to Portland is an event of superlative importance, that should insure the old time Standing Room Only audience which was wont to greet the Boston Symphony at City Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 24 1925

rendered.

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchest 104 pieces, conceded to be the be symphony organization in this cou try, is to give its annual concert Worcester on the evening of Tue day, Feb. 17, in Mechanic hall. will be the first opportunity Worce ter patrons will have to see the n conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, w has created so much of a sensati wherever he has appeared with t orchestra since his arrival in th country. A perfect band when t new conductor assumed the bato the high standard of the organizati has been maintained under his lea ership, and Koussevitzky today the talk of the musical world. fact, he is unique and Boston much in love with him. He has iginality and ideas of his own whi he does not hesitate to express. Th was shown in Boston at one of t recent symphony concerts, when played the Rimsky-Korsakoff, "T Flight of the Bumble Bee," a sche zo from the opera, "Tsar Salta where it made such an impressi on the audience that he repeated for an encore. The encore was d manded and granted for the fir time since the first beginning of the orchestra 40 years ago. Boston was quite stirred up about that for a time, but the patrons have settled down to the belief that Koussevitzky will give an encore when he thinks it is really wanted. This selection is one of the numbers of the Worcester program, and if an encore is demanded it will be given.

Subscriptions for seats may be made at the Boston office, Symphony hall, until the public sale opens, which will be Feb. 2 at Steinert's.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

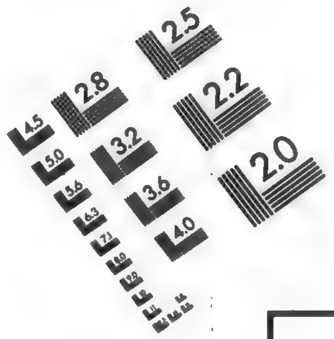
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. LEDGER

JAN 2 4 1925

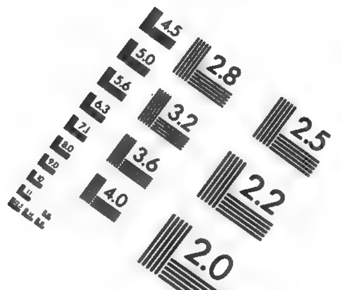
The first concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in four years will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening before members of the Philadelphia Forum. Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, has selected a program consisting of Bach's Concerto for Orchestra in D major, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival," two Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

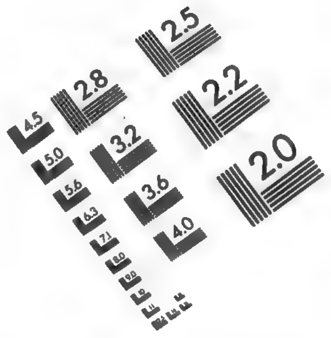
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



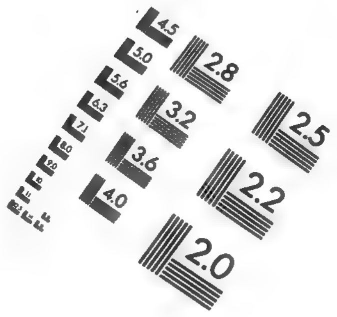
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
3.2
2.0
5.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0



4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
3.2
2.0
5.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0

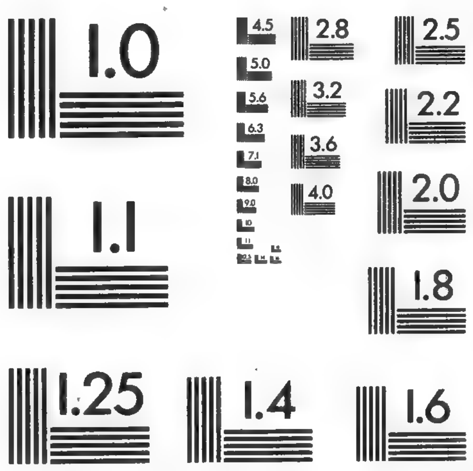


4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
5.6
3.2
2.2
6.3
3.6
7.1
8.0
4.0
2.0
9.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

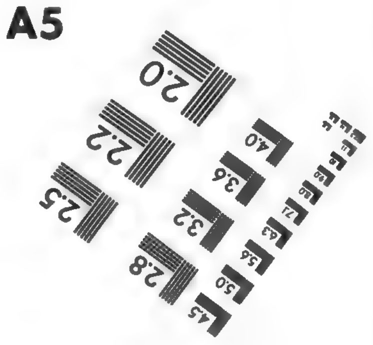
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

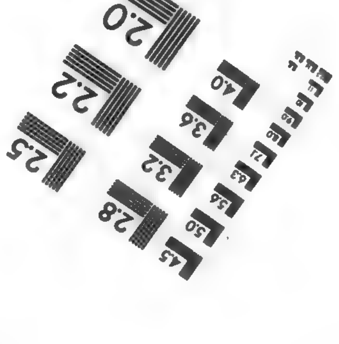


2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
4.5

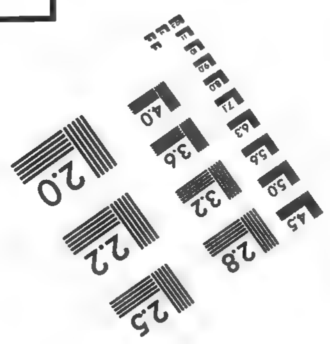
4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
2.2
4.5
2.8
2.5

A4

A3



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5



4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
2.2
4.5
2.8
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

PAPER- Transcript
DATE- Jan 24

BOSTON EVENING T

Stravinsky

DAY OF STRAVINSKY, WELL-GRACED GUEST AT SYMPHONY HALL

AFTERNOON OF THE MAN AND HIS MUSIC

Modest Composer, Alert and Also Taut-Strung—A Program That Might Better Have Represented Him—Fragments of "The Fire-Bird" and Fragments of "Petrushka"—Leap to the Piano-Concerto of 1924, Sinewy, Singular, Austere, Imperious

DISTINCTLY, Mr. Igor Stravinsky is not a composer on view. He is visiting the United States for the first time. He is the most illustrious figure in the music-making of our day. Yesterday afternoon he was guest at the Symphony Concert. The orchestra played his music only. He himself shared in the first performance in America of his Concerto for Piano, Wind Orchestra, Drums and Double-Basses. The audience left not a seat empty and bestowed upon him as much applause as it is wont to give to any but resident composers proffering a new piece. Mr. Stravinsky, in person, might have answered the clapping after his arrangement of "The Song of the Volga Boatmen"; the folk-dances from his ballet, "Petrushka"; the numbers joined in suite from his ballet of "The Fire-Bird." He might even have appeared at the end of the concert —in final apotheosis.

As it was, Mr. Stravinsky came upon the stage only when it was time to begin the Concerto; walked quickly to the piano-stool; bowed to the welcoming plaudits as briefly as might be; waited alertly for the conductor to signal his entrance into the ensemble. At the pauses in the piece, he was cursory and business-like in thanks for applause. He turned swiftly on his heel; jerked a low bow as quickly at the audience; was in his place again. The Concerto completed, his first care was to shake Mr. Koussevitzky's hands and wave smiling thanks to a deserving orchestra. As briefly as might be, a bow or two, a hand laid upon his heart, were acknowledgement to the clapping crowd. Though the applause diminished, Mr. Stravinsky returned once and twice; but it swelled again when he pulled Mr. Koussevitzky to his side. Thereupon the most eminent living composer, save only Richard Strauss, withdrew from the public eye of Boston—to return to it this evening for final welcome and final farewell. Thereafter, we others may only know, with the dear old program-book, that he is "now in the United States."

The advent of Mr. Stravinsky on the platform of Symphony Hall more gratified than impressed many curiosities. He is not tall; he is slight; he moves quickly, tautly, almost spinning upon his heels when he turns; strung tense in every needed muscle when he plays upon the piano; springing forward, even bouncing upward, in his energy with certain measures. The contours of his face, especially in the high cheek-bones, are distinctly Slav, possibly with Tartar admixture generations ago. Under a high forehead with thin dark hair brushed smoothly back, dark eyes shine brightly. His countenance suggests a wiry and alert spirit within. His every movement is that of a man of precision. He bears himself as one accustomed to the world within and without the concert-hall, and he employs an excellent tailor. Yesterday in fact his jacket, trousers and tie, as austere as they were well-cut and worn, belied—and disappointed—many an expectation. Where were the flaming ties, the sparkling rings, the "pullovers" like unto Joseph's coat with which anecdote had arrayed Mr. Stravinsky? The rehearsal-room, however, is not the concert-hall. Yet what shall it profit a composer as sign and wonder to an audience, "prepared for anything," if he resemble nothing so much as a Russian well established in business or profession, say in London? Seemingly fate predestined Mr. Stravinsky to be a stumbling-block to man—and woman—kind. Much of his music vexes many an ear. Yesterday, his aspect and bearing disappointed many an eye.

As arranged by Mr. Koussevitzky and others in authority, the concert was hardly representative of that music. It began with an occasional piece, brief, bald, summary, written to oblige Monsieur Diaghylev in 1917. It continued with assorted folk-scenes and dances from "Petrushka," relatively early ballet. Thence it switched to the Piano-Concerto, music less than a year old; only to race back to Mr. Stravinsky's beginnings in the theater with "The Fire-Bird." Obviously a seventh and an eighth performance, within a year, of "The Rite of Spring" was out of the question. For other concerts, Mr. Koussevitzky chose to reserve "The Song of the Nightingale"—Stravinsky in not a few respects at acme—piece, besides, that we Bostonians might well have heard from Mr. Monteux last year. "The Symphonies" in memory of Debussy and the Octet for Wind Choir were banished as too controversial. From Mr. Stravinsky's latest period—as the lecturers call it—the audience heard only the Piano-Concerto, since as guest, the composer must somewhere be in visual evidence; preferably not upon the conductor's stand. Besides, as the high-placed obligingly explained, "it was desirable to have everything pleasant," just as when Rotarians meet. Hence no "Symphonies," no Octet, not even a Chinese Nightingale singing out of fairy-book. In sum, an afternoon oftener recalling the past than recording the present of Mr. Stravinsky.

Played in the Suite for large orchestra first assembled by the composer, the music to "The Fire-Bird" still entices and enchants. Already Mr. Stravinsky is master of both the graces and the forces of rhythm. In the magic garden, the captive Princesses wind through their wistful round; toss lightly as leaves astir in the sunshine, the apples of gold and the apples of silver. Nausicaa and her maidens at ball upon Homeric strand make no lovelier picture. Or the train of The Ogre sprawls out of his castle, stamps, prances, cavorts under a spell stronger than his. At opposite poles are the two episodes. Yet in either the illusion of the rhythm is complete; while the substance and the surface of the music do but swell this suggestion.

Equally is Mr. Stravinsky master of a music that in line, modulation and progress shall translate motion into tones. Measures gleam with The Fire-Bird as she flits radiantly about the garden. Measures flutter with her when from the captor Prince she entreats her shining freedom. Again Mr. Stravinsky translates an illusion to the eye into an illusion for the ear; while through both, it penetrates and possesses the imagination: Harmonic and instrumental color flow richly from his palette. The music of the Princesses not only pulses gently. As gently it also glows. The music of the Introduction is as an iridescent curtain, slowly rising upon a magical scene. Colors grotesque, mingled and parted in the flash of a moment, splash The Ogre's troop. Already a Stravinsky achieving beauty, fantasy, illusion; full panoplied to go forward.

From the Suite out of "Petrushka" conductor and composer had wisely excised the pages that would unfold the dramatic narrative unaccompanied by action on the stage. For no such end (were it possible) did Mr. Stravinsky write his music. Rather, through it, the mimed fable and the charactered puppets should all coalesce into one body and a single illusion. Of such pages there remained—as it seemed by way of sample—only those that first disclose Petrushka himself—twitching and teetering, pitty-patting and grimacing, comic, piteous, most human of puppets. With a hint of him at the back of the listener's head, here was music as graphic in suggestion as it was precise, adroit, inventive with every delineating means.

All else in the Suite as played yesterday, was folk-scene and folk-dance in the tumult of the street-fair. The three puppets danced à la Russe; but still more with the rigid, angular, clicking motion of automata; the trader played upon his accordeon; the bear lumbered in and lumbered out. The nurses, the grooms, the coachmen, the other carnival-folk, danced by group, danced also in ensemble. Therewith entered a Stravinsky not as the Stravinsky of "The Fire-Bird"—a composer capable of a harsh, strident, streaming counterpoint, as when all the dances together whirled; disposed also to hammering, plunging, rough-edged, heavy-footed or curiously twitching rhythms; prone to harmonic and instrumental color acrid, rough-coated, pungent.

From these pages in "Petrushka" of 1911, the transition to the Piano-Concerto of 1924 seemed less abrupt than the span of the years and the new ways of the composer might imply. Indeed, the arrangement of "The Bargemen's Song" might plausibly be stepping-stone along the course. For here is Mr. Stravinsky waiving out of his orchestra the sensuous strings many-timbred. Here also is he writing bare, gaunt, middle-grayish measures that move heavily in square-cut masses of tone. True, the folk-words and the folk-tune of The Bargemen invite such music. They toiled under skies oftenest wintry-gray; they tugged at heavy burdens; slow was their progress; gaunt their thoughts; somber their spirits. Even so, Mr. Stravinsky would hardly have denied his transcription every decorative, every amplifying period, unless he were then inclining to the severities, austerities and rigors of composition in music.

Not that the Concerto for Piano and a stringless orchestra, save only the double-basses, exemplifies these devotions and no other. It is true, however, that the songful choir is once more discarded; that the decorative instruments, like the harps, and over the way the percussion-group, are absent with leave; that the orchestral background now and again moves heavily, darkly, rough-hewn. Moreover, from end to end of the Concerto, Mr. Stravinsky has flouted the siren of color. The band, less than thirty strong, in crescent around the piano, does not enrich and enamel patterns. It shapes, weaves, and on occasion, reticently tints them. Adroit euphonies, embellishing arabesques, the familiar jewelry of instrumentation go by the board. The harmonies are the outgrowth, bare and inescapable, of the counterpoint. They set in thin backgrounds; deploy little light and shade; carry scant imagery or suggestion.

For the graces as well as the gewgaws of music seem the last of Mr. Stravinsky's preoccupations in the designing and the accomplishing of this Concerto. He is writing music by mental process to achieve mental satisfactions. Piano and orchestra are weaving and interweaving patterns in tones; mating and unmating them; setting them in various sorts of motion; shifting them to this relative position and that. Yet while the Stravinskian mind is willing, the Stravinskian flesh—or rather the Stravinskian spirit—is sometimes weak. At three-and-forty, even after the "Symphonies" and the "Octet" a composer may not altogether alter his self-expression. Mr. Stravinsky remains in the Concerto a master of incisive rhythms; too prone, indeed, is he to keep them a-hammering. He renews and enlarges his command of counterpoint—of that penetrating counterpoint in which long melodic lines stream harshly along their way, cutting and channelling the music. Color he can forswear; but by no means melody. It repossesses him in the slow movement; pervades the pages: rises into a grave passion, an austere beauty that leave neither mind nor heart (by Mr. Stravinsky's leave) untouched. In degree melody recurs elsewhere, albeit the composer wears a certain self-conscious, not to say guilty air. After all, the most stripped and "mental" of music may not be all fugati, cadenzas and metrical patterns. There are human limits—for composer as well as hearers.

More: not for nothing has Mr. Stravinsky considered, experimented and assimilated in the syncopation and jazz of this our happy day. They have entered his musical system, so to say. They are there to stay, except as by usage he may gradually eliminate them. Consciously or sub-consciously he often makes them his substitute in this music for color the despised. Imagine a Concerto in long stretches of contrapuntal pattern, say of the eighteenth century. Imagine it relieved and diversified at decent intervals by bare and austere melody; once ennobled by grave and lofty song. Imagine it, finally, jazzed as in premonition; jazzed not gayly, but severely; out of the resolute mind rather than the impulse irresistible. Imagine these processes simultaneously or in succession, sinewy, vigorous and rigorous to the end. And the outcome will be very like the Piano-Concerto of Igor Stravinsky. H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 2 4 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY REVIVES CLASSICS

Koussevitsky Reveals Manifold Qualities in Program.

A program which should reveal to particular advantage the manifold qualities of its new leader is to be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky at the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, February 1, at 3. The principal number on the program will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. The truly magnificent and deeply moving interpretation of this great score by Koussevitzky on the occasion of a Pension Fund concert in Boston last December proved an outstanding event in the very remarkable symphony season.

Koussevitzky will begin the concert with a Conecrto for Orchestra in D major, for string orchestra, by Philip Emanuel Bach, the most talented son of J. S. Bach., The score was edited by Maximilian Steinberg. The reading reveals Koussevitzky's peculiar power of revivifying the so-called classics. Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture is chosen from the program of Koussevitzky's American debut last October. Two Russian numbers of particular charm are also to be played, the prelude to "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky, and "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a Scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." These pieces have been introduced to the public by the Russian leader.

The seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. Mail orders will be accepted from out-of-town patrons and those unable to attend the sale in person.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

JAN 2 4 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky will make its first appearance in several years at a concert for the members of the Philadelphia Forum, at the Academy of Music next Monday evening. Beethoven's seventh symphony will be a feature of the program.

violoncellist.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF

JAN 2 4 1925

ight Orchestral Concerts.

There will be no fewer than eight orchestral concerts next week. Sergei Koussevitzky comes to Carnegie Hall with the Boston Orchestra on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Roland Hayes, tenor, will be the soloist at the first concert and the orchestral numbers will include a concerto by Philip Emmanuel Bach, Maurice Ravel's arrangement of Debussy's harp pieces, "Sarabande" and "Danse," and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. On Saturday there will be a Handel concerto grosso for strings, Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition" and oven's Seventh Symphony.

Orchestra plays

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

JAN 2 4 19

Vigor in "Welcome Strange

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra is to give its annual concert in Worcester Tuesday evening, Feb. 17. A subscribers' notice has been sent out and mail orders will be received for a time for seats at the Boston office, Symphony hall. The public sale will be opened at Steinert's Monday, Feb. 2. Worcester music lovers will have their first opportunity to see Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor, who assumed the baton with the beginning of the present season. He has made a most favorable impression on the music people of this country, and has received the most glowing tributes from the New York and Boston critics.

At the Worcester concert two excerpts from the music of Russia, virtually unknown to the Western world, will be included in the program, the prelude to the opera, "Khovantchin," by Moussorgsky, and "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a little scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakoff's fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." This is the selection which created the sensation among musical people in Boston a few weeks ago. There was a demand for an encore and it was given by Koussevitzky. This is the first time the orchestra has played an encore in a symphony program since its organization 40 years ago. The feature symphony of the program is Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, in E. minor, in four movements.

Post Jan 24

1925

STRAVINSKY CAPTIVATES AT CONCERT

Composer Appears as Soloist With Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The world moves swiftly these days. Only last spring Igor Stravinsky, composer of the fearful and formidable "Rite of Spring" that then set musical Boston by the ears, seemed an almost fabulous being.

Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, at the Symphony Concert, there was Igor Stravinsky in the flesh, an affable-seeming little man who bowed deeply, rapidly and repeatedly in response to the applause that greeted his entrance, bowed again between the movements of his Concerto, in which he was the solo pianist, and at the end extended both hands to Mr. Koussevitzky with a frank friendliness altogether captivating.

BELIED BY APPEARANCE

Not from any outward appearance might this be the man from whom has come such devastating music. Yet Igor Stravinsky it was. And who, having seen the composer, can ever again shudder at his music? The notion is fantastical.

There is in Mr. Stravinsky's aspect and manner, in his extraordinarily rapid, almost mechanical motions, in his slight body and his eyes that seem just to have left off peering in a microscope, more to suggest the entomologist than the musician. That he is all intellect, an enormously developed mental machine, seems the most obvious conclusion. Nor did the wholly circumspect and conventional attire of yesterday—a far cry from the orange of shirt and muffler that has received so much publicity—tend to add color to his presence and personality.

Looks Like Scientist

To be sure, the sight of Mr. Stravinsky face to face modifies, if it does not wholly belie, these first impressions. But as yesterday's audience saw him upon the stage, surrounded by the orchestra, he was a somewhat exceptional figure as composer.

We have seen here in Boston d'Indy, Rachmaninoff and Richard Strauss—eminent composers all, and men of imposing presence, each one suggesting in his physical self and his demeanor the temper of his music.

And now comes Igor Stravinsky, maker of the musical bombshells of the century—looking like a kind and impersonal scientist. No more does he fit the popular or romantic conception of a great composer than he bears out the picture of the bizarre and wild-eyed anarchist who would bring about a reign of musical terror.

Contrast and Variety

Appropriately, Mr. Koussevitzky devoted to the music of Stravinsky the whole of yesterday's concert, and so well contrasted were the four pieces which made the programme that there was no hint of the lack of contrast and variety that some may have feared in an all-Stravinsky afternoon.

For wholly innocuous beginning came the composer's masterly arrangement for wind-orchestra of the familiar Song of the Volga Bargemen, a piece that Mr. Koussevitzky did not hesitate to perform at one of the Young People's Concerts. To this pleasant prelude, then succeeded the Suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," enormously clever, colorful, vividly descriptive and audacious music of its composer's 29th year, foreshadowing here and there the far bolder "Rite of Spring." Apart from the action it was designed to accompany, the music of "Petrouchka" necessarily loses a little, both in suggestiveness and in significance. Yet it is singularly stimulating to hear and, what is more, it is music of genius.

Returned to Bach

But the new Piano Concerto, which yesterday followed "Petrouchka," is a bird of a different feather. Art, so Vincent d'Indy tells us, moves, not in a circle but in a spiral, ever and anon repeating itself in certain phases, but at a higher elevation. In such wise has Stravinsky, the arch-modern, become a classicist; he has returned to Bach, and this Concerto is his confession of faith.

Some, of course, will deny the applicability in this instance of M. d'Indy's metaphor, or at the least they will hold that the spiral has been one of descent. For this Concerto is sure to have its detractors.

Grips by Its Vigor

To the sympathetic listener, however, Stravinsky seems here successfully to have blown new notes on an old horn. To a Bachian polyphony, to a Bachian abstractness and, in the second movement, to a Bachian elevation of mood, he has added modern harmony and rhythm, even the rhythm of jazz, and, in the skilful accompaniment for wind-instruments and percussion, modern instrumental resource as well. Moreover, this music grips, holds and enthralls by reason of its sheer intellectual vigor, its sinewy strength.

As pianist Mr. Stravinsky proved a fluent technician, a master of his own exceedingly intricate rhythms, and one relatively indifferent to tonal color as such. But whether it was for him, for his piece, or for his playing of it, the applause was such as to bring him back to the stage time and again—and then yet again.

Of Charm and Fancy

Finally, with commendable tact, since for some listeners the Concerto was bound to prove strong medicine, Mr. Koussevitzky's tact placed at the end of his programme five movements of the Suite drawn from the ballet that, in the order of composition, preceded "Petrouchka," the enchanting "Fire-Bird." Music of rare grace and charm, of romantic fancy, music rightly and imaginatively scored and, in the final Infernal Dance, music of excitement as well, this suite could not fail to please the most timid, the most exacting or the most conservative listener.

19

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF

JAN 2 4 192

Eight Orchestral Concerts.

There will be no fewer than eight orchestral concerts next week. Sergei Koussevitzky comes to Carnegie Hall with the Boston Orchestra on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Roland Hayes, tenor, will be the soloist at the first concert and the orchestral numbers will include a concerto by Philip Emmanuel Bach, Maurice Ravel's arrangement of Debussy's harp pieces, "Sarabande" and "Danse," and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. On Saturday there will be a Handel concerto grosso for strings, Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The Philharmonic Orchestra plays to-morrow, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday in Carnegie Hall. Wilhelm Furtwaengler conducts Sunday and at a special concert on Friday, his first programme consisting of Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. The second programme consists of the third "Leonore" overture of Beethoven, Strauss's "Tod and Verklaerung" and Beethoven's C minor symphony.

Willem van Hoogstraten conducts the other concerts—one of the students' series on Wednesday, featuring the Beethoven Fifth Symphony and the Tchaikovsky B flat minor concerto with his wife, Elly Ney, as soloist; and a regular concert on Saturday evening featuring Brahms's Fourth Symphony and the Schumann piano concerto with Myra Hess as soloist.

Before undertaking a Winter tour extending to Cuba, the New York Symphony Orchestra to-morrow afternoon in Aeolian Hall will play Ralph Vaughn-Williams's "London" symphony, Mozart's "Les petits riens" and the "Turkish March" from his piano sonata, and Sergei Rachmaninoff's D minor piano concerto with Alfred Cortot as soloist.

The State Symphony Orchestra plays on Tuesday afternoon in Carnegie Hall a Brahms-Tchaikovsky programme, with Percy Grainger as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
EVENING SUN

JAN 2 4 1925

The third pair of concerts by t Boston Symphony Orchestra will ta place in Carnegie Hall next Thursd evening and Saturday afternoo Koussevitzky, conductor. A featu of the Thursday concert will be t appearance of Roland Hayes as sol ist in Berlioz's "The Repose of t Holy Family" from "The Flight Int Egypt," and the 104th Sonnet trarch as set by Liszt. A feature of the matinee will be Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," in the orchestral arrangement which Ravel made especially for the conductor and which was given its first performance by him in Europe last spring. The Thursday program will also include Philip Emanuel Bach's concerto f orchestra in D, edited by Maximilia Steinberg, and the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikovsky in E minor. The matinee will also include Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor fo strings, opus 6. No. 10, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

CINCINNATTI, OHIO
BILLBOARD

JAN 2 4

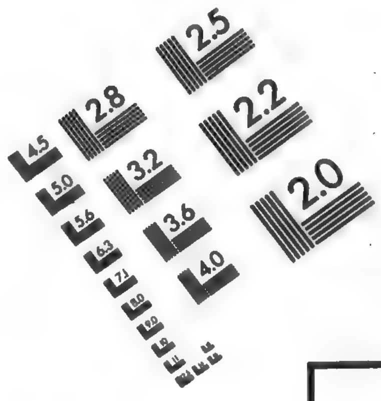
Paul Kochanski will appear as soloi with the New York Symphony Orchest in Havana on February 2, with the Bo ton Symphony Orchestra in Providence o February 24 and in Cambridge on Feb ruary 26.

REDUCTION

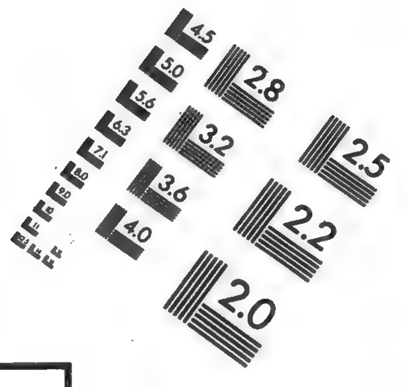
RATIO

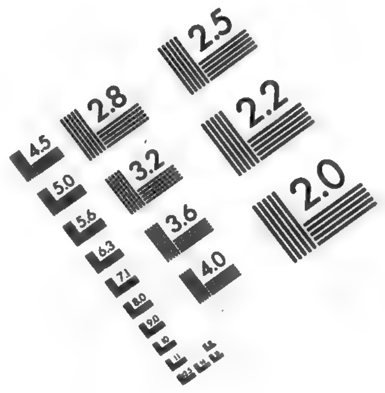
12x

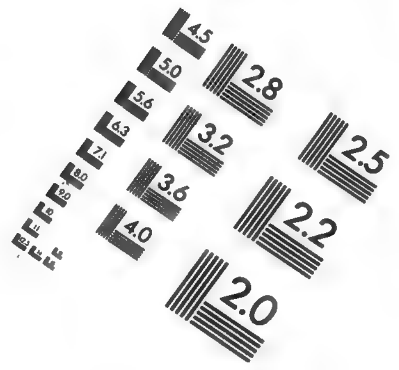
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0



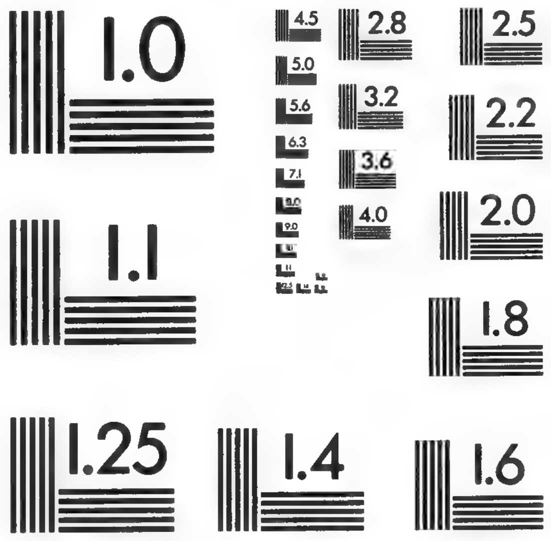




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0
1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

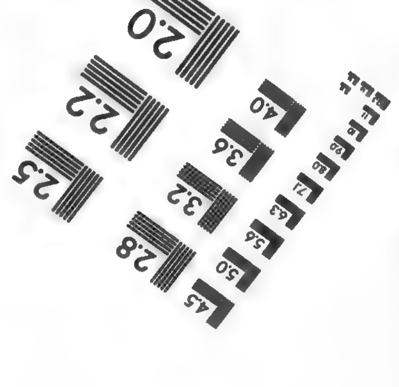
1.0 mm

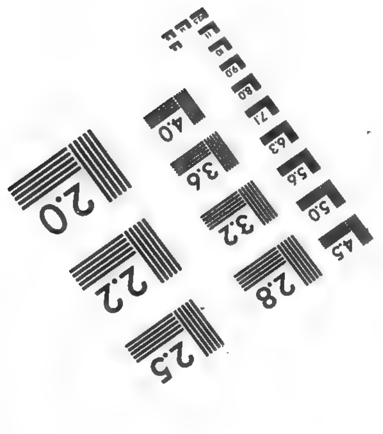
1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

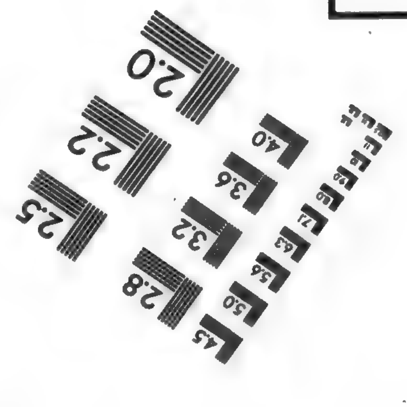
A5





A4

A3



PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

20

PAPER- Globe

DATE- Jan 24

STRAVINSKY FILLS SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Composer Plays Piano in His New Concerto

Igor Stravinsky, the Russian composer whose music has been vehemently discussed in musical circles here, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. He played the piano part in his new concerto for piano and wind instruments, which was performed for the first time in America. His setting of the Russian popular tune, known to American audiences as "Song of the Volga Boatmen," and suites from his ballets "Petruschka" and "The Firebird," filled the rest of the program. Mr Koussevitsky conducted. The audience applauded with more cordiality than is usual in the case of modernist music. After "Petruschka," the orchestra stood in acknowledgment. Mr Stravinsky was recalled many times after the concerto.

Stravinsky is a little man, obviously shy, nervous at appearing before an audience, completely absorbed in his music while he is playing and unhappy afterward as long as he is compelled to undergo the scrutiny of 2800 spectators. He has not a bit of the poseur about him, nor could he command the attention of an audience by force of personality alone, as do his countrymen Chaliapin and Koussevitzky. Nobody would look twice at Stravinsky in a crowd, yet if anyone did he would discover that the composer has an original and sensitive face unlike anyone's else. But it is not what passes for a strong face, and certainly not a beautiful face.

The new concerto is written for piano, wind instruments and double basses. It is dedicated to Mme Koussevitzky and was first played last Spring at a Koussevitzky concert in Paris. This music is quite unlike the earlier works of Stravinsky. It is strongly influenced by Bach, and there are bits of syncopation that suggest superficially the American jazz, in which the composer has for several years professed great interest. Stravinsky has taken his own wherever he found it, from Bach, whom all musicians praise, and from jazz, which so many musicians scorn.

This concerto has greater emotional power and much greater dignity of style than any other work of Stravinsky heard in Boston. It is absolute music, with no attempt at telling a story or at conveying any specific feeling to the hearer. The style is freely polyphonic, the themes are original and of great beauty; the working out is naturally, yet elaborately contrived. Masterpiece is a rash word to use about contemporary music, yet one could not but feel that this concerto is a masterpiece.

The suite from "The Firebird" has not worn well. It is effectively scored for a very large orchestra, with the excessive use of percussion instruments fashionable in 1910. But the musical ideas are now rather banal, the musical craftsmanship superlative only in the scoring for orchestra, not in the handling of the themes used.

"Petruschka," on the other hand, remains a humorous genre picture in music, akin to Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" in sheer imaginative gusto, though written in another idiom. One would like to know the exact extent to which the themes in this piece are taken, as essaists claim, from Russian popular music. They sound more like Stravinsky than like anything else, just as Beethoven's "Russian Themes" in Rasumovsky quartets and elsewhere sound like Beethoven.

Nobody can now say whether Stravinsky is a great composer. He is too near us and his merits are too hotly disputed. He has certainly written in "Petruschka," in "Rites of Spring," and in this new concerto music that stirs the listener deeply, music original in style and often superb in technique. The slow movement of the concerto touched one's heart yesterday as few contemporary pieces have done. Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave, as was expected, a highly effective performance of this program. P. R.

PAPER- Advertiser

DATE- Jan 24

STRAVINSKY IN HUB DEBUT AT THE SYMPHONY

By E. F. HARKINS

Igor Stravinsky, one of the few geniuses among living composers, made his first appearance in Boston at yesterday's Symphony concert.

Igor Stravinsky

He came chiefly out of compliment to his friend Serge Koussevitzky, the new Symphony leader, to play the solo part in the first American performance of his new concerto for piano and wind instruments.

In return for the compliment the orchestra played an all-Stravinsky program, the other numbers being the "Song of the Volga Bargemen," arranged for wind orchestra, and the "Petrouchka" and "Fire-Bird" suites, taken from the famous Stravinsky ballets.

TIMES HAVE CHANGED

How the times change and people with them! Ten years ago Stravinsky was hardly known in this country, although Paris had already heard his "Sacre du Printemps" under Monteux; and a whole decade passed before Monteux had the courage to introduce "Le Sacre" to Boston. Meanwhile the beautiful ballet music had been profoundly admired here. It is still, as time has proved, even up to yesterday, his most popular music. "Le Sacre" is a titanic work, amazing, but not ingratiating.

Much the same may be said of the new concerto played at yesterday's concert. It is extraordinarily difficult to follow as well as to play. Unlike the ballet music, and even "Le Sacre," it soars and rushes to the uttermost bounds of absolute music, with themes that intermix, rhythms that seem to flutter aimlessly in butterfly fashion; also dazzling syncopations.

BRILLIANT ALL AROUND

Stravinsky, whom the elder conservatives might have pictured as an ogre, looks like a dapper young professor. He is a little over 40, but appears to be about 30. His manner is brisk, unaffected. The Stravinsky poise is as unabashed as the Stravinsky art. The prodigious young Russian's performance at the piano was brilliant. The most difficult passages were made to seem easy. Enormously difficult, too, was the orchestra's part, which Mr. Koussevitzky conducted nervously yet magnificently.

There was an ovation after the concerto, with composer and conductor shaking hands and exchanging well deserved congratulations.

ST. JOSEPH, MO.
PRESS

JAN 24 1925

Regarding Conductors.

Wilhelm Furtwaengler has stirred up considerably the orchestra-conductor situation hereabouts. His first appearance brought him a deserved ovation . . . in recognition of a unique accomplishment. Then came a second leading of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, followed by a third and a fourth. With each effort he demonstrated his place in the symphony field. He can now be pronounced by Americans who never before observed his endeavors to be one of the first of living conductors. Whether the Philharmonic will be able to arrange to have him come permanently to this city remains to be seen.

In the meantime Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artistic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitzky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a striving of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

Meanwhile Ignatz Waghalter is struggling with the State Symphony Orchestra, over which Josef Stransky formerly presided. It is not a first-rate band, so Waghalter has had and is having his troubles. He [illegible] sound musician. He is also sincere [illegible] long Berlin training is proving he[illegible], and some readings are admirable. Simplicity and straightforwardness are two Waghalter characteristics. The full measure of his worth seems difficult to estimate while he has at his disposal no better orchestra than the State Symphony.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT

JAN 25 1925

Regarding Conductors.

Wilhelm Furtwaengler has stirred up considerably the orchestra-conductor situation hereabouts. His first appearance brought him a deserved ovation . . in recognition of a unique accomplishment. Then came a second leading of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, followed by a third and a fourth. With each effort was demonstrated his pace in the symphony field. He can now be pronounced by Americans who never before observed his endeavors to be one of the first of living conductors. Whether the Philharmonic will be able to arrange to have him come permanently to this city remains to be seen.

In the meantime Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artistic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitzky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a striving of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

Meanwhile Ignatz Waghalter is struggling with the State Symphony Orchestra, over which Josef Stransky formerly presided. It is not a first-rate band, so Gaghalter has had and is having his troubles. He is a sound musician. He is also sincere. His long Berlin training is proving helpful, and some readings are admirable. Simplicity and straightforwardness are two Waghalter characteristics. The full measure of his worth seems difficult to estimate while he has at his disposal no better orchestra than the State Symphony.

HERE NEXT SUNDAY

Courant 1/24/25

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Who will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra here nex week.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 25 1925

RUSSIAN DIRECTOR HERE FEB. 17

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be first heard in Worcester at the visit of this organization for a concert in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 17.— Preceded to America by the most klowing reports from Europe, Koussevitzky has made another conquest both sudden and complete—the conquest of America. This remarkable leader is talked about the country over—every series is subscribed and seats for the Boston Symphony concerts are at a premium. Naturally, much was expected of Serge Koussevitzky. His qualities have exceeded all expectations. In Boston, New York, and each city he has visited, the effect has been electric.

There is but one opinion of his personal magnetism, his fresh sincerity and vividness as an interpretation artist, his rare and absolute control, manifest in the perfect response of the famous orchestra which he now commands.

About no other conductor (and America has in the last few seasons heard all of the "great" ones) has the consensus of opinion been so high, and so unqualified.

Koussevitzky's program for Worcester will reveal the brilliance and versatility of the Russian leader. It will include a Concerto for Orchestra in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach, edited by Maximilian Steinberg. Berioz' Overture, "The Roman Carnival"; the prelude to the opera "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky; and Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from the opera "Tear Saltan." The second portion of the program will comprise Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor.

Mail orders for seats will be sent to the Boston office, Symphony hall, previous to the public sale which opens at Steinert Music store, Feb

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 25 1925

Roland Hayes to Appear With the Boston Orchestra

Next Friday evening, in the Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will make their third appearance of the season in Brooklyn. Roland Hayes will be the soloist of the occasion.

Koussevitzky will open the program with a Concerto for Orchestra in D major by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been re-edited by Maximilian Steinberg. Koussevitzky first heard this score performed by the noted "Society of Ancient Instruments" in Paris, and was so impressed with its beauty that he persuaded the Russian musician to re-edit it for orchestra in more modern style.

The principal number on the program will be the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikovsky in E minor, which will close the concert. The program will also include two dances by Debussy called "Danse" and "Sarabande," which have been arranged for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

Roland Hayes will be heard in two numbers, "The Repose of the Holy Family," from Berlioz's oratorio, "The Flight into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch, the accompaniment of which has been arranged for orchestra by Busoni.

PAPER- Advertiser

DATE- Jan 24

...lation in New England——SATURDAY, JANUAR

STRAVINSKY PLAYS AT SYMPHONY HALL

Igor Stravinsky, the foremost figure of the musical world today, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. In addition, he was almost the "whole show," for Mr. Koussevitzky had arranged a program composed entirely of the distinguished composer's music, in honor of his visit to America.

None would have dreamed of such symphony concert even a year ago. all-Stravinsky concert, consisting of some of the very wildest music that has come out of Russia, with the wild Stravinsky as soloist in his own piano concerto, and another Russian conducting the program.

As a matter of fact, in personal appearance and manner, Stravinsky is far from being wild. He is a nervous little gentleman, rather embarrassingly inclined to baldness, and wearing not the conventional frock coat of afternoon wear, but a suit that looked much like the American businessman's suit.

Newman wrote not long ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

JAN 25 1925

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Sergei Koussevitzky, will play concerto by P. E. Bach; Sarabande and Danse, by Debussy; Symphony No. 5, by Tschaikovsky, and "Repose of the Holy Family" from Berlioz's "Flight into Egypt," with Roland Hayes, solo tenor, in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening. Compositions by Moussorgsky, Handel and Beethoven comprise the Saturday afternoon programme.

* * *

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
ITEM

Record

JAN 25 1925

The first concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the past four [illegible] will be at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, before members of the Philadelphia Forum. Serge Koussevitzky, a conductor who, deprived of his own orchestra by the revolution in Russia, has brought extraordinary endowments to his new undertaking here, has selected a program of wide range. The opening will be Bach's Concerto for Orchestra in D major, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg. This will be followed by Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," and two Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals." Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will comprise the second half of the program. Koussevitsky, as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, follows after such men as Gericke, Nikisch, Fiedler and Muck.

* * *

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NORTH
AMERICAN

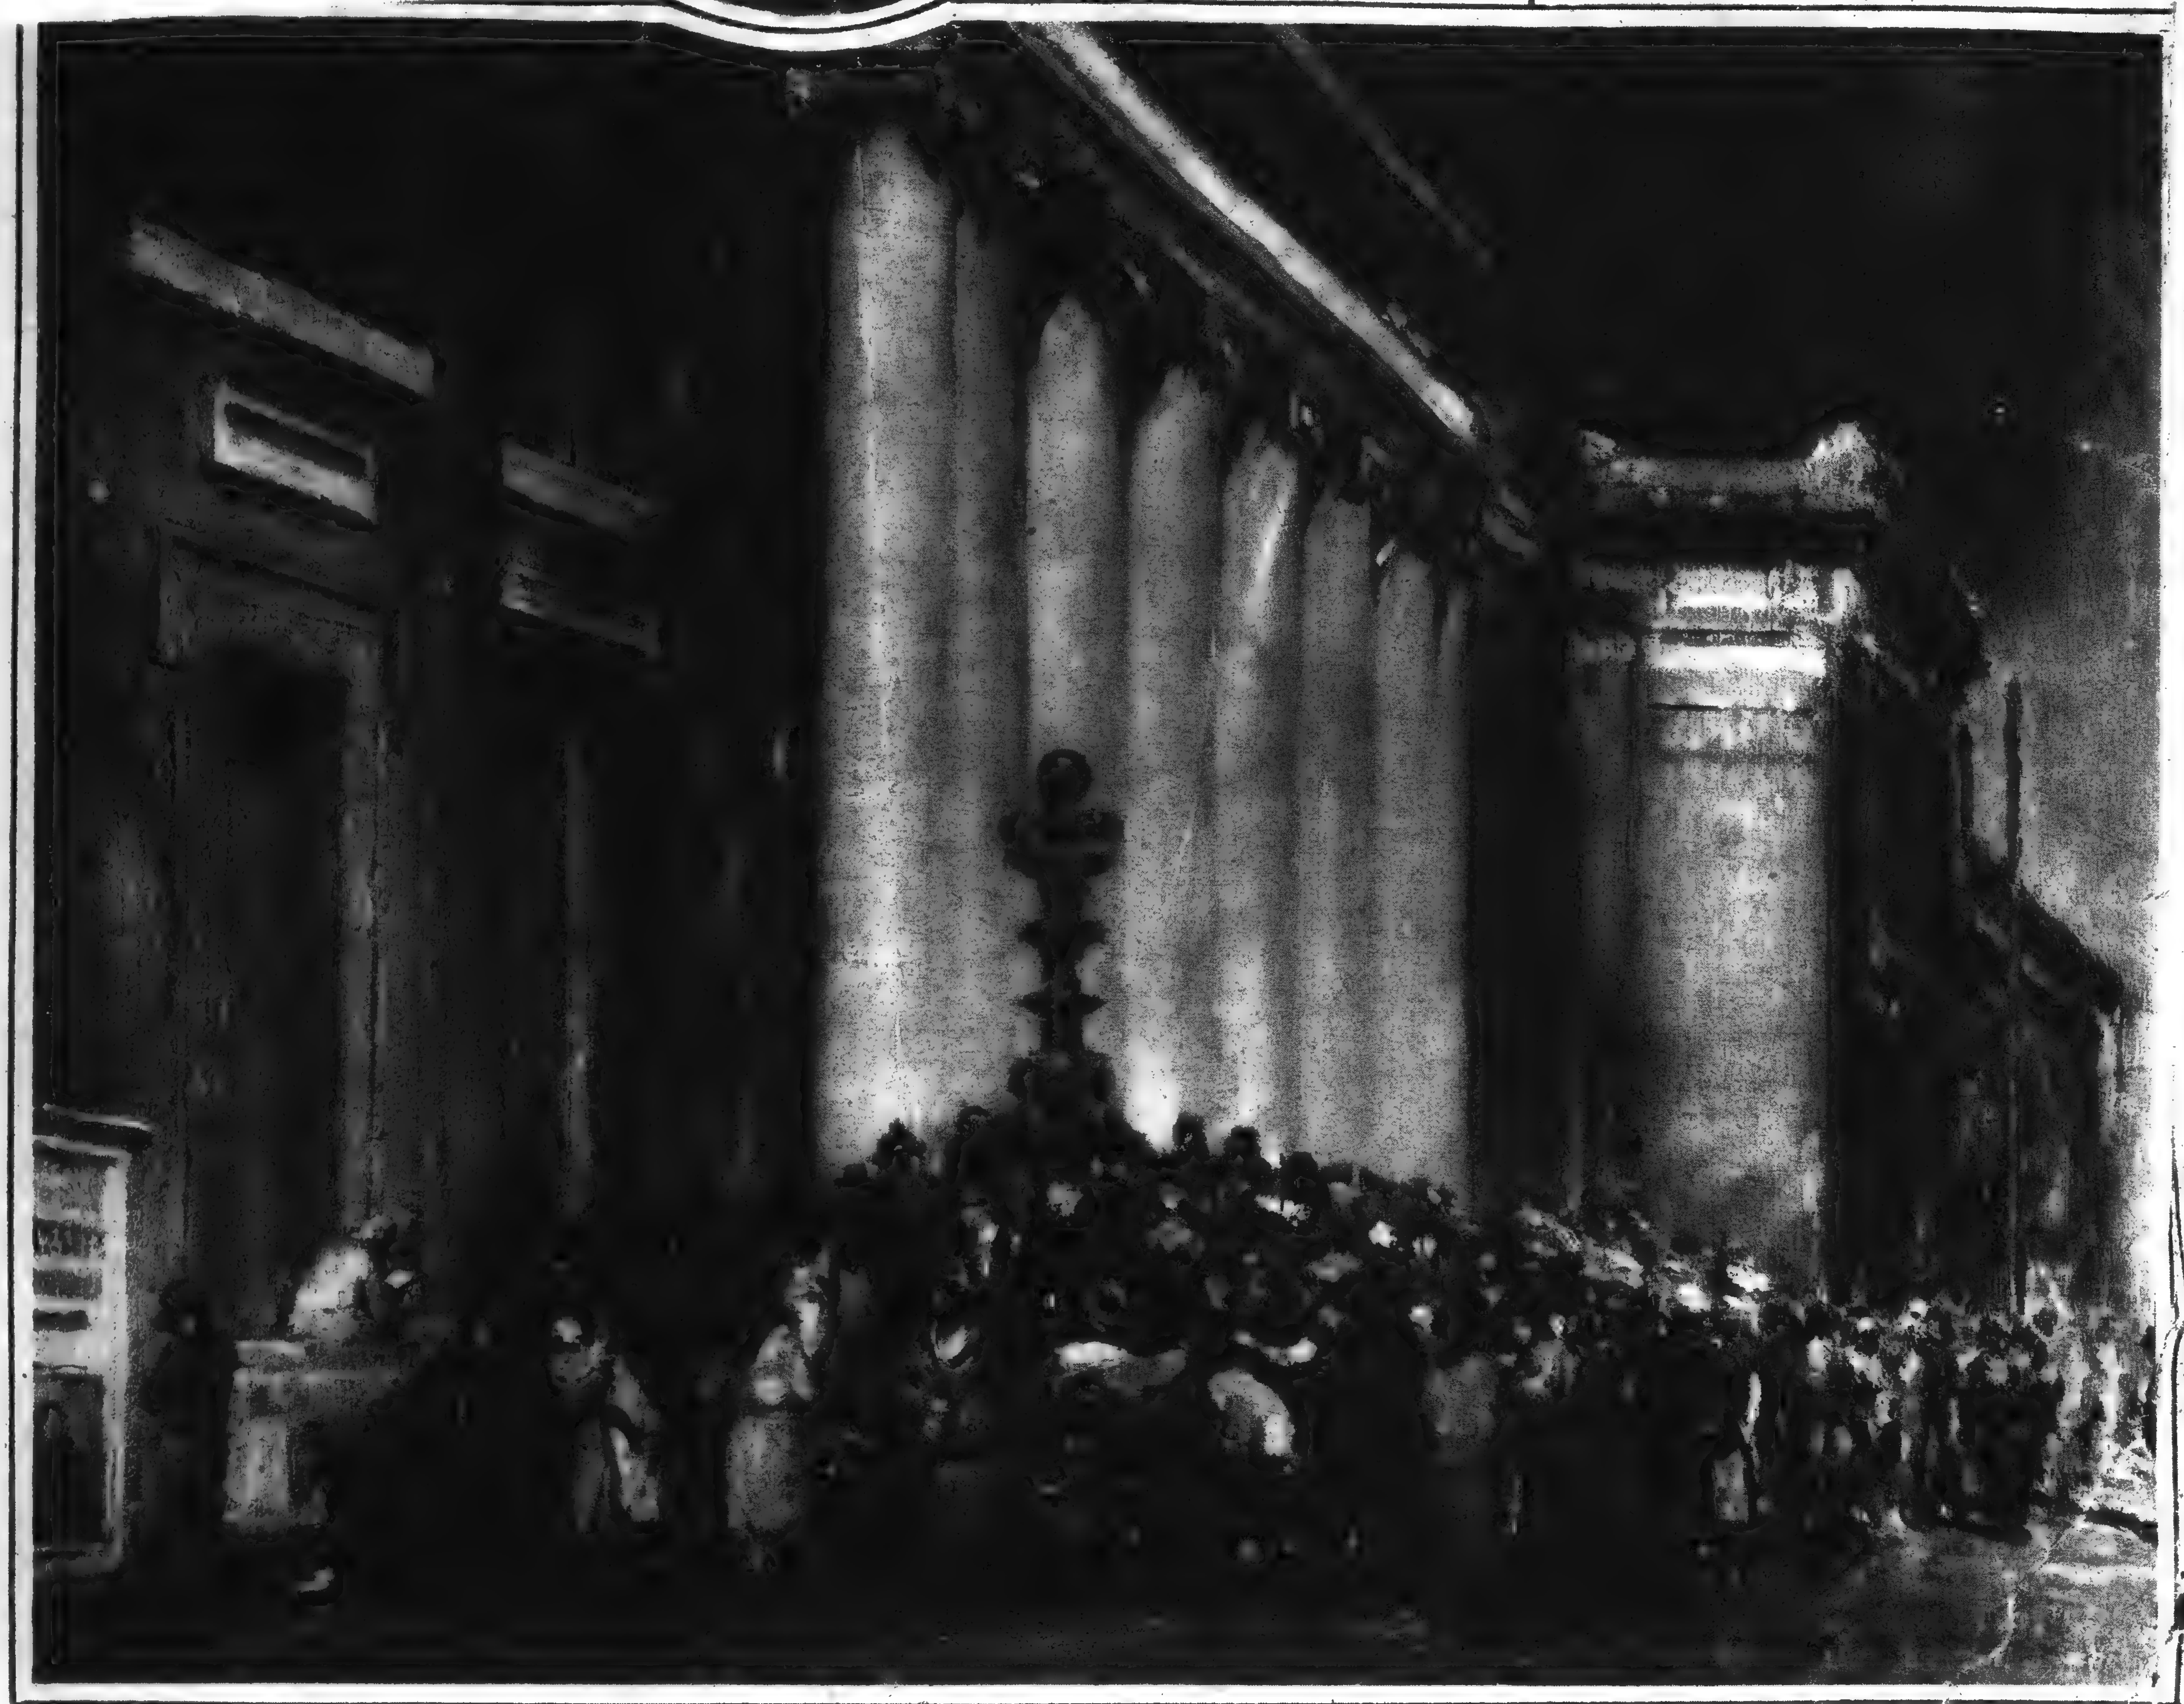
JAN 25 1925

The first concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the last fo[illegible] be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening before members of the Philadelphia Forum. Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, will lead. The opening number will be Bach's concerto for orchestra in D major, arranged by Maxmillian Steinberg. It is in three movements. This will be followed by Berlioz's sparkling overture, "The Roman Carnival," and two Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals." Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will comprise the second half of the program.

* * *

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 25 1925



"KOUSSEVITZKY CONDUCTS"—Friday morning scene in front of Symphony Hall, Boston. The hall contains only a small number of rush seats, which on Friday mornings (rehearsal day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra) students crowd to secure. The picture is from a painting by Duane Haley, brother of John Haley, Photographer, of Hartford.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

JAN 25 1925

* * *

ON WEDNESDAY night the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its only Baltimore appearance of the season, presaging, some say, a series of concerts next season. Many reports have come from various places concerning the new director, Serge Koussevitsky. Evidently the Boston Orchestra's publicity man is an ambitions and an energetic person. And it is not to be denied that he has excellent material in the Russian who so shocked Paris with the Nihilistic music of his contemporary countrymen, and who years before that had wandered over Russia, playing the contra-bass, and even before that was chef d'orchestre (at the age of twelve) in his native town, Tver.

He is not bringing us Scriabine, Stravinsky or Prokoviev. He has, it would appear, no intention of shocking the provinces. But there is on his program the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," and Rimsky's little "Flight of the Bumble Bee" Scherzo from "Tsar Saltan." The symphony is the Beethoven A Major, that which Wagner called "The Apotheosis of the Dance," and other numbers will be the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and the Elgar arrangement of the Bach C Minor Fantasia and Fugue. Considering that Mr. Koussevitsky's reputation rests equally on his catholicity in new works and his sympathy for and vitality in the classics, it is perhaps, after all, not a bad arrangement. We have the word of no less a personage than Ernest Newman that he has a "cosmic orderliness" that should go well with Bach and Beethoven.

Thursday night brings the return of the Polish opera "Halka," given, if memory serves rightly, last season at the Academy. The Lyric will house the show this year. The cast, many of whom will be remembered, includes Mme. L. Ogrodzka, who has sung the title role all over Europe, so press notices convey; Mme. El. Rostkwaka; the tenor Cortilli, two barytones, Reconi and Ryglewicz, and Al. Kahinoff, basso.

The opera, said to have been composed at the golden period, when neither music nor libretto predominated but were welded in an indissoluble whole—or wards to that effect—deals with the love of a Polish mountaineer girl for a noble who rejects her and marries a woman of the nobility, whereupon the peasant girl, love overcoming her desire to burn down the church, drowns herself and her child in the River Vistula.

* * *

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

JAN 25 1925

Regarding Conductors.

Wilhelm Furtwaengler has stirred up considerably the orchestra-conductor situation hereabouts. His first appearance brought him a deserved ovation . . . in recognition of a unique accomplishment. Then came a second leading of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, followed by a third and a fourth. With each effort demonstrated his place in the symphony field. He can now be pronounced by Americans who never before observed his endeavors to be one of the first of living conductors. Whether the Philharmonic will be able to arrange to have him come permanently to this city remains to be seen.

In the meantime Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artistic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitzky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a striving of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

Meanwhile Ignatz Waghalter is struggling with the State Symphony Orchestra, over which Josef Stransky formerly presided. It is not a first-rate band, so Waghalter has had and is having his troubles. He is a sound musician. He is also sincere. His long Berlin training is proving helpful, and some readings are admirable. Simplicity and straightforwardness are two Waghalter characteristics. The full measure of his worth seems difficult to estimate while he has at his disposal no better orchestra than the State Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.
HERALD

JAN 25 1925

Regarding Conductors.

Wilhelm Furtwaengler has stirred up considerably the orchestra-conductor situation hereabouts. His first appearance brought him a deserved ovation, in recognition of a unique accomplishment. Then came a second leading of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, followed by a third and a fourth. With each effort he demonstrated his place in the symphony field. He can now be pronounced by Americans who never before observed his endeavors to be one of the first of living conductors. Whether the Philharmonic will be able to arrange to have him come permanently to this city remains to be seen.

In the meantime Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artistic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitzky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a striving of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

Meanwhile Ignatz Waghalter is struggling with the State Symphony Orchestra, over which Josef Stransky formerly presided. It is not a first-rate band, so Waghalter has had and is having his troubles. He is a sound musician. He is also sincere. His long Berlin training is proving helpful, and some readings are admirable. Simplicty and straightforwardness are two Waghalter characteristics. The full measure of his worth seems difficult to estimate while he has at his disposal no better orchestra than the State Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY
NEW YORK
KNICKERBOCKER PRES

JAN 25 1925

Regarding Conductors.

WILHELM FURTWAENGLER has stirred up considerably the orchestra-conductor situation hereabouts. His first appearance brought him a deserved ovation. . . . in recognition of a unique accomplishment. Then came a second leading of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, following by a third and a fourth. With each effort demonstrated his place in the symphony field. He can now be pronounced by Americans who never before observed his endeavors to be one of the first of living conductors. Whether the Philharmonic will be able to arrange to have him come permanently to this city remains to be seen.

In the meantime Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artistic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitzky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a strivinging of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

Meanwhile Ignatz Waghalter is struggling with the State Symphony Orchestra, over which Josef Stransky formerly presided. It is not a first-rate band, so Waghalter has had and is having his troubles. He is a sound musician. He is also sincere. His long Berlin training is proving helpful, and some readings are admirable. Simplicity and straightforwardness are two Waghalter characteristics. The full measure of his worth seems difficult to estimate while he has at his disposal no better orchestra than the State Symphony.

CLEVELAND,
OHIO
NEWS

JAN 25 1925

REGARDING CONDUCTORS

WILHELM FURTWAENGLER has stirred up considerably the orchestra-conductor situation hereabouts. His first appearance brought him a deserved ovation . . . in recognition of a unique accomplishment. Then came a second leading of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, followed by a third and a fourth. With each effort he demonstrated his place in the symphony field. He can now be pronounced by Americans who never before observed his endeavors to be one of the first of living conductors. Whether the Philharmonic will be able to arrange to have him come permanently to this city remains to be seen.

In the meantime, Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artistic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitzky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a striving of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

Meanwhile, Ignatz Waghalter is sturggling with the State Symphony orchestra, over which Josef Stransky formerly presided. It is not a first-rate band, so Waghalter has had and is having his troubles. He is a sound musician. He is also sincere. His long Berlin training is proving helpful, and some readings are admirable. Simplicity and straightforwardness are two Waghalter characteristics. The full measure of his worth seems difficult to estimate while he has at his disposal no better orchestra than the State Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WASHINGTON,
D. C.
~~NEWS~~
Star

JAN 25 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tuesday.

Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance here Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, at Poli's Theater, on the occasion of this orchestra's only visit of the season.

Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last Autumn. He was considered a dominant figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris and previously in Russia, where he has traveled with the orchestra that bore his name.

In America Koussevitzky has made another conquest.

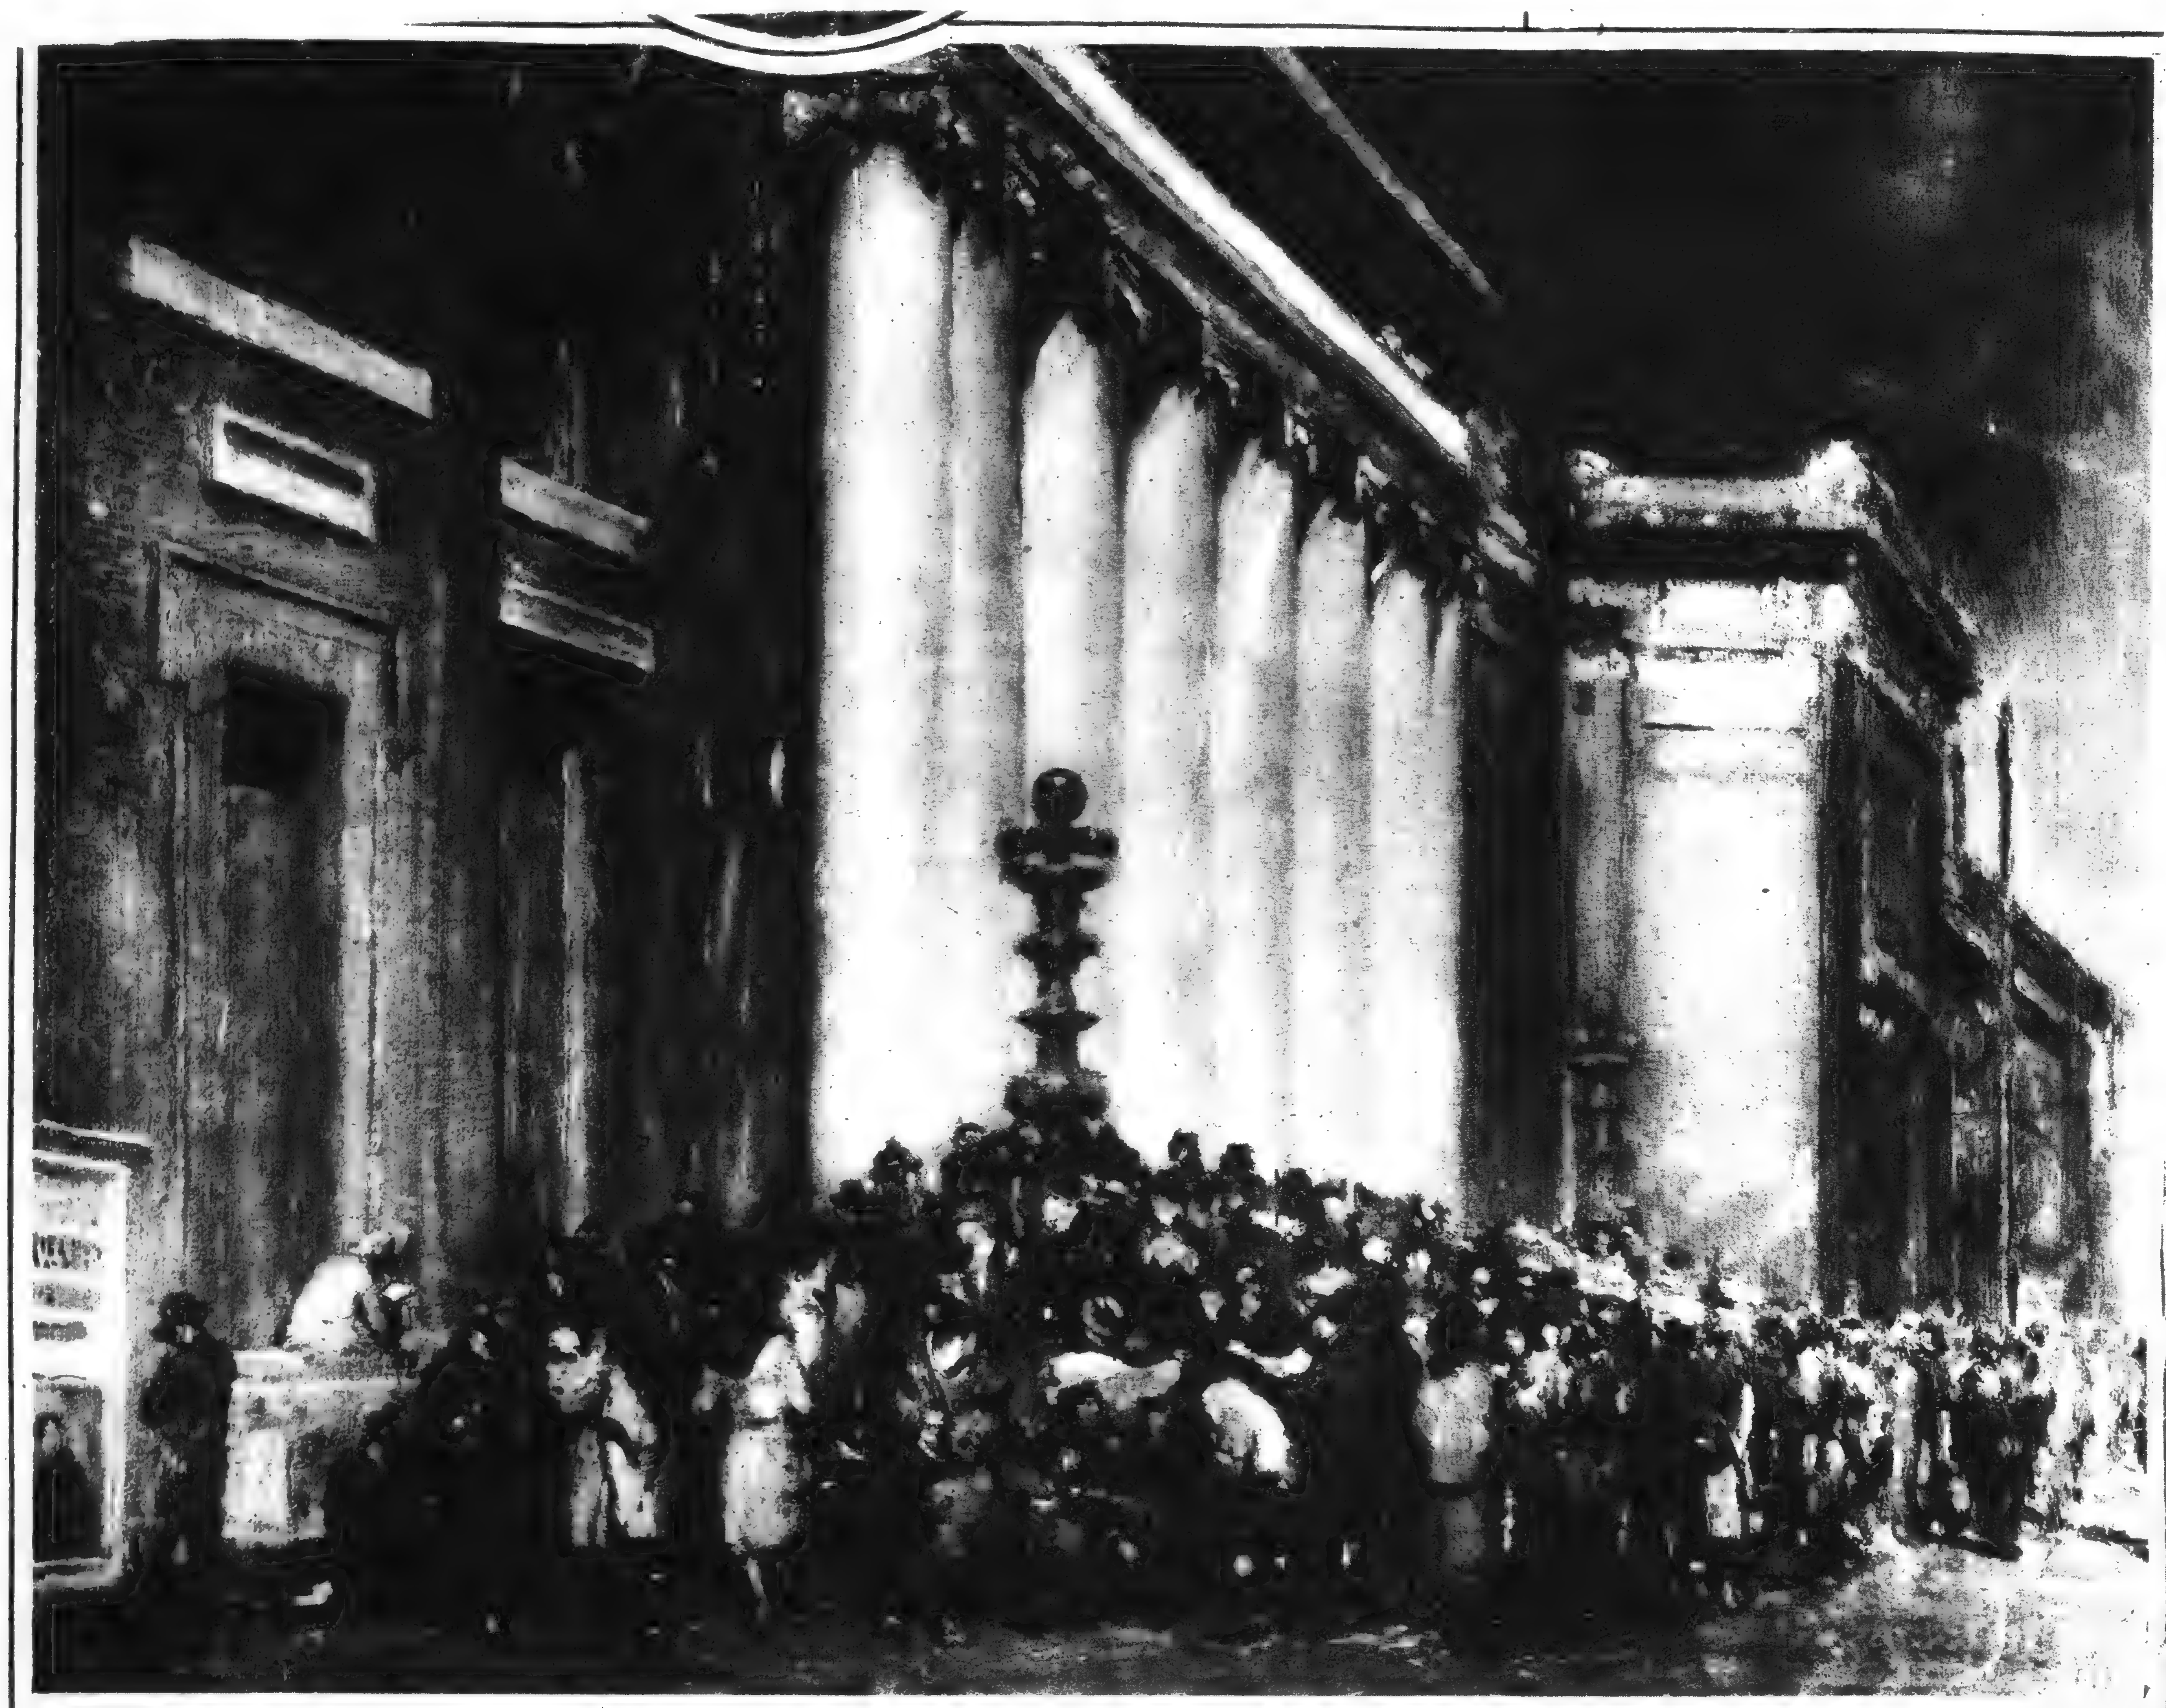
The program will include a "Concerto for Orchestra in D Major," by Philip Emanuel Bach, talented son of J. S. Bach, re-edited in more modern instrumentation by Maximilian Steinberg; also Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony in A Major."

Seats on sale at Mrs. Greene's Concert Bureau, Thirteenth and G streets.

NEW YORK

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 25 1925



"KOUSSEVITZKY CONDUCTS"—Friday morning scene in front of Symphony Hall, Boston. The hall contains only a small number of rush seats, which on Friday mornings (rehearsal day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra) students crowd to secure. The picture is from a painting by Duane Haley, brother of John Haley, Photographer, of Hartford.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

JAN 25 1925

* * *

ON WEDNESDAY night the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its only Baltimore appearance of the season, presaging, some say, a series of concerts next season. Many reports have come from various places concerning the new director, Serge Koussevitsky. Evidently the Boston Orchestra's publicity man is an ambitions and an energetic person. And it is not to be denied that he has excellent material in the Russian who so shocked Paris with the Nihilistic music of his contemporary countrymen, and who years before that had wandered over Russia, playing the contra-bass, and even before that was chef d'orchestre (at the age of twelve) in his native town, Tver.

He is not bringing us Scriabine, Stravinsky or Prokoviev. He has, it would appear, no intention of shocking the provinces. But there is on his program the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," and Rimsky's little "Flight of the Bumble Bee" Scherzo from "Tsar Saltan." The symphony is the Beethoven A Major, that which Wagner called "The Apotheosis of the Dance," and other numbers will be the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and the Elgar arrangement of the Bach C Minor Fantasia and Fugue. Considering that Mr. Koussevitsky's reputation rests equally on his catholicity in new works and his sympathy for and vitality in the classics, it is perhaps, after all, not a bad arrangement. We have the word of no less a personage than Ernest Newman that he has a "cosmic orderliness" that should go well with Bach and Beetthoven.

Thursday night brings the return of the Polish opera "Halka," given, if memory serves rightly, last season at the Academy. The Lyric will house the show this year. The cast, many of whom will be remembered, includes Mme. L. Ogrodzka, who has sung the title role all over Europe, so press notices convey; Mme. El. Rostkwaka; the tenor Cortilli, two barytones, Reconi and Ryglewicz, and Al. Kabinoff, basso.

The opera, said to have been composed at the golden period, when neither music nor libretto predominated but were welded in an indissoluble whole—or wards to that effect—deals with the love of a Polish mountaineer girl for a noble who rejects her and marries a woman of the nobility, whereupon the peasant girl, love overcoming her desire to burn down the church, drowns herself and her child in the River Vistula.

* * *

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

JAN 25 1925

Regarding Conductors.

Wilhelm Furtwaengler has stirred up considerably the orchestra-conductor situation hereabouts. His first appearance brought him a deserved ovation . . . in recognition of a unique accomplishment. Then came a second leading of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, followed by a third and a fourth. With each effort demonstrated his place in the symphony field. He can now be pronounced by Americans who never before observed his endeavors to be one of the first of living conductors. Whether the Philharmonic will be able to arrange to have him come permanently to this city remains to be seen.

In the meantime Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artistic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitzky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a striving of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

Meanwhile Ignatz Waghalter is struggling with the State Symphony Orchestra, over which Josef Stransky formerly presided. It is not a first-rate band, so Waghalter has had and is having his troubles. He is a sound musician. He is also sincere. His long Berlin training is proving helpful, and some readings are admirable Simplicity and straightforwardness are two Waghalter characteristics The full measure of his worth seems difficult to estimate while he has a his disposal no better orchestra than the State Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.
HERALD

JAN 25 1925

Regarding Conductors.

Wilhelm Furtwaengler has stirred up considerably the orchestra-conductor situation hereabouts. His first appearance brought him a deserved ovation, in recognition of a unique accomplishment. Then came a second leading of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, followed by a third and a fourth. With each effort he demonstrated his place in the symphony field. He can now be pronounced by Americans who never before observed his endeavors to be one of the first of living conductors. Whether the Philharmonic will be able to arrange to have him come permanently to this city remains to be seen.

In the meantime Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artistic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitzky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a striving of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

Meanwhile Ignatz Waghalter is struggling with the State Symphony Orchestra, over which Josef Stransky formerly presided. It is not a first-rate band, so Waghalter has had and is having his troubles. He is a sound musician. He is also sincere. His long Berlin training is proving helpful, and some readings are admirable. Simplicty and straightforwardness are two Waghalter characteristics. The full measure of his worth seems difficult to estimate while he has at his disposal no better orchestra than the State Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY
NEW YORK
KNICKERBOCKER PRES

JAN 25 1925

Regarding Conductors.

WILHELM FURTWAENGLER has stirred up considerably the orchestra-conductor situation hereabouts. His first appearance brought him a deserved ovation. . . . in recognition of a unique accomplishment. Then came a second leading of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, following by a third and a fourth. With each effort demonstrated his place in the symphony field. He can now be pronounced by Americans who never before observed his endeavors to be one of the first of living conductors. Whether the Philharmonic will be able to arrange to have him come permanently to this city remains to be seen.

In the meantime Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artistic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitzky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a strivinging of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

Meanwhile Ignatz Waghalter is struggling with the State Symphony Orchestra, over which Josef Stransky formerly presided. It is not a first-rate band, so Waghalter has had and is having his troubles. He is a sound musician. He is also sincere. His long Berlin training is proving helpful, and some readings are admirable. Simplicity and straightforwardness are two Waghalter characteristics. The full measure of his worth seems difficult to estimate while he has at his disposal no better orchestra than the State Symphony.

CLEVELAND,
OHIO
NEWS

JAN 25 1925

REGARDING CONDUCTORS

WILHELM FURTWAENGLER has stirred up consideraoly the orchestra-conductor situation hereabouts. His first appearance brought him a deserved ovation . . . in recognition of a unique accomplishment. Then came a second leading of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, followed by a third and a fourth. With each effort he demonstrated his place in the symphony field. He can now be pronounced by Americans who never before observed his endeavors to be one of the first of living conductors. Whether the Philharmonic will be able to arrange to have him come permanently to this city remains to be seen.

In the meantime, Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artistic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitzky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a striving of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

Meanwhile, Ignatz Waghalter is sturggling with the State Symphony orchestra, over which Josef Stransky formerly presided. It is not a first-rate band, so Waghalter has had and is having his troubles. He is a sound musician. He is also sincere. His long Berlin training is proving helpful, and some readings are admirable. Simplicity and straightforwardness are two Waghalter characteristics. The full measure of his worth seems difficult to estimate while he has at his disposal no better orchestra than the State Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING
WASHINGTON,
D. C.
~~NEWS~~

JAN 25 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tuesday.

Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance here Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, at Poli's Theater, on the occasion of this orchestra's only visit of the season.

Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last Autumn. He was considered a dominant figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris and previously in Russia, where he has traveled with the orchestra that bore his name.

In America Koussevitzky has made another conquest.

The program will include a "Concerto for Orchestra in D Major," by Philip Emanuel Bach, talented son of J. S. Bach, re-edited in more modern instrumentation by Maximilian Steinberg: also Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony in A Major."

Seats on sale at Mrs. Greene's Concert Bureau, Thirteenth and G streets.

[illegible] and Oscar

22

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

JAN 25 1925

World of Music

Brooklyn patrons should receive Boston Symphony programme-notes:

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn are always opened with the same prelude (lamentoso)—namely, the predicament of bewildered patrons wondering why a few seemingly privileged people possess programme-notes for the occasion while the majority receive only the unenlightening house programme furnished by the Academy of Music. A great many people who attend these concerts know extremely little about music except from an emotional viewpoint, and it is really impossible for them to get the full import or to develop their appreciation without expert guidance, such as that embodied in Philip Hale's historical and descriptive notes written expressly for Boston Symphony audiences. That these notes are not given to every patron seems almost a premeditated slight. Is not Brooklyn's money as good as Manhattan's—or Boston's?

Why, it may be asked with all due reverence, does the Boston management fail to distribute Mr. Hale's valuable notes more freely? Simply because the rules of the Academy of Music will not permit circulation to any programme, outside of the regular house programme, which carries advertisements. This debars the Boston programme, an attractively printed and very informative publication. Under the circumstances, the Boston booklet should be distributed as a separate leaflet (advertisements omitted), similar to Lawrence Gilman's Philharmonic notes. Surely, if the comparatively new and much less affluent Brooklyn Orchestral Society can effect a distribution of especially prepared programme-notes, it is not beyond the means of such an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra to do likewise.

The situation in no wise is the fault of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, under whose auspices the Boston concerts (five annually) have been held here for the past twenty-seven seasons. Prior to its local management by the Institute, the orchestra for seventeen years gave concerts in Brooklyn, making a record that will in a few more seasons reach the half-century mark.

Insofar as patronage is concerned, the Boston Orchestra has flourished in Brooklyn. This season, like many past, finds the house sold out for every concert. Since the opera house of the Academy seats 2,300 people, that many ticket purchasers are represented. About five hundred of these are season subscribers, each of whom receives by mail, prior to the concerts, a copy of Mr. Hale's notes. Another hundred copies or two are handed out from the window of the Institute's box office, or, for those who are not too embarrassed to ask, at a drug store nearby. This leaves approximately 1,500 patrons without notes, a condition that should not or need not be.

Boston Symphony Concert Next Friday Night.

Features of the third visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Brooklyn, at the Academy of Music next Friday evening, will be the performance of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony (in E minor), under Koussevitzky's direction, and the appearance as soloist of Roland Hayes, the celebrated negro tenor.

Tschaikowsky's symphony was the principal number at the recent Pension Fund concert by the orchestra in Boston, when Serge Koussevitzky was first heard in the music of his countryman. The performance revealed new powers in the conductor and a new eloquence in the music.

Friday evening's concert will open with Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto for Orchestra in D major (arranged by Maximillian Steinberg). It will also include two dances by Debussy, called "Danse" and "Sarabande," arranged for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

The music in which Roland Hayes will appear with the orchestra is Berlioz's air, "The Repose of the Holy Family" from "The Flight Into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch, the accompaniment orchestrated by Busoni.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 25 1925

A program which should reveal to particular advantage the manifold qualities of its new leader is to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky at the Capitol Theater next Sunday afternoon, February 1, at 3 o'clock. The principal number on the program will be Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. The truly magnificent and deeply moving interpretation of this great score by Koussevitzky on the occasion of a Pension Fund Concert in Boston last December proved an outstanding event in the very remarkable Symphony season.

Koussevitzky will begin the concert with a Concert for Orchestra in D major, for string orchestra, by Philip Emanuel Bach, the most talented son of J. S. Bach. The score was edited by Maximillian Steinberg. The reading reveals Koussevitzky's peculiar power of revivifying the so-called classics. Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture is chosen from the program of Koussevitzky's American debut last October. Two Russian numbers of particular charm are also to be played. The Prelude to "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky, and "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a Scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." These pieces have been introduced to our public by the Russian leader.

The seat sale is now open and the demand indicates a sold house although at this time it is still possible to obtain good seats. The sale is at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. Mail orders will be accepted from patrons out of town and those unable to attend the sale in person.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
~~CITIZEN~~

JAN 25 1925

Next Friday evening in the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussewitzky will make their third appearance of the season in Brooklyn. Roland Hayes will be the soloist of the occasion. Koussewitzky will open the program with a Concerto for Orchestra in D major by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been re-edited by Maximilian Steinberg. The principal number on the program will be the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikowsky in E minor. The evening will also include two dances by Debussy: "Danse" and "Sarabande," which have been arranged for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

Roland Hayes will be heard in two numbers. "The Repose of the Holy Family" from Berlioz' oratorio "The Flight into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch, the accompaniment of which has been arranged for orchestra by Busoni.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
~~ADVERTISER~~
Telegram

JAN 25 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE MARCH 25

Will Be Big Event in Local Musical Circles

Marked as a red letter day in the calendar of the Winter's musical events is the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this City for a concert on March 25 under the auspices of the Portland Music commission.

There is no organization of musicians that ever played in this City which has been received with the enthusiasm of the Boston Symphony orchestra. There is probably no individual musical event of a concert season that is considered more important. Even the personality of the world's greatest individual stars cannot surpass the charm of hearing this great body of perfectly trained musicians under the baton of one of the ablest conductors in the world today.

And of course the personality of Serge Koussevitsky, the dynamic new leader of the Boston Symphony lends a piquancy to this year's concert that has not been equalled in the past several years. It is confidently expected that Koussevitsky will succeed in again making the Boston Symphony the greatest orchestra in the world. He is the talk of the music world this winter. The laurels of other conductors who have been much in the public eye are lessening by comparison with the achievements of Koussevitsky. With him the Boston Symphony and New England as a music center are coming back into their own, and his concerts in New England are drawing record audiences for that reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JAN 25 1925

The Catholic Operatic Society will present Gilbert and Sullivan's comic opera, "Patience, or Bunthorne's Bride," in the Academy of Music on Thursday evening, January 29. The cast includes the following: Eleanore McManus, Mrs. Muriel Martel, Crescentia Beck, Rosalie Moscony, May Smith, Robert Finley, Eldon Smith Fred Caperoon, Raymond Uhl and J. Brooks Greenwood. The accompaniment will be played by members of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

For the first time in four years the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Philadelphia tomorrow evening at the Academy of Music. The concert given to the members of the Forum, will be under the direction of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. The programme includes Bach's Concerto in D major, arranged by Steinberg; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture; the DeBussy "Noctournes" and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven.

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

JAN 25 1925

Big Orchestra Again Comes To Baltimore

Boston Musicians, Under New Leadership, Will Make Their Only Appearance Of The Season At Lyric Wednesday

NEXT Wednesday night at the Lyric the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of its new director, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its only Baltimore appearance of the season and after an absence of many years.

The program has one innovation. Contrary to custom, Koussevitzky has placed what might be called the smaller pieces at the beginning and will close the program with the symphony selected for the occasion, which, in the present instance, will be Beethoven's in A major.

The Fantasia and Fugue in C minor by Bach will be the opening number. Considered as an impassioned interpreter of Wagner it is not surprising that Koussevitzky has included in the program the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser." Two Russian composers, Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov also will be represented.

The complete program follows:

Fantasia and Fugue in C Minor (arranged for orchestra by Elgar)...Bach
"Bacchanale (The Hill of Venus)," from Tannhauser..............Wagner
Prelude to "Khovantchina"..Moussorgsky
Scherzo "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from "Tsar Saltan," Rimsky-Korsakov Symphony in A Major, No. 7, Op. 92........................Beethoven
I—Poco sostenuto; vivace.
II—Allegretto.
III—Presto; presto meno assai.
IV—Allegro con brio.

Koussevitzky's early career in Russia—incidentally he is the first Russian to conduct the Boston—was largely identified with the famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow. In Moscow and Petrograd, Beethoven and Bach festivals figured among his concerts. He likewise championed music of genius from living composers. He also traveled all over Russia with his orchestra, bearing symphonic music to parts where it never had been heard. He even chartered a steamer and sailing the length of the Volga gave concerts in town after town.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 25 1925

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

JAN 26 1925

Fair Coloratura Here And Noted Orchestra Conductor

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be heard here for the first time with that orchestra Tuesday at Poli's.
Mabel Garrison, coloratura soprano, whose recital at the Na-

Regarding Conductors

Wilhelm Furtwaengler has stirred up considerably the orchestra-conductor situation hereabouts. His first appearance brought him a deserved ovation * * * in recognition of a unique accomplishment. Then came a second leading of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, following by a third and a fourth. With each effort demonstrated his place in the symphony field. He can now be pronounced by Americans who never before observed his endeavors to be one of the first of living conductors. Whether the Philharmonic will be able to arrange to have him come permanently to this city remains to be seen.

In the meantime Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artistic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitzky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a striving of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

JAN 26 1925

bureau

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

Serge Koussevitzky, the celebrated new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance here next Tuesday afternoon, January 27, at 4:30, at Poli's Theater, the occasion of this orchestra's only visit to Washington this season. The concert is under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris, and previously in Russia, where he has traveled far and wide with the orchestra that bore his name.

In America Koussevitzky has made another conquest—both sudden and complete.

The program will include a Concerto for Orchestra in D major, by Philip Emanuel Bach, arranged in more [illegible] instrumentation by Maximilian Steinberg; Berlioz' Overture "The Roman Carnival;" Debussy's two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals;" and Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" in A major.

Remaining seats on sale at Mrs. Greene's Concert Bureau, Droops.

MUSIC FETE TOMORROW

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 26 192

Boston Symphony

Worcester musical people have come to look forward with interest to the visit to this city of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the most famous organization of musicians in this country. In fact it is doubtful if there is an equal of the Boston Symphony orchestra the world over. It comes to Mechanics hall Tuesday evening, Feb. 17. Last season under the direction of Pierre Momteaux, it rose to heights of musical grandeur in the performance of the famous symphonies.

This season the orchestra has for its conductor Serge Koussevitzky, the famed Russian musician who has maintained the high standard of the organization and introduced many new scores from his own country, two of them being the prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a cherzo from the opera "Tsar Saltan." Both of these compositions have scored tremendously in the Boston Symphony programs.

Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture is one of the numbers for the Worcester concert. The opening number is C. P. E. Bach's "Concerto in D Major," three movements, and the symphony is Tchaikovsky's "Fifth in E Minor."

Koussevitzky's connection with the orchestra began at the opening of the symphony season, and last week he signed an agreement for another year with the Boston Symphony, which is hailed by the Boston public as most welcome news.

There is to be a subscription sale of seats, orders to be sent to the Boston office, Symphony hall, and the public sale opens at Steinert's Monday, Feb. 2.

---

ce.
Newman wrote not long ago.
at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's [illegible] Droop's, Thirteenth and 22

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

JAN 25 1925

World of Music

Brooklyn patrons should receive Boston Symphony programme-notes:

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn are always opened with the same prelude (lamentoso)—namely, the predicament of bewildered patrons wondering why a few seemingly privileged people possess programme-notes for the occasion while the majority receive only the unenlightening house programme furnished by the Academy of Music. A great many people who attend these concerts know extremely little about music except from an emotional viewpoint, and it is really impossible for them to get the full import or to develop their appreciation without expert guidance, such as that embodied in Philip Hale's historical and descriptive notes written expressly for Boston Symphony audiences. That these notes are not given to every patron seems almost a premeditated slight. Is not Brooklyn's money as good as Manhattan's—or Boston's?

Why, it may be asked with all due reverence, does the Boston management fail to distribute Mr. Hale's valuable notes more freely? Simply because the rules of the Academy of Music will not permit circulation to any programme, outside of the regular house programme, which carries advertisements. This debars the Boston programme, an attractively printed and very informative publication. Under the circumstances, the Boston booklet should be distributed as a separate leaflet (advertisements omitted), similar to Lawrence Gilman's Philharmonic notes. Surely, if the comparatively new and much less affluent Brooklyn Orchestral Society can effect a distribution of especially prepared programme-notes, it is not beyond the means of such an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra to do likewise.

The situation in no wise is the fault of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, under whose auspices the Boston concerts (five annually) have been held here for the past twenty-seven seasons. Prior to its local management by the Institute, the orchestra for seventeen years gave concerts in Brooklyn, making a record that will in a few more seasons reach the half-century mark.

Insofar as patronage is concerned, the Boston Orchestra has flourished in Brooklyn. This season, like many past, finds the house sold out for every concert. Since the opera house of the Academy seats 2,300 people, that many ticket purchasers are represented. About five hundred of these are season subscribers, each of whom receives by mail, prior to the concerts, a copy of Mr. Hale's notes. Another hundred copies or two are handed out from the window of the Institute's box office, or, for those who are not too embarrassed to ask, at a drug store nearby. This leaves approximately 1,500 patrons without notes, a condition that should not or need not be.

Boston Symphony Concert Next Friday Night.

Features of the third visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Brooklyn, at the Academy of Music next Friday evening, will be the performance of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony (in E minor), under Koussevitzky's direction, and the appearance as soloist of Roland Hayes, the celebrated negro tenor.

Tschaikowsky's symphony was the principal number at the recent Pension Fund concert by the orchestra in Boston, when Serge Koussevitzky was first heard in the music of his countryman. The performance revealed new powers in the conductor and a new eloquence in the music.

Friday evening's concert will open with Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto for Orchestra in D major (arranged by Maximillian Steinberg). It will also include two dances by Debussy, called "Danse" and "Sarabande," arranged for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

The music in which Roland Hayes will appear with the orchestra is Berlioz's air, "The Repose of the Holy Family" from "The Flight Into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch, the accompaniment orchestrated by Busoni.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 25 1925

A program which should reveal to particular advantage the manifold qualities of its new leader is to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky at the Capitol Theater next Sunday afternoon, February 1, at 3 o'clock. The principal number on the program will be Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. The truly magnificent and deeply moving interpretation of this great score by Koussevitzky on the occasion of a Pension Fund Concert in Boston last December proved an outstanding event in the very remarkable Symphony season.

Koussevitzky will begin the concert with a Concert for Orchestra in D major, for string orchestra, by Philip Emanuel Bach, the most talented son of J. S. Bach. The score was edited by Maximillian Steinberg. The reading reveals Koussevitzky's peculiar power of revivifying the so-called classics. Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture is chosen from the program of Koussevitzky's American debut last October. Two Russian numbers of particular charm are also to be played, The Prelude to "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky, and "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a Scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." These pieces have been introduced to our public by the Russian leader.

The seat sale is now open and the demand indicates a sold house although at this time it is still possible to obtain good seats. The sale is at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. Mail orders will be accepted from patrons out of town and those unable to attend the sale in person.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
~~CITIZEN~~

JAN 25 1925

Next Friday evening in the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussewitzky will make their third appearance of the season in Brooklyn. Roland Hayes will be the soloist of the occasion. Koussewitzky will open the program with a Concerto for Orchestra in D major by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been re-edited by Maximilian Steinberg. The principal number on the program will be the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikowsky in E minor. The evening will also include two dances by Debussy: "Danse" and "Sarabande," which have been arranged for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

Roland Hayes will be heard in two numbers. "The Repose of the Holy Family" from Berlioz' oratorio "The Flight into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch, the accompaniment of which has been arranged for orchestra by Busoni.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
~~ADVERTISER~~
Telegram

JAN 25 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE MARCH 25

Will Be Big Event in Local Musical Circles

Marked as a red letter day in the calendar of the Winter's musical events is the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this City for a concert on March 25 under the auspices of the Portland Music commission.

There is no organization of musicians that ever played in this City which has been received with the enthusiasm of the Boston Symphony orchestra. There is probably no individual musical event of a concert season that is considered more important. Even the personality of the world's greatest individual stars cannot surpass the charm of hearing this great body of perfectly trained musicians under the baton of one of the ablest conductors in the world today.

And of course the personality of Serge Koussevitsky, the dynamic new leader of the Boston Symphony lends a piquancy to this year's concert that has not been equalled in the past several years. It is confidently expected that Koussevitsky will succeed in again making the Boston Symphony the greatest orchestra in the world. He is the talk of the music world this winter. The laurels of other conductors who have been much in the public eye are lessening by comparison with the achievements of Koussevitsky. With him the Boston Symphony and New England as a music center are coming back into their own, and his concerts in New England are drawing record audiences for that reason.

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

JAN 25 1925

Big Orchestra Again Comes To Baltimore

Boston Musicians, Under New Leadership, Will Make Their Only Appearance Of The Season At Lyric Wednesday

NEXT Wednesday night at the Lyric the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of its new director, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its only Baltimore appearance of the season and after an absence of many years.

The program has one innovation. Contrary to custom, Koussevitzky has placed what might be called the smaller pieces at the beginning and will close the program with the symphony selected for the occasion, which, in the present instance, will be Beethoven's in A major.

The Fantasia and Fugue in C minor by Bach will be the opening number. Considered as an impassioned interpreter of Wagner it is not surprising that Koussevitzky has included in the program the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser." Two Russian composers, Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov also will be represented

AZINE STAND, $17.8
$19.85 POLYCHROME
$15.85.
$18.85 ART POLYCHRON with sun burst top, $15.

major, No. 7, ...Beethoven
I—Poco sostenuto; vivace.
II—Allegretto.
III—Presto; presto meno assai.
IV—Allegro con brio.

Koussevitzky's early career in Russia—incidentally he is the first Russian to conduct the Boston—was largely identified with the famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow. In Moscow and Petrograd, Beethoven and Bach festivals figured among his concerts. He likewise championed music

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JAN 25 1925

The Catholic Operatic Society will present Gilbert and Sullivan's comic opera. "Patience, or Bunthorne's Bride," in the Academy of Music on Thursday evening, January 29. The cast includes the following: Eleanore McManus, Mrs. Muriel Martel, Crescentia Beck, Rosalie Moscony, May Smith, Robert Finley, Eldon Smith Fred Caperoon, Raymond Uhl and J. Brooks Greenwood. The accompaniment will be played by members of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

For the first time in four years the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in ~~Philadelphia tomorrow~~ evening at the Academy of Music. The concert given to the members of the Forum, will be under the direction of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. The programme includes Bach's Concerto in D major, arranged by Steinberg; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture; the DeBussy "Noctournes" and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

JAN 26 1925

Fair Coloratura Here And Noted Orchestra Conductor

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be heard here for the first time with that orchestra Tuesday at Poli's.

Mabel Garrison, coloratura soprano, whose recital at the Na-at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's ... Droop's Thirteenth and

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 25 1925

Regarding Conductors

Wilhelm Furtwaengler has stirred up considerably the orchestra-conductor situation hereabouts. His first appearance brought him a deserved ovation * * * in recognition of a unique accomplishment. Then came a second leading of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, following by a third and a fourth. With each effort demonstrated his place in the symphony field. He can now be pronounced by Americans who never before observed his endeavors to be one of the first of living conductors. Whether the Philharmonic will be able to arrange to have him come permanently to this city remains to be seen.

In the meantime Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artistic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitzky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a striving of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

JAN 26 1925

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

Serge Koussevitzky, the celebrated new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance here next Tuesday afternoon, January 27, at 4:30, at Poli's Theater, the occasion of this orchestra's only visit to Washington this season. The concert is under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris, and previously in Russia, where he has traveled far and wide with the orchestra that bore his name.

In America Koussevitzky has made another conquest—both sudden and complete.

The program will include a Concerto for Orchestra in D major, by Philip Emanuel Bach, arranged in more [illegible] instrumentation by Maximilian Steinberg; Berlioz' Overture "The Roman Carnival;" Debussy's two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals;" and Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" in A major.

Remaining seats on sale at Mrs. Greene's Concert Bureau, Droops.

MUSIC FETE TOMORROW

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 26 192

Boston Symphony

Worcester musical people have come to look forward with interest to the visit to this city of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the most famous organization of musicians in this country. In fact it is doubtful if there is an equal of the Boston Symphony orchestra the world over. It comes to Mechanics hall Tuesday evening, Feb. 17. Last season under the direction of Pierre Momteaux, it rose to heights of musical grandeur in the performance of the famous symphonies.

This season the orchestra has for its conductor Serge Koussevitzky, the famed Russian musician who has maintained the high standard of the organization and introduced many new scores from his own country, two of them being the prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a cherzo from the opera "Tsar Saltan." Both of these compositions have scored tremendously in the Boston Symphony programs.

Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture is one of the numbers for the Worcester concert. The opening number is C. P. E. Bach's "Concerto in D Major," three movements, and the symphony is Tchaikovsky's "Fifth in E Minor."

Koussevitzky's connection with the orchestra began at the opening of the symphony season, and last week he signed an agreement for another year with the Boston Symphony, which is hailed by the Boston public as most welcome news.

There is to be a subscription sale of seats, orders to be sent to the Boston office, Symphony hall, and the public sale opens at Steinert's Monday, Feb. 2.

NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 26 1925

SUPERB RECITAL BY ROLAND HAYES

Negro Tenor's Artistry Manifested at Capitol Concert.

Roland Hayes, celebrated Negro tenor, making his first appearance in this city since he attained world wide fame, was heard in recital at the Capitol theater yesterday afternoon. Mr. Hayes's return to Hartford was the occasion for one of the most interesting musical events of the season here up to the present time. Many lovers of music, attracted by the extraordinary artistry of the singer, were in attendance. Nor did Mr. Hayes disappoint, and his singing left an impression which was altogether favorable.

Mr. Hayes yesterday made his third appearance in this city, although few remember his other recitals here, so little comment did they arouse at the time. He sang first at Unity hall, and, about four years ago, gave a recital at Center church house under colored auspices. At that time he was entirely unknown, and the audiences that he attracted were exceedingly small. Yesterday all was changed. The singer, famous after his triumphs in England and in other parts of Europe, and also well known in his native land by reason of his recitals in various cities and because of his numerous appearances as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, returned to gather the rewards which should have been his long before, and modestly accepted the ovation which was given him by an audience, every one of which, was attracted by the high musicianship of the singer who, in 1920, arrived in England without money enough to buy food, but who, a few weeks later, achieved fame, almost over night.

Mr. Hayes's consistent growth in his artistic impulses was well illustrated by means of as finely a selected program as has ever been heard in this city. An artist of the highest grade, Mr. Hayes has been endowed by nature with a tenor voice of unusual purity and sweetness of tone. Other tenors may surpass him for brilliancy and dramatic power but for devotion to the better things of music Mr. Hayes is setting a noteworthy example which other singers of the present day and generation would do well to follow. In practically every number Mr. Hayes yesterday seemed to always feel what he sang and his interpretative work was admirable throughout. In the expression of emotions of the finer sort he cannot be surpassed, and he gave throughout a performance which surely deserved the enthusiastic applause which it received.

Mr. Hayes presented a program which was well calculated to show his musical ability at its best. Beginning with the classic "Gedenke Doch, Mein Geist Zuruck," by Bach, he next substituted the beautiful "Adelaide" by Beethoven for the same composer's "With a Painted Ribbon," which ap-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

MERIDEN,
CONN.
RECORD

JAN 26 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN HARTFORD FEBRUARY 1

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to Hartford next Sunday afternoon, February 1, after an absence of two years it will be heard under the most favorable circumstances in its long and honorable career. The Capitol theater is the locale and needless to say the best auditorium in Hartford to acoustics and comfort, and then again the house is large which permits a scale of prices that is well within the reach of all. This orchestral treat is further enhanced by the first Hartford appearance of Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestras new conductor and the only Russian who has led the orchestra. Mr. Kaussevitsky came to this country at the beginning of the season and his every appearance has called forth the most glowing praise for his masterly and artistic direction. His coming is one of the outstanding musical events of the year. The Boston Symphony concert is positively the only orchestral event of the season. The seats are now on sale at Sedwick & Casey's 139 Asylum street, Hartford. The advance sale indicates a sold out house although at this time it is still possible to obtain good seats. Mail orders will be accepted from out of town patrons.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 26 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY

Director of Boston Symphony Introduces Russian Music.

Two excerpts from the music of Russia, virtually unknown to the western world until Koussevitzky introduced them, will be included on the program of his first appearance here as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The principal monuments of the genius of Moussorgsky are the two operas, "Boris Godunov" and "Khovantchina." The prelude to the latter, which is to be played, depicts the coming dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moccow. The piece has its distinct color and mood suggestive of the subject.

"The Flight of the Bumble Bee" is a little scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan," in which a prince transforms himself into a bee for his own purposes. This tiny piece exacts an aerial lightness and fleetness from the wood wind which is a marvel of virtuosity. Its charm is evident from the fact that when Mr. Koussevitzky performed it in Boston an encore was demanded and granted for the first time since the first beginnings of the orchestra, forty years ago. The seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street.

The concert will be heard at the Capitol theater next Sunday afternoon. It is announced that the concert will begin at 3 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

JAN 26 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING

The booking of the famed Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 pieces, for its annual Worcester concert in Mechanics' hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, is announced. It not only gives Worcester opportunity to hear one of the greatest musical organizations in the world, but also to see the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who has signed a contract for another year with the orchestra.

Many reports of the striking abilities of Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, of Paris, and of Russia, where he had traveled with the orchestra that bore his name. And in America, Koussevitzky has made another conquest. The Worcester program is exceptionally attractive, including Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. There is a subscription sale of seats at the Boston office, Symphony hall, and the public sale opens at Steinert's, Monday, Feb. 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 26 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Two excerpts from the music of Russia, virtually unknown to the western world until Koussevitsky introduced them, will be included on the program of his first appearance here as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The principal monuments of the genius of Moussorgsky are the two operas, "Boris Godunov" and "Khovantchina." The prelude to the latter which is to be played, depicts the coming of dawn over Red square in the Kremlin, Moscow. The piece has its distinct color and mood suggestive of the subject.

"The Flight of the Bumble Bee," is a little scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan" in which a prince transforms himself int a bee for his own puropses. This tiny piece exacts an aerial lightness and fleetness from the wood wind which is a marvel of virtuosity. Its charm is evident from the fact that when Mr. Koussevitsky performed it in Boston an encore was demanded and granted for the first time since the beginning of the orchestra. Forty years ago. The concert will be heard in the Capitol Theater next Sunday afternoon. It is announced to begin at 3 p. m. The seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's Music store, No. 139 Asylum street.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Eve. Public Ledger

JAN 27 1925

HITS WORLD DISLIKE OF MODERN MUSIC

Serge Koussevitzky Declares Paris Is Most Receptive to New Composers

FINDS U. S. APPRECIATIVE

The worldwide dislike for new music is nothing new; it has been much the same since the days of the early composers, Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, declares.

The orchestra played last night at the Academy of Music before members of the Philadelphia Forum.

"It is curious, this world-wide distaste for hearing new music," Mr. Koussevitzky said. "But it is not a new phenomenon. Those who applaud Brahms now would not listen to him twenty-five years ago.

"So it was with Wagner, and so it has been with many another of whom all the world now applauds. It is not merely a question of the age of the concertgoers—some persons are able to grow old and still stay young in spirit and still keep in sympathy with the development of the world's culture."

Hopeful of American Music

The conductor has high hopes for the future of American music.

"I have already included music by American composers on my programs," he said, "and I hope to do so again."

Paris, he said, is the one great exception to the general rule of dislike for new compositions.

"When I arrange concerts at the opera in Paris," said Mr. Koussevitzky, in his suite at the Ritz-Carlton, "I know that the opera will be filled to the last seat with an audience d'elite such as one can find in no other country and no other city in the world.

"That audience d'elite in the opera in Paris doesn't want to hear Beethoven or Brahms, or Tschaikowsky. It wants to hear programs consisting entirely of new music. Particularly, it wants to hear music that no one ever has heard before. It wants to know what is being created in that moment.

Germany Least Receptive

"There is no audience like it anywhere else! Petrograd and Moscow are more receptive to new music than Germany, for instance. But the general public is much the same in all countries, and wants to hear Beethoven, Brahms and Tschaikowsky, because their music is familiar.

"American audiences?—how do they feel on this matter of hearing present-day music? I find it a little hard to tell. Everywhere I have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra the house has been filled to the last seat, everywhere there has been applause, everywhere the audience seems serious. But until one evening recently when I listened over the radio to Ethel Leginska conducting an orchestra somewhere, and heard the wireless transmit the remarkable bursts of applause, I hadn't believed an American audience could grow so excited.

"In Germany," went on Mr. Koussevitzky, "audiences want to hear nothing at all but German composers. They have no interest in the composers of the rest of the world—except that they like Tschaikowsky. There is no creative spirit music in Germany today."

"How about Richard Strauss?" he was asked.

Calls Strauss Back Figure

"Why," he protested, "Strauss belongs to the last century."

"Yes, there is one present-day foreigner Germans will listen to," went on Mr. Koussevitzky. "That's Stravinsky. They have to listen to him. He has so profound an effect they can't help listening to him. He wins enthusiasm in Germany, but that enthusiasm is from the young, for he appeals to the spirit of youth. But though Stravinsky has won admiration in Germany, the fact remains that composers in Germany today still are working from the old patterns and not creating for themselves."

"In music today, the creative spirit is strongest in France, Italy, Russia, England and Spain."

WASHINGTON,
D. C.
NEWS

JAN 27 1925

MRS. COOLIDGE will attend the concert this afternoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will have as her guest Mrs. Frothingham, wife of Representative Louis A. Frothingham.

Opera Last Night Breaks

Noted Conductor

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

JAN 27 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Famous Orchestra With Koussevitsky as New Conductor, at Academy

After an absence of several years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Philadelphia last evening and gave a concert before members of the Philadelphia Forum, under the leadership of its new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. It was an event of unusual interest and importance, impressive as a prevision of the return to high favor of an orchestra which for many years was regarded as the finest of its kind in this country.

Mr. Kossevitsky is still young, of fair height, good figure, attractive appearance and dignified, ingratiating manner. He is unobtrusive, even reserved in his lack of attempt to display personality apart from the complete personnel of the orchestra. This trait is apparent also in the absence of any courting of applause, even for the orchestra, and praisworthy was his effort, to a large degree successful, in preventing the annoying interruption of hand-clapping between the movements or parts of a composition. Thus the Concerto for Orchestra in D Major of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, which opened the program, and the Symphony in A Major, No. 7, of Beethoven, which closed it were the more to be enjoyed by the discriminating listeners because carried through without such disturbance. Between these selections were placed "The Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz, and the now familiar two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," of Debussy.

The Bach concerto served very effectually in introducing a portion of the orchestra. but most beautiful of all was the interpretation of the Debussy nocturnes, exquisite in shading and delicacy of effect, graced by the loveliest of pianissimo, which Koussevitsky produces with rare skill.

The conductor's precision, his attention to detail, the inclination to deliberate and make no start till all is ready and everything "just so," again were evident in his presentation of the Beethoven symphony. There was no extravagance of gesture, no waste of energy nor slightest suggestion of self conscious pose. If there were bits of raggedness in the playing of the orchestra, an absence at times of that complete unison and luscious richness and mellowness of tone that Philadelphia symphony concert audiences are accustomed to hear, there was still superb musicianship on the part of a splendid instrument, in response to a conductor who knows how to use such fine material to the best advantage.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

JAN 27 1925

* * *

MRS. COOLIDGE ATTENDS BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mrs. Coolidge will attend the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Poli's Theater this afternoon. With her will be Mrs. Louis Frothingham, wife of Congressman Frothingham, of Massachusetts.

* * *

The Italian Ambassador, Prince

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 27 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A program which should reveal to particular advantage the manifold qualities of its new leader is to be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at the Capitol theater next Sunday afternoon, February 1, at 3 o'clock. The principal number on the program will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. The truly magnificent and deeply moving interpretation of this great score by Koussevitzky on the occasion of a pension fund concert in Boston last December proved an outstanding event in the very remarkable Symphony season.

Koussevitzy will begin the concert with a Concert for Orchestra in D major, for string orchestra, by Philip Emanuel Bach, the most talented son of J. S. Boch. The score was edited by Maximilian Steinberg. The reading reveals Koussevitzky's peculiar power of revivifying the so-called classics. Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture is chosen from the program of Koussevitzky's American debut last October Two Russian numbers of particular charm are also to be played, the prelude to "Khovantchina" by Mussorgsky and "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." These pieces have been introduced to our public by the Russian leader.

The seat sale is now in progress at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. The demand is exceedingly heavy and early application is advisable. This is positively the only orcrestral concert of the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

JAN 27 1925

BUT it was, after all, the enthusiasm, the personality, the magnetism and the forcefulness of the Leopold Stokowski which brought the orchestra into national prominence and focused the eyes of musical America upon the band. Of course, Philadelphians displayed great liberality in the matter of support, the Symphony Orchestra Association having for years covered a deficit estimated at $50,000 to $75,000. This association consisted of about 300 men and women prominent in social and artistic affairs. The lavishness of the city not only enabled the director to engage such instrumentalists in this country as in his opinion would add to the strength of the organization, but to recruit from the best talent afforded by Europe.

The importance of directors has been shown in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which latter, though it did not lack very able and earnest conductors after the departure of Karl Muck, none the less languished because the personality of these leaders was not of a sufficiently outstanding nature to maintain the orchestra in the position it had gained after years of large financial sacrifices and cumulative effort.

In any discussion of the benefits of a symphony orchestra of national reputation to a city it must not be forgotten that such an organization costs lots of money and that furthermore the local atmosphere must be of a character to attract musicians of eminence who can find there a receptive field for their activities outside of their work with the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

JAN 27 1925

A CHANGE has been made in the program to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night at the Lyric, this being the substitution of the Tschaikowsky Fifth Symphony for the Beethoven Symphony No. 7 in A major. The rest of the program stands as it has been announced. Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conducot, will wield the baton.

SALE of seats for the fifth concert of the season of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra on Sunday evening, February 8, at 8.30 o'clock at the Lyric opens at Albaugh's tomorrow. Henry Hadley, one of the most distinguished composers in the United States, will be guest conductor on this occasion and will open the program with his own composition, the "North, East, South and West" Symphony. This symphony was composed at the suggestion of Carl Stoeckel, founder of the Norfolk (Conn.) festival, who, while on a visit to Frederick R. Huber several years ago, presented the parts to the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra for its first performance on March 2, 1919. This will be Mr. Hadley's first public appearance in Baltimore.

Philadelphia Papers January 27

Morning Ledger

JANUARY 27, 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS A GALA RETURN

Performance Scores Big Success Under the Direction of Koussevitsky

Serge Koussevitsky—himself—at the head of the rejuvenated Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared in the Academy of Music last evening before a Forum audience that filled the building to the last seat. He scored a great popular success for himself and the orchestra in a program which contained only a single one of the works for the reading of which he is most famous, although the program did demand four varied styles of interpretation and of conducting. It consisted of a "concerto" for orchestra by Carl Phillipp Emanuel Bach, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg; the Berlioz overture, "Roman Carnival"; two of the Debussy nocturnes for orchestra, "Clouds" and "Fetes," and the Beethoven Symphony in A major (No. 7).

Of these numbers Mr. Koussevitsky was at his best in the "Fetes" of Debussy of which he gave a magnificent reading, the little march in the middle section being beautifully taken as to tempo, which does not always happen, and the spirit of the whole movement being in full accord with the intention of the composer as expressed in the score. The "Clouds" seemed to be a bit gray and heavy in parts of the orchestral coloring, although there were some exquisite spots in it. Bach was taken in the strictly classic style and while it is not a great work, it served admirably to show the versatility of Mr. Koussevitsky, who has made his great reputation largely as the exponent of the modern.

The Berlioz "Roman Carnival" was beautifully read, although it seemed that here and there were places in which the orchestra failed to realize altogether the ideals of the conductor. The close of the work was especially effective albeit a trifle sensational. The Beethoven symphony was interpreted generally in the traditional style, although there was no lack of original touches in the reading. The last movement was taken at a terrific tempo and with a verve which almost justified the hysterical declaration of Richard Wagner that it is the mythical "eleventh variation." But it enabled the concert to close in a blaze of glory.

As a conductor, Mr. Koussevitski is, first of all, an intense individualist. He will apparently not hesitate to make such changes of tempo or nuance as suits him to do, provided the effect gained thereby is what he wishes. But at the same time, musical sincerity is shown in every element of his conducting. Such changes as he makes are apparently for the purpose of reading the great masterpieces of the musical past in the spirit of the present, and not for any mere tonal or emotional effect. Next stands out the tremendous vitality of the man, an intense personality and the self-evident fact that in his conducting he gives of himself even more than he demands from the members of his orchestra — which is plenty.

At the same time, some of the work last evening was uneven. He would rise to tremendous heights in one passage and in another he did not seem to take his orchestra with him. How much of this is due to the orchestra and how much to the conductor can be said only by those who have heard many of the Boston Symphony concerts. A single hearing can provide no adequate basis of judgment.

As to the orchestra, it can be said only that Mr. Koussevitzky is working with a rejuvenated wreck. Those of us who remember the Boston Orchestra of the days of Muck and Witek and saw—and heard—the fall under the impossible conductors who succeeded, can only marvel that Mr. Koussevitzky has obtained in a few short months the results which he showed last evening. He has that rarest of all orchestral sections—four fine French horns—and he also has that little French group of wood-winds headed by M. Longy which was supreme in its day and still stands second only to the Philadelphia Orchestra. But the Boston organization has little "piano" and no "pianissimo" as compared with our own orchestra. But it has a conductor who knows exactly what he wants and who will know how to get it. Judging somewhat from indications and not entirely from specific results last evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is again very much to the fore among the great American orchestras.

S. L. L.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD, CONN.

COURANT

JAN 27 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

A program which should reveal to particular advantage the manifold qualities of its new leader is to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky at the Capitol Theater next Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. The principal number on the program will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. The truly magnificent and deeply moving interpretation of this great score by Koussevitzky on the occasion of a pension fund concert in Boston last December proved an outstanding event in the very remarkable symphony season.

Koussevitzky will begin the concert with a concert for orchestra in D major, for string orchestra, by Philip Emanuel Bach, the most talented son of J. S. Bach. The score was edited by Maximilian Steinberg. The reading reveals Koussevitzky's peculiar power of revivifying the so-called classics. Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture is chosen from the program of Koussevitzky's American debut last October. Two Russian numbers of particular charm are also to be played, the prelude to "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky, and "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." These pieces have been introduced to the American public by the Russian leader.

This is the only orchestral concert of the season. The seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. The demand is very heavy and early application is advisable.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT A TRIUMPH

It Plays Magnificently Under Serge Koussevitsky's Baton

North American

Before the war the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was regarded as an event. Later visits under recent conductors resolved themselves into mere happenings. Last night for the first time in four years the Boston Symphony gave a concert at the Academy of Music under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitsky, and the occasion again became distinctly an event.

Many reports were heard regarding the Russian conductor's iconoclasm, but last night's program was decorously conventional. It opened with an orchestral "Concerto in D major" by the younger Bach, followed by Belioz's overture "Carnaval Romain," the Debussey tone pictures, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and the Beethoven Seventh Symphony. Every number programmed had doubtless been heard by most of those present dozens of times, so Mr. Koussevitsky's was a double triumph, since he not only played magnificently, but proved that a true musician can always breathe new life in to old compositions.

Apparently every quality that should go to make the ideal conductor is possessed by Koussevitsky; intellect, sensitiveness, a fine sense of line and proportion, and to an extraordinary degree intensity that is controlled. He delights in contrast, but takes care never to anticipate a climax and so rob it of its power. His interpretations are highly individual, but always logical.

While the Berlioz was the most thrillingly worked out, the finest playing of the evening was in the classic Bach and the Debussy. All the old time Boston full richness of strings, with the peculiar velvety texture, was evident. Incidentally, Koussevitsky places his first eight strings immediately around his stand, so that they almost form a circle to receive his often barely indicated wishes.

The Debussy Nocturnes have never been played with more beauty of effect and atmosphere, especially the "Fetes," with its gradually approaching procession, sounded as tho it were coming from a tremendous distance.

After the intermission the orchestra played the Beethoven Symphony which Richard Wagner once described as "the apotheosis of the dance," (but not for conductors). The concert was under the auspices of the Philadelphia Forum.

Evening Ledger 1/27/25

Noted Conductor

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

DECLARES PARIS LIKES NEW MUSIC

Serge Koussevitzky Says Antipathy to Modern Composers Is Not of Recent Date

FINDS U. S. APPRECIATIVE

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, seemed a bit homesick last evening, just before he started for the Academy of Music to delight the Forum members with his orchestra and his conducting.

Not homesick for Russia, but for Paris.

"When I arrange concerts at the opera in Paris," said Mr. Koussevitzky, in his suite at the Ritz-Carlton. "I know that the opera will be filled to the last seat with an audience d'elite such as one can find in no other country and no other city in the world.

"That audience d'elite in the opera in Paris doesn't want to hear Beethoven or Brahms, or Tschaikowsky. It wants to hear programs consisting entirely of new music. Particularly, it wants to hear music that no one ever has heard before. It wants to know what is being created in that moment.

"There is no audience like it anywhere else! Petrograd and Moscow are more receptive to new music than Germany, for instance. But the general public is much the same in all countries, and wants to hear Beethoven, Brahms and Tschaikowsky, because their music is familiar.

"American audiences?—how do they feel on this matter of hearing present-day music? I find it a little hard to tell. Everywhere I have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra the house has been filled to the last seat, everywhere there has been applause, everywhere the audience seems serious. But until one evening recently when I listened over the radio to Ethel Leginska conducting an orchestra somewhere, and heard the wireless transmit the remarkable bursts of applause, I hadn't believed an American audience could grow so excited.

"In Germany," went on Mr. Koussevitzky, "audiences want to hear nothing at all but German composers. They have no interest in the composers of the rest of the world—except that they like Tschaikowsky. There is no creative spirit music in Germany today."

"How about Richard Strauss?" he was asked.

"Why," he protested, "Strauss belongs to the last century."

"Yes, there is one present-day foreigner Germans will listen to," went on Mr. Koussevitzky. "That's Stravinsky. They have to listen to him. He has so profound an effect they can't help listening to him. He wins enthusiasm in Germany, but that enthusiasm is from the young, for he appeals to the spirit of youth. But though Stravinsky has won admiration in Germany, the fact remains that comp[illegible] Germany today still are work[illegible] patterns and not creati[illegible]s.

"It [illegible] world-wide dislike fo[illegible] new music," Mr. Koussevi[illegible]turned to his theme. "But it's not [illegible] new phenomenon. Those who applaud Brahms now wouldn't listen to him twenty-five years ago. So it was with Wagner and so it has been with many another of those all the world now applaud. It's not merely a question of the age of concert-goers—some persons are able to grow old and still stay young in spirit and still keep in sympathy with the development of the world's culture.

"In music today, the creative spirit is strongest in France, Italy, Russia, England and Spain."

Asked about the United States, Mr. Koussev[illegible]id that already in his concert[illegible]n he has included musi[illegible] composers on his pr[illegible] to do so again of[illegible]

Evening Ledger 1/27/25

BOSTON SYMPHONY STAGES COME-BACK

Orchestra Under Koussevitsky Gives Indications of Returning to Forefront

Serge Koussevitsky—himself—at the head of the rejuvenated Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared in the Academy of Music last evening before a Forum audience that filled the building to the last seat. He scored a great popular success for himself and the orchestra in a program which contained only a single one of the works for the reading of which he is most famous, although the program did demand four varied styles of interpretation and of conducting. It consisted of a "concerto" for orchestra by Carl Phillipp Emanuel Bach, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg; the Berlioz overture, "Roman Carnival"; two of the Debussy nocturnes for orchestra, "Clouds" and "Fetes," and the Beethoven Symphony in A major (No. 7).

Of these numbers Mr. Koussevitsky was at his best in the "Fetes" of Debussy of which he gave a magnificent reading, the little march in the middle section being beautifully taken as to tempo, which does not always happen, and the spirit of the whole movement being in full accord with the intention of the composer as expressed in the score. The "Clouds" seemed to be a bit gray and heavy in parts of the orchestral coloring, although there were some exquisite spots in it. Bach was taken in the strictly classic style and while it is not a great work, it served admirably to show the versatility of Mr. Koussevitsky, who has made his great reputation largely as the exponent of the modern.

Program Closes Strong

The Berlioz "Roman Carnival" was beautifully read, although it seemed that here and there were places in which the orchestra failed to realize altogether the ideals of the conductor. The close of the work was especially effective albeit a trifle sensational. The Beethoven symphony was interpreted generally in the traditional style, although there was no lack of original touches in the reading. The last movement was taken at a terrific tempo and with a verve which almost justified the hysterical declaration of Richard Wagner that it is the mythical "eleventh variation." But it enabled the concert to close in a blaze of glory.

As a conductor, Mr. Koussevitski is, first of all, an intense individualist. He will apparently not hesitate to make such changes of tempo or nuance as suits him to do, provided the effect gained thereby is what he wishes. But at the same time, musical sincerity is shown in every element of his conducting. Such changes as he makes are apparently for the purpose of reading the great masterpieces of the musical past in the spirit of the present, and not for any mere tonal or emotional effect. Next stands out the tremendous vitality of the man, an intense personality and the self-evident fact that in his conducting he gives of himself even more than he demands from the members of his orchestra — which is plenty.

Some of Work Uneven

At the same time, some of the work last evening was uneven. He would rise to tremendous heights in one passage and in another he did not seem to take his orchestra with him. How much of this is due to the orchestra and how much to the conductor can be said only by those who have heard many of the Boston Symphony concerts. A single hearing can provide no adequate basis of judgment.

As to the orchestra, it can be said only that Mr. Koussevitzky is working with a rejuvenated wreck. Those of us who remember the Boston Orchestra of the days of Muck and Witek and saw—and heard—the fall under the impossible conductors who succeeded, can only marvel that Mr. Koussevitzky has obtained in a few short months the results which he showed last evening. He has that rarest of all orchestral sections—four fine French horns—and he also has that little French group of wood-winds headed by M. Longy which was supreme in its day and still stands second only to the Philadelphia Orchestra. But the Boston organization has little "piano" and no "pianissimo" as compared with our own orchestra. But it has a conductor who knows exactly what he wants and who will know how to get it. Judging somewhat from indications and not entirely from specific results last evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is again very much to the fore among the great American orchestras.

S. L. L.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR THE FORUM

Record

Welcome Given to Organization After Long Absence Here.

The enterprising manager of the Philadelphia Forum made possible for an audience here what everyone interested in music has devoutly longed for—a hearing of the rehabilitated Boston Orchestra, under its famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. The Boston Orchestra, for many years a pioneer in orchestral playing here, was forced four years ago to withdraw from Philadelphia. Owing to the many vicissitudes endured after the death of the patron of the orchestra, the late Colonel Higginson, and the lack of popularity of the conductors succeeding the great Dr. Carl Muck, patronage for the Boston organization fell away until, in the judgment of the manager, it was necessary to discontinue the concerts, which for years had been the leading musical events of this city.

The Boston Orchestra is once more the great instrument it was formerly. It has a conductor who ranks with the world's finest, and at the Academy of Music last night Koussevitsky compelled the most enthusiastic response from an audience which appeared to recognize at once the gifts of a really endowed musician and sat fascinated through a program designed for a musical clientele. The Forum audience is enjoying a series of five concerts and indicates a love and appreciation of music, but it is not the critical gathering found at the regular symphonic concerts. Koussevitsky's triumph, therefore, was all the more remarkable and gratifying. He was recalled to the stage repeatedly and, although the concert for some reason did not get under way until almost 9 o'clock and the symphony had not begun at the hour we are accustomed to consider the proper time for leaving a symphony concert, there was no evidence of impatience in anything, but the greatest interest in everything played by the orchestra.

The program comprised the Bach Concerto for orchestra in D major, arranged by Maximillian Steinberg; the "Roman Carnival," overture of Berlioz; two Debussy nocturnes, "Nonages" and "Fetes," and after the intermission the Beethoven A major symphony. As a conductor Koussevitsky has dignity and poise, does not indulge in superfluous motions and exhibits a marked tendency toward allowing the musicians most of the credit for the many extraordinary tonal effects evolved. He arranges his orchestra differently from other conductors, having the first and second violins and the first 'cello desks almost in a circle about him. It gives him the appearance of being surrounded by musicians, instead of facing them from the usual distance, and has the effect of a much more intimate group of artists. The most strikingly characteristic interpretations last night were those given the Debussy nocturnes. Nothing more exquisite has ever been heard from an orchestra here than the delicate, illusive dream-like texture of the first nocturne, "Nonages." The deliberation with which Koussevitsky painted this scene for his audience, the shimmer and glow and ravishing tone color produced a perfect storm of applause. Even more than the gayety and rhythmic contagion of the "Festivals" was this pastel hued scene enjoyed. The "Fetes" was extraordinarily well done, the visionary procession coming out with startling clearness and beauty. It seemed strange that a Forum audience could become so wildly enthusiastic over Debussy and only goes to prove that in the manner in which such music is presented lies the secret of making it popular.

The Beethoven Seventh Symphony was another great triumph for the musicians and doubtless many leaving the Academy last night nourished the hope of a series of concerts from the Boston Orchestra next year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BALTIMORE, MD.

AMERICAN

JAN 28 192

Boston Symphony Here In Concert Tonight

THE only Baltimore appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the season will take place tonight at the Lyric, when the famous organization plays under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the new director. Koussevitzky's appearance in Boston, New York and other cities have created a furore and at the moment he is the most talked of figure in the musical world of this country.

The symphony will be the Fifth of Tchaikowsky in E minor and Koussevitzky's interpretation of his fellow countryman's great work is eagerly awaited. Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor for string orchestra and solo string quartet also is on the program. A novelty will be Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

It is understood that plans are afoot to bring the Boston here next season for a short series of concerts.

---

ce.

Newman wrote not long ago:

at Mrs. Wilson-

Philadelphia Papers January -27 25

NEW YORK TIMES 21

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Eve. Public Ledger

JAN 27 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY STAGES COME-BACK

Orchestra Under Koussevitsky Gives Indications of Returning to Forefront

Serge Koussevitsky—himself—at the head of the rejuvenated Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared in the Academy of Music last evening before a Forum audience that filled the building to the last seat. He scored a great popular success for himself and the orchestra in a program which contained only a single one of the works for the reading of which he is most famous, although the program did demand four varied styles of interpretation and of conducting. It consisted of a "concerto" for orchestra by Carl Phillipp Emanuel Bach, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg; the Berlioz overture, "Roman Carnival"; two of the Debussy nocturnes for orchestra, "Clouds" and "Fetes," and the Beethoven Symphony in A major (No. 7).

Of these numbers Mr. Koussevitsky was at his best in the "Fetes" of Debussy of which he gave a magnificent reading, the little march in the middle section being beautifully taken as to tempo, which does not always happen, and the spirit of the whole movement being in full accord with the intention of the composer as expressed in the score. The "Clouds" seemed to be a bit gray and heavy in parts of the orchestral coloring, although there were some exquisite spots in it. Bach was taken in the strictly classic style and while it is not a great work, it served admirably to show the versatility of Mr. Koussevitsky, who has made his great reputation largely as the exponent of the modern.

Program Closes Strong

The Berlioz "Roman Carnival" was beautifully read, although it seemed that here and there were places in which the orchestra failed to realize altogether the ideals of the conductor. The close of the work was especially effective albeit a trifle sensational. The Beethoven symphony was interpreted generally in the traditional style, although there was no lack of original touches in the reading. The last movement was taken at a terrific tempo and with a verve which almost justified the hysterical declaration of Richard Wagner that it is the mythical "eleventh variation." But it enabled the concert to close in a blaze of glory.

As a conductor, Mr. Koussevitski is, first of all, an intense individualist. He will apparently not hesitate to make such changes of tempo or nuance as suits him to do, provided the effect gained thereby is what he wishes. But at the same time, musical sincerity is shown in every element of his conducting. Such changes as he makes are apparently for the purpose of reading the great masterpieces of the musical past in the spirit of the present, and not for any mere tonal or emotional effect. Next stands out the tremendous vitality of the man, an intense personality and the self-evident fact that in his conducting he gives of himself even more than he demands from the members of his orchestra — which is plenty.

Some of Work Uneven

At the same time, some of the work last evening was uneven. He would rise to tremendous heights in one passage and in another he did not seem to take his orchestra with him. How much of this is due to the orchestra and how much to the conductor can be said only by those who have heard many of the Boston Symphony concerts. A single hearing can provide no adequate basis of judgment.

As to the orchestra, it can be said only that Mr. Koussevitzky is working with a rejuvenated wreck. Those of us who remember the Boston Orchestra of the days of Muck and Witek and saw—and heard—the fall under the impossible conductors who succeeded, can only marvel that Mr. Koussevitzky has obtained in a few short months the results which he showed last evening. He has that rarest of all orchestral sections—four fine French horns—and he also has that little French group of wood-winds headed by M. Longy which was supreme in its day and still stands second only to the Philadelphia Orchestra. But the Boston organization has little "piano" and no "pianissimo" as compared with our own orchestra. But it has a conductor who knows exactly what he wants and who will know how to get it. Judging somewhat from indications and not entirely from specific results last evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is again very much to the fore among the great American orchestras.

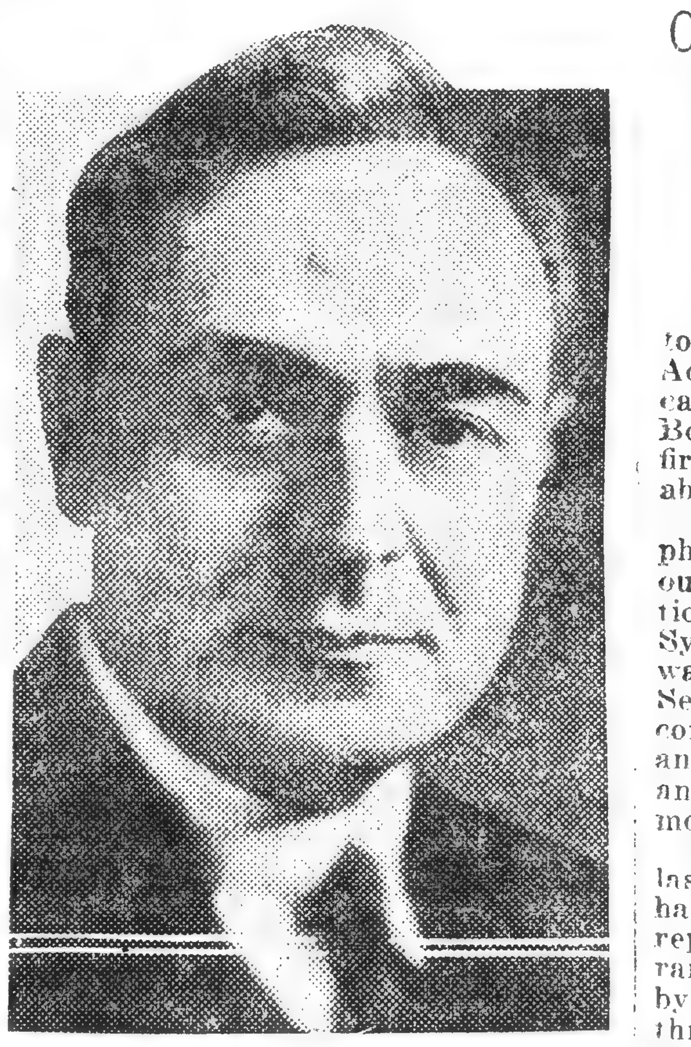
S. L. L.

Morning Ledger 1/27/25

HILADELPHIA, TUESDAY MORNING,

Paris Audiences Most Cordial to New Music, Says Koussevitzky

Antipathy to Modern Writers Not a New Condition, Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Declares. Finds American Listeners Appreciative



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, seemed a bit homesick last evening, just before he started for the Academy of Music to delight the Forum members with his orchestra and his conducting.

Not homesick for Russia, but for Paris.

"When I arrange concerts at the opera in Paris," said Mr. Koussevitzky, in his suite at the Ritz-Carlton. "I know that the opera will be filled to the last seat with an audience d'elite such as one can find in no other country and no other city in the world.

"That audience d'elite in the opera in Paris doesn't want to hear Beethoven or Brahms, or Tschaikowsky. It wants to hear programs consisting entirely of new music. Particularly, it wants to hear music that no one ever has heard before. It wants to know what is being created in that moment.

There is no audience like it anywhere else! Petrograd and Moscow are more receptive to new music than Germany, for instance. But the general public is much the same in all countries, and wants to hear Beethoven, Brahms and Tschaikowsky, because their music is familiar.

"American audiences?—how do they feel on this matter of hearing present-day music? I find it a little hard to tell. Everywhere I have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra the house has been filled to the last seat, everywhere there has been applause, everywhere the audience seems serious. But until one evening recently when I listened over the radio to Ethel Leginska conducting an orchestra somewhere, and heard the wireless transmit the remarkable bursts of applause, I hadn't believed an American audience could grow so excited."

"In Germany," went on Mr. Kousevitzky, "audiences want to hear nothing at all but German composers. They have no interest in the composers of the rest of the world—except that they like Tschaikowsky. "There is no creative spirit music in Germany today."

"How about Richard Strauss?" he was asked.

"Why," he protested, "Strauss belongs to the last century."

"Yes, there is one present-day foreigner Germans will listen to," went on Mr. Koussevitzky. "That's Stravinsky. They have to listen to him. He has so profound an effect they can't help listening to him. He wins enthusiasm in Germany, but that enthusiasm is from the young, for he appeals to the spirit of youth. But though Stravinsky has won admiration in Germany, the fact remains that composers in Germany today still are working from the old patterns and not creating for themselves.

"It's curious—that world-wide dislike for hearing new music." Mr. Koussevitsky returned to his theme. "But it's not a new phenomenon. Those who applaud Brahms now wouldn't listen to him twenty-five years ago. So it was with Wagner and so it has been with many another of those all the world now applaud. It's not merely a question of the age of concert-goers—some persons are able to grow old and still stay young in spirit and still keep in sympathy with the development of the world's culture.

"In music today, the creative spirit is strongest in France, Italy, Russia, England and Spain."

Asked about the United States, Mr. Koussevitsky said that already in his concerts in Boston he has included music by American composers on his programs and hopes to do so again often.

Inquirer 1/27/25
4 b c

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY RECEIVES OVATION

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heartily Welcomed After Absence of Four Years

Cortot, in Recital, Plays Moussorgsky's "Pictures From an Exhibition"

By STANLEY MUSCHAMP.

The Philadelphia Forum presented to its members last evening in the Academy of Music another of its musical offerings. On this occasion the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first local appearance after four years' absence.

The history of music in Philadelphia cannot be completely told without the writer allowing a goodly section for the part which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played. It was quite the expected thing when Serge Koussevitzky stepped upon the conductor's dias; that he should receive an ovation, partly on his own account and partly for that for which the famous band of musicians represent.

The programme which was given last evening contained numbers which have become familiar through many repetitions and included a splendid arrangement of a Concerto in D major by C. P. E. Bach, which has passed through the hands of Maximillian Steinberg; Berlioz overture to "The Roman Carnival"; the two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," by De Bussy; and after the intermission, the A major symphony of Beethoven. Nothing of the newer composers with which the name of Koussevitzky has been associated.

Koussevitzky—New Conductor

The personality of Serge Koussevitzky impresses one upon first meeting as that of a scholarly musician, whose directions though individual, are not far enough removed from the good traditions to be indicative of eccentricity of manner or interpretation of the various musics. The indications of his beat, numerous, sometimes frequent and again less so, ofttimes leaving the players to carry on the work until the need of leadership remanifests itself. The interpretation of the several works listed revealed nothing new. They were intelligent, expressive and arrived at the climaxes with sufficient force to be effective without offending good taste.

After each number and at the completion of the programme, M. Koussevitzky was recalled many times bowing his acknowledgments and enjoining the orchestra to rise in receiving the applause of the crowded auditorium.

Bulletin 1/27/25

THE EVENING

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Famous Orchestra With Koussevitsky as New Conductor, at Academy

After an absence of several years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Philadelphia last evening and gave a concert before members of the Philadelphia Forum, under the leadership of its new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. It was an event of unusual interest and importance, impressive as a prevision of the return to high favor of an orchestra which for many years was regarded as the finest of its kind in this country. That the Boston Orchestra still is a magnificent organization was in evidence, and the capacity audience had full justification for the enthusiastic applause bestowed with particularity upon the distinguished Russian who now is at its head.

Mr. Kossevitsky is still young, of fair height, good figure, attractive appearance and dignified, ingratiating manner. He is unobtrusive, even reserved in his lack of attempt to display personality apart from the complete personnel of the orchestra. This trait is apparent also in the absence of any courting of applause, even for the orchestra, and praiseworthy was his effort, to a large degree successful, in preventing the annoying interruption of hand-clapping between the movements or parts of a composition. Thus the Concerto for Orchestra in D Major of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, which opened the program, and the Symphony in A Major, No. 7, of Beethoven, which closed it were the more to be enjoyed by the discriminating listeners because carried through without such disturbance. Between these selections were placed "The Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz, and the now familiar two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," of Debussy.

The Bach concerto served very effectually in introducing a portion of the orchestra, but most beautiful of all was the interpretation of the Debussy nocturnes, exquisite in shading and delicacy of effect, graced by the loveliest of pianissimo, which Koussevitsky produces with rare skill.

The conductor's precision, his attention to detail, the inclination to deliberate and make no start till all is ready and everything "just so," again were evident in his presentation of the Beethoven symphony. There was no extravagance of gesture, no waste of energy nor slightest suggestion of self conscious pose. If there were bits of raggedness in the playing of the orchestra, an absence at times of that complete unison and luscious richness and mellowness of tone that Philadelphia symphony concert audiences are accustomed to hear, there was still superb musicianship on the part of a splendid instrument, in response to a conductor who knows how to use such fine material to the best advantage.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WORCESTER
MASS.
POST

28 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT NOTABLE

All 104 Players Coming in Fine Program

The annual visit to Worcester of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the outstanding musical events of this season. After an absence of several years, the Boston Symphony came back to Worcester last season and had one of the largest audiences it has had in Worcester. This year it comes on the evening of Tuesday, Feb. 17, and with it comes Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor, whose name is discussed throughout musical America, for he is regarded as one of the greatest conductors who has come to these shores.

The orchestra comprises 104 pieces and every one of them will be on the stage of Mechanics Hall. The program has been announced, and it is commented on as one of the best offered by an orchestra. It opens with C. P. E. Bach's Concerto for orchestra in D major, includes three short numbers, two of them Russian novelties which have created much interest in the country, and the symphony to be played is Tchaikovsky's Fifth in E. minor.

The subscription sale of seats is being taken care of at the Boston office, Symphony Hall, and the public sale opens at Steinert's Monday, Feb. 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE,
MD.
EVE. SUN

JAN 28 1925

Boston Symphony Program Changed

Several changes have been made in the program to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, at the Lyric tonight. As at first announced, the concert was to have opened with the Bach "Fantasia and Fugue" in C minor. Under the rearrangement the first number will be Haendel's "Concerto Grosso" in D minor, Opus 6, No. 10, for string orchestra and solo string quartet. Instead of Moussorgsky's prelude to "Kovantchina" will be played that composer's "Pictures at an Exhibition," in which Maurice Ravel has set the Russian's piano suite for full orchestra, especially for Koussevitzky, who introduced the score to various European audiences last spring. The pictures are "promenade," "gnome," "the Tuilieries," "Bydlo," "Ballet of Chickens in Their Shells," Samuel Goldberg and Schmuyle," "the Catacombs, "the Hut On Fowls Legs" and "the Great Gate at Kiev." The symphony, as has already been stated, will be the Fifth Tschaikowsky in E minor.

Students To Give Concert.

The second concert of the season by students of the European conservatory, Henri Weinreich, director, will take place next Friday evening at the conservatory on St. Paul street. A number of composers are represented on the program to be given by violin and piano students, and there will also be a vocal number.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WASHINGTON,
D. C.
NEWS

JAN 28 1925

Boston Symphony Is Reborn

Koussevitsky Gives Fire and Intensity in Appearance Here

By DICK ROOT

Once the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the outstanding musical organization of its kind in this country; under the marvelous fire, intensity and poise of its new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, it has been born again.

Koussevitsky is, without doubt, a man of feeling and power, yet free from pedantry. Poli's was filled to capacity yesterday and a Washington audience for once forgot the clock and sat till 6:30, enthralled, and somewhat startled, by the senorities drawn from noble instruments by Koussevitsky.

Bach, Berlioz, Debussy and the Beethoven Symphony in A major, were played. The two nocturnes by Debussy were splendid with color.

Mrs. Lawrence Townsend gave the fourth in her series of morning musicals today at Rauscher's at 11:30. Oscar Seagle, baritone, of New York, appeared.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 28

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Serge Koussevitzky, the eminent new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be first heard in Hartford at the pending visit of this organization for a concert in the Capitol Theater next Sunday afternoon, February 1 at 3 o'clock. Preceded to America by the most glowing reports from Europe, Kussevitzky has made another conquest both sudden and complete over—every series is subscribed and seats for the Boston Symphony concerts are at a premium. Naturally, much was expected of Serge Koussevitzky. His qualities have exceeded all expectations. In Boston, New York, and each city he has visited, the effect has been electric.

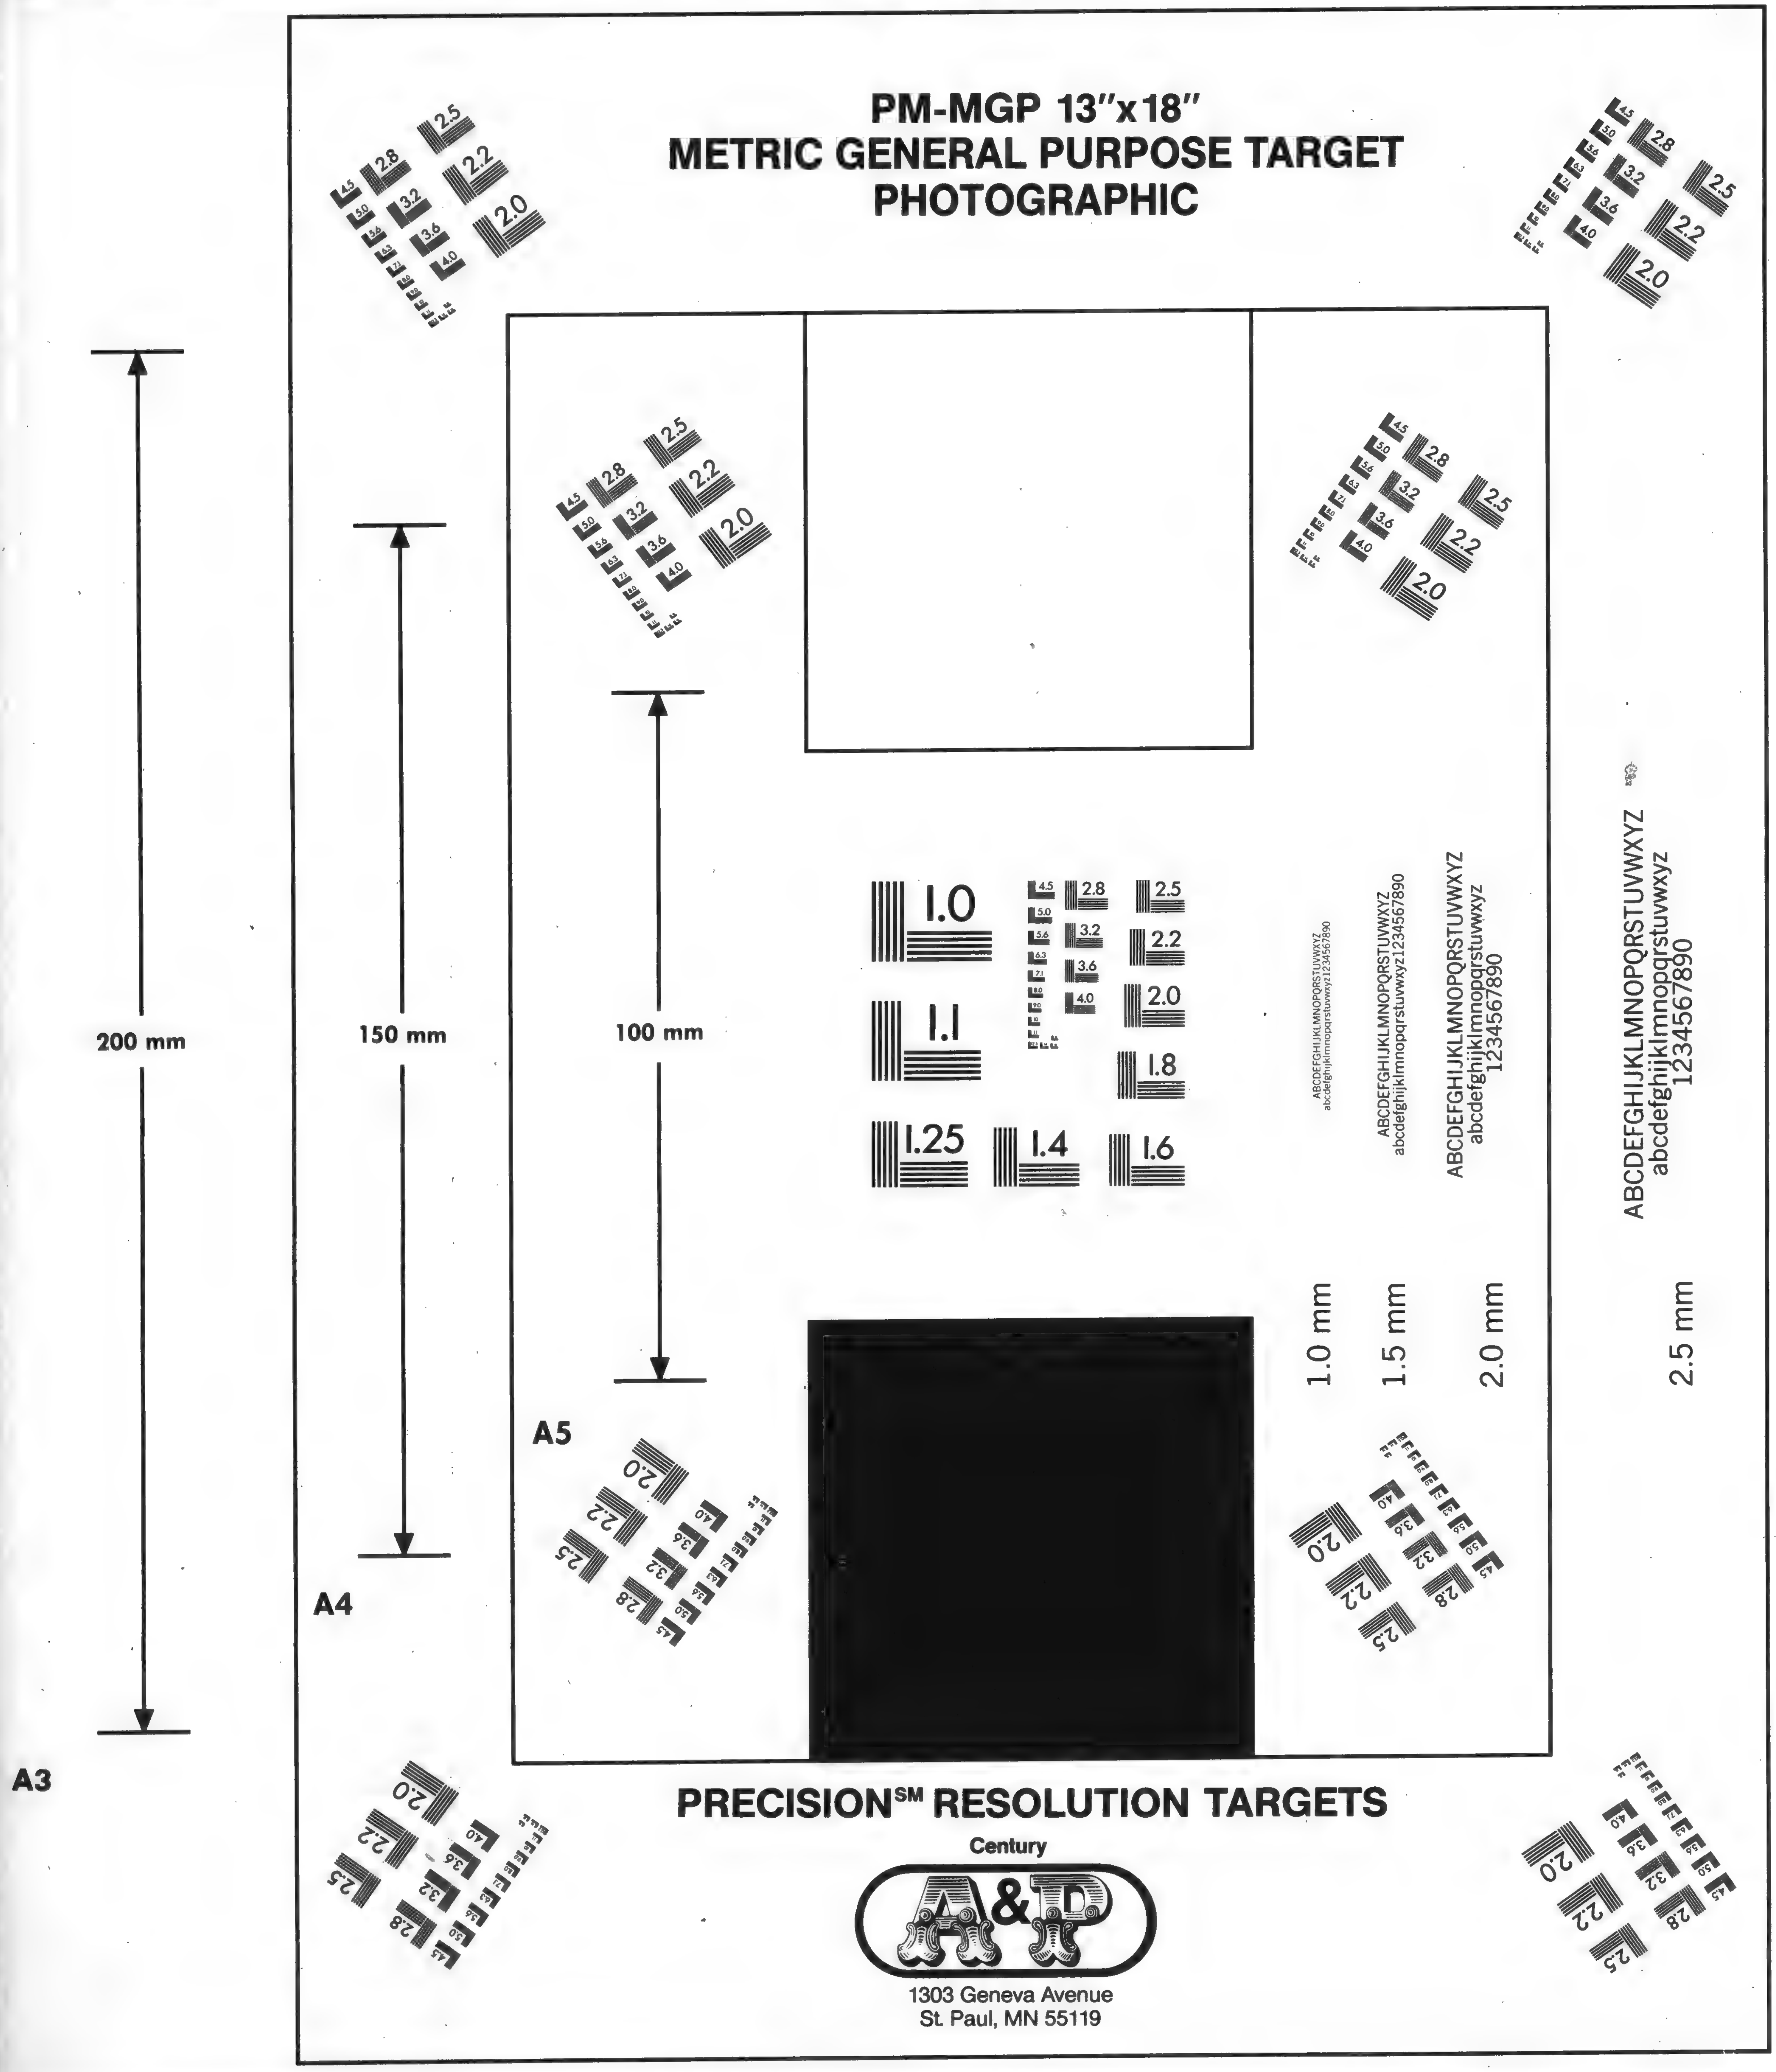
There is but one opinion of his personal magnetism, his fresh sincerity and vividness as an interpretative artist, his rare and absolute control, manifest in the perfect response of the famous orchestra which he now commands.

About no other conductor (and America has in the last few seasons heard all of the "great" ones) has the concensus been so high, and so unqualified.

Koussevitzky's program for Hartford is such as to reveal the brilliance and versatility of the Russian leader It will include a concerto for orchestra in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach, edited by Maximilian Steinberg; Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival"; the prelude to the opera "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky; and Rimsky-Korsakov's scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from the opera, "Tsar Saltan." The second portion of the program will comprise Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. The management earnestly requests that patrons be seated for the opening number as no one will be seated during its playing. The seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's, No. 139 Asylum street.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

INFORMATION OBSCURED

26

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
~~ITEM~~
Public Ledger

JAN 28 1925

Current Topics of the Town

Musings on Philadelphia Audiences, Prompted by Koussevitzky's Visit

WHEN Carl Pohlig was conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra he said to a member of the management:

"It says in the program book, will de ladies please take off deir hats pecause it hides de view? Won't you please have it put also in de program book, will de ladies please take off deir gloves so dey can clap?"

It was explained to him that in Philadelphia—and in other places—the pleasure of the public is not always to be measured by the long continuance or the sheer volume of the applause. Sometimes the hearer when he is most deeply stirred is inclined to be silent.

Pohlig was also told that in Philadelphia—and elsewhere—a good many persons think they are doing their duty by a conductor or a virtuoso when they turn out to hear him. They argue that the tangible index of his popularity is the intake at the box office and that if this is large he ought to be satisfied.

But a Chaliapin or a Paderewski, accustomed to performing before capacity audiences whenever they appear, would not be content with a listless or noiseless gathering, however numerous.

Since the established custom is to make a loud percussion with the palms, as a sign that the artist has found favor with his hearers, it is not strange that the absence of the audible token—however crude it seems in the ears of the ultra-fastidious—is taken by the artist as a depressing evidence that he failed.

Some persons are ostentatiously proud of the fact that they do not applaud. They are welcome to their attitude, if they do not chill with their rebuke the tempestuous blood of the unrefined who must show their enthusiasm with a demonstration.

TO THE Philadelphia Forum, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came the new leader, Koussevitzky, and as he had readings and tempi of his own, so he had his views about audiences, and said—before the concert—that he was homesick for Paris, because in Paris, like the Athenians of old, they always wanted to hear new things. Whereas in every other music center, of Europe at least, people were disinclined to listen to the unprecedented and the unfamiliar.

This is a good week to discuss the attitude of local audiences toward the untried in music or musicians, for we have in our midst one of the most discussed musical anarchs of all in the person of Igor Strawinsky, who is to lead the Philadelphia Orchestra as guest conductor. On Monday he began with a rehearsal, lasting from 10 until 2, in which there was a prodigal outgiving of personal energy, beside which even the driving force of Koussevitzky's restless dynamics seemed pale and tame.

OUR audiences don't mind new music. In fact, they welcome it—even demand it, since they wish to keep abreast of the age and the most recent developments.

But they don't want an overdose at one time. Three years ago, when at the start of the season Stokowski was trying on one exacerbating spasm [illegible] ent uproar after another, subscri[illegible] numbers waxed indignant and [illegible] h a barrage of letters to the t[illegible] r of the Pennsylvania Building [illegible] management induced the gifted le[illegible] o alter the bias of his programs.

Von Buelow said that the three big B's of music were Bach, Beethoven, Brahms. They need not be pushed off the map by the three S's of the day—Strawinsky, Schoenberg, Scriabin.

It is unfair to say that we hate caviare, if we do not care to have caviare served for every one of five courses at dinner.

Any conductor, from anywhere, makes a mistake when he rails at an audience as inhospitable because it does not at once acclaim chords put together by composers who hold, as Scriabin held, that any note may be put with any other note.

AT TIMES there is an appalling insufficiency of numbers for the hearing of good music.

Some of us were mortified when Busoni, the great pianist, played for about forty persons in a hall that holds a thousand.

Again, it was mortifying to our amour propre as a musical center to behold Harold Bauer doing his best in a concert room whose capacity was about one-third filled.

Last Monday morning there was a meager attendance for Cortot, France's most celebrated pianist, though it should be borne in mind that not all of us are able to leave the washtub for the piano on the first weekday morning.

But is the occasional scanty patronage for a concert a local condition? By no means.

For example, Hans Pfitzner, eminent German composer, gave a recital of songs of his own writing in Cologne. Not one ticket was bought and paid for.

In the same city the renowned Anton Rubinstein once played in a hall virtually empty.

And the Flonzaley Quartet, so popular in Philadelphia, performed in Cologne for an audience of which just three members had paid to be admitted.

Until recently Kreisler had small, cool audiences in Vienna, his own home town.

So that Philadelphia artists needn't bemoan any local petrifaction of the heart that they may find toward the prospect of a piano or a song recital, as though this city alone gave stones instead of bread to its musical prophets.

In every part of the land they will find musicians and other artists complaining of the want of local recognition and appreciation and will hear the saying about the prophet without honor worn threadbare in the studios.

THE rule of the survival of the fittest must hold in music as in biology. The rewards must be saved for those who supremely deserve them. We need not fear the competition of "outsiders" if we meet it by a manful endeavor to excel instead of a narrow determination to keep the foreigner out.

How may we expect a hearing for our own artists in other cities if we are reluctant to accept g[illegible] artists and alien conductors here?

Naturally, we [illegible] of our Sascha Jacobinoffs, our [illegible], our Nicholas Doutys, our Th[illegible], our Dusolina Gianninis—and [illegible] d are glad to have them heard in [illegible] cities. As we expect audiences for them according to their deserts, so we are ready to receive the best from other places, caring primarily for the merit of the performance, not for the nativity of the performer.

It must always be so in art, which does not ask where its disciple was born or what his name is, but cares only for his utter devotion.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

JAN 28 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY WINS HIGH PRAISE

Audience of Musicians and Connoisseurs Captured by Koussevitzky.

MARKS FIRST APPEARANCE

Orchestra Has Regained Old Brilliance Under New Leader, Critic Says.

By KATE SCOTT BROOKS.

An audience of musicians and connoisseurs put the stamp of approval on Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Poli's Theater at his first appearance here with that organization. He really won the audience, which packed the house to standing room only, with the first movement of the beautiful Bach Concerto for Orchestra in D major, which opened his program. It is a work written by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, third son of Johann Sebastian Bach.

It was exquisitely given and proves Koussevitzky master of his players, temperamental, mindful of the finer effects, sympathetic, romantic and brilliant. In fact, he appears to have everything, including originality and independence, to make the great conductor.

REGAINS BRILLIANCE.

In Koussevitzky's hands the Boston Symphony has lost none of its old-time perfection of attack and shading, and has gained some of its fire and abandon of twenty or twenty-five years ago, much of which was lost these last few years since the retirement of Carl Muck. The conductor was recalled enthusiastically many times after this opening gem.

The Boston Symphony remains true to tradition in the arrangement of the players, with the basses solemnly in the back across the middle of the stage, cellos in front in the middle, and first violins on the left, second violins and violas at the right and the other players in their accustomed places. There was no part of the orchestra in raised seats.

In this conservative fashion the basses and brasses were heard through, and not over, the strings and wood winds, making for balance.

The program was long, the Symphony, Beethoven's Seventh, beginning at 5:45 and ending at 6:30, though few people left.

RHYTHM AND GRACE.

The Berlioz Overture, "The Roman Carnival," might easily have been omitted. It was scarcely worthy of the remainder of the program. The other number was Debussy's two nocturns, "Clouds and Festivals," realistic and atmospheric, and given with lovely tone color and fine rhythm and grace.

Mr. Koussevitzky has great breadth of style and vision, and depth. His every movement is telling and frequently when his hands rest and the orchestra goes right on, it is as though enjoying the result of rehearsal work. He will be welcomed warmly on his next appearance.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 28 192

Boston Symphony

The Boston symphony orchestra, 104 pieces, with its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is to give its annual concert in Mechanics hall Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, at 8.15 o'clock. The subscription list for patrons is now open at Symphony hall, Boston, where engagement can be made by mail. The public sale opens at Steinert's Monday, Feb. 2.

Serge Koussevitzky, who is at the head of the orchestra, is one of the foremost conductors in the world. He is about 50 years old and was born in Northern Russia.

WASHINGTON,
D. C.
~~NEWS~~
Star

JAN 28 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES AUDIENCE

New Russian Conductor Wins High Tribute for Masterful Work.

Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian conductor who won high praise for his work at Parisian concerts last Summer and who is now director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the oldest organization of its kind in the United States, won hearty approval of a capacity audience at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon, when he conducted one of the finest programs heard here this season. It is probable that Mr. Koussevitsky did not realize the compliment paid him when the entire audience remained in its seats until the close of the concert, something not customary in Washington.

Maximillian Steinberg's arrangement of "Concerto for Orchestra in D Major," by C. P. Emanuel Bach, son of the great Sebastian Bach, was the opening number. This work is filled with delicate melodies skillfully interwoven in musicianly style. It was given fine shadings of tone under Mr. Koussevitsky's direction. "The Roman Carnival," by Berlioz, which followed, shows the ability of the composer to make something beautiful from comparatively uninteresting material. It was given marked contrast by the two exquisite nocturnes of Debussy, "Clouds" and "Festivals," which closed the first half of the program with marvelous beauty in their exceptional interpretation.

Beethoven's "Symphony in A Major, No. 7," was the feature. Each phrase was given careful, colorful reading and the blending of all the instruments was remarkably fine in the symphony. Particularly intriguing were the themes and interpretations of the allegretto and scherzo movements, so different in mood yet equally beautiful as interpreted. The finale held the audience almost spellbound until the last note.

Mr. Koussevitzky's debut performance for the Capital was highly successful, and many expressed the hope that he will return with his reanimated orchestra soon again.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

JAN 28 1925

NOTED ORCHESTRA AT LYRIC TONIGHT

The only appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore this season will take place this evening at the Lyric. Serge Koussevitzky, who assumed the leadership of the famous organization this seson, and whose work has been acclaimed wherever the orchestra has appeared, will conduct Beethoven's No. 7, in A major, will be the symphony for the occasion. Works by Bach, Wagner, Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov will also be on the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 28 1925

There are no concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston this week, the organization being on tour. The Transcript last Saturday announced that it is understood that Mr. Koussevitzky had been engaged as conductor for another year after the close of the present series and might possibly remain for a third year. No question but what he is a conductor of the first rank, stimulating alike to the members of the orchestra and to those who hear him.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 28 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky Eminent New Conductor of Famous Orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky, the eminent new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be first heard in Hartford at the pending visit of this organization for a concert in the Capitol theater next Sunday afternoon, February 1 at 3 o'clock. Preceded to America by the most glowing reports from Europe, Koussevitzky has made another conquest both sudden and complete—the conquest of America. This remarkable leader is talked about the country over—every series is subscribed and seats for the Boston Symphony concerts are at a premium. Naturally, much was expected of Serge Koussevitzky. His qualities have exceeded all expectations. In Boston, New York, and each city he has visited, the effect has been electric.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

There is but one opinion of his personal magnetism, his fresh sincerity and vividness as an interpretative artist, his rare and absolute control, manifest in the perfect response of the famous orchestra which he now commands.

About no other conductor (and America has in the last few seasons heard all of the "great" ones) has the the concensus of opinion been so high, and so unqualified.

Koussevitzky's program for Hartford is such as to reveal the brilliance and versatility of the Russian leader. It will include a Concerto for Orchestra in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach, edited by Maximilian Steinberg; Berlioz' Overture, "The Roman Carnival"; the Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky; and Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from the Opera, "Tsar Saltan." The second portion of the program will comprise Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. The management earnestly requests that patrons be seated before the opening number as no one will be seated during its playing. The seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's, No. 139 Asylum street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HERALD

JAN 28 1925

WASHINGTON

Mrs. Coolidge attended the concert yesterday of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and had ~~as her~~ guest Mrs. Frothingham, wife of Representative Louis A. Frothingham.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HERALD

JAN 28 1925

Mr. and Mrs. Geoffrey Cabot gave a dinner last evening in honor of Mr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Koussevitsky.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

JAN 28 1925

* * *

Mrs. Coolidge attended the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday at Poli's. She had as her guest, Mrs. Louis Frothingham, wife of Representative Frothingham, of Massachusetts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
~~DISPATCH~~
Record

JAN 28 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR THE FORUM

Welcome Given to Organization After Long Absence Here.

The enterprising manager of the Philadelphia Forum made possible for an audience here what everyone interested in music has devoutly longed for—a hearing of the rehabilitated Boston Orchestra, under its famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. The Boston Orchestra, for many years a pioneer in orchestral playing here, was forced four years ago to withdraw from Philadelphia. Owing to the many vicissitudes endured after the death of the patron of the orchestra, the late Colonel Higginson, and the lack of popularity of the conductors succeeding the great Dr. Carl Muck, patronage for the Boston organization fell away until, in the judgment of the manager, it was necessary to discontinue the concerts, which for years had been the leading musical events of this city.

The Boston Orchestra is once more the great instrument it was formerly. It has a conductor who ranks with the world's finest, and at the Academy of Music last night Koussevitsky compelled the most enthusiastic response from an audience which appeared to recognize at once the gifts of a really endowed musician and sat fascinated through a program designed for a musical clientele. The Forum audience is enjoying a series of five concerts and indicates a love and appreciation of music, but it is not the critical gathering found at the regular symphonic concerts. Koussevitsky's triumph, therefore, was all the more remarkable and gratifying. He was recalled to the stage repeatedly and, although the concert for some reason did not get under way until almost 9 o'clock and the symphony had not begun at the hour we are accustomed to consider the proper time for leaving a symphony concert, there was no evidence of impatience in anything, but the greatest interest in everything played by the orchestra.

The program comprised the Bach Concerto for orchestra in D major, arranged by Maximillian Steinberg; the "Roman Carnival," overture of Berlioz; two Debussy nocturnes, "Nonages" and "Fetes," and after the intermission the Beethoven A major symphony. As a conductor Koussevitsky has dignity and poise, does not indulge in superfluous motions and exhibits a marked tendency toward allowing the musicians most of the credit for the many extraordinary tonal effects evolved. He arranges his orchestra differently from other conductors, having the first and second violins and the first 'cello desks almost in a circle about him. It gives him the appearance of being surrounded by musicians, instead of facing them from the usual distance, and has the effect of a much more intimate group of artists. The most strikingly characteristic interpretations last night were those given the Debussy nocturnes. Nothing more exquisite has ever been heard from an orchestra here than the delicate, illusive dream-like texture of the first nocturne, "Nonages." The deliberation with which Koussevitsky painted this scene for his audience, the shimmer and glow and ravishing tone color produced a perfect storm of applause. Even more than the gayety and rhythmic contagion of the "Festivals" was this pastel hued scene enjoyed. The "Fetes" was extraordinarily well done, the visionary procession coming out with startling clearness and beauty. It seemed strange that a Forum audience could become so wildly enthusiastic over Debussy and only goes to prove that in the manner in which such music is presented lies the secret of making it popular.

The Beethoven Seventh Symphony was another great triumph for the musicians and doubtless many leaving the Academy last night nourished the hope of a series of concerts from the Boston Orchestra next year.

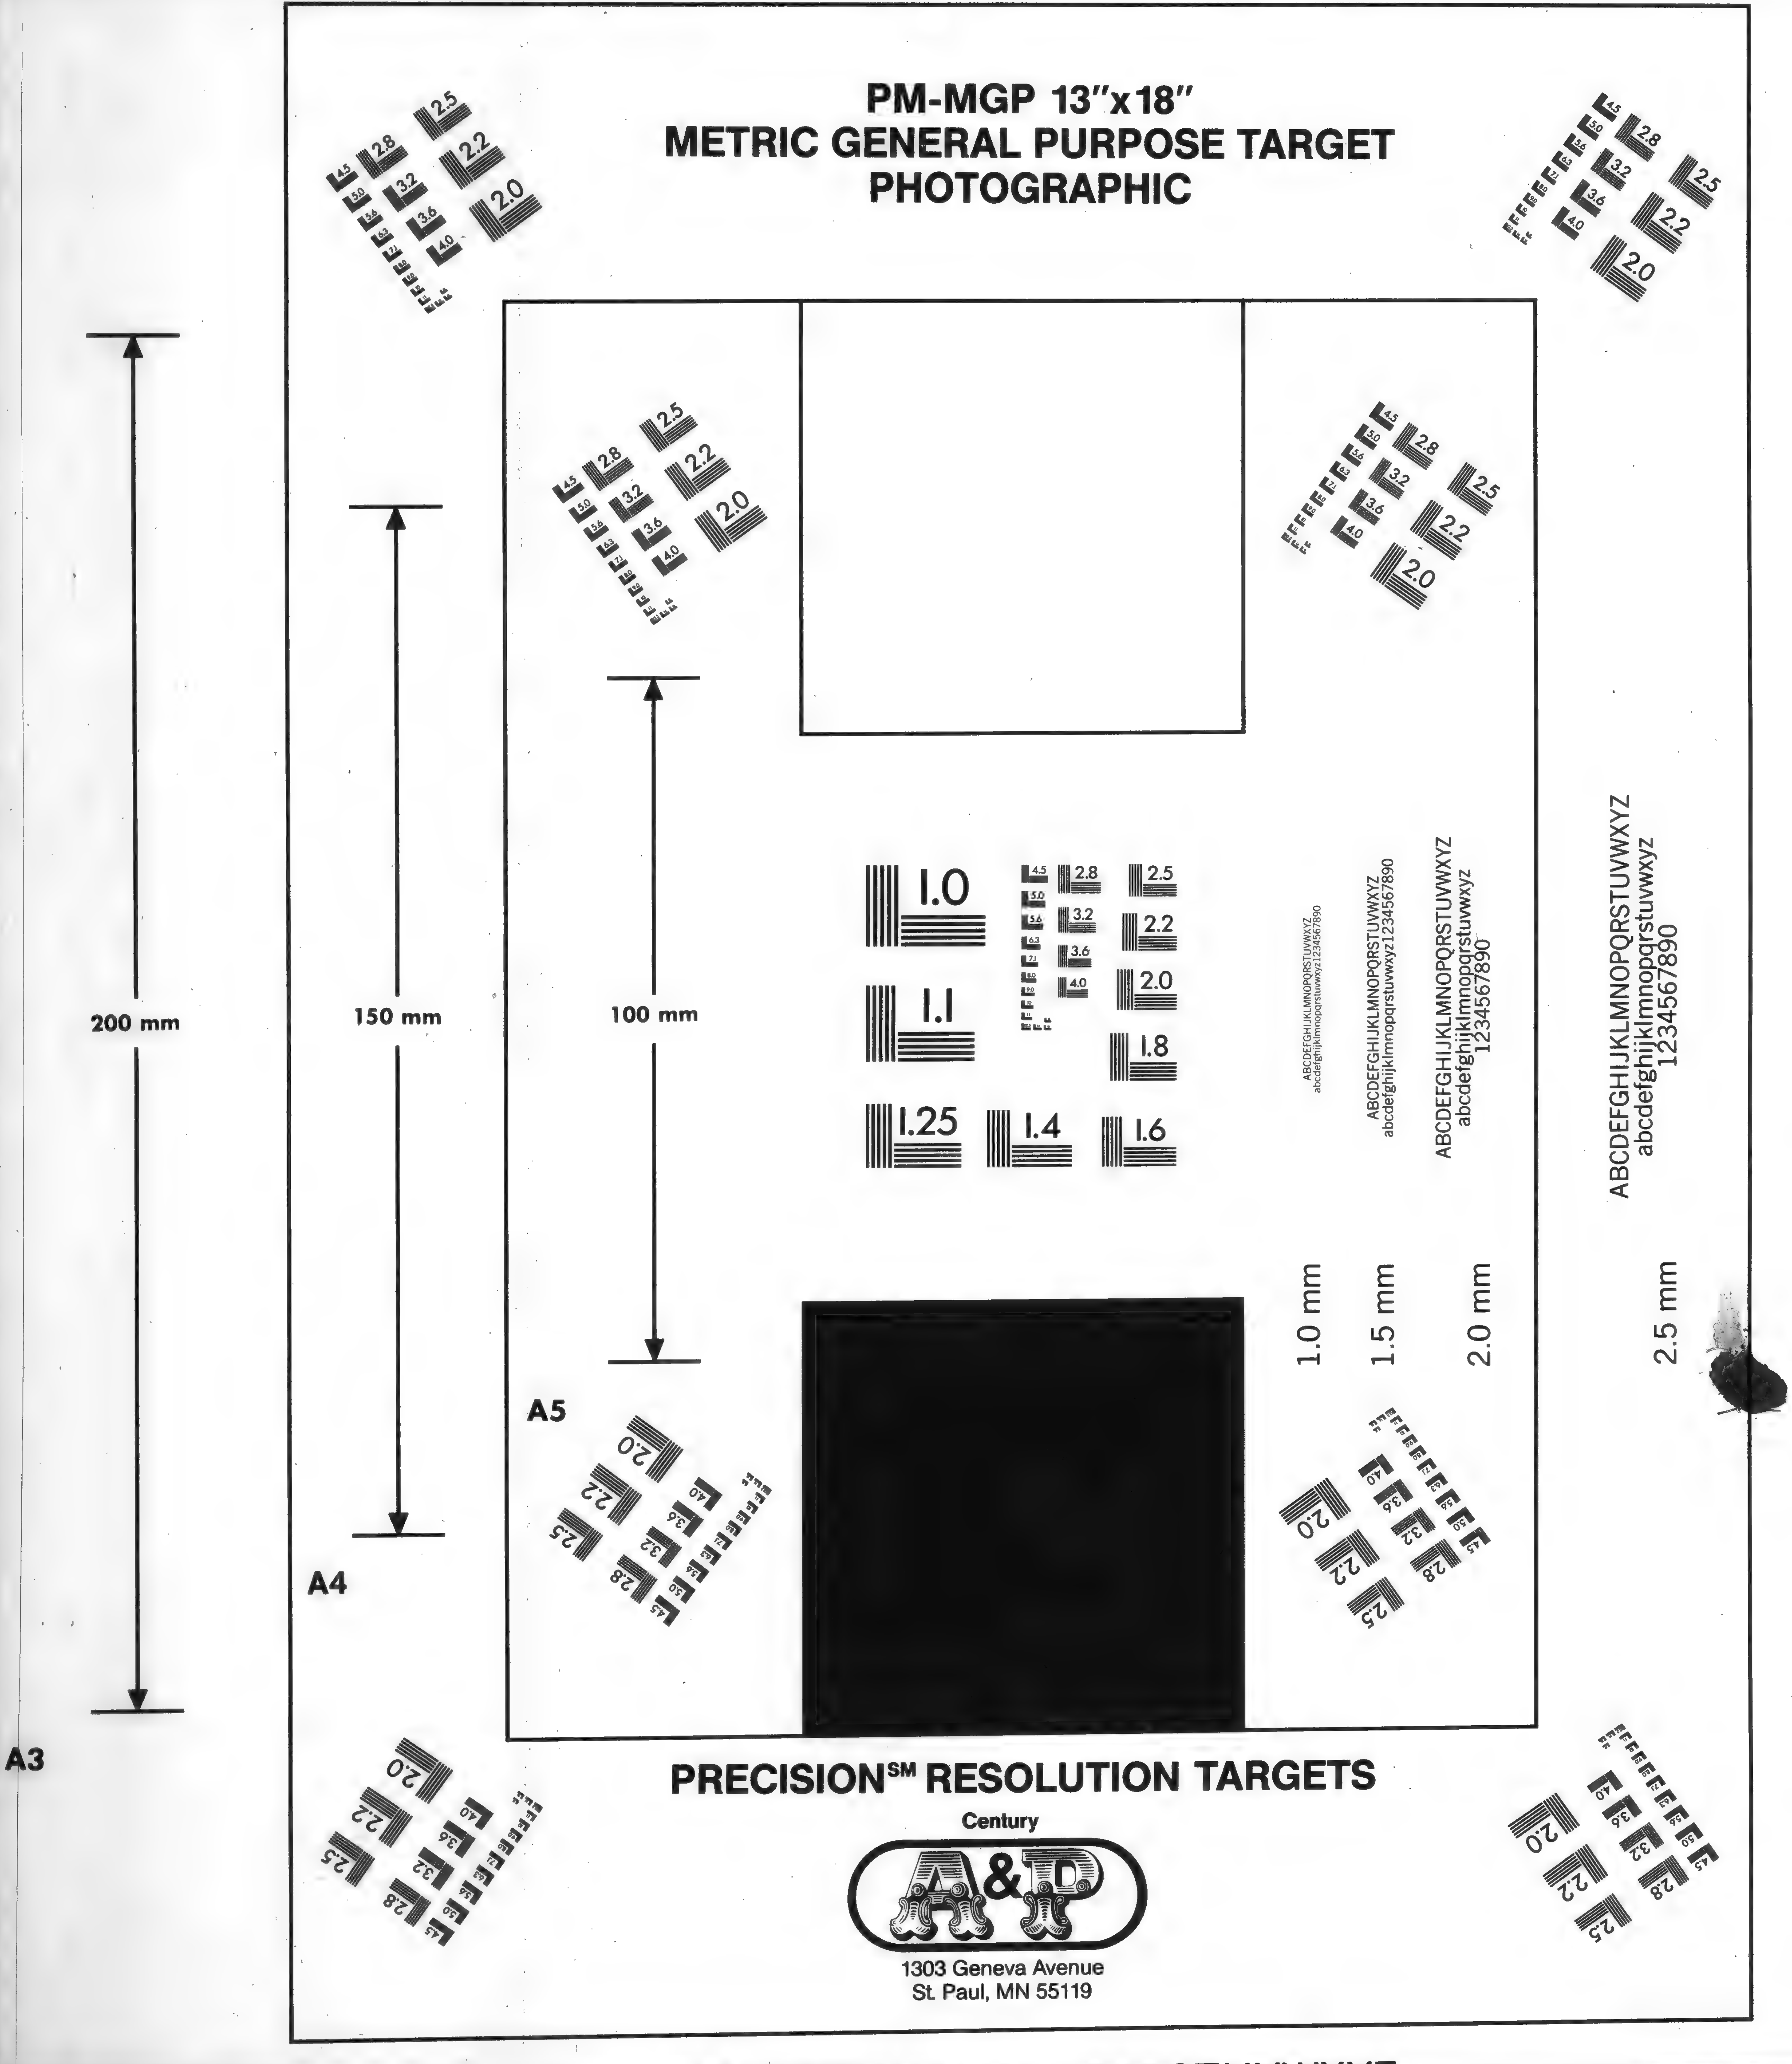
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JAN 28 1925

MRS. COOLIDGE yesterday afternoon attended the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra and had as her guest Mrs. Louis A. Frothingham

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
7.1
4.0
8.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
3.2
3.6
4.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

BALTIMORE,
MD.
EVE. SUN

JAN 29 1925

LYRIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his organization had no reason to complain about the warmth of the reception accorded them at the Lyric last night, or about the measure of interest manifested by an audience that was to be considered large in view of the inhospitable weather. And it is to be said that the Russian justified this interest and deserved the reception amounting to an ovation, for he undoubtedly takes rank as one of the most notable musical figures in the country. Of a courtly, almost military, bearing and carrying himself very erect, he commands attention the moment he comes out on the stage. His gestures are mostly downward, though when he wishes to work up the climaxes he is moved by his enthusiasm to raise his arms, and the short, nervous jabs become sweeping.

Mr. Koussevitzky, in so far as he may be said to have revealed himself last night, is essentially Russian in temperament and method. Perhaps for this reason his reading of the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition" and of the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5 were far more characteristic than his interpretation of the Haendel "Concerto Crosso," with which the concert opened. To be sure, the concerto is pitched in a minor key, but this fact alone could not account for the lack-luster quality of the performance. Koussevtizky seems to have a penchant for painting in dull finish colors, except when he comes to the florid portions, especially of Russian works, when he puts on the tones in great garish splashes, as he did in the Moussorgsky number and in the symphony. Her he gave the brasses and the percussions full sway, with the result that they at times rather overcame the strings and even the woodwinds. Moreover, he appears to aim not so much at finely polished effects as at intensity. The sustained music of the concerto, therefore, was not always conspicuous for smoothness, or for subtlety, but at times sounded rather broken and rough.

THE Koussevitzky method, if that be his method, is consequently admirably adapted to the music of Moussorgsky, whose humor has a decided rude, clumsy quality, and found striking expression in that number. In addition, the Ravel orchestration furnished an admirable medium, and the presentation, therefore, took on a degree of excellence that made the "pictures" most vivid.

In the more subdued movements of the symphony the orchestra again reflected the tendency of the conductor to use unglossed surface tints, with the result that the melancholy and soul travail of the composer came out even more strongly than usual, while in the tumultuous and forcedly exultant last moment the dynamics were again of the most assertive sort.

As an interpreter of typically Russian music Koussevitzky may be regarded as taking a high place. Whether he is equally impressive in other schools only further hearings can demonstrate. But at any rate, he seems to be qualified to bring vigor and picturesqueness into the work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to imbuse it with a spirit that promises much for the future. It is to be hoped that Baltimoreans will have furhter opportunity to hear the organization under the new leader.

F. W. S.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 29 1925

Boston Symphony

Keen interest is manifested in the coming to Worcester of the Boston symphony. The date is Tuesday, Feb. 17, the place is Mechanics hall, the program is attractive and a feature of the visit is the first appearance here of Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor. New York took to him kindly, and pronounce him a musical "find" of which Boston may well be proud. Boston is in love with him musically, and so much of an impression did he make that the entire symphony season is practically sold out to subscribers.

Subscription for the Worcester concert are being received this week at Symphony hall, Boston, but the public sale opens at Steinert's Monday.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 29 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY FEATURES TCHAIKOVSKY SYMPHONY

A feature of the coming appearance here of the Boston Symphony orchestra under its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. This was the first symhony of Tchaikovsky in which the composer's countryman was heard in America when it was the principal number of the Pension Fund concert, December 14th last. The performance made nothing less than a magnificent impression as attested by the following quotations from Boston newspapers reviewing this concert:

"Here surely is Tchaikovsky's symphonic masterpiece—music as yet that time and change may not dull or pale or wither. Neither in the Symphony of Fate that preceded it, nor in "The Pathetic" that followed it, is to be so free from the infirmities and the excesses of his temperament, practice, procedure. Here he writes drama in tones; his invention flows and is fertile; while sure is his hand and quick his imagination upon structure and progress.

The fifth has gone neglected at Symphony hall until Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday revived it—superbly, magnificently, superlatively. With the music, above the music, soared the performance. An orchestra strung to the utmost pitch gave him back his askings, Mr. Wendler, Mr. Sand, Mr. Laurant, Mr. Ritter—who did not distinguish himself? The Theme of Defeat haunted the ear as it haunts the music. Adroitly, Mr. Koussevitzky differentiated the moods; ardently he heightened the vigors of the first movement. Like bed of glowing coals was the orchestral tone in the Andante. Astute was Mr. Koussevitzky that this songful beauty should saturate but not cloy. The Scherzo-Waltz was a marvel of delicate pointing. The Finale was the sun of Tchaikovsky in high heaven running course. An audience transported shook off its possession, volleyed, even shouted, its plaudits. Since that first afternoon of Wagner plus Dr. Muck, there has been no such concert for the Pension Fund."

H. T. P.—Boston Transcript, December 15, 1924.

"It was good to hear, though late in the day, the symphony, Tchaikovsky perhaps at his best. Nothing he ever wrote sounds better and even his most virulent detractors must admit that when pure sound is the matter in question Tchaikovsky, in his later years, knew what he was about. Its melody escapes the commonness that sometimes does Tchaikovsky's music damage. Its emotion is intense, but it does not fall into hysteria. If conductors jealous of Tchaikovsky's repute should content themselves with playing such music of his as is great of its kind, like the symphony in E minor, his memory would stay green the longer.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the symphony with studied care, without undue stress of its emotional force, yet effectively, at times thrillingly. The audience listened with an absorption very marked. The applause at the end was overwhelming."

R. R. G.—Boston Herald, December 15, 1924.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 29 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Russian Music Introduced by Koussevitzky at Sunday Concert.

Two excerpts from the music of Russia, virtually unknown to the western world until Koussevitzky introduced them, will be included on the program of his first appearance here as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The principal monuments of the genius of Moussorgsky are the two operas "Boris Godunov" and "Khovantchina." The prelude to the latter, which is to be played, depicts the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow. The piece has its distinct color and mood suggestive of the subject.

"The Flight of the Bumble Bee" is a little Scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Tsar Sultan" in which a prince transforms himself into a bee for his own purposes. This tiny piece exacts an aerial lightness and fleetness from the wood wind which is a marvel of virtuosity. Its charm is evident from the fact that when Mr. Koussevitzky performed it in Boston, an encore was demanded and granted for the first time since the first beginnings of the orchestra, forty years ago.

This concert, the only orchestral event of the season, will be heard in the Capitol theater next Sunday afternoon. The concert will begin promptly at 3 p. m. and the management earnestly requests that patrons be at this time The seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Caseys music store, No. 139 Asylum street.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 29 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Igor Stravinsky, the daring Russian composer who is visiting America for the first time, was the guest of honor at the symphony concerts in Boston last Friday and Saturday. The program consisted entirely of his music, namely, suites from the ballets "Petrouchka" and "The Fire-Bird," "The Volga Bargemen's Song," and his new pianoforte concerto. The concerto is dedicated to Madame Nathalie Koussevitzky. It had its first performance at the hands of Koussevitzky and Stravinsky in Paris last spring and its first American performances on the occasion just mentioned.

Stravinsky has said that this music is in the spirit of the Seventeenth Century. This element was detected in it by the critics, but also many modern influences. Philip Hale in the "Herald" even discovered "in the rhythm the suggestion of the negro influence that is now felt across the Atlantic."

Stravinsky was greeted by tumultous applause by both audiences. The interest in his genius is in part due to his remarkable score "Le Sacre du Printemps," which was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux last spring and under Serge Koussevitzky this season. Koussevitzky has long been associated with Stravinsky in the performance of his works and has published some of his music in the Russian musical edition which he owns jointly with his wife.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky will be heard in the Capitol Theater this coming Sunday afternoon, the only orchestral concert of the season. The concert will begin promptly at 3 o'clock and the management earnestly requests that patrons be seated at this time. The seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's, No. 139 Asylum street.

MERIDEN,
CONN.
RECORD

JAN 29 1925

Koussevitzky To Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra In Hartford Next Sunday

Two excerpts from the music of Russia, virtually unknown to the western world until Koussevitzky introduced them, will be included on the program of his first appearance in Hartford as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The principal monuments of the genius of Moussorgsky are the two operas, "Boris Godunov" and "Khovantchina." The prelude to the latter, which is to be played, depicts the coming dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow. The place has its distinct color and mood suggestive of the subject.

"The Flight ofthe Bumble Bee" is a little scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." in which a prince transforms himself into a bee for his town purposes. This tiny poece exacts an aerial lightness and fleetness from the wood wind whichis a marvel of virtuosity. Its charm is evident from the fact that when Mr. Koussevitzky performed it in Boston an encore was demanded and granted for the first time since the first beginnings of the orchestra, forty years ago. The seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street, Hartford.

The concert will be heard at the Capitol theater in Hartford next Sunday afternoon. It is announced that the concert will begin at 3 p. m.—Adv.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 30 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The outstanding number on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program last night was Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. It was outstanding because of the interpretation given it by Serge Kousevitsky, the conductor. He gave this as fine a reading as it has ever been given in this part of the country.

Roland Hayes was the soloist and he sang Liszt's 104th "Sonnet of Petrarch" and "The Repose of the Holy Family" from Berlioz's "Flight Into Egypt." The program given by the orchestra was varied and interesting, and a crowded houses applauded vigorously. Outstanding was Ravel's orchestration of Debussy's Sarabande and Dance.

INDIANAPOLIS,
IND.
STAR

JAN 29 1925

Washington Society.

Indianapolis Star Bureau, 421 Colorado Building.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 28.—Secretary of Labor and Mrs. Davis entertained at dinner last evening complimentary to Secretary of Commerce and Mrs. Hoover. Their guests included Representative and Mrs. Everett Sanders of Indiana.

Senator and Mrs. Swanson of Virginia entertained a company of fifty at dinner this evening at the Chevy Chase Club.

Mrs. Coolidge attended the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

JAN 29 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony orchestra, 104 musicians, one of the greatest musical organizations in the world, comes to Worcester Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, for its annual concert in Mechanics hall. With it comes the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, whose connection with the orchestra has created so much favorable comment. He recently signed a contract for another year. Since assuming the baton of the Boston organization Koussevitzky has introduced several Russian novelties, which have been enthusiastically received. One of them, the "Flight of the Bumble Bee," from the opera "Tsar Saltan," was so well received in Boston at a symphony concert that Koussevitzky responded with an encore, the first time an encore has been played by the Boston Symphony since its organization 40 years ago.

Subscriptions for seats for the Worcester concert are being made this week at Symphony hall, Boston, but the public sale opens at Steinert's next Monday.

CINCINNATI,
OHIO
STAR

JAN 30 1925

Regarding Conductors

Wilhelm Furtwaengler has stirred up considerably the orchestra-conductor situation hereabouts. His first appearance brought him a deserved ovation . . . in recognition of a unique accomplishment. Then came a second leading of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, followed by a third and a fourth. With each effort demonstrated his place is the symphony field. He can now be pronounced by Americans who never before observed his endeavors to be one of the first living conductors. Whether the Philharmonic will be able to arrange to have him come permanently to this city remains to be seen.

In the meantime Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artistic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitzky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a striving of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

Meanwhile Ignatz Waghalter is struggling with the State Symphony Orchestra, over which Josef Stransky formerly presided. It is not a first-rate band, so Waghalter has had and is having his troubles. He is a sound musician. He is also sincere. His long Berlin training is proving helpful, and some readings are admirable. Simplicity and halter characteristics. The full measure of his worth seems difficult to estimate while he has at his disposal no better orchestra than the State Symphony.

NEW YORK
TIMES

JAN 30 1925

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony.

Nothing could better have illustrated the variety and contrast of qualities that go to the making of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, than the performance of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, which concluded the program of the concert given last night in Carnegie Hall. The symphony, be it said, is now looked upon with aversion by the average reviewer when it appears on a New York program. It has, as usual, been mercilessly overplayed here this season. For at least half its length it is Tchaikovsky in his most sentimental despondent, self-pitying vein. Nor did Mr. Koussevitsky, putting it on his program, escape the suspicion of pandering to public taste and craving the opportunities which the E minor symphony gives the conductor—if so he desires—for self-display.

For a good three movements Mr. Koussevitsky confirmed rather than diminished the listener's suspicions. Particularly in the first movement did he inordinately drag tempi and sugar phrases. There was beautiful playing in the slow movement, but not such as to reconcile the listener to soporific tempi and the prevalence of sob and groan—until the finale arrived, when suddenly conductor and composer drew themselves up to an incredible height—in the most nobly affirmative music Tchaikovsky ever penned—and wild hosannas were heard, and victorious armies marched across the sky. In majesty, in irresistible power, and in the control retained by the conductor, even in the moments of the most frantic rejoicing this was a performance to remember, a performance of heroic and kindling glory. It is no common musician, or ordinary man, who does a thing like that, and it has been apparent ere this that Mr. Koussevitsky, with his singular greatnesses and inequalities, is not an artist to be reckoned by common measurements.

Roland Hayes was soloist at this concert. He sang Liszt's 104th Sonnet of Petrarch and the charming "Repose of the Holy Family," from Berlioz's "Flight into Egypt." In this air, sung by Mr. Hayes with his wonted musicianship and sensetiveness of manner, female voices were used for the finale "Allelulias" back of the scene. It is music of a delightful naïveté and a purity of style which some have accused Berlioz of affecting. In the Petrarchian sonnet of Liszt the singer was not heard to the best advantage. The music lies high and rather poorly for his voice. He showed that his upper register continues to develop, but the vocal style was rough and rather forced. Mr. Hayes has never impressed us as a singer for the big or brassy effect, but rather as an artist of an intelligence and sensitiveness better reserved for finer things. He was, nevetheless, warmly and repeatedly recall by the audience.

The concert opened with the delight concerto for orchestra (as arranged Maximilian Steinberg) in D major, C. P. E. Bach, music not familiar and amply worth the pains taken to troduce it. Philip Emmanuel can dom have written in a lovelier than in the slow movement of work, originally scored for violin, ton, viol a'amore, viola da gamba bass viol and rearranged for flute oboes, bassoon, horn and strings a Koussevitsky's suggestion. Those the days when composers could slow movements. They did not n poetic program or a modern orch They had only—apparently—to adop tempo and a type of measure and allow beautiful musical ideas to luxuriate over page after page of paper. And there more than beauty of melodic line this music. Its mood, for want of better term, may fittingly be called "romantic." There are measures of ecclesiastical color and effect, but they evoke from the strings a song that is anything but that of the cloister, an the atmosphere is one of poetry an emotion.

Mr. Koussevitsky used an English horn in its upper register, instead o an oboe, for passages of sustained solo playing, and this gave added character and instrumental color to the music of Bach's son. The performance of the suite as a whole was an eloquent one distinguished by uncommon warmth o tone of the strings and fine balance between the different orchestra choirs. The last movement is the least important. For the greater part it is delightfully melodic and substantially woven music.

The Sarabande and Dance of Debussy, as orchestrated by Ravel, showed again what a past master of instrumentation Ravel is, and how unnecessary, on the whole, it was for him to transcribe for orchestra a delightful piano piece; we speak of the Sarabande best left in its original form. Th Dance is much more desirable in orchestral dress. These compositions Mr. Koussevitsky conducted with excellent results, both technical and interpretive, from his orchestra. But the lasting memory of the evening is the finale of Tchaikovsky's symphony. In that he towered, not merely a brilliantly gifted conductor or an erratic "reader" of masterpieces, but a great creative interpreter.

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

JAN 30 1925

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Orchestra were evening attractions at Carnegie Hall, in a peculiar programm of an orchestral concerto b Bach-Steinberg, a Berlioz a from "The Flight Into Egypt (with Roland Hayes as the solo ist); the One Hundred an Fourth Sonnet of Petrarca, b Liszt-Busoni, two pieces b Debussy-Ravel, and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony.

NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune

JAN 3 0 1925

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

The Boston Symphony Concert: Mr. Koussevitzky Ranges From Bach to Debussy

Third evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall: Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor; soloist, Roland Hayes.

PROGRAM

1. Concerto for Orchestra in D major C. P. E. Bach (Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg)
2. 104th Sonnet of Petrarch (accompaniment arranged for orchestra by Busoni)....................Liszt
   Mr. Hayes
3. Air, "The Repose of the Holy Family," from "The Flight Into Egypt"....................Berlioz
   Mr. Hayes
4. Sarabande; Danse.......Debussy-Ravel
5. Symphony No. 5, in E minor Tchaikovsky

Evidently the Boston Symphony Orchestra is on easy street these days, now that Mr. Koussevitzky has demonstrated that he is what the managerial world so happily calls "a box-office riot." We are moved to this cheering conclusion by the fact that the Orchestra brought eight women singers all the way from Boston (regardless of the fortune it costs to travel between the capital of Massachusetts and the capital of the world), only that they might sing ten measures behind the scenes at the close of a number on last night's program. And those ten measures, in which a chorus of four sopranos and four altos merely sing "Halleluja! Halleluja!" as an epilogue to the tenor air of the Narrator in "The Repose of the Holy Family" from Berlioz's "L'Enfance du Christ," are optional—Berlioz says in his score that in the absence of a chorus, the tenor may sing the ten bars of the first soprano.

* * *

But the lordly Boston Symphony stooped to no such expedient. They magnificently chose to perform the work as Berlioz obviously preferred that it should be done. And so, much to the surprise of last night's audience, who were unwarned by the program, Berlioz's "eight voices of unseen angels" floated out from behind the scenes after Mr. Hayes had finished his solo, and ended the excerpt as Berlioz had so poetically conceived it—on an ethereal chord of A major for the distant choir. The effect was enchanting. The Narrator had just sung of the angels who were keeping vigil over the Holy Family as they rested, and their "Hallelujah!" was an exquisite epilogue to the tale.

Last night, to be sure, the angels from Boston were not absolutely in tune on their final A major chord; but their peccancy was hardly noticeable.

* * *

The excerpt from Berlioz's tripar- oratorio is seldom heard in New tk. It is, in the main, delectable inic—a little insipid in places, as in mi instrumental introduction, where an simplicity of the style is a bit too ins obviously sought. But there are delicious passages in it—music of a sweet, cool, dreaming loveliness, tenderly primitive, which must astonish those who know Berlioz only as the wild, untamed Romanticist of the "Fantastic" Symphony and "Harold in Italy."

Mr. Hayes sang this music with his usual refinement of style and depth of feeling. He was particularly moving in his delivery of "L'Enfant Jesus dormait" and "Les anges du ciel à genoux autour d'eux." But on the whole he was not at his best last night. He sang his first number, Liszt's intolerably sentimental setting of Petrarch's 104th sonnet, "Pace non trovo" (with the orchestral accompaniment arranged by Busoni) as disappoiontingly as we have heard him sing anything. Some of his high notes sent a shiver through sensitive nerves, and he was not always on the pitch. But he was readily forgiven after he had come to the end of the Berlioz number, and the audience lavished applause upon him, so that for a time an encore seemed imminent.

* * *

The orchestral concerto by Emanuel Bach was new to New York. It was performed by the Philadelphia Orchestra January 26, 1923, for the first time in America, at a concert conducted by Darius Milhaud, but the Philadelphians had never played it here.

The score of this arrangement contains the following note by the transcriber, Maximilian Steinberg (son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakoff):

> "The manuscript of this concerto bears no indication of the date of its composition. It is written in four concertante string parts. The manuscript belongs to the Charles Guillon collection at Bourg-En-Bresse, France, in which it appears as No. 718."

Steinberg's arrangement, which was published in 1911, is for a reduced orchestra of one flute, two oboes, English horn, one bassoon, one horn and strings. The work in this form is practically a concerto grosso after the style of the illustrious father of Carl Philipp Emanuel. That is to say, its essential characteristic is its contrasting of a small group of solo instruments—in this case the woodwind and horn—with the full string band.

* * *

The first movement is an allegro moderato in D major, 2-2, in which the two oboes and bassoon are conspicuous; the second, andante lento molto, B minor, 9-8, has a beautiful opening solo for the English horn, accompanied by violas and cellos, and a concluding passage for muted strings, oboe, flute, bassoon and horn. The finale is a rollicking 6-8 allegro in D.

This music is at times amazingly contemporaneous in feeling—there are suggestions of "Parsifal" in the passage for muted strings at the end of the slow movement; and the solo for the English horn (consummately played last night by Mr. Speyer) has a modernity of expression that is not easy to account for. The whole concerto is delightful. Why it should have waited fourteen years for a New York performance is just another one of those mysteries of our local concert programs.

* * *

The two Debussy dances, as brilliantly transcribed for orchestra by Ravel, are familiar through repeated performances by the Philharmonic Society, which first played them here on December 13, 1923—though last night's house bill announced them as "First Time in America" (New York, at last accounts, was still in the Union, though she may be slipping).

Mr. Koussevitzky played them admirably, as he had previously played the Bach concerto.

We were able to hear only two movements of Tchaikovsky's symphony. This outrageously neglected work had had only seven and a half New York performances in the present month of January, which was doubtless the reason why Mr. Koussevitzky chose to make the record an even eight. He dwelt overlong, as he loves to do, on those not infrequent passages of Tchaikovsky's score from which the treacle drips in sufficient quantities to sweeten a carload of Schonbergian lemons. For example, the antiphonal passage for horns and strings in the first movement, half a dozen measures after letter G in the score. But he played the slow movement with a beautiful blend of dignity and romantic fervor, and Mr. Wendler (if it was he) played his difficult horn solo with admirable skill and taste.

The house was a large one, and Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were left in no doubt whatever concerning their place in the local heart.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 3 0 1925

A SPRIGHTLY Metropolitan performance of "Cosi fan tutte" lured a spare number of people into the unpleasant weather of the night. The few who did venture forth were well rewarded for whatever may have been the discomforts of travel. Mmes. Easton, Bori and Peralta, and Messrs. Meader, De Luca and Didur again distinguished themselves by their delicately effective presentation of the charming Mozart opus. Mr. Bodansky, of course, conducted.

The major event of the day was the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall. But as Mr. Koussewitsky, with the assistance of Mr. Hayes, will repeat the program at the Academy this evening, we postponed our attendance to better enjoy the Brooklyn concert.

EDWARD CUSHING.

NEW YORK
EVENING SUN

JAN 3 0 1925

Boston Men Delight at Concert

Orchestra Plays Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto—Roland Hayes Soloist.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The program of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening began with Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's concerto in D for orchestra. The work was presented in a modern arrangement by Maximilian Steinberg. It is an unusual experience to hear a composition by the third son of the immortal Sebastian. Many good things have been said about his contributions to clavier music and his book on the art of playing the keyboard instrument laid the foundations of all subsequent piano methods.

His symphonies have had honorable mention in some of the histories, but little is said of his orchestral concertos, which in the final analysis are quite as close to the modern symphonies as his other orchestral compositions.

Mr. Steinberg's arrangement seemed discreet and respectful. It possessed clarity and a tastefully continent color scheme, in which none the less orchestral technic of a date much later than Emanuel Bach's was made serviceable. The work is beautiful in itself and might well be heard oftener than it has been. It was admirably played by the gentlemen of Boston.

String Tone Is Excellent.

Under the direction of Mr. Kousevitky the orchestra appears to be slowly moving toward a better estate. The old Boston strings of the days of Gericke and Nikisch were famous, and probably we shall not soon hear their like again, but the string tone last evening in the concerto was something to make the heart glad. It was opulent in sonority, and there was a fine muscularity in the bowing.

The concerto led the way to the entrance of the soloist, Roland Hayes, the distinguished negro tenor. The writer does not recall any previous appearance of a negro soloist with any of the great orchestras in their series of concerts. Mr. Hayes sang Liszt's setting of the 104th sonnet of Petrarch with orchestration by Busoni and the "Repose of the Holy Family" from Berlioz's cantata "The Flight Into Egypt."

We have heard Mr. Hayes sing better than he did in the Liszt number, in which his voice seemed singularly heavy except in a few ringing high tones and his style labored. But we never heard him sing anything more beautifully than he sang the Berlioz number. To say that is equivalent to saying that it was sung pretty nearly as well as possible, for Mr. Hayes is an artist of highly developed technic, fastidious taste and a singularly correct employment of style. The audience recalled him half a dozen times, and there was no mistaking the note of real enthusiasm in the applause.

The intermezzo of the program was composed of two Debussy bits, a sarabande and dance orchestrated by Ravel. Debussy's piano music is slowly losing its identity, and these two pieces, performed last evening for the first time in this country, deepened the wonder at the ceaseless transmogrification. These are simple little things and the veracious orchestra does not need them and hardly knows what to do with them. They were excellently played and caused no disturbance.

After the customary intermission the orchestra performed Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony. This work has now been played five times in the month of January, twice under Furtwaengler, once under Damrosch and once under Waghalter. Mr. Kousevitky doubtless thought local music lovers had not heard it. The chronicler of musical doings in this place declined to hear another "reading" and therefore has no comment to make.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

JAN 3 0 1925

NEW CONDUCTOR A HIT IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Shows Marked Improvement Under His Leadership.

BY MAURICE ROSENFELD.

[Special Dispatch from a Staff Correspondent.]

New York, Jan. 30.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, with its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, gave one of its periodical concerts in this city at Carnegie hall last evening, and was greeted by an audience that packed the hall, an auditorium considerably larger than Chicago's Orchestra hall.

Assisting the orchestra was Roland Hayes, the Boston Negro tenor, who has been heard in song recital in Chicago. Koussevitzky arranged a program that had variety enough to display his special artistry as a conductor. It consisted of a concerto for orchestra in D major, by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, a classic work in three movements; a vocal arrangement by Busoni of the E major sonnet, No. 104, by Liszt, with the vocal parts sung by Mr. Hayes; an air from Berlioz' choral work, "The Flight Into Egypt," with a short chorus at its end; two orchestral pieces (Sarabande and Danse), by Debussy, orchestrated by Ravel, played at this concert for the first time in America, and the E minor symphony No. 5, by Tschaikowsky.

Orchestra Improved.

Koussevitsky has done much in the way of improving the playing of the orchestra. He has co-ordinated the different choirs so that they blend admirably. In his interpretation of the different styles he proved in the first place to be an imaginative colorist. There was a beautiful legato in the strings and a warm tone from the woodwinds. His interpretation of the two Debussy pieces was somewhat capricious in style, and the percussion effects were given due prominence.

It was in the symphony, however, that he displayed his most significant traits. Here he lingered, in a brooding mood, over the introduction of the first movement. He drew out the lyric phrases of the andante cantabile and put a frenzy of spirit into the last section that brought forth its rustic dance character with truly Russian vim.

Roland Hayes sang the Liszt-Busoni and the Berlioz selections with fine lyric tone and with musical taste. Excepting a slip of the chorus in the Berlioz number, the pieces were admirably done, and Mr. Hayes was recalled several times. The Berlioz air is a fine, sustained piece of oratorio music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

JAN 3 0 1925

ly Religious.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its annual Worcester concert in Mechanics hall on the evening of Tuesday, Feb. 17. The orchestra numbers 104 pieces, and Worcester will have its first opportunity to see Serge Koussevitzky, its new Russian conductor. In London and Paris, for the last four years, the name of Koussevitzky has stood for all that is engrossing and vital in orchestral conducting. His European reputation is fully maintained in this country, for since he assumed the baton of the Boston organization he has become a commanding figure in the musical world.

For the Worcester concert, he has chosen several novelties, but the outstanding number is the Fifth symphony of his distinguished fellow countryman and composer, Tchaikowsky. This is the symphony in E minor.

Subscriptions for the concert are now being received at Symphony hall, Boston. The public sale opens at Steinert's next Monday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 3 0 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

One hundred and four picked musicians under the leadership of one of the world's foremost conductors is the alluring attraction at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon. Frank A. Sedgwick will offer the only symphonic concert of the season and the famous Boston Symphony orchestra is the medium of expression. Added zest is given this affair as it marks the first local appearance of Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished Russian conductor, newly come to America after sensational European appearances. The orchestra has been absent from the list of Hartford musical events for two years and its return has been gleefully hailed by music lovers. The advance seat sale indicates that the largest audience that has ever heard a Boston Symphony concert in this city will be on hand in the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 1. The seat sale is now in progress at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, 139 Asylum street. Early application is advisible. The management earnestly requests that patrons be seated by 3 o'clock as no one will be seated during the progress of a number.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 3 0 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky's Program Features Tchaikowsky Symphony.

A program which should reveal to particular advantage the manifold qualities of its new leader is to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky at the Capitol theater, next Sunday afternoon, February 1, at 3 o'clock. The principal number on the program will be Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor. The truly magnificent and deeply moving interpretation of this great score by Koussevitzky on the occasion of a Pension Fund concert in Boston last December proved an outstanding event in the very remarkable Symphony season.

Koussevitzky will begin the concert with a Concert for Orchestra in D Major, for string orchestra, by Philip Emanuel Bach, the most talented son of J. S. Bach. The score was edited by Maximilian Steinberg. The reading reveals Koussevitzky's peculiar power of revivifying the so-called classics. Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture is chosen from the program of Koussevitzky's American debut last October. Two Russian numbers of particular charm are also to be played. The Prelude to "Khovantchina," by Moussorgsky, and "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a Scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." These pieces have been introduced to our public by the Russian leader.

Seats and loges are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. The management earnestly requests that patrons be seated by 3 o'clock, as no one will be seated during the progress of a number.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

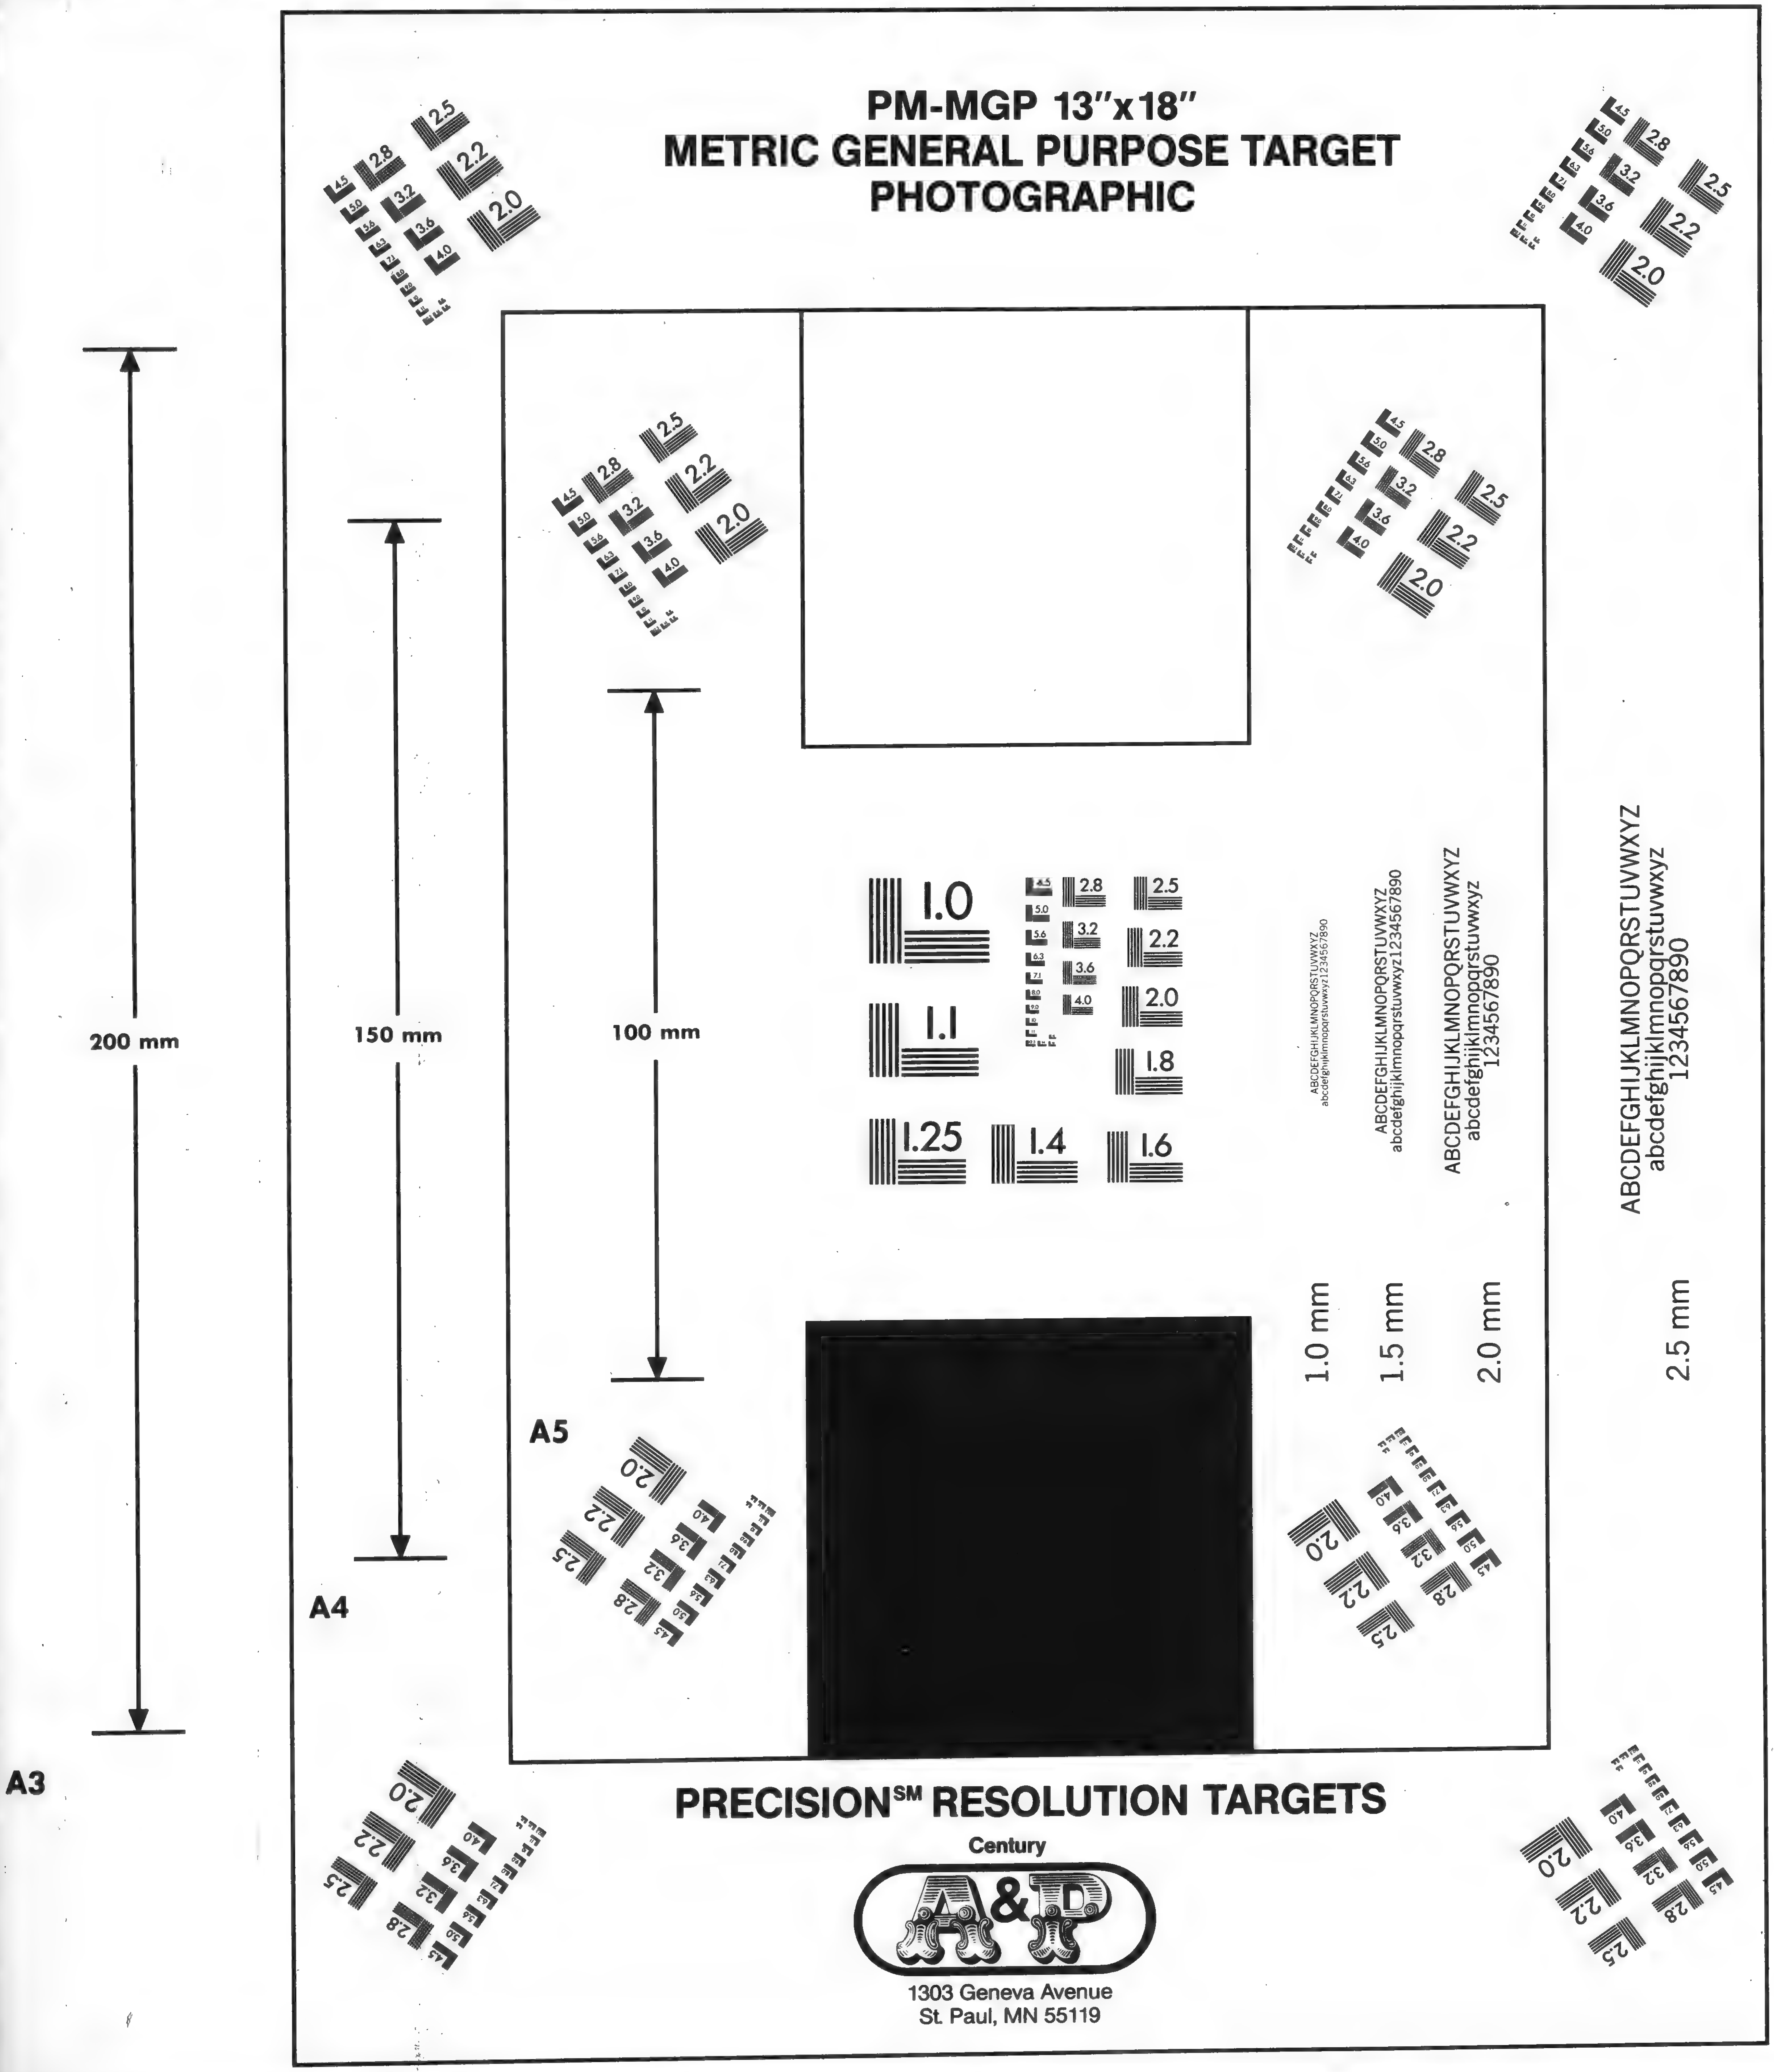
JAN 3 0 1925

MUSIC NOTES.

Roland Hayes sings with the Boston Symphony in the Brooklyn Academy this evening, repeating last night's Carnegie Hall program under Koussevitzky.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

INFORMATION OBSCURED

29

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
POST

JAN 30 1925

Music

Ernest Newman's Daily Column

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra

KOUSSEVITZKY'S program last night was skilfully devised to prepare us for Tchaikovski's fifth symphony,—or rather for Koussevitzky's performance of it. A concerto of Philipp Emmanuel Bach in D major, in a modern orchestral arrangement by Maximilian Steinberg, made us wish that some student would give us a real study of Carl Philipp; for none of the standard histories treat him quite satisfactorily. He did not get his great reputation in his own day without deserving it; and each fresh work of his that comes to our knowledge—especially the remarkable 'cello concerto that M. Pollain discovered in Brussels and played in London last year—deepens our conviction of his unusual quality. The concerto given last night has not the depth and power of thought of the 'cello concerto, but no one could question the genius of the man who could write such a slow movement. It was played with Koussevitzky's usual keen sense of line, and with great beauty of instrumental tone.

Ravel's orchestral arrangement of two of Debussy's piano pieces, the "Sarabande" and the "Danse," rather takes from than adds to our understanding of Debussy, but adds considerably to our knowledge of Ravel. One hardly realizes how purely pianistic is Debussy's thinking in his piano works until we hear them on some other instrument or combination of instruments, when the inner life and character of them seem to be completely changed. But if we can forget the sound of those works on the piano and take Ravel's arrangements as quasi-independent works, they are fascinating. One of the unfathomable mysteries of modern music is how each composer, using the same instruments as all the others, writes himself so completely upon his scoring that, as Sir Henry Wood has pointed out in a brilliant article in Dent's new Dictionary of Music, we can recognize any modern composer, independently of what he is saying, by the mere color-texture of his work. It is perhaps because the scoring of these two dances is so thoroughly Ravel that we feel them to be, in their orchestral form, not quite Debussy. But the scoring is in each case a model of taste and understanding, and the dances give unlimited opportunities for exquisite solo playing—opportunities that were taken full advantage of last night.

Tenor solos of the ordinary concert type would have clashed with such a program as this. Mr. Roland Hayes is therefore to be commended not less for his choice of songs than for his very beautiful singing of them. Liszt's setting of the 104th sonnet of Petrarch (given on this occasion with Busoni's orchestration) is full of difficulties both of range and phrasing. Mr. Hayes seemed a little uneasy in making some transitions of tone, but by far the greater part of the sonnet was sung with the purest tone and with thorough command of the long melodic lines. Equally beautiful, in a quieter way, was the performance of the charming "Repose" aria from Berlioz's "Flight into Egypt."

Koussevitzky's reading of the Tchaikovski Number Five is his own, and opinion about it will be divided. We have never any right to quarrel with an artist's conception of a work until we have at any rate made an effort to place ourselves at his point of view: it is the mere innocence of impertinence to declare a reading to be "wrong" merely because it happens to be a different reading from our own. What, then, let us ask ourselves, is Koussevitzky's view of the fifth symphony? Until we have discovered that—or persuaded ourselves that we have—we shall only be able to indulge in futilities about "taking liberties with the tempo," and all the other recognized clichés for occasions like this.

Once or twice I was unable even to guess what was in the conductor's mind; and as, on these rare occasions, I could only feel sub-consciously that he was "wrong," I should have every sympathy with any one who, being in a similar difficulty all through, should declare the performance to be "wrong" almost from start to finish. I would cite, as an illustration of what I mean, the slight slowing down of the tempo at the commencement of the syncopated melody in the waltz-movement. Something must have been going on in Koussevitzky's mind at this point at which I could not even guess. But when another slightly slower tempo than the usual was adopted just before the final stage of this movement, the new point of view seemed to declare itself quite clearly to me and to justify itself. Indeed, I have never heard the end of this movement made so significant. That Tchaikovski had a very definite poetic idea in his mind at this point is shown by the curious and quite unusual color—so different from its usual brazen harshness—that he gives to the "Fate" theme (let us call it that for convenience's sake). Koussevitzky's slackening of the pulse of the music just before the entry of the theme made the meaning of the whole episode clearer, to me, than it has ever been before. It is not a meaning that I could put into words; but a meaning it certainly had.

Here, then, is a case of an unaccustomed treatment of a familiar passage becoming perfectly logical when one has placed oneself, or fancied one has, at the point of view of the conductor. In the earlier stages of the symphony it was less difficult to perceive the personal point of view. Koussevitzky showed us Tchaikovski as he really was: he let him work himself into any paroxysm of terror he liked, and, when his nerve broke and he began to weep, let him weep and pity himself to his heart's content. Was it right or wrong to do so? The answer depends on what view you take of the conductor's functions. If you claim that your own conception of the work is the only possible right one, you will naively declare the other to be wrong. But if you take the view that in a work like this,—a human document, to use a term that has rather dropped out of fashion, a long chapter of highly emotional self-confession—the conductor is an actor as truly as the player of Hamlet or Œdipus is, you must allow an actor of genius to play the part as he feels it.

It is futile to turn round on him and say that you do not like such a character as he portrays. You do not make it a complaint against the actor who shows Iago as a monster of iniquity that you could not live with such a character as Iago. It is equally irrelevant, æsthetically, to say that you have no sympathy with a character so neurotic as the Tchaikovski whom Koussevitzky shows us in the first two movements of the symphony. If Cezanne paints a crushed tomato in all the rich tints of putrefaction, it is no valid criticism of the painting to say that you don't like tomatoes. anyhow, and least of all when they are rotten. And it is no criticism of such a character as Koussevitzky draws in the early part of the symphony to say that you despise a man so lacking in self-control. Granting the postulate that such a character is conceivable, and that it is in just such music as this that just such a character as that would express itself, the conductor is justified in heightening the lights and deepening the shadows of a soul the very essence of which was the perpetual oscillation between self-terror and self-pity.

It is futile, again, to lay it down dogmatically that the tempo of the finale was "too fast." It would have been too fast for any other reading; but it was not a shade too fast for this. The final allegro, indeed, not only was justified by but itself justified all that had gone before; when once the dark obsession that had tortured the man's mind in the earlier movements had been rolled away, it was natural that he should find relief in a dance as mad as this. There was thus nothing capricious or ill-governed in the reading: everything was under the most masterly control. One might or might not agree with it or like it; but it will be some time before any one who heard it will forget it.

ERNEST NEWMAN.

NY

THIS CLIPPING FROM TELEGRAPH

JAN 30 1925

The Boston Symphony.

On the surface, Serge Koussevitzky seems to be an ideal conductor. That is, he accomplishes a great deal of directing without any lost motion. Almost stolid, he nevertheless has a firm hand on his Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky is the only Russian I ever saw who looks and acts exactly like an unemotional Englishman.

Photo Mishkin.
THEODORE STEARNS.

Therein lies the secret of his inability to magnetize audiences, either by his own personality or by the playing of his orchestra. What he needs—it is probably too late to call his attention to it now—is an emotional waking up that will last and leave an imprint, not so much on his mind as on on his soul. As he is to-day—as he was last night in Carnegie Hall conducting the Boston Symphony—he is hide-bound and not able to realize it. So much for Serge Koussevitzky.

* * * * *

Last night, at this symphony concert, Roland Hayes was the soloist. His numbers, accompanied by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were the Liszt 104th Sonnet of Petrarch and the air, "The Repose of the Holy Family" from the oratorio "The Flight Into Egypt" by Berlioz. With more experience in singing with a symphony orchestra behind him, Roland Hayes should grow in confidence and use with more freedom his fine sympathetic voice.

Hayes was plainly worried last night by the fact that he had eighty or ninety men working with him musically instead of just a one-man accompaniment at the piano. In his Liszt "104th Sonnett" he strained for his high notes, and however beautiful his phrasing, he gave the impression of working hard. This is a cardinal sin in art.

In the Berlioz number he was more at ease and he did it exquisitely, but in his solo recitative portion just before the finish he sagged from the pitch, nor should all the tumultuous applause—and it was very heavy—condone the fault.

The Bosto nSymphony this season has a good string section, but a wood wind ensemble that generally gives a clammy impression of being caught by the heels as it runs along. The flute, oboe and clarinet colors were cold last night—like cobalt—but the bassoons were warm and brown.

News
Chicago
Jan 30

NEW CONDUCTOR A HIT IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Shows Marked Improvement Under His Leadership.

BY MAURICE ROSENFELD.

[Special Dispatch from a Staff Correspondent.]

New York, Jan. 30.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, with its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, gave one of its periodical concerts in this city at Carnegie hall last evening, and was greeted by an audience that packed the hall, an auditorium considerably larger than Chicago's Orchestra hall.

Assisting the orchestra was Roland Hayes, the Boston Negro tenor, who has been heard in song recital in Chicago. Koussevitzky arranged a program that had variety enough to display his special artistry as a conductor. It consisted of a concerto for orchestra in D major, by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, a classic work in three movements; a vocal arrangement by Busoni of the E major sonnet, No. 104, by Liszt, with the vocal parts sung by Mr. Hayes; an air from Berlioz' choral work, "The Flight Into Egypt," with a short chorus at its end; two orchestral pieces (Sarabande and Danse), by Debussy, orchestrated by Ravel, played at this concert for the first time in America, and the E minor symphony No. 5 by Tschaikowsky.

Orchestra Improved.

Koussevitsky has done much in the way of improving the playing of the orchestra. He has co-ordinated the different choirs so that they blend admirably. In his interpretation of the different styles he proved in the first place to be an imaginative colorist. There was a beautiful legato in the strings and a warm tone from the woodwinds. His interpretation of the two Debussy pieces was somewhat capricious in style, and the percussion effects were given due prominence.

It was in the symphony, however that he displayed his most significan traits. Here he lingered, in a broodin mood, over the introduction of the firs movement. He drew out the lyri phrases of the andante cantabile an put a frenzy of spirit into the last sec tion that brought forth its rustic danc character with truly Russian élan.

Roland Hayes sang the Liszt Buson and the Berlioz selections with fine lyri tone and with musical taste. Exceptin a slip of the chorus in the Berlioz num ber, the pieces were admirably done, an Mr. Hayes was recalled several times The Berlioz air is a fine, sustained piec of oratorio music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WORCESTER
MASS.
POST
JAN 30 1925

SYMPHONY ADDS RUSSIAN MUSIC

More Than Ever Played Under New Conductor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its annual concert in Mechanics Hall Tuesday evening, Feb. 17. With the orchestra comes the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, whose appearance have been hailed with delight from the critics. Since assuming the baton of the Boston organization he has introduced more of the music of the Russian composers, and these include some novelties which have been well received.

One of these novelties is the scherzo. "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from the Rimsky-Korsakoff opera, "Tsar Saltan." When this number received its first presentation at the symphony concert in Boston there was so much demand for it that Koussevitzky repeated the selection. This is the first time an encore has been given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its regular symphony programs since its organization 40 years ago.

Subscriptions for the concert are now being received at Symphony Hall, Boston, but the public sale opens at Steinert's next Monday morning.

HAVERHILL
MASS.
GAZETTE
ISSUE OF
JAN 30 1925

AFTER BOSTON SYMPHONY FOR CONCERT HERE

Academy Management Now Trying to Arrange Appearance Here

Manager Edward Foley of the Academy stated today that he is practically assured of a capacity house for the concert Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, by Fritz Kreisler. So sure is he of a sell-out that he is now planning for another concert to follow soon after the local appearance of the great violinist.

Today he went to Boston to see if a Haverhill concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra could be arranged.

Preliminary negotiations have been under way for some time and Manager Foley will shortly be in a position to say positively whether or not the orchestra will come here. If the Boston Symphony orchestra does come it will come intact with every one of its 105 members and with the brilliant Sergei Koussevitsky conducting, Mr. Foley stated. There will be no such thing as a concert by an ensemble of Boston Symphony players. It will be the full orchestra or none.

Interest in the Kreisler concert is great, according to Manager Foley. The first announcements brought unusual responses and inquiries. Reservations pour in every day and it is safe to say that when the public sale of tickets opens on Saturday morning a large part of the house will be gone. It is four years since Kreisler played here and in the years that have intervened interest in him has increased rather than abated. When Kreisler came here in 1920 and 1921 there was no trouble in selling out the house. And by all signs 1925 will keep up the record.

Kreisler plays in Boston the Sunday before his Haverhill recital. Symphony hall is now sold out for the concert despite the fact that he played there only two weeks ago.

The program which he will play in Haverhill has not yet been received. Carl Lamson, as of old, will be the accompanist.

NEW YORK
WORLD

JAN 30 192

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

It cost something to wade, swin slide, ski and otherwise navigate Carnegie Hall last night to hear th Boston Symphony Orchestra pla and the highest compliment one ca possibly pay the concert is to repor briefly, that it was worth it. M Koussevitzky offered a rarely ba anced and satisfying program and choirs sang together in very plausi imitation of the morning stars.

It is always an occasion when Boston Symphony offers a soloist, a last night was a particularly re starred one. For the soloist was R land Hayes, who sang Liszt's 10 Sonnet of Petrarch (with Busor orchestral accompaniment) and "Repose of the Holy Family" fr Berlioz's "The Flight Into Egyp Mr. Hayes seemed to have a sli cold, for the wonted clarity of so of his tones was faintly blurred times. The essential beauty of voice was unmarred, however, and interpretations were, as always, quisitely finished and deeply mov in their brooding sincerity.

The orchestral accompaniments both numbers were perfection. much cannot be said, however, for t offstage choir of female voices th accompanied the last measures of Berlioz excerpt. The angels—I thi they were angels—differed utte with the conductor regarding tempo; and as Mr. Koussevitzky w only mortal, they won, orchestra soloist tying for second place. Hayes received a tremendous ovat from the audience, during which Koussevitzky left the stage with air of grim determination—doubtl to execute a pogrom or two.

The orchestral portion of the pr gram comprised the Steinberg arrangement of C. P. E. Bach's concerto in D, two new orchestral transcriptions by Ravel of dances by Debussy, and the Chykovsky fifth symphony. The Bach piece was a noble reading on Mr. Koussevitzky's part, set off by some wholly beautiful orchestral playing. The second of the Ravel transcriptions, the "Danse," was the better, puckish in mood and scintillating in its orchestral garb. The Sarabande, originally part of the "Pour le Piano" suite, suffered, I thought, from the transcriber's over-anxiety to display as many different orchestral colors in a given time as possible. It was an effective piece of scoring, but it rather obscured the breadth and grave beauty of the original.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the Fifth was a disconcerting mixture of merits and defects. The second movement was vital and beautiful, but the third went at such a deliberate pace that it offered almost no contrast with what had preceded it. In the first movement he played the waltz-like second theme in a sentimentalized and exaggerated rubato that not only destroyed its outlines but dislocated it from the rest of the music. The remainder of the first movement, and the last, could hardly have been improved.

NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

JAN 30 1925

The Philadelphia Orchestra ha best look to its laurels. Its riv Boston Symphony players have com back strong this year. The latte boys have the band, the conductor the old time audiences, and last eve ning went a step further in the con est by stealing typical "Philadelphi night" weather. And the elements didn't deter the standees from patron izing the music purveyed by St Botolph's men and their new conductor, Koussevitzky. Added interes in the concert sprung from the ap pearance of Roland Hayes, the colore tenor, who as soloist, sang an air Berlioz and a Liszt setting of a so net. Some of Mr. Hayes's tones we as fine spun as Koussevitzky's piani simi.

There seems to be a run on Tsch kowsky's fifth symphony in orche tral circles. Messrs. Furtwangler a Von Hoogstraten have just appli their talents to it, Mr. Von Hoogst ten only as late as Wednesday nig Mr. Koussevitzky took up the mel dies when the Philharmonic left o All three gentlemen play it stirring well—each one finding in it passag that have a particular personal app and which he could treat as his fee ing directed. If the fifth is play much oftener, the public will ha their own favorite bits and there w be nothing left for the conductors except to shift to another symphor

It was a consoling thought, as o ploughed one's way through t storm to the Boston Symphony, reflect that one of our own bands, the New York Symphony, was at that very moment in or approaching Havana, Cuba, where snow and sleet do not corrupt, and where—where—well, Mr. Damrosch before leaving last Sunday told his subscribers he was aware how envious they all were of their orchestra's approaching privileges.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNIO

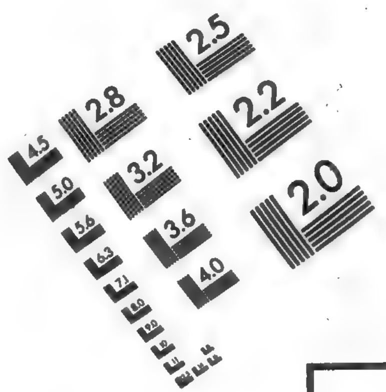
JAN 3

Boston Symphony at the Academy of Music To-nigh

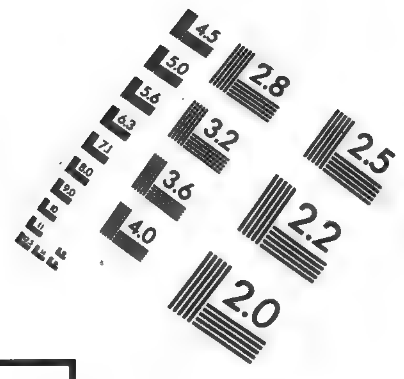
The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gives its third concert of its Brooklyn series at the Academy of Music (under Institute auspices) to-night at 8:15 o'clock. Roland Hayes, celebrated negro tenor, will be the soloist. The programme includes Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's D major Concerto for Orchestra, Debussy's "Danse" and "Sarabande" (arranged by Maurice Ravel), and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. Mr. Hayes will sing "The Repose of the Holy Family," from Berlioz's "The Flight into Egypt," and Liszt's setting of the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch, the accompaniment orchestrated by Busoni.

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

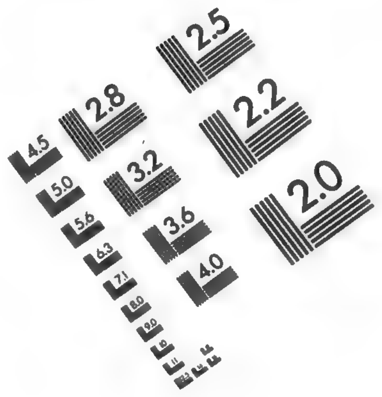
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



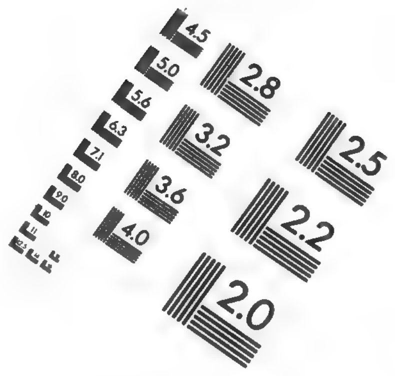
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0



4.5
2.8
5.0
5.6
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0

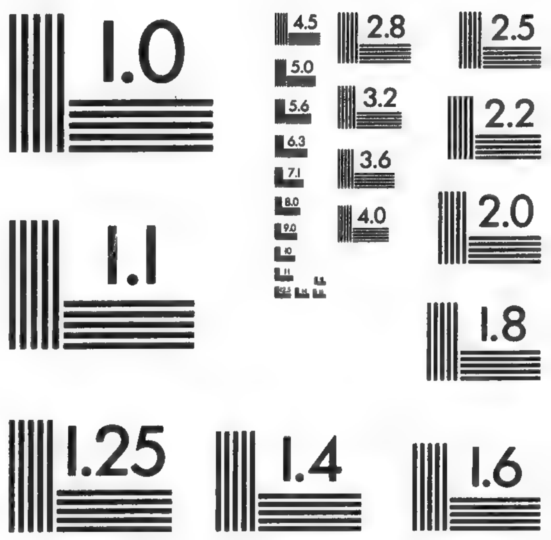


4.5
2.8
5.0
5.6
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
5.6
3.2
2.2
6.3
3.6
7.1
4.0
2.0
8.0
9.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

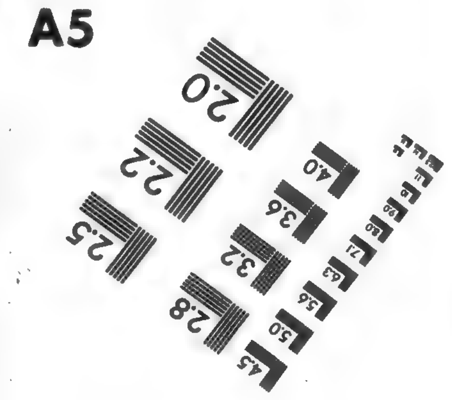
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

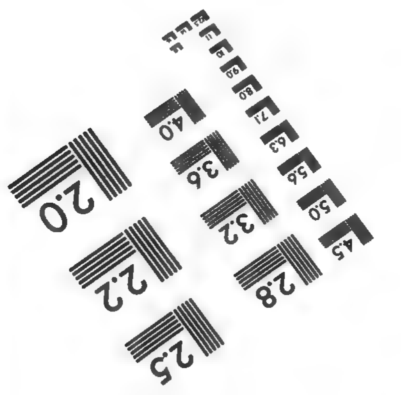
2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5



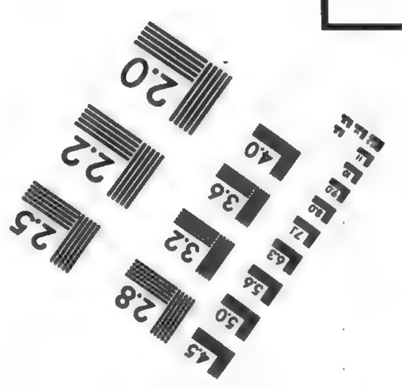
2.0
2.2
4.0
2.5
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5
5.0



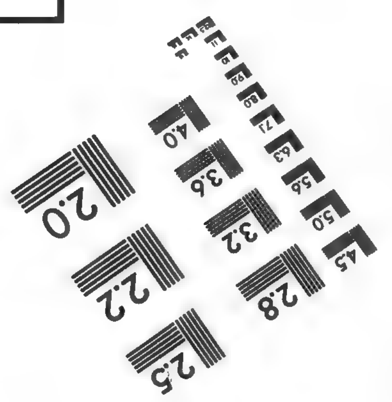
4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
5.0
2.2
2.8
4.5
2.5

A4

A3



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5



4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
5.0
2.2
2.8
4.5
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

30

Transcript Mass and Pigment: The Concert-Hall in 1925 Jan 31

The Rush-Line Gathers at Symphony Hall: Painting by Duane Haley of Boston

---

NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

JAN 31 1925

There was plenty of action in the orchestral field with the coming of Messrs. Furtwangler, Stravinsky, Waghalter and Miss Leginska as conductors to the departure of Mr. Damrosch and his cohorts for Cuba. Opinion seems to hold that Stravinsky is a better composer than conductor; that Furtwangler is a romanticist, at his best when conducting the classic symphonies, in which he adheres to the letter as well as the spirit of the score, aiming to preserve the big curve and not given to dwelling upon episodic detail. The passion, contrasts in moods and the intensity in such pieces as "Don Juan" and "Tristan" he missed.

Mr. Waghalter of the State Symphony as yet adheres to the letter of the music, letting it sing itself but missing the nuances. Among the memorable orchestral moments of the month are: Furtwangler's playing of the Brahms C Minor Symphony and Schumann's fourth; the Boston Symphony's performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Roman Carnival;" the Philharmonic's playing of Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture. Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, by the Philadelphians, was the longest [illegible] and least enjoyable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

JAN 31 1925

REGARDING CONDUCTORS

Wilhelm Furtwaengler has stirred up considerably the orchestra-conductor situation hereabouts. His first appearance brought him a deserved ovation . . . in recognition of a unique accomplishment. Then came a second leading of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, following by a third and a fourth. With each effort demonstrated his place in the symphony field. He can now be pronounced by Americans who never before observed his endeavors to be one of the first of living conductors. Whether the Philharmonic will be able to arrange to have him come permanently to this city remains to be seen.

In the meantime Serge Kouseevitzky, the Boston Symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artistic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitzky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a striving of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 31 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Musically the year holds forth nothing more attractive than the Boston Symphony concert, which will be heard in the Capitol Theater tomorrow afternoon, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The orchestra returns to Hartford after an absence of two years and added zest is given the event by the first appearance here of Serge Koussevitsky, the new leader and one of the world's greatest musicians. He is the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Previous to his coming to America last September he was called the only great conductor whom this country had not heard. He is described as a leader of rare charm magnetism and forcefulness, and as an artist of impassioned convictions. His coming to Hartford is one of the outstanding musical events of the season and will no doubt occasion the largest audience that has ever attended a Boston Symphony concert in this city. The orchestra contains intact the remarkable personnel of former seasons. The demand for seats for this notable concert exceeds that of any other season by far and the long-sighted concert goer will do well to make immediate application for seats. The sale is now in progress at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, 139 Asylum street. The remaining seats and admissions will be placed on sale at the theater box office at 1 o'clock tomorrow. The management ernestly requests that patrons be seated at concert time as no one will be seated during the progress of a number.

PAPER Trans

DATE

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Henry Hadley will be the guest conductor of the next regular pair of Bostin symphony concerts to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evennig, and Margaret Matzenauer will be the soloist. Hadley will conduct the first time here his Fourth Symphony, "North, East, South and West," and will also present Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan," and Smetana's overture to "The Sol[illegible]ide." Mme. Matzenauer will sing B[illegible]oven's aria. "Ah! Perfido," and an aria from Mozart's "Titus."

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 31 1925

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to play at the Capitol theater in this city to-morrow afternoon, gave concerts in New York on Thursday evening and this afternoon. Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" and Tschaikovsky's "Fifty Symphony were played.

* * *

CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

JAN 30 1925

The Boston Symphony.

A very large audience heard the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening and applauded rapturously Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, and Roland Hayes, the soloist. The refined art of Mr. Hayes had play in a gentle air from Berlioz's "Flight Into Egypt." In Liszt's more robust setting of Petrarch's sonnet "Pace non trovo" his tones were wooden, intractable and uncertain in pitch. The instrumental numbers were Maximilian Steinberg's arrangement of a concerto in D major by C. P. E. Bach, Ravel's orchestral version of a sarabande and a dance composed by Debussy for piano (marked "first time in America"), and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony, which all the conductors are leading this season. The orchestra played well, and in the symphony Mr. Koussevitzky revelled in scarce linked phrases interminably drawn out.

P. S.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 31 1925

Roland Hayes, tenor, who sang here so successfully last Sunday afternoon, was the soloist in New York on Thursday evening at a concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. He sang the tenor aria from "The Flight Into Egypt" by Berlioz.

30

Transcript Mass and Pigment: The Concert-Hall in 1925 Jan 31

The Rush-Line Gathers at Symphony Hall: Painting by Duane Haley of Boston

---

NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

JAN 31 1925

There was plenty of action in the orchestral field with the coming of Messrs. Furtwangler, Stravinsky, Waghalter and Miss Leginska as conductors to the departure of Mr. Damrosch and his cohorts for Cuba. Opinion seems to hold that Stravinsky is a better composer than conductor; that Furtwangler is a romanticist, at his best when conducting the classic symphonies, in which he adheres to the letter as well as the spirit of the score, aiming to preserve the big curve and not given to dwelling upon episodic detail. The passion, contrasts in moods and the intensity in such pieces as "Don Juan" and "Tristan" he missed.

Mr. Waghalter of the State Symphony as yet adheres to the letter of the music, letting it sing itself but missing the nuances. Among the memorable orchestral moments of the month are: Furtwangler's playing of the Brahms C Minor Symphony and Schumann's fourth; the Boston Symphony's performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Roman Carnival;" the Philharmonic's playing of Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture. Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, by the Philadelphians, was the longest [illegible] and least enjoyable.

Newman wrote not long ago

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

JAN 31 1925

REGARDING CONDUCTORS

Wilhelm Furtwaengler has stirred up considerably the orchestra-conductor situation hereabouts. His first appearance brought him a deserved ovation . . . in recognition of a unique accomplishment. Then came a second leading of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, following by a third and a fourth. With each effort demonstrated his place in the symphony field. He can now be pronounced by Americans who never before observed his endeavors to be one of the first of living conductors. Whether the Philharmonic will be able to arrange to have him come permanently to this city remains to be seen.

In the meantime Serge Kouseevitzky, the Boston Symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artistic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitzky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a striving of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 31 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Musically the year holds forth nothing more attractive than the Boston Symphony concert, which will be heard in the Capitol Theater tomorrow afternoon, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The orchestra returns to Hartford after an absence of two years and added zest is given the event by the first appearance here of Serge Koussevitsky, the new leader and one of the world's greatest musicians. He is the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Previous to his coming to America last September he was called the only great conductor whom this country had not heard. He is described as a leader of rare charm magnetism and forcefulness, and as an artist of impassioned convictions. His coming to Hartford is one of the outstanding musical events of the season and will no doubt occasion the largest audience that has ever attended a Boston Symphony concert in this city. The orchestra contains intact the remarkable personnel of former seasons. The demand for seats for this notable concert exceeds that of any other season by far and the long-sighted concert goer will do well to make immediate application for seats. The sale is now in progress at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, 139 Asylum street. The remaining seats and admissions will be placed on sale at the theater box office at 1 o'clock tomorrow. The management ernestly requests that patrons be seated at concert time as no one will be seated during the progress of a number.

PAPER Traveler

DATE [illegible]

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Henry Hadley will be the guest conductor of the next regular pair of Boston symphony concerts to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evennig, and Margaret Matzenauer will be the soloist. Hadley will conduct the first time here his Fourth Symphony, "North, East, South and West," and will also present Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan," and Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride." Mme. Matzenauer will sing Beethoven's aria, "Ah! Perfido," and an aria from Mozart's "Titus."

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 31 1925

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to play at the Capitol theater in this city to-morrow afternoon, gave concerts in New York on Thursday evening and this afternoon. Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" and Tschaikovsky's "Fifty Symphony were played.

* * *

CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

JAN 30 1925

The Boston Symphony.

A very large audience heard the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening and applauded rapturously Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, and Roland Hayes, the soloist. The refined art of Mr. Hayes had play in a gentle air from Berlioz's "Flight Into Egypt." In Liszt's more robust setting of Petrarch's sonnet "Pace non trovo" his tones were wooden, intractable and uncertain in pitch. The instrumental numbers were Maximilian Steinberg's arrangement of a concerto in D major by C. P. E. Bach, Ravel's orchestral version of a sarabande and a dance composed by Debussy for piano (marked "first time in America"), and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony, which all the conductors are leading this season. The orchestra played well, and in the symphony Mr. Koussevitzky revelled in scarce linked phrases interminably drawn out.

P. S.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 31 1925

Roland Hayes, tenor, who sang here so successfully last Sunday afternoon, was the soloist in New York on Thursday evening at a concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. He sang the tenor aria from "The Flight Into Egypt" by Berlioz.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 31 1925

MUSIC OF THE DAY

THIRD of the Brooklyn Boston Symphony concerts was that which took place at the Academy last evening. The assisting artist was Roland Hayes, tenor, and the program consisted of music by Phillip Emannuel Bach, Berlioz, Liszt, Debussy and Tchaikowsky. The audience was one of the largest seen at the Academy this season—all available seats were occupied, as well as a goodly portion of the standing room.

As Mr. Hayes was the feature of the evening, first consideration must go to him. It is two seasons now since he made his debut in New York, and in that time he has become one of the most widely admired and popular of singers. All of this is his just due. We have remarked before on the superb quality of his voice, which is perhaps the finest tenor to be heard in the concert hall, and on the quality of his artistry. Mr. Hayes is essentially an interpreter. He does not, it may be, indulge in the familiar tricks of the dramatic singer—and in the last analysis one cannot consider him as a dramatic singer. His apparatus is that of the concert hall, and his interpretation is a matter of vocal technique, of a fine sensitiveness in the coloring of his tones, in his phrasing, in the ardor with which he sings.

The Berlioz aria from "The Flight Into Egypt" and the Liszt setting of Petrarch's 104th Sonnet were not designed to show him at his best. In the Berlioz the delicacy of his singing was lost in the vigor of a too assertive orchestral background, and the tessitura of the Liszt aria lay too high for Mr. Hayes to compass with ease. His voice is best in its middle and lower ranges, where a resonant, almost baritone quality adds warmth to his tones. But he sang both numbers with that intelligence which is characteristic of all he does.

The main feature of Mr. Koussewitsky's share in the evening was the Tschaikowsky Symphony in E minor. Just why this symphony should suddenly achieve such a tremendous vogue is one of those mysteries the key to which lies only in the hands of those who devise programs. Messrs. Damrosch, Furtwaengler, Hoogstraten, Waghalter and Stokowski have given it to us this season, and the past week or so has brought at least half a dozen performances of this single work. Mr. Koussewitsky added nothing important to the sum total of versions we have heard—the unevenness which the Russian conductor has manifested since his first concert here grows monthly more alarming until the stage is reached where one is quite unable to look forward to his concerts either with pleasure or distaste. Only a mild curiosity remains, a curiosity to see whether he will give us something as fine as he has given us in the "Oberon" overture and the Debussy "Nuage" or something as poor as he has given in the Wagner "Tannhauser" Bacchanale and last evening's symphony.

There is no objection to eccentricities of reading if the result is effective. Had the sleepy tempi adopted by Mr. Koussewitsky through a large part of Tschaikowsky's score heightened the impression of its ardor, one could not object. But Tschaikowsky in his music has reached the outmost bounds of taste, and to exaggerate his tonal illnesses is to destroy their beauty. It is hardly conceivable that anyone could see fit to yearn over the phrase that serves as second subject in the first movement of the Fifth Symphony—that melancholy bit of sentiment that follows the more vigorously woeful transition theme—as did Mr. Koussewitsky, nor take the first bars of the Valse with such exaggerated slowness. And when Mr. Koussewitsky reached the finale he went to the other extreme. But the finale, which except for its savage first theme is one of Tschaikowsky's worst pages, can stand for this sort of thing. It is Muscovite Sousa, and Mr. Koussewitsky is an unparalleled band master.

The Bach Concerto in D major was finely modeled, and the two Debussy Dances, orchestrated b

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 31 1925

Music Events

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has again come into its own. Since the days of Karl Muck the capital of New England culture has not boasted such a splendid musical organization as the one which now bears its name. A good many things have been said about Serge Koussevitzky and all of them have been good. Last night at the Academy of Music, more than 2,000 Brooklynites found out that all of these things are true.

For several years now, musical America has worshipped at the shrine of Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Mr. Stokowski, however, no longer holds the field alone. His altar he must share with Mr. Koussevitzky. Unless he is careful he will be supplanted altogether by the man who in Boston has worked such wonders.

Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony was the piece de resistance last night. Under Mr. Koussevitzky's guidance the orchestra rose to the occasion with a power and beauty which was nothing short of magnificent and particularly in the fourth movement when the themes gather with ever rising tempo toward that thrilling and tremendous climax, which calls to mind nothing so much as the superhuman writing Wagner has given to the third act of Gotterdammerung when, with fire and water, the realm of the gods is destroyed.

The first number on the program last night was Bach's concerto in D major. Mr. Koussevitzky caught the joyous, rollicking spirit of the initial movement of this composition with just the right verve and exuberance. Equally true and beautiful was his interpretation of the second movement with its slow majesty, and the third, with its swinging, triumphant and at times almost reckless, air.

Especially noticeable in the concerto was the splendid work of the wind instruments which, in the third movement of the fifth symphony, also acquitted themselves nobly.

Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, sang "The Repose of the Holy Family" from Berlicz; "The Flight Into Egypt" with mellow beauty and deep understanding and feeling. The same cannot be said of his rendition of "The 104th Sonnet of Petrarch," Liszt. Here his voice seemed at times woefully raged and uneven. Particularly was this noticeable in the upper register. Debussy, that gentleman of France who began in music what Stravinsky finished, also contributed to the program. The first piece was "Sarabande," done in his usual fragmentary manner. The second number, a dance, was sprightly, gay, disconnected and strictly modern after the Debussy fashion.

The concert was given under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society.

PAPER Transcript

DATE Jan 31

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

NEEDLESS, almost, to say, Mr. Henry Hadley, summoned as guest-conductor to the Symphony Concerts next week, will make one of his own pieces the major number of the program. Half of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will fall to his Symphony, "North, South, East, West," as yet unplayed in Boston. He will further regale the audiences with his versions of Strauss's "Don Juan" and Smetana's overture to the peasant opera, "The Bartered Bride." Between whiles, Mme. Matzenauer will sing airs from Beethoven and Mozart.

Mr. Hadley is also to be lavished on the concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge on Thursday evening next. There his Symphony, as aforesaid, will sing sweet in the ears of the University; while the other pieces to be heard are Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride"; Strauss's "Don Juan" and the Prelude and Closing Scene from Wagner's "Tristan."

Mr. Hadley will also be guest-conductor at the concert of the People's Orchestra in the St. James Theater tomorrow afternoon. True to type, he sets one of his pieces on the program—this time an "Ancient Suite" for violoncello to be played by his brother. Otherwise the list traverses a Symphony of Haydn in B-flat; Norwegian Dances by Grieg, an orchestral version of Liszt's "Liebestraum"; Johann Strauss's Waltz of the Vienna Woods.

on their programs.

Monday evening, Feb. 9, in Symphony Hall, the third of the supplementary series f Symphony Concerts, with the orchestra n full force and high mettle, with Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor of insight, imagination and individuality, through music and players transmuting large powers into communicating fires. Mr. John Charles Thomas, now of full stature as concert-singer, will assist the orchestra. His pieces; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony; the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire Bird," fill the program.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 31 1925

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Makes His Initial Bow to a Local Audience at the Capitol Theater To-morrow Afternoon at 3 O'Clock.

HAVERHILL
MASS.
GAZETTE

ISSUE OF
JAN 31 1925

SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE ON 1ST OF MARCH

Boston Organization Is Engaged for Appearance at the Academy

The full Boston Symphony orchestra with its 105 musicians under the baton of Sergei Kousevitzky, will be heard in concert at the Academy on Sunday afternoon, March 1.

Manager Foley of the Academy contracted for the orchestra's appearance in Haverhill yesterday after some few days of negotiating. This will be the first time in five years that the full orchestra has been to Haverhill. It last came in November, 1920, when Pierre Monteux was conducting.

So great was the response of the public sale for the violin recital by Fritz Kreisler that Manager Foley was encouraged to negotiate for a Haverhill engagement of this orchestra.

There isn't much chance of Kreisler playing to many empty seats for not even the sale for Galli-Curci in 1923 opened with the rush that has attended the Kreisler sale since the first formal announcement was made on Monday.

The concert will be an outstanding one even in such a brilliant season as the present. New York critics, always jealous of the supremacy of the Boston Symphony orchestra, are all agreed that under Kousevitzky the famous band has regained all the prestige lost when Muck left it. It has been a matter of note that on every visit of the orchestra to New York capacity houses have heard it. This was not so under Rabaud, who succeeded Muck, or Monteux, who succeeded Rabaud. But even New York, which has been giving the palm to the Philadelphia orchestra, now admits that the Boston orchestra is back at the top again.

Manager Foley is particularly anxious to impress upon Haverhill people that his contract calls for the full orchestra, not an ensemble of players from it.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 31 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT SUNDAY

Serge Koussevitzky Captivates America With Magnetism.

Serge Koussevitzky, the eminent new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be first heard in Hartford at the pending visit of this organization for a concert in the Capitol theater to-morrow (Sunday) afternoon at 3 o'clock. Preceded to America by the most glowing reports from Europe, Koussevitzky has made another conquest both sudden and complete—the conquest of America. This remarkable leader is talked about the country over—every series is subscribed and seats for the Boston Symphony concerts are at a premium. Naturally, much was expected of Serge Koussevitzky. His qualities have exceeded all expectations. In Boston, New York and each city he has visited, the effect has been electric.

There is but one opinion of his personal magnetism, his fresh sincerity and vividness as an interpretative artist, his rare and absolute control manifest in the perfect response of the famous orchestra which he now commands.

About no other conductor (and America has in the last few seasons heard all of the "great" ones) has the consensus of opinion been so high, and so unqualified.

Koussevitzky's program for Hartford is such as to reveal the brilliance and versatility of the Russian leader. It will include a Concerto for Orchestra in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach, edited by Maximilian Steinberg; Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival"; the Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from the opera "Tsar Saltan." The second portion of the program will comprise Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. Seats may be obtained at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street until this evening. The remaining seats will be placed on sale at the theater box office to-morrow at 1 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 31 1925

Roland Hayes Here With The Boston Orchestra

Serge Koussewitzky and Roland Hayes gave Brooklynites one of the rarest treats of the musical season last night at the Academy of Music. To them Mr. Koussewitzky brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a superbly organized group, and Mr. Hayes, the primitive beauty of a voice as mellow and luscious as a rare fruit of the tropics.

The Russian's form was at once languid and didactic. With the best effort he held his associates in a mighty grip and poured into them the mighty music in him. His expression was truly fearless.

Never before have Brooklynites heard Tchaikousky's Fifth Symphony played as it was played last night. The man with the baton all but sang, so vital was his rendition. The second movement was quite appealing and his finale magnificent.

The Negro tenor sang two numbers patently chosen to permit him to demonstrate his power in a limited time. Berlioz's air, "The Repose of the Holy Family," from "The Flight Into Egypt," revealed a great depth of feeling and passion. In Liszt's "104th Sonnet of Petrarch" he soared with vigor and certainly into the upper register. His efforts won tremendous approbation from his listeners.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

JAN 31 1925

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a superlatively fine performance of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony at the Academy of Music last night. Frequently heard and sometimes reaching a borderline of monotony the popular E minor symphony last night presented fresh beauties and new meanings. Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was sturdy, poetic and dramatically incisive, with an exaggerated ritardando or two at certain elisions in the opening movement, but otherwise disclosing a "close up" view of the work in the reflection of a powerful personality. Even Johannes Brahms, who, at the rehearsal preceding its performance at Hamburg in 1889, expressed admiration for the E minor symphony's first three movements while taking exception ("very frankly") to the finale, would very likely have enthused could he have but heard this same finale as played by Koussevitzky and the Boston men last night. Conductor and orchestra here rose to noble heights. Never, within recollection, has this part of Tschaikowsky's work een so inspiringly presented. Much f the secret of this effective reading ay in Mr. Koussevitzky's sped up empi. It was a performance, at any ate, of irressistible grandeur, and ne that moved a conservative Institute audience to an outburst of rotracted applause.

Otherwise the evening was not articularly eventful. Roland Hayes, egro tenor of indisputably fine ifts, was the soloist, singing an air rom Berliaz's "The Flight Into gypt," and Liszt's 104th Sonnet of etrarch (the original accompaninent orchestrated by the late Feruccio Busooni). Of this latter, Mr. layes gave a better account of etrarch than of Liszt. His breath support was not sufficient to hold up the high tones, albeit those of the ower compass possessed smoothness nd contained power. Somehow, espite his artistic efforts, Mr. layes seems to belong to the realm f recital than the domain of symhony. He was very cordially applauded.

Two Ravel orchestrations of Deussy piano pieces, faithfully in the diom of the composer's peculiarly individual instrumental speech, roved pleasing bits, by title "Saraande" and "Danse." A delightful ntique, Philip Emanuel Bach's D najor concerto for orchestra, pened the programme.

As is usual at these concerts, the official programmes, containing Philip Hale's historical and descriptive notes, were held by a favored minority, thus slighting a large majority of the patrons present. Even if not premeditated, this situation is one calling for correction. The Boston Orchestra visits Brooklyn again on March 13, with Albert Spalding as soloist.

32

PAPER Globe

DATE 2-1

Henry Hadley will be guest conductor with the People's Symphony Orchestra this afternoon at the St James Theatre and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its regular concerts Friday and Saturday. Mr Hadley now makes his home in New York, but he was born in Somerville and studied in Boston. He is associate conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the composer of numerous works, including several symphonies, operas "Cleopatra's Night" and "Bianca's choral works and lesses things, many of them performed at various times in Boston.

USIC AND MUSICIANS

ny st uctors

Henry Hadley, associate conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, will guest conductor at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and also of the People's Symphony Orchestra. Some philosophy on the subject of guest conductors is therefore in order.

Deems Taylor, last Sunday in the New York World, freed his mind with his customary vigor and directness of attack on the subject of guest conductors. He wrote in part as follows:

If the Philharmonic under Mahler was as fine as people say it was, the main reason, aside from Mahler's talents as conductor, was the fact that he had the orchestra to himself. It makes really little difference whether or not this season's conductors of the Philharmonic rank as far below Mahler as Mr Nock seems to think they do. They might be the six greatest conductors the world has ever seen, and the Philharmonic would not play as well under them as the Chicago and Philadelphia Orchestras play under Stock and Stokowski.

The reason is simple enough. Teamwork is the secret of a great orchestra exactly as it is the secret of a great football team. If the Notre Dame team, instead of being drilled by Knut Rockne, were compelled to go through its season under six successive head coaches, each with a different system of plays, nobody would expect it to reveal any very brilliant football. Similarly, the board of directors of the Philharmonic are not living in the world of reality if they seriously expect their orchestra to approach greatness under six different conductors.

"What are the qualities that make an orchestra deserving of the adjective 'great?' Technical proficiency is perhaps the fundamental one—in the sense, at least, that without expert musicians in its ranks no ensemble can play really greatly. This quality the Philharmonic undoubtedly possesses and will continue to possess no matter who conducts it. But there are other essentials, and most of them presuppose a close and lengthy association between conductor and players. Suppose we list them as: (1) beauty of tone; (2) transparence; (3) precision of attack and release; (4) balance; (5) flexibility."

Mr Taylor goes on to show in detail that under each of his five heads it is indispensable that an orchestra play under a single permanent conductor, and not under a succession of brilliant transients.

In Boston the People's Symphony directors might well profit by Mr Taylor's words of wisdom. In the case of the Boston Symphony orchestra there have not hitherto been many guest conductors. In 37 years under Maj Higginson there was but a single guest conductor, d'Indy, aside from composers who led single works of their own at various concerts. Since then we have had Bruno Walter once, Schneevoight once, and d'Indy again and that is all. Three since 1918 is certainly not a dangerous number of guests.

It is said that the reason for introducing a guest conductor at this time in the series without previous warning is that Mr Koussevitzky finds himself overworked by the heavy schedule of the orchestra and wished to have a breathing space. Mr Hadley will also conduct the next concert in the Cambridge series, but Kousseviztky is announced for the Monday concert Feb 9.

Every conductor the Boston Orchestra has had has been overworked, granted the necessity for numerous rehearsals and a high standard of performance. Some like Monteux have occasionally spared themselves and their men by not giving enough rehearsal to standard pieces to make possible a first rate performance. Others lik Muck have prepared for the ordeal by planning beforehand the programs for the entire season and carefully studying and marking the orchestral scores so as to simplify as much as possible the actual work of preparing for each concert from week to week.

Mr Koussevitzky has not, rather obviously, planned his programs in advance for the entire season. Nor has he ever notably slighted any work played. No wonder he finds himself overtaxed. If it is true as rumor has it that Mr Koussevitzky has now been reengaged for two seasons more he no doubt may wish for some lightening of his load as conductor.

It would from the point of view of the audience be an agreeable deviation from the routine of these concerts to have two or three guest conductors during each season of 24 concerts. But no greater number should or probably will be introduced. The most obvious way to reduce the burden on Mr Koussevitzky is not to spoil the Boston series by too many guest conductors, but to cut out all concerts outside of New England with the exception of the series in New York, which is necessary to keep up the prestige of the orchestra or thought to be so by a large portion of the public. Whatever happens the Monday series in Boston, the Young People's concerts and so on should not be given up.

An assistant conductor who could conduct some of the concerts and be ready in case of emergency to conduct any of them might be an advantage. The Chicago Opera has lately found and brought forward a young American conductor, Henry G. Weber, heard last Thursday in "Tannhauser," and to be heard again in "Rigoletto" Wednesday evening. If the Boston Symphony could find a young American and give him in a subordinate capacity a chance to grow and gain experience, it would be possible for this orchestra to have in time an American at its head, something that would be highly desirable if it could be done without taking an inferior man.

One does not suggest Mr Weber or anyone else as the proper man for such a job. The only perquisite is that the assistant conductor should be a young man not over 35 at the most and better under 30. The trustees need not play safe in the matter of an assistant conductor, except that it would be prudent not to chose anyone in Boston and desirable to give an untried and practically unknown American the chance.

With such an assistant we should not ever be forced to listen to stopgap conductors, summoned at short notice, as would certainly happen if Koussevitzky were taken ill suddenly. Nobody under such circumstances can do himself justice. Why not an assistant conductor, an American under 30?

NEW YORK
WORLD

FEB 1 1925

MUSIC

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony brought their second program of the week to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It opened with Handel's "Concerto Grosse," which was followed by a sharply contrasted study by Moussorgsky—the "Pictures at an Exhibition." Mr. Koussevitsky turned to the lighter mood with evident enjoyment and the fragments of color and light in this curiously assorted collection emerged with deftness and charm under his direction. The second part of the program was devoted to Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, played with true eloquence and fidelity.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

FEB 1 1925

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 1 1925

President and Mrs. Coolidge At Opening of New Auditorium.

During the past week the President and Mrs. Coolidge attended the first offering of the Washington Opera Company, which incidentally opened the new Auditorium on Monday night, gave a dinner in compliment to Bascom Slemp, the retiring secretary to the President, on Tuesday night, and a State dinner in honor of the Justices of the Supreme Court on Thursday night. Mrs. Coolidge was also at home to 50 or more visitors on Monday afternoon and attended the Boston Symphony concert on Tuesday.

At the opera on Monday night, where by reason of the President's official engagement with the Budget Committee they arrived late, they were joined in the reserved box by the Italian Ambassador, Prince Caetani, who came on from a dinner at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Truxton Beale, accompanied by his hostess, and by Senator William B. McKinley of Illinois and his niece, Miss Julia Mattis.

The London Daily Telegraph remarks: "Kussevitzsky's success with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this Autumn has been so phenomenal that his visit has come to be regarded at Boston as having assumed a degree of economic importance, quite apart from its musical interest. So much is it economically important that, in the result, there is likely to be a substantial reduction in the annual deficit owing to his drawing powers. In mid-December twenty-four Friday afternoon, and the same number of Saturday evening concerts remain to complete the season, and for every one of these, as for the ten New York and the five special evening concerts to be given later in Boston, there is already not a seat to be purchased."

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 1 1925

Great Boston Symphony In Concert Here Today

Event Marks Local Debut of Serge Koussevitzky, Famous Russian Conductor—To Play Fifth Symphony in E Minor.

Serge Koussevitzky, the eminent new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be first heard in Hartford in the Capitol Theater this afternoon, at 3 o'clock. Preceded to America by the most glowing reports from Europe, Koussevitzky has made another conquest both sudden and complete—the conquest of America. This remarkable leader is talked about the country over—every series is subscribed and seats for the Boston Symphony concerts are at a premium. Naturally, much was expected of Serge Koussevitzky. His qualities have exceeded all expectations. In Boston, New York, and each city he has visited, the effect has been electric.

There is but one opinion of his personal magnetism, his fresh sincerity and vividness as an interpretative artist his rare and absolute control, manifest in the perfect response of the famous orchestra which he now commands.

About no other conductor (and America has in the last few seasons heard all of the "great" ones) has the consenusus been so high, and so unqualified.

Koussevitzky's program for Hartford is such as to reveal the brilliance and versatility of the Russian leader. It will include a concerto for orchestra in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach, edited by Maximilian Steinberg; Berlioz's Overture. "The Roman Carnival"; the Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky; and Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee", from the Opera, "Tsar Saltan." The second portion of the program will comprise Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. The remaining seats and admissions will be placed on sale at the theater box office today at 1 o'clock. The managem nt ernestly requests that the patrons be seated by 3 o'clock.

IN CONCERT HERE TODAY

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Famous conductor of the Boston Symphony who makes his first bow to a local audience at the Capitol theater this afternoon at 3 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOUSTON, TEXAS
CHRONICLE

FEB 1 1925

PAPER Herald

DATE Feb

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall, Henry Hadley will conduct as a guest, and Margaret Matzenauer will sing. Mr. Hadley will introduce his fourth symphony, "North, East, South and West," and conduct Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride." Mme. Matzenauer will sing Beethoven's "Ah! Perfido," and an aria from Mozart's "Cle menza di Tito."

In the meantime Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artstic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitsky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a striving of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

ce.

Newman wrote not

NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune

FEB 1 1925

Russian Conductor Has Conservative Program

Koussevitzky, Thought Unorthodox, Makes Few Innovations in Beethoven; Plays Ravel's Setting

By F. D. Perkins

Sergei Koussevitzky, who remarked last spring that the fear he would present nothing but modern music in the concerts of the Boston Symphony was entirely unfounded, gave a conservative program yesterday for his third Carnegie Hall matinee: a Handel Concerto Grosso in D minor, the tenth of the series produced within thirty-one days of 1739; Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven—the first Beethoven number played by the Russian conductor here, although he has already presented Boston with an all-Beethoven program.

As Mr. Koussevitzky mounted the rostrum to begin the second half of his program there may well have been some wondering as to what untraditional things he was going to do to Beethoven. He did few, if any. Tempo and interpretation seemed, for the most part, entirely orthodox, with nothing to rasp the nerves of those who had always heard Beethoven played just so, and were not disposed to welcome any departure from it. A marked retardation in the coda of the first movement, just before the closing outburst, a finale with the brass more in evidence than under Mr. Furtwängler, for instance, were noticeable. Perhaps the best thing about it was the opening chord and its successors in the introduction, crisp, electrifying outbursts. There was electricity in some other places, escepially the finale, but on the whole Mr. Koussevitzky was almost too successful in keeping out a touch of Russian vodka from a German classic.

The Handel work, from which two of the five movements were omitted, was well played, with a remarkable sprint at the end, but the most interesting performance of the program was that of the quasi-novelty. An orchestral version of the Moussorgsky pictures has already been given here by the New York Symphony under Mr. Damrosch, that of Leonidas Leonardi, but Ravel's setting, composed at Mr. Koussevitzky's request and played by him in Paris in May, 1923, is far and away the better. Mr. Leonardi's work, while not incompetent, was a translation; there was the sense of adaptation, of transfer to a slightly alien medium. But Ravel's orchestra garb might well have been the original dress of the composition, judging by the perfection of its fit.

Mr. Koussevitzky omitted one picture, "The Old Castle," and apparently some of the later Promenades. Ravel's scoring emphasized the color and contrast of the work, especially in the episodes "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle," "Catacombs" and "The Great Gate of Kieff." This last, with a superb close, led to prolonged and hearty applause for the conductor and a standing orchestra.

PAPER Globe

DATE Feb-1

Henry Hadley will be guest conductor with the People's Symphony Orchestra this afternoon at the St James Theatre and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its regular concerts Friday and Saturday. Mr Hadley now makes his home in New York, but he was born in Somerville and studied in Boston. He is associate conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the composer of numerous works, including several symphonies, operas "Cleopatra's Night" and "Bianca's choral works and lesses things, many of them performed at various times in Boston.

USIC AND MUSICIANS

ny
t uctors

Henry Hadley, associate conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, will guest conductor at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and also of the People's Symphony Orchestra. Some philosophy on the subject of guest conductors is therefore in order.

Deems Taylor, last Sunday in the New York World, freed his mind with his customary vigor and directness of attack on the subject of guest conductors. He wrote in part as follows:

If the Philharmonic under Mahler was as fine as people say it was, the main reason, aside from Mahler's talents as conductor, was the fact that he had the orchestra to himself. It makes really little difference whether or not this season's conductors of the Philharmonic rank as far below Mahler as Mr Nock seems to think they do. They might be the six greatest conductors the world has ever seen, and the Philharmonic would not play as well under them as the Chicago and Philadelphia Orchestras play under Stock and Stokowski.

The reason is simple enough. Teamwork is the secret of a great orchestra exactly as it is the secret of a great football team. If the Notre Dame team, instead of being drilled by Knut Rockne, were compelled to go through its season under six successive head coaches, each with a different system of plays, nobody would expect it to reveal any very brilliant football. Similarly, the board of directors of the Philharmonic are not living in the world of reality if they seriously expect their orchestra to approach greatness under six different conductors.

"What are the qualities that make an orchestra deserving of the adjective 'great?' Technical proficiency is perhaps the fundamental one—in the sense, at least, that without expert musicians in its ranks no ensemble can play really greatly. This quality the Philharmonic undoubtedly possesses and will continue to possess no matter who conducts it. But there are other essentials, and most of them presuppose a close and lengthy association between conductor and players. Suppose we list them as: (1) beauty of tone; (2) transparence; (3) precision of attack and release; (4) balance; (5) flexibility."

Mr Taylor goes on to show in detail that under each of his five heads it is indispensable that an orchestra play under a single permanent conductor, and not under a succession of brilliant transients.

In Boston the People's Symphony directors might well profit by Mr Taylor's words of wisdom. In the case of the Boston Symphony orchestra there have not hitherto been many guest conductors. In 37 years under Maj Higginson there was but a single guest conductor, d'Indy, aside from composers who led single works of their own at various concerts. Since then we have had Bruno Walter once, Schneevoight once, and d'Indy again and that is all. Three since 1918 is certainly not a dangerous number of guests.

It is said that the reason for introducing a guest conductor at this time in the series without previous warning is that Mr Koussevitzky finds himself overworked by the heavy schedule of the orchestra and wished to have a breathing space. Mr Hadley will also conduct the next concert in the Cambridge series, but Kousseviztky is announced for the Monday concert Feb 9.

Every conductor the Boston Orchestra has had has been overworked, granted the necessity for numerous rehearsals and a high standard of performance. Some like Monteux have occasionally spared themselves and their men by not giving enough rehearsal to standard pieces to make possible a first rate performance. Others lik Muck have prepared for the ordeal by planning beforehand the programs for the entire season and carefully studying and marking the orchestral scores so as to simplify as much as possible the actual work of preparing for each concert from week to week.

Mr Koussevitzky has not, rather obviously, planned his programs in advance for the entire season. Nor has he ever notably slighted any work played. No wonder he finds himself overtaxed. If it is true as rumor has it that Mr Koussevitzky has now been reengaged for two seasons more he no doubt may wish for some lightening of his load as conductor.

It would from the point of view of the audience be an agreeable deviation from the routine of these concerts to have two or three guest conductors during each season of 24 concerts. But no greater number should or probably will be introduced. The most obvious way to reduce the burden on Mr Koussevitzky is not to spoil the Boston series by too many guest conductors, but to cut out all concerts outside of New England with the exception of the series in New York, which is necessary to keep up the prestige of the orchestra or thought to be so by a large portion of the public. Whatever happens the Monday series in Boston, the Young People's concerts and so on should not be given up.

An assistant conductor who could conduct some of the concerts and be ready in case of emergency to conduct any of them might be an advantage. The Chicago Opera has lately found and brought forward a young American conductor, Henry G. Weber, heard last Thursday in "Tannhauser," and to be heard again in "Rigoletto" Wednesday evening. If the Boston Symphony could find a young American and give him in a subordinate capacity a chance to grow and gain experience, it would be possible for this orchestra to have in time an American at its head, something that would be highly desirable if it could be done without taking an inferior man.

One does not suggest Mr Weber or anyone else as the proper man for such a job. The only perquisite is that the assistant conductor should be a young man not over 35 at the most and better under 30. The trustees need not play safe in the matter of an assistant conductor, except that it would be prudent not to chose anyone in Boston and desirable to give an untried and practically unknown American the chance.

With such an assistant we should not ever be forced to listen to stopgap conductors, summoned at short notice, as would certainly happen if Koussevitzky were taken ill suddenly. Nobody under such circumstances can do himself justice. Why not an assistant conductor, an American under 30?

NEW YORK
WORLD

FEB 1 1925

MUSIC

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony brought their second program of the week to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It opened with Handel's "Concerto Grosse," which was followed by a sharply contrasted study by Moussorgsky—the "Pictures at an Exhibition." Mr. Koussevitzky turned to the lighter mood with evident enjoyment and the fragments of color and light in this curiously assorted collection emerged with deftness and charm under his direction. The second part of the program was devoted to Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, played with true eloquence and fidelity.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

FEB 1 1925

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 1 1925

President and Mrs. Coolidge At Opening of New Auditorium.

During the past week the President and Mrs. Coolidge attended the first offering of the Washington Opera Company, which incidentally opened the new Auditorium on Monday night, gave a dinner in compliment to Bascom Slemp, the retiring secretary to the President, on Tuesday night, and a State dinner in honor of the Justices of the Supreme Court on Thursday night. Mrs. Coolidge was also at home to 50 or more visitors on Monday afternoon and attended the Boston Symphony concert on Tuesday.

At the opera on Monday night, where by reason of the President's official engagement with the Budget Committee they arrived late, they were joined in the reserved box by the Italian Ambassador, Prince Caetani, who came on from a dinner at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Truxton Beale, accompanied by his hostess, and by Senator William B. McKinley of Illinois and his niece, Miss Julia Mattis.

The London Daily Telegraph remarks: "Kussevitzky's success with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this Autumn has been so phenomenal that his visit has come to be regarded at Boston as having assumed a degree of economic importance, quite apart from its musical interest. So much is it economically important that, in the result, there is likely to be a substantial reduction in the annual deficit owing to his drawing powers. In mid-December twenty-four Friday afternoon, and the same number of Saturday evening concerts remain to complete the season, and for every one of these, as for the ten New York and the five special evening concerts to be given later in Boston, there is already not a seat to be purchased."

NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune

FEB 1 1925

Russian Conductor Has Conservative Program

Koussevitzky, Thought Unorthodox, Makes Few Innovations in Beethoven; Plays Ravel's Setting

By F. D. Perkins

Sergei Koussevitzky, who remarked last spring that the fear he would present nothing but modern music in the concerts of the Boston Symphony was entirely unfounded, gave a conservative program yesterday for his third Carnegie Hall matinee: a Handel Concerto Grosso in D minor, the tenth of the series produced within thirty-one days of 1739; Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven—the first Beethoven number played by the Russian conductor here, although he has already presented Boston with an all-Beethoven program.

As Mr. Koussevitzky mounted the rostrum to begin the second half of his program there may well have been some wondering as to what untraditional things he was going to do to Beethoven. He did few, if any. Tempo and interpretation seemed, for the most part, entirely orthodox, with nothing to rasp the nerves of those who had always heard Beethoven played just so, and were not disposed to welcome any departure from it. A marked retardation in the coda of the first movement, just before the closing outburst, a finale with the brass more in evidence than under Mr. Furtwängler, for instance, were noticeable. Perhaps the best thing about it was the opening chord and its successors in the introduction, crisp, electrifying outbursts. There was electricity in some other places, escepially the finale, but on the whole Mr. Koussevitzky was almost too successful in keeping out a touch of Russian vodka from a German classic.

The Handel work, from which two of the five movements were omitted, was well played, with a remarkable sprint at the end, but the most interesting performance of the program was that of the quasi-novelty. An orchestral version of the Moussorgsky pictures has already been given here by the New York Symphony under Mr. Damrosch, that of Leonidas Leonardi, but Ravel's setting, composed at Mr. Koussevitzky's request and played by him in Paris in May, 1923, is far and away the better. Mr. Leonardi's work, while not incompetent, was a translation; there was the sense of adaptation, of transfer to a slightly alien medium. But Ravel's orchestra garb might well have been the original dress of the composition, judging by the perfection of its fit.

Mr. Koussevitzky omitted one picture, "The Old Castle," and apparently some of the later Promenades. Ravel's scoring emphasized the color and contrast of the work, especially in the episodes "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle," "Catacombs" and "The Great Gate of Kieff." This last, with a superb close, led to prolonged and hearty applause for the conductor and a standing orchestra.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 1 1925

Great Boston Symphony In Concert Here Today

Event Marks Local Debut of Serge Koussevitzky, Famous Russian Conductor—To Play Fifth Symphony in E Minor.

Serge Koussevitzky, the eminent new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be first heard in Hartford in the Capitol Theater this afternoon, at 3 o'clock. Preceded to America by the most glowing reports from Europe, Koussevitzky has made another conquest both sudden and complete—the conquest of America. This remarkable leader is talked about the country over—every series is subscribed and seats for the Boston Symphony concerts are at a premium. Naturally, much was expected of Serge Koussevitzky. His qualities have exceeded all expectations. In Boston, New York, and each city he has visited, the effect has been electric.

There is but one opinion of his personal magnetism, his fresh sincerity and vividness as an interpretative artist his rare and absolute control, manifest in the perfect response of the famous orchestra which he now commands.

About no other conductor (and America has in the last few seasons heard all of the "great" ones) has the consenusus been so high, and so unqualified.

Koussevitzky's program for Hartford is such as to reveal the brilliance and versatility of the Russian leader. It will include a concerto for orchestra in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach, edited by Maximilian Steinberg; Berlioz's Overture. "The Roman Carnival"; the Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky; and Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee", from the Opera, "Tsar Saltan." The second portion of the program will comprise Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. The remaining seats and admissions will be placed on sale at the theater box office today at 1 o'clock. The managem nt ernestly requests that the patrons be seated by 3 o'clock.

IN CONCERT HERE TODAY

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Famous conductor of the Boston Symphony who makes his first bow to a local audience at the Capitol theater this afternoon at 3 o'clock.

journey over the sometimes humor-

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOUSTON, TEXAS
CHRONICLE

FEB 1 1925

In the meantime Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony's new permanent conductor, appears to be slipping down the artstic hill. At the outset he exhibited bodily restraint. He got effects; and if he now and again violated tradition it was done without marked offensiveness. Lately, however, Koussevitsky has been indulging in needless and undue gyrations; and in gestures of the arms which hint at a striving of visual impressiveness. I like him less than at first, and others share that opinion.

PAPER Herald

DATE Feb.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall, Henry Hadley will conduct as a guest, and Margaret Matzenauer will sing. Mr. Hadley will introduce his fourth symphony, "North, East, South and West," and conduct Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride." Mme. Matzenauer will sing Beethoven's "Ab! Perfido," and an aria from Mozart's "Cle menza di Tito."

ce.

Newman wrote

THE HARTFORD COURANT

Left— SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will make his local debut with the famous orchestra at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 1.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

FEB 1 1925

Mr. Copland and Jazz.

Aaron Copland, young Brooklyn composer, in a letter to the music editor expressing appreciation of The Standard Union's comment upon his Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, recently presented by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony, among others things, writes:

"Since you were rash enough to set me up as an example for the Jazzites, I shall be rash and admit the second movement of my symphony owes a great deal to jazz. But I must add, and it is greatly to your credit, that of all the music critics who attended the concert you were the only one who sensed the relationship. Your review was surprisingly complete and very sympathetic."

For these kind words—many thanks. Mr. Copland's symphony will next be played at Boston (by the Boston Symphony) under Serge Koussevitzky, for two performances, on Feb. 20 and 21.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF FEB 2 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS VARIED PROGRAMME

Introduces Orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures"; the State Symphony.

When Serge Koussevitzky made his first appearance here with the Boston Orchestra some two months ago he gave a vigorously orthdox performance of Brahms's Fourth Symphony, during which the real Brahms nevertheless somehow eluded him. At the time we expressed some considerable curiosity as to what he would do with Beethoven, and particularly the Seventh Symphony, since we believe this to be something like the acid test of a conductor. On Saturday, at the orchestra's second concert of the week in Carnegie Hall, he played this, to us, most profoundly agitating music of the whole symphonic repertoire, and he sent us home in a mental welter of disappointment.

We scarcely know what to make of it or how to account for it. Brahms might easily be alien to a Russian, but Beethoven is the real basis of modern music, after all is said, and a conductor of commanding grasp must all but live or die by him. Moreover, Mr. Koussevitzky has often enough shown himself to be a discerning, even a penetrating musician, with a remarkable feeling for the finer as well as the more obvious content of cyclical music. But this performance of the Seventh Symphony was pretty nearly as poor as any we have ever listened to!

It was not even played as music from the mere musician's standpoint. In some of its most vital moments it actually failed to "sound." The very beginning of the symphony was started wrong and lost its strange beauty. The opening chord of the introduction, out of which emerges, in one of Beethoven's inspirational touches, the lovely first melody, given to the oboe and clarinet, stood forth all but detached and the thing became very nearly meaningless. We speak of this as a typical instance of the way things went during the whole of the work. Effects which have become so well known as to be traditional, either evaporated or were ignored, and through what seemed really no more than sheer carelessness.

BEETHOVEN IN THE SEVENTH.

The Seventh Symphony has always seemed to us to be Beethoven's frankest expression of feeling in all his music. The idealism that was an inescapable phase of the philosophy of his time, to which he yielded and converted into music in the "Eroica," the C minor and the choral symphonies is prophetically absent from the Seventh. It is music that was startlingly in advance of his own day and of the romantic period that followed it. It suits the point of view of our own twentieth century—not in its form, to be sure, nor in its idiom, but in its content.

Beethoven here searches heart and head and finds an inner conviction of the futility of the universe, of the ways of man, and of the thing he himself is. And there is no deeper and no truer expression of all this than the hopelessness of the allegretto, with its perpetual repetition and its insistent beat of the rhythm. But after that the deluge. Beethoven then tears loose, as in no other of his works; the scherzo is a preliminary beating up of the fleshpots and the finale an orgiasm of "ausgeknopft" feeling.

That is what the Seventh Symphony should mean, with an undercurrent of the savage and the bitter to boot. That is what Mahler found in it and that is how Arturo Toscanini interprets it. And Nikisch, too, rammed it home without stint of its essentially realistic—emotionally realistic—significance.

But Mr. Koussevitzky was a thousand miles or so from anything of this sort. Indeed, we cannot say that he gave it any special, or even general, meaning at all. For one thing, it was too badly played, technically, to hold much, even if any had been intended. It was limp when it wasn't lame and lame when it wasn't limp.

Moussorgsky and Ravel.

The quasi-novelty of the afternoon was the orchestration by Maurice Ravel of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exposition." As a piano suite it is fairly well known here, chiefly through the finely pointed performances of it by Harold Bauer. But this was the first time the Ravel instrumentation had been heard. Walter Damrosch, earlier in the season, thinking perhaps to steal some of Mr. Koussevitzky's thunder, played an orchestration of the suite by Leonidas Leonardi, remembered here as a pianist and latterly an occasional conductor of the Lamoreaux Orchestra in Paris. But this was very bad indeed.

The Ravel orchestration is not Ravel at all, but purposefully Rimsky-Korsakov. It is diabolically skillful in its imitativeness of the Russian instrumental wizard, and enormously effective in its alternate richness and delicacy. But even so, the music wears thin, its descriptive quality at times comes pretty close to bordering on the childish. The finale alone, perhaps (two of the movements were omitted by Mr. Koussevitzky) is first-rate Moussorgsky, and this, in a way, is of the same significance as the Kremlin scene in "Boris Godounov."

The orchestra was far from letter perfect in the performance of the Moussorgsky suite, and the conductor frequently struck some halting moments in its presentation. The concert opened with a very fine delivery of Handel's concerto grosso in D minor for the string band.—I. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

FEB 1 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVES 'PICTURES' BY RAVEL

Boston Symphony Leader Introduces a New Orchestration of Moussorgsky's Work.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony's hundred men went on their way to Hartford last night after completing their orchestra's third visit of the New York season with a third sold-out subscription at their Carnegie Hall matinee. A program without soloist comprised Handel's concerto grosso in D minor, Opus 6, No. 10, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A major, for classics. Between these the Russian leader introduced a new orchestration of the rare "Picture at an Exhibition," made by Maurice Ravel for the Koussevitzky concerts in Paris last season, fifty years after the original piano manuscript of Moussorgsky.

However various might be his reading of things accepted and familiar—as in a dervish-like hastened finale of Handel's sonorous strings—there was again evident yesterday a great personal authority of the Bostonian coonductor with his men. It was no less apparent with his audience, when a ripple of applause at the first stop in Beethoven's later work was checked in utter silence by the upraised hands of the man facing the orchestra.

Russian temperament, strangely enough, emphasized least of all in the Seventh symphony what Wagner once called its "apotheosis of the dance." Rather he molded it as the very stuff of music, an epic of dactyl and spondee, proclaiming Beethoven's brooding introspection, and varying vigorous climax with quiet moments when the leader stood with arms at side, letting the orchestra mold a phrase to logical conclusion.

Moussorgsky's "Pictures," a memorial to an artist friend, Hartmann, had been heard here in one of several previous versions arranged by Touschmalov, Leonardi or Henry Wood, which have had fugitive performance in Chicago, New York and London. Ravel, intimately acquainted with Russian music, lent new tone values and gossamer tone colors to the ten episodes, of which two were omitted, "Il Vecchio Castello" and "Limoges Market-Women."

Most curious and compelling was a little genre sketch, "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle." Ravel's orchestral colors caught inimitably the humor with which Moussorgsky had himself "drawn the picture" in piano black-and-white. Personal, too, were the composer's ambling "Promenades" between pictures, from "Tuileries" and "Catacombs" to the little "Ballet of Chickens in Their Shells," the witch-clock called "Hut on Fowls' Legs" and a superb finale nobly intoned from Hartmann's "Gate of the Bojars at Kiev."

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

FEB 1 1925

Noted Symphony Orchestras Rule in Carnegie Hall

By GRENA BENNETT.

Carnegie Hall was monopolized by symphony orchestras yesterday. In the afternoon, the visiting Bostonians, under leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, played to an audience that tested the capacity of the house.

In the evening the "All Seats Sold" sign was still hanging in the lobby when William Van Hoogstraten took his place for the last time as conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra.

There was a great and sincere demonstration for the directors at each event.

Mr. Koussevitsky made a feature at the matinee of Moussorgsky's "Picture at an Exhibition," played here for the first time (according to a line in the programme). The composed was still under the spell of the original and borrowed music of his own opera, "Boris Godunoff," which he newly and adroitly orchestrated and relabeled the themes and folk tunes.

Some were pompous, as, for instance, in "Promenade" and "La Grande Port de Kiev"; some were scintillating or shimmering, as in the case of "Tuilleries" and "Ballet des Prussins dans leur Coques," and others were grotesque or bizarre, like "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmyle" and "Gnomes."

The audience tittered or laughed at the humorous pictures; while others were heartily applauded, as the music and its admirable performance deserved.

As a safe, sane and contenting contrast to the novelty, Mr. Koussevitsky preceded it with Handel's superb D minor concerto grosso and followed it with [illegible]en's melodious seventh [illegible]y.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 1 1925

Music Course at Brown

Music again gets respectful attention in the new series of extension lectures at Brown University that will begin the week of Feb. 16. Thomas Whitney Surette, well known in Providence, will give a course of seven lectures under the title, "The Art of Music." A foreword supplied by Mr. Surette says that, in his opinion, "the course will be of interest to all who feel that art and beauty are essential to life. It is intended to reach the family and is to be given at the late afternoon hour in order that men as well as women may come. Girls and boys of high school age should find much of interest in the lectures."

Mr. Surette hopes that he will be able to make one or more of his lectures illustrative of the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. He will deal, too, with the music [illegible] Bach and other great composers, and will tell in one lecture how to listen to music for the special benefit of young people. He will likewise have something to say about Orchestral instruments and, being a versatile musician, will illustrate his talks on the instruments themselves. An innovation will be singing at each lecture, with the audience showing what it can do with simple music to the accompaniment of a small string orchestra.

Mr. Surette, who was director of the Concord Summer School of Music last season, will give his first lecture in Manning Hall at Brown Wednesday, Feb. 25 at 5 o'clock.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

FEB 2 1925

CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY LIKES AMERICAN WORKS

Orchestra Will Play Here March 25 in the Municipal Course

Serei Koussevitszky, the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony, who brings his great organization of musicians to Portland March 25 for a concert at City Hall under Music Commission auspices, has expressed much interest in American composers.

Knowing little of them when he landed in this Country in September, he addressed himself at once to the task of studying them, with the promise of including many American compositions on his programs of the Winter, a promise to which he seems to have adhered. Among American composers John Alden Carpenter appears to be his favorite, having been well known to him before he crossed the ocean.

Early after Koussevitszky arrived in this Country he had the opportunity of hearing Sousa's Band, and showed much interest in the concert given by the famous bandmaster. He likewise attended recitals by Mme Schumann-Heink and by Roland Hayes, the Negro tenor.

One of his early novelty compositions on a Boston Symphony program was Pacific 231, by Nonegger, celebrating a locomotive, which was certainly American enough in theme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
GAZETTE
[illegible]

FEB 2 1925

Igor Stravinsky played his concert for pianoforte and orchestra with the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in Symphony Hall, Boston, Jaunary 28. His piano concerto is in contrast to his more modern compositions, "Petrouchka," "L'Oiseau de Feu" and others and is said by critics to be a return in model to the Bach form.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN

FEB 2 1925

Boston Symphony Concert.

The chronicling of the Saturday afternoon activities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall has rather the aspect of ancient history in the Monday night record of a crowded musical week end, and Mr Koussevitzky's program was not one to startle the natives after some of the recent heavy artillery brought to bear on the poor people by rival conductors battling for public favor.

However, Mr. Koussevitzky did not play Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony Saturday afternoon. He offered Handel's concerto grosse in D minor, Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven. This last, the first Beethoven conducted by the Russian conductor in this town, was magnificently played as to tone, finish, color and movement.

Perhaps there were some who wished for a little more romantic fervor, for a little more emphasis and accentuation of the springy elasticity of an earth bursting with vernal joy, a quality that seems inherent in the work from the opening chord to the bacchantic fervor of the finale—except perhaps, in the haunting plaintiveness of the second movement. But this was only a passing sun spot of an otherwise brilliant performance. And the rich impressive coloring of Ravel's orchestration, particularly in Moussorgsky's massive "Great Gate of Kieff" aroused enthusiasm.

PAPER Herald

DATE Feb, 1

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The third concert of the Monday evening series of the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place on Feb. 9 in Symphony hall. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire Bird," and Beethoven's seventh symphony in A major. The soloist will be John Charles Thomas, baritone.

PAPER Advertiser

Feb, 1

DATE

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Henry Hadley will appear as guest conductor and Margaret Matzenauer as the soloist. Mr. Hadley will introduce his fourth symphony and will also conduct Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and Smetana's "Sold Bride" overture. Madame Matzenauer will sing Beethoven's aria, "Ah! Perfido," and an aria from Mozart's "Titus."

THE HARTFORD COURANT

Left— SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will make his local debut with the famous orchestra at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 1.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

FEB 1 1925

Mr. Copland and Jazz.

Aaron Copland, young Brooklyn composer, in a letter to the music editor expressing appreciation of The Standard Union's comment upon his Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, recently presented by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony, among others things, writes:

"Since you were rash enough to set me up as an example for the Jazzites, I shall be rash and admit the second movement of my symphony owes a great deal to jazz. But I must add, and it is greatly to your credit, that of all the music critics who attended the concert you were the only one who sensed the relationship. Your review was surprisingly complete and very sympathetic."

For these kind words—many thanks. Mr. Copland's symphony will next be played at Boston (by the Boston Symphony) under Serge Koussevitzky, for two performances, on Feb. 20 and 21.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

FEB 1 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVES 'PICTURES' BY RAVEL

Boston Symphony Leader Introduces a New Orchestration of Moussorgsky's Work.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony's hundred men went on their way to Hartford last night after completing their orchestra's third visit of the New York season with a third sold-out subscription at their Carnegie Hall matinee. A program without soloist comprised Handel's concerto grosso in D minor, Opus 6, No. 10, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A major, for classics. Between these the Russian leader introduced a new orchestration of the rare "Picture at an Exhibition," made by Maurice Ravel for the Koussevitzky concerts in Paris last season, fifty years after the original piano manuscript of Moussorgsky.

However various might be his reading of things accepted and familiar—as in a dervish-like hastened finale of Handel's sonorous strings—there was again evident yesterday a great personal authority of the Bostonian coonductor with his men. It was no less apparent with his audience, when a ripple of applause at the first stop in Beethoven's later work was checked in utter silence by the upraised hands of the man facing the orchestra.

Russian temperament, strangely enough, emphasized least of all in the Seventh symphony what Wagner once called its "apotheosis of the dance." Rather he molded it as the very stuff of music, an epic of dactyl and spondee, proclaiming Beethoven's brooding introspection, and varying vigorous climax with quiet moments when the leader stood with arms at side, letting the orchestra mold a phrase to logical conclusion.

Moussorgsky's "Pictures," a memorial to an artist friend, Hartmann, had been heard here in one of several previous versions arranged by Touschmalov, Leonardi or Henry Wood, which have had fugitive performance in Chicago, New York and London. Ravel, intimately acquainted with Russian music, lent new tone values and gossamer tone colors to the ten episodes, of which two were omitted, "Il Vecchio Castello" and "Limoges Market-Women."

Most curious and compelling was a little genre sketch, "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle." Ravel's orchestral colors caught inimitably the humor with which Moussorgsky had himself "drawn the picture" in piano black-and-white. Personal, too, were the composer's ambling "Promenades" between pictures, from "Tuileries" and "Catacombs" to the little "Ballet of Chickens in Their Shells," the witch-clock called "Hut on Fowls' Legs" and a superb finale nobly intoned from Hartmann's "Gate of the Bojars at Kiev."

PAPER Herald

DATE Feb,

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The third concert of the Monday evening series of the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place on Feb. 9 in Symphony hall. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire Bird," and Beethoven's seventh symphony in A major. The soloist will be John Charles Thomas, baritone.

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

FEB 1

Noted Symphony Orchestras Rule in Carnegie Hall

By GRENA BENNETT.

Carnegie Hall was monopolized by symphony orchestras yesterday. In the afternoon, the visiting Bostonians, under leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, played to an audience that tested the capacity of the house.

In the evening the "All Seats Sold" sign was still hanging in the lobby when William Van Hoogstraten took his place for the last time as conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra.

There was a great and sincere demonstration for the directors at each event.

Mr. Koussevitsky made a feature at the matinee of Moussorgsky's "Picture at an Exhibition," played here for the first time (according to a line in the programme). The composed was still under the spell of the original and borrowed music of his own opera, "Boris Godunoff," which he newly and adroitly orchestrated and relabeled the themes and folk tunes.

Some were pompous, as, for instance, in "Promenade" and "La Grande Port de Kiev"; some were scintillating or shimmering, as in the case of "Tuilleries" and "Ballet des Prussins dans leur Coques," and others were grotesque or bizarre, like "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmyle" and "Gnomes."

The audience tittered or laughed at the humorous pictures; while others were heartily applauded, as the music and its admirable performance deserved.

As a safe, sane and contenting contrast to the novelty, Mr. Koussevitsky preceded it with Handel's superb D minor concerto grosso and followed it with en's melodious seventh

---

PAPER [illegible]

DATE 1 [illegible]

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Henry Hadley will appear as guest conductor and Margaret Matzenauer as the soloist. Mr. Hadley will introduce his fourth symphony and will also conduct Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and Smetana's "Sold Bride" overture. Madame Matzenauer will sing Beethoven's aria, "Ah! Perfido," and an aria from Mozart's "Titus."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 1

Music Course at Brown

Music again gets respectful attention in the new series of extension lectures at Brown University that will begin the week of Feb. 16. Thomas Whitney Surette, well known in Providence, will give a course of seven lectures under the title, "The Art of Music." A foreword supplied by Mr. Surette says that, in his opinion, "the course will be of interest to all who feel that art and beauty are essential to life. It is intended to reach the family and is to be given at the late afternoon hour in order that men as well as women may come. Girls and boys of high school age should find much of interest in the lectures."

Mr. Surette hopes that he will be able to make one or more of his lectures illustrative of the programmes of [illegible]ton Symphony Orchestra concerts. He will deal, too, with the music of Bach and other great composers, and will tell in one lecture how to listen to music for the special benefit of young people. He will likewise have something to say about Orchestral instruments and, being a versatile musician, will illustrate his talks on the instruments themselves. An innovation will be singing at each lecture, with the audience showing what it can do with simple music to the accompaniment of a small string orchestra.

Mr. Surette, who was director of the Concord Summer School of Music last season, will give his first lecture in Manning Hall at Brown Wednesday, Feb. 25 at 5 o'clock.

LIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

B 2 1925

CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY LIKES AMERICAN WORKS

Orchestra Will Play Here March 25 in the Municipal Course

Serei Koussevitszky, the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony, who brings his great organization of musicians to Portland March 25 for a concert at City Hall under Music Commission auspices, has expressed much interest in American composers.

Knowing little of them when he landed in this Country in September, he addressed himself at once to the task of studying them, with the promise of including many American compositions on his programs of the Winter, a promise to which he seems to have adhered. Among American composers John Alden Carpenter appears to be his favorite, having been well known to him before he crossed the ocean.

Early after Koussevitszky arrived in this Country he had the opportunity of hearing Sousa's Band, and showed much interest in the concert given by the famous bandmaster. He likewise attended recitals by Mme Schumann-Heink and by Roland Hayes, the Negro tenor.

One of his early novelty compositions on a Boston Symphony program was Pacific 231, by Nonegger, celebrating a locomotive, which was certainly American enough in theme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF FEB 2 192

KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS VARIED PROGRAMME

Introduces Orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures"; the State Symphony.

When Serge Koussevitzky made his first appearance here with the Boston Orchestra some two months ago he gave a vigorously orthdox performance of Brahms's Fourth Symphony, during which the real Brahms nevertheless somehow eluded him. At the time we expressed some considerable curiosity as to what he would do with Beethoven, and particularly the Seventh Symphony, since we believe this to be something like the acid test of a conductor. On Saturday, at the orchestra's second concert of the week in Carnegie Hall, he played this, to us, most profoundly agitating music of the whole symphonic repertoire, and he sent us home in a mental welter of disappointment.

We scarcely know what to make of it or how to account for it. Brahms might easily be alien to a Russian, but Beethoven is the real basis of modern music, after all is said, and a conductor of commanding grasp must all but live or die by him. Moreover, Mr. Koussevitzky has often enough shown himself to be a discerning, even a penetrating musician, with a remarkable feeling for the finer as well as the more obvious content of cyclical music. But this performance of the Seventh Symphony was pretty nearly as poor as any we have ever listened to!

It was not even played as music from the mere musician's standpoint. In some of its most vital moments it actually failed to "sound." The very beginning of the symphony was started wrong and lost its strange beauty. The opening chord of the introduction, out of which emerges, in one of Beethoven's inspirational touches, the lovely first melody, given to the oboe and clarinet, stood forth all but detached and the thing became very nearly meaningless. We speak of this as a typical instance of the way things went during the whole of the work. Effects which have become so well known as to be traditional, either evaporated or were ignored, and through what seemed really no more than sheer carelessness.

BEETHOVEN IN THE SEVENTH.

The Seventh Symphony has always seemed to us to be Beethoven's frankest expression of feeling in all his music. The idealism that was an inescapable phase of the philosophy of his time, to which he yielded and converted into music in the "Eroica," the C minor and the choral symphonies is prophetically absent from the Seventh. It is music that was startlingly in advance of his own day and of the romantic period that followed it. It suits the point of view of our own twentieth century—not in its form, to be sure, nor in its idiom, but in its content.

Beethoven here searches heart and head and finds an inner conviction of the futility of the universe, of the ways of man, and of the thing he himself is. And there is no deeper and no truer expression of all this than the hopelessness of the allegretto, with its perpetual repetition and its insistent beat of the rhythm. But after that the deluge. Beethoven then tears loose, as in no other of his works; the scherzo is a preliminary beating up of the fleshpots and the finale an orgiasm of "ausgeknopft" feeling.

That is what the Seventh Symphony should mean, with an undercurrent of the savage and the bitter to boot. That is what Mahler found in it and that is how Arturo Toscanini interprets it. And Nikisch, too, rammed it home without stint of its essentially realistic—emotionally realistic—significance.

But Mr. Koussevitzky was a thousand miles or so from anything of this sort. Indeed, we cannot say that he gave it any special, or even general, meaning at all. For one thing, it was too badly played, technically, to hold much, even if any had been intended. It was limp when it wasn't lame and lame when it wasn't limp.

Moussorgsky and Ravel.

The quasi-novelty of the afternoon was the orchestration by Maurice Ravel of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exposition." As a piano suite it is fairly well known here, chiefly through the finely pointed performances of it by Harold Bauer. But this was the first time the Ravel instrumentation had been heard. Walter Damrosch, earlier in the season, thinking perhaps to steal some of Mr. Koussevitzky's thunder, played an orchestration of the suite by Leonidas Leonardi, remembered here as a pianist and latterly an occasional conductor of the Lamoreaux Orchestra in Paris. But this was very bad indeed.

The Ravel orchestration is not Ravel at all, but purposefully Rimsky-Korsakov. It is diabolically skillful in its imitativeness of the Russian instrumental wizard, and enormously effective in its alternate richness and delicacy. But even so, the music wears thin, its descriptive quality at times comes pretty close to bordering on the childish. The finale alone, perhaps (two of the movements were omitted by Mr. Koussevitzky) is first-rate Moussorgsky, and this, in a way, is of the same significance as the Kremlin scene in "Boris Godounov."

The orchestra was far from letter perfect in the performance of the Moussorgsky suite, and the conductor frequently struck some halting moments in its presentation. The concert opened with a very fine delivery of Handel's concerto grosso in D minor for the string band.—I. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
GAZETTE

1925

Igor Stravinsky played his concert for pianoforte and orchestra with the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in Symphony Hall, Boston, Jaunary 28. His piano concerto is in contrast to his more modern compositions, "Petrouchka," "L'Oiseau de Feu" and others and is said by critics to be a return in model to the Bach form.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN

FE

Boston Symphony Concert.

The chronicling of the Saturday afternoon activities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall has rather the aspect of ancient history in the Monday night record of a crowded musical week end, and Mr Koussevitzky's program was not one to startle the natives after some of the recent heavy artillery brought to bear on the poor people by rival conductors battling for public favor.

However, Mr. Koussevitzky did not play Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony Saturday afternoon. He offered Handel's concerto grosse in D minor, Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven. This last, the first Beethoven conducted by the Russian conductor in this town, was magnificently played as to tone, finish, color and movement.

Perhaps there were some who wished for a little more romantic fervor, for a little more emphasis and accentuation of the springy elasticity of an earth bursting with vernal joy, a quality that seems inherent in the work from the opening chord to the bacchantic fervor of the finale—except perhaps, in the haunting plaintiveness of the second movement. But this was only a passing sun spot of an otherwise brilliant performance. And the rich impressive coloring of Ravel's orchestration, particularly in Moussorgsky's massive "Great Gate of Kieff" aroused enthusiasm.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 2 1925

BAD MANNERS AT A CONCERT.

There was a time when what is known as the musical season in Hartford was a bit barren. That has not been the case this winter. We have heard and will hear a number of the finest musicians in the world. During the past week four excellent performances of grand opera were given here. Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky gave one of the finest concerts it has ever played in Hartford.

One wonders why such faultless, inspiring playing must be marred by minor and unnecessary things. Of those persons who will cough and seem thus to start an epidemic of coughing throughout the audience it must be said that they are more to be pitied than blamed. Probably they cannot help it. It is, no doubt, a necessary evil. But less to be let off easily are the people who apparently go to a concert mainly for the purpose of bursting into loud hand clapping the minute there is any pause in the music. No one has ever explained why a symphony must be interrupted by applause at the conclusion of each movement. Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday made it very plainly understood that he did not wish this to happen, and, fortunately, he had nearly as good control in conducting the immense audience to silence when it began this inopportune applause as he did over his splendid orchestra.

But for one class of persons who attend concerts there can be offered no plea against their being executed in the most barbarous fashion known to the ancients. These are the people who talk while the orchestra is playing. Why they do it no one knows, but they do. It was our misfortune to sit yesterday beside a couple composed of a large, voluble woman and an almost equally talkative escort. There was hardly a number of the program that was not marred by frequent remarks by this exasperating pair. The faint, mysterious opening of the second movement of the Tchaikovsky symphony was spoiled for those in their immediate vicinity by her assertion that Koussevitzky as a conductor did not arouse her. Had she been conscious of how she aroused her unwilling hearers she might have refrained from comment at that particular time. Nor was anything added to the music because of audible criticism concerning the oboes.

A great deal has been said concerning bad manners in the theater. Nowhere are they more glaringly out of place than at a concert.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

FEB 2 1925

Boston Symphony

The public sale for the annual concert in Mechanics hall Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, by the Boston Symphony orchestra opens this morning at Steinert's Music store. This is one of the outstanding concerts of the season, and gives Worcester the opportunity to see Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor. He conducted his own symphony orchestra in that country and then came to Paris at the close of the war, and for four years was prominent in music in Paris and London. In 1920 he came to Paris and organized what became internationally known as the Concerts Koussevitzky. As guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra he created a sensation and was hailed as one of the greatest of the world's conductors. As a musician he is evidently endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it.

HARTFORD DAILY COURANT: MONDAY, FEBRUARY 2,

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS SUPERBLY

Receives Short, Silent Tribute to Greatness by Huge Audience.

KOUSSEVITZKY RANKS AS MASTER MUSICIAN

Accorded Unique Reception by Lovers of Music in Hartford.

The playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at the Capitol Theater yesterday afternoon was superb and the huge audience gathered to greet the orchestra and its new conductor was one of the most enthusiastic ever seen at a symphony concert here. The concerto and the symphony were played, however, without intervals permitting applause between movements and a long-standing rule of the orchestra was broken for the first time in Hartford by the repetition the delightful little Rimsky-Korsakov "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Mr. Koussevitzky was warmly welcomed when he came on the stage, and his work was more than warmly appreciated. He may well feel that no conductor ever before gained such an instant success with a Hartford audience.

A Repressive Conductor.

A word as to the personality of the conductor is surely not amiss at this time. He is a man of good figure, average size; he is a rather youthful looking and he moves quickly, surely, gracefully. He has poise aplenty but no mannerism of self-esteem; he achieves wonderful climaxes of tone without undue strenuousness and he frequently lets the orchestra play along as it perfectly well knows how to do without any great exertion on his part. He is perfectly sure of himself—as any musician competent to lead a great orchestra should be: and he is sure of the men who play under his baton. Why should he imagine for a moment that artists of their standing need to have the measures of a fugue counted for them? When he wishes a particular effect he knows how to go about getting it, and he knows that his players can give it. For the orchestra is magnificently responsive to his calls; the balance of its tone is beautifully exact, its strings are sweeping, sure and fine, its woodwinds are delightful in sweetness and its brasses have the combined splendor of smoothness and power.

Individual Readings.

Mr. Koussevitzky has very definite ideas of interpretation, some of which are not exactly the ideas that have been accepted by many conductors, but inasmuch as he makes a splendid appeal in the readings he gives and plays the music with exquisite grace and charm in lightness and with tremendous effect of power in the passages of weight, and inasmuch as (judging by yesterday's concert and the reports of others under his direction elsewhere) he manages to bring his audiences under the spell of his art as expressed by his orchestra, it is quite reasonable to feel that he is entitled to his own ideas of interpretation just as he is undoubtedly competent to give them expression.

All the qualities of an orchestral conductor may not be discovered in a single concert but those shown by Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon mark him as a great figure in music in America today and lovers of great music such as it falls to the lot of symphony orchestras to give the public will hope, as many of them most surely expect, that the splendid Boston Symphony Orchestra has come into a very important phase of its existence and that it will continue to prosper greatly under Mr. Koussevitzky's leadership.

Yesterday afternoon's playing was of most brilliant quality throughout, from the first measures of the C. P. E. Bach D major Concerto to the wondrous finale of the great Tschaikowsky Fifth Symphony. The Bach work, breaking at once in fugal form, showed the new conductor's aforementioned faith in his orchestra within a very few measures. But the seemingly undirected playing was as beautifully smooth as anyone could ask and the whole work was given in a delightful manner.

The picturesque, romantic and lovely Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture was played with every possible charm of tone from the sweetness of the English horn in the opening melody, through the syncopation extraordinary that marks much of the work, to the dashing climax. The Moussorgsky "Khovantchina" prelude was exquisite; a test for the woodwinds in the first part and including some of that particularly lovely tone of the strings that is of the quality that makes one think of singing at its best. And the ending into silence was of the finest possible grace and effectiveness, save only for the nervousness of coughs in the audience and the banging door of some self-centered Philistine. Then came the charming little "Bumble Bee" scherzo, one of those compositions that must give absolute joy to a composer able to suggest in sound what he has in his mind; and then, after a brief intermission, the symphony.

Symphony Deathless.

Someone has said that the trouble with Tschaikowsky's works is that they are so good that they are played to death. This trouble came with the wonderful "Pathetic," his Sixth Symphony, and some are complaining that the beautiful Fifth that was played yesterday is approaching the same fate. For it is so lovely, so graciously melodic, that it is played over and over where symphonies are found; yet it may hardly be said that it is too old a story for Hartford music lovers as yet. Nor will it be if its beauties are shown as they were by the Boston players yesterday.

The first movement began very slowly, but in such delight of tone and breadth that its effectiveness was enhanced by the drawing out of its charms. The lower orchestra, without the violins, sang here in all its beauty and later the splendid "drill" of the violins was shown in that sweeping melody of the symphony that enchants the eye as well as the ear when it is made visible in perfection of bowing. The andante's loveliness are well known and all were there in the playing; the valse, delightful in its recurring melodies, was beautifully played; and the magnificent finale was begun and swept to its superb conclusion with an authority and power that carried the audience away from its sense of time and place. And when the symphony was over the applause was not begun before the last note died. There was the instant's hush that told the story of the effect of great music, greatly played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
POST

FEB 2 1925

Mr. Koussevitzky Plays Beethoven

Serge Koussevitzky tried his hand at a more or less conventional program Saturday afternoon with the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, the symphony for the occasion being Beethoven's seventh, which, despite some uneasiness on the part of the more conventional minded as to what this conductor might do to it, was given a reading well in keeping with the traditions that have surrounded it for these many years.

Few perceptible liberties were taken, and it was an interpretation marked by clarity and cleanly-marked rhythms rather than by any violation of accepted conventions. The orchestra played well, as it has a way of doing under its present leader's baton.

The opening number on the program was Handel's "Concerto Grosso in D Minor," heard recently several times in Mr. Furtwaengler's Philharmonic programs. Mr. Koussevitzky cut it half in two, and played it with speeded-up tempi, giving it a more sprightly reading than is altogether customary.

The novelty of the afternon was Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the Ravel arrangement. This composition has already been played here by the New York Symphony, but in the orchestration of Leonidas Leonardi inferior in every respect to the fine arrangement of the French composer, who undoubtedly found material very much to his liking. Mr. Koussevitzky omitted a few of the "Pictures" and ran others together, but it was a thoroughly engaging interpretation of a colorful, entertaining piece of program music, with proper attention to its subtly humorous passages.

It might well be played oftener, for it has unusual qualities. It would be interesting to see what other conductors would do with it. Mr. Koussevitzky, as the saying is, "puts it across."

The program evoked the usual enthusiasm, and conductor and men shared in the long applause that followed the Beethoven symphony.

Hartford Courant Feb 2

ARTISTIC TREAT BY THE SYMPHONY

Orchestra and Conductor Koussevitzky Given Real Ovation.

Serge Koussevitzky, eminent Russian conductor and musician, made his first appearance in Hartford yesterday afternoon at the Capitol theater, when he directed the Boston Symphony orchestra during what proved to be one of the most noteworthy concerts of the present musical season in this city. The entire seating capacity of the theater was taken, and Koussevitzky, long expected, was greeted by a distinguished gathering.

Hartford's only orchestral concert of the year proved to be one of the most interesting musical events held in this city in many a day, and found an audience ready and waiting to listen to the rare and artistic treats unfolded during the course of a concert of exceptional brilliancy. Koussevitzky appeared as an absolute stranger to the large majority of those present, but he immediately won a warm welcome, and was given one of the most enthusiastic ovations ever accorded to any conductor who has appeared here in many years.

Under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky the orchestra has opened new fields of musical usefulness, the possibilities of which are without limit. The work so well begun by Mr. Monteux, after the orchestra had experienced troublous times, has been successfully carried on, and there were those who remarked yesterday that favorable comparisons were possible with the days of Gericke and Nikisch, to say nothing of surpassing the work of Fielder and Muck. The string choirs have been built up to a remarkable degree. Bowing was unanimously excellent, sturdy when required, yet shading away into an infinitely beautiful delicacy.

But above the playing of the orchestra yesterday there at all times stood the preponderant figure of the great conductor, who, after setting new orchestral triumphs in Europe, is now winning successes in this country which are just as noteworthy. Yesterday he obtained effects in shading and expression heretofore undreamed of in orchestral music. Quiet and dignified, yet always assertive when required, Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday impressed a Hartford audience as one of the greatest of all orchestral conductors. Standing at times almost motionless, with his baton absolutely still in his right hand, with his left making almost imperceptible movements, yet at all times exerting a persuasive, almost supernatural force on his men, the general effect of which beggars description. The strings set a standard which was instantly followed by other sections of the orchestra. Welded together into a harmonious whole the result was the rendition of a program of exquisite beauty and musical impressiveness throughout.

The program began with Maximilian Steinberg's arrangement of the "Concerto for Orchestra in D major" by Karl Philip Emanuel Bach. This little known work was given with discretion and authority. The work is beautiful and interesting and it should appear oftener on modern programs

Next came the "The Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz, a highly descriptive bit of orchestral writing, which was interpreted by Mr. Koussevitzky in an intelligent fashion, showing the brilliancy of the orchestra, and the admirable control which conductor has over his musicians.

Next was the exquisite prelude to "Khovantchina," by Moussorgsky, taken from that composer's little known opera of the same name. This work, which is also descriptive, is written to illustrate the coming of dawn over the Red Square, in the Kremlin, at Moscow. It showed some unusually appealing work for the strings.

The final selection played before the intermission was "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," taken from "The Fairy Tale of the Esar Saltan," by Rimsky-Korsakov. This number evoked an ovation for the conductor which recalled him several times. He first acknowledged the tribute paid to him by beckoning every member of the orchestra to arise. The applause continued and he then, contrary to a long-established precedent set by the Boston Symphony orchestra, ordered the composition played again in its entirety.

The symphony offered yesterday was Tschaikovsky's Fifth, a work well known in this city and familiar to many. The four movements were played with an assurance, yet with a finish and with the utmost in musical sense. The first movement was almost overpowering in its brilliancy and always satisfying. The melodious andante cantabile showed the more delicate work of the orchestra under the best possible conditions, and the valse was perfectly executed. The finale proved to be a fitting climax to an afternoon of musical enjoyment which will long be remembered.

Hartford music lovers are deeply indebted to Mr. Sedgwick because of his bringing the Boston Symphony orchestra to this city, especially when it seemed, for a time, that a year would pass in Hartford without a single orchestral concert.

Many expressed their approval of the acoustic qualities of the theater, which were pronounced ideal for an orchestral concert. The most delicate tones of the instruments were as clearly and as distinctly heard in the remote parts of the building as they were in the orchestra chairs.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 2 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its annual Worcester concert in Mechanics hall on the evening of Tuesday, Feb. 17. The orchestra comprises 104 pieces, led by the new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. He was one of the foremost musical celebrities of Europe for several years prior to coming to America. He has brilliant command as a leader, and is an artist of searching sympathies and impassioned convictions.

Koussevitzky has prepared a splendid program for his Worcester concert, opening with Bach's concerto for orchestra in D major, and closing with Tchaikowski's "Fifth Symphony in E Minor." He also plays three novelties, including the little scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from the opera "Tsar Saltan." Seats for the concert went on sale at Steinert's today.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 2 1925

HE VISIONS GREAT AMERICAN MUSIC

Koussevitzky Predicts It Will Express Splendor and Beauty.

A great American music, imbued with the hopes and fears of the people, expressing the exotic splendor of cities and the brooding beauty of agricultural areas, was the vision Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which played yesterday afternoon at the Capitol Theater, imparted in an interview.

With R. Burgin, concert master, as interpreter (for Mr. Koussevitzky does not speak English) the celebrated conductor said:—

"What little I have seen of America I like. Yours is a young country, a bud yet to bloom. Your cities are fascinating. They are most American. Theirs is a strange beauty. Oh yes, there will be a great American music."

Mr. Koussevitzky sat resting in a room back stage. The players had arrived only a short time before the beginning of the concert and were to leave directly after in a special train. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed steeling himself for the ordeal of conducting, concentrating. But he consented to answer a few questions.

"This is my first visit to the United States," he said. "I haven't had much time to study the country. I feel, however, the material exists for future artists like Tchaikovsky, Beethoven, Handel. There is stuff for great music in your cities, I think."

Mr. Koussevitzky has been so busy since his arrival here with rehearsals and concerts that he has been able to pay only little attention to native music. On the subject of jazz he chose to study it further before saying anything. His work is now easing up and it is his desire to become acquainted with American compositions. He has invited Henry Hadley, American composer of the symphony, "North, East, South and West," to see him next week.

"I am gratified to see the large interest Americans take in concerts, recitals and opera," Mr. Koussevitzky said "One cannot despair of a country whose people seek the musicians. Music, great music, holds in the bars the elusive and undefinable qualities of beauty. The soul of man finds expression and it is music."

The conductor spoke rapidly, his eyes flashing, his hands working convulsively. His face is plastic and expressive as a child's, mirroring the passing moods and thoughts. He soon reclined in his chair and was lost in the contemplation of the concert.

"Every concert taxes his fullest powers," said George E. Judd, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony. "He comes off the stage wringing wet, but it is a holy sweat."

Newman wrote not

34

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 2 1925

BAD MANNERS AT A CONCERT.

There was a time when what is known as the musical season in Hartford was a bit barren. That has net been the case this winter. We have heard and will hear a number of the finest musicians in the world. During the past week four excellent performances of grand opera were given here. Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky gave one of the finest concerts it has ever played in Hartford.

One wonders why such faultless, inspiring playing must be marred by minor and unnecessary things. Of those persons who will cough and seem thus to start an epidemic of coughing throughout the audience it must be said that they are more to be pitied than blamed. Probably they cannot help it. It is, no doubt, a necessary evil. But less to be let off easily are the people who apparently go to a concert mainly for the purpose of bursting into loud hand clapping the minute there is any pause in the music. No one has ever explained why a symphony must be interrupted by applause at the conclusion of each movement. Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday made it very plainly understood that he did not wish this to happen, and, fortunately, he had nearly as good control in conducting the immense audience to silence when it began this inopportune applause as he did over his splendid orchestra.

But for one class of persons who attend concerts there can be offered no plea against their being executed in the most barbarous fashion known to the ancients. These are the people who talk while the orchestra is playing. Why they do it no one knows, but they do. It was our misfortune to sit yesterday beside a couple composed of a large, voluble woman and an almost equally talkative escort. There was hardly a number of the program that was not marred by frequent remarks by this exasperating pair. The faint, mysterious opening of the second movement of the Tchaikovsky symphony was spoiled for those in their immediate vicinity by her assertion that Koussevitzky as a conductor did not arouse her. Had she been conscious of how she aroused her unwilling hearers she might have refrained from comment at that particular time. Nor was anything added to the music because of audible criticism concerning the oboes.

A great deal has been said concerning bad manners in the theater. Nowhere are they more glaringly out of place than at a concert.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

FEB 2 1925

Boston Symphony

The public sale for the annual concert in Mechanics hall Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, by the Boston Symphony orchestra opens this morning at Steinert's Music store. This is one of the outstanding concerts of the season, and gives Worcester the opportunity to see Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor. He conducted his own symphony orchestra in that country and then came to Paris at the close of the war, and for four years was prominent in music in Paris and London. In 1920 he came to Paris and organized what became internationally known as the Concerts Koussevitzky. As guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra he created a sensation and was hailed as one of the greatest of the world's conductors. As a musician he is evidently endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it.

ARTFORD DAILY COURANT: MONDAY, FEBRUARY 2,

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS SUPERBLY

Receives Short, Silent Tribute to Greatness by Huge Audience.

KOUSSEVITZKY RANKS AS MASTER MUSICIAN

Accorded Unique Reception by Lovers of Music in Hartford.

The playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at the Capitol Theater yesterday afternoon was superb and the huge audience gathered to greet the orchestra and its new conductor was one of the most enthusiastic ever seen at a symphony concert here. The concerto and the symphony were played, however, without intervals permitting applause between movements and a long-standing rule of the orchestra was broken for the first time in Hartford by the repetition the delightful little Rimsky-Korsakov "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Mr. Koussevitzky was warmly welcomed when he came on the stage, and his work was more than warmly appreciated. He may well feel that no conductor ever before gained such an instant success with a Hartford audience.

A Repressive Conductor.

A word as to the personality of the conductor is surely not amiss at this time. He is a man of good figure, average size; he is a rather youthful looking and he moves quickly, surely, gracefully. He has poise aplenty but no mannerism of self-esteem; he achieves wonderful climaxes of tone without undue strenuousness and he frequently lets the orchestra play along as it perfectly well knows how to do without any great exertion on his part. He is perfectly sure of himself—as any musician competent to lead a great orchestra should be: and he is sure of the men who play under his baton. Why should he imagine for a moment that artists of their standing need to have the measures of a fugue counted for them? When he wishes a particular effect he knows how to go about getting it, and he knows that his players can give it. For the orchestra is magnificently responsive to his calls; the balance of its tone is beautifully exact, its strings are sweeping, sure and fine, its woodwinds are delightful in sweetness and its brasses have the combined splendor of smoothness and power.

Individual Readings.

Mr. Koussevitzky has very definite ideas of interpretation, some of which are not exactly the ideas that have been accepted by many conductors, but inasmuch as he makes a splendid appeal in the readings he gives and plays the music with exquisite grace and charm in lightness and with tremendous effect or power in the passages of weight, and inasmuch as (judging by yesterday's concert and the reports of others under his direction elsewhere) he manages to bring his audiences under the spell of his art as expressed by his orchestra, it is quite reasonable to feel that he is entitled to his own ideas of interpretation just as he is undoubtedly competent to give them expression.

All the qualities of an orchestral conductor may not be discovered in a single concert but those shown by Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon mark him as a great figure in music in America today and lovers of great music such as it falls to the lot of symphony orchestras to give the public will hope, as many of them most surely expect, that the splendid Boston Symphony Orchestra has come into a very important phase of its existence and that it will continue to prosper greatly under Mr. Koussevitzky's leadership.

Yesterday afternoon's playing was of most brilliant quality throughout, from the first measures of the C. P. E. Bach D major Concerto to the wondrous finale of the great Tschaikowsky Fifth Symphony. The Bach work, breaking at once in fugal form, showed the new conductor's aforementioned faith in his orchestra within a very few measures. But the seemingly undirected playing was as beautifully smooth as anyone could ask and the whole work was given in a delightful manner.

The picturesque, romantic and lovely Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture was played with every possible charm of tone from the sweetness of the English horn in the opening melody, through the syncopation extraordinary that marks much of the work, to the dashing climax. The Moussorgsky "Khovantchina" prelude was exquisite; a test for the woodwinds in the first part and including some of that particularly lovely tone of the strings that is of the quality that makes one think of singing at its best. And the ending into silence was of the finest possible grace and effectiveness, save only for the nervousness of coughs in the audience and the banging door of some self-centered Philistine. Then came the charming little "Bumble Bee" scherzo, one of those compositions that must give absolute joy to a composer able to suggest in sound what he has in his mind; and then, after a brief intermission, the symphony.

Symphony Deathless.

Someone has said that the trouble with Tschaikowsky's works is that they are so good that they are played to death. This trouble came with the wonderful "Pathetic," his Sixth Symphony, and some are complaining that the beautiful Fifth that was played yesterday is approaching the same fate. For it is so lovely, so graciously melodic, that it is played over and over where symphonies are found; yet it may hardly be said that it is too old a story for Hartford music lovers as yet. Nor will it be if its beauties are shown as they were by the Boston players yesterday.

The first movement began very slowly, but in such delight of tone and breadth that its effectiveness was enhanced by the drawing out of its charms. The lower orchestra, without the violins, sang here in all its beauty and later the splendid "drill" of the violins was shown in that sweeping melody of the symphony that enchants the eye as well as the ear when it is made visible in perfection of bowing. The andante's loveliness are well known and all were there in the playing; the valse, delightful in its recurring melodies, was beautifully played; and the magnificent finale was begun and swept to its superb conclusion with an authority and power that carried the audience away from its sense of time and place. And when the symphony was over the applause was not begun before the last note died. There was the instant's hush that told the story of the effect of great music, greatly played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
POST

FEB 2 1925

Mr. Koussevitzky Plays Beethoven

Serge Koussevitzky tried his hand at a more or less conventional program Saturday afternoon with the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, the symphony for the occasion being Beethoven's seventh, which, despite some uneasiness on the part of the more conventional minded as to what this conductor might do to it, was given a reading well in keeping with the traditions that have surrounded it for these many years.

Few perceptible liberties were taken, and it was an interpretation marked by clarity and cleanly-marked rhythms rather than by any violation of accepted conventions. The orchestra played well, as it has a way of doing under its present leader's baton.

The opening number on the program was Handel's "Concerto Grosso in D Minor," heard recently several times in Mr. Furtwaengler's Philharmonic programs. Mr. Koussevitzky cut it half in two, and played it with speeded-up tempi, giving it a more sprightly reading than is altogether customary.

The novelty of the afternon was Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the Ravel arrangement. This composition has already been played here by the New York Symphony, but in the orchestration of Leonidas Leonardi inferior in every respect to the fine arrangement of the French composer, who undoubtedly found material very much to his liking. Mr. Koussevitzky omitted a few of the "Pictures" and ran others together, but it was a thoroughly engaging interpretation of a colorful, entertaining piece of program music, with proper attention to its subtly humorous passages.

It might well be played oftener, for it has unusual qualities. It would be interesting to see what other conductors would do with it. Mr. Koussevitzky, as the saying is, "puts it across."

The program evoked the usual enthusiasm, and conductor and men shared in the long applause that followed the Beethoven symphony.

Hartford
Courant
Feb 2

ARTISTIC TREAT BY THE SYMPHONY

Orchestra and Conductor Koussevitzky Given Real Ovation.

Serge Koussevitzky, eminent Russian conductor and musician, made his first appearance in Hartford yesterday afternoon at the Capitol theater, when he directed the Boston Symphony orchestra during what proved to be one of the most noteworthy concerts of the present musical season in this city. The entire seating capacity of the theater was taken, and Koussevitzky, long expected, was greeted by a distinguished gathering.

Hartford's only orchestral concert of the year proved to be one of the most interesting musical events held in this city in many a day, and found an audience ready and waiting to listen to the rare and artistic treats unfolded during the course of a concert of exceptional brilliancy. Koussevitzky appeared as an absolute stranger to the large majority of those present, but he immediately won a warm welcome, and was given one of the most enthusiastic ovations ever accorded to any conductor who has appeared here in many years.

Under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky the orchestra has opened new fields of musical usefulness, the possibilities of which are without limit. The work so well begun by Mr. Monteux, after the orchestra had experienced troublous times, has been successfully carried on, and there were those who remarked yesterday that favorable comparisons were possible with the days of Gericke and Nikisch, to say nothing of surpassing the work of Fielder and Muck. The string choirs have been built up to a remarkable degree. Bowing was unanimously excellent, sturdy when required, yet shading away into an infinitely beautiful delicacy.

But above the playing of the orchestra yesterday there at all times stood the preponderant figure of the great conductor, who, after setting new orchestral triumphs in Europe, is now winning successes in this country which are just as noteworthy. Yesterday he obtained effects in shading and expression heretofore undreamed of in orchestral music. Quiet and dignified, yet always assertive when required, Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday impressed a Hartford audience as one of the greatest of all orchestral conductors. Standing at times almost motionless, with his baton absolutely still in his right hand, with his left making almost imperceptible movements, yet at all times exerting a persuasive, almost supernatural force on his men, the general effect of which beggars description. The strings set a standard which was instantly followed by other sections of the orchestra. Welded together into a harmonious whole the result was the rendition of a program of exquisite beauty and musical impressiveness throughout.

The program began with Maximilian Steinberg's arrangement of the "Concerto for Orchestra in D major" by Karl Philip Emanuel Bach. This little known work was given with discretion and authority. The work is beautiful and interesting and it should appear oftener on modern programs.

Next came the "The Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz, a highly descriptive bit of orchestral writing, which was interpreted by Mr. Koussevitzky in an intelligent fashion, showing the brilliancy of the orchestra, and the admirable control which conductor has over his musicians.

Next was the exquisite prelude to "Khovantchina," by Moussorgsky, taken from that composer's little known opera of the same name. This work, which is also descriptive, is written to illustrate the coming of dawn over the Red Square, in the Kremlin, at Moscow. It showed some unusually appealing work for the strings.

The final selection played before the intermission was "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," taken from "The Fairy Tale of the Esar Saltan," by Rimsky-Korsakov. This number evoked an ovation for the conductor which recalled him several times. He first acknowledged the tribute paid to him by beckoning every member of the orchestra to arise. The applause continued and he then, contrary to a long-established precedent set by the Boston Symphony orchestra, ordered the composition played again in its entirety.

The symphony offered yesterday was Tschaikovsky's Fifth, a work well known in this city and familiar to many. The four movements were played with an assurance, yet with a finish and with the utmost in musical sense. The first movement was almost overpowering in its brilliancy and always satisfying. The melodious andante cantabile showed the more delicate work of the orchestra under the best possible conditions, and the valse was perfectly executed. The finale proved to be a fitting climax to an afternoon of musical enjoyment which will long be remembered.

Hartford music lovers are deeply indebted to Mr. Sedgwick because of his bringing the Boston Symphony orchestra to this city, especially when it seemed, for a time, that a year would pass in Hartford without a single orchestral concert.

Many expressed their approval of the acoustic qualities of the theater, which were pronounced ideal for an orchestral concert. The most delicate tones of the instruments were as clearly and as distinctly heard in the remote parts of the building as they were in the orchestra chairs.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 2 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its annual Worcester concert in Mechanics hall on the evening of Tuesday, Feb. 17. The orchestra comprises 104 pieces, led by the new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. He was one of the foremost musical celebrities of Europe for several years prior to coming to America. He has brilliant command as a leader, and is an artist of searching sympathies and impassioned convictions.

Koussevitzky has prepared a splendid program for his Worcester concert, opening with Bach's concerto for orchestra in D major, and closing with Tchaikowski's "Fifth Symphony in E Minor." He also plays three novelties, including the little scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from the opera "Tsar Saltan." Seats for the concert went on sale at Steinert's today.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 2

HE VISIONS GREAT AMERICAN MUSIC

Koussevitzky Predicts It Will Express Splendor and Beauty.

A great American music, imbued with the hopes and fears of the people, expressing the exotic splendor of cities and the brooding beauty of agricultural areas, was the vision Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which played yesterday afternoon at the Capitol Theater, imparted in an interview.

With R. Burgin, concert master, as interpreter (for Mr. Koussevitzky does not speak English) the celebrated conductor said:—

"What little I have seen of America I like. Yours is a young country, a bud yet to bloom. Your cities are fascinating. They are most American Theirs is a strange beauty. Oh yes, there will be a great American music."

Mr. Koussevitzky sat resting in a room back stage. The players had arrived only a short time before the beginning of the concert and were to leave directly after in a special train. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed steeling himself for the ordeal of conducting, concentrating. But he consented to answer a few questions.

"This is my first visit to the United States," he said. "I haven't had much time to study the country. I feel, however, the material exists for future artists like Tchaikovsky, Beethoven, Handel. There is stuff for great music in your cities, I think."

Mr. Koussevitzky has been so busy since his arrival here with rehearsals and concerts that he has been able to pay only little attention to native music. On the subject of jazz he chose to study it further before saying anything. His work is now easing up and it is his desire to become acquainted with American compositions. He has invited Henry Hadley, American composer of the symphony "North, East, South and West," to see him next week.

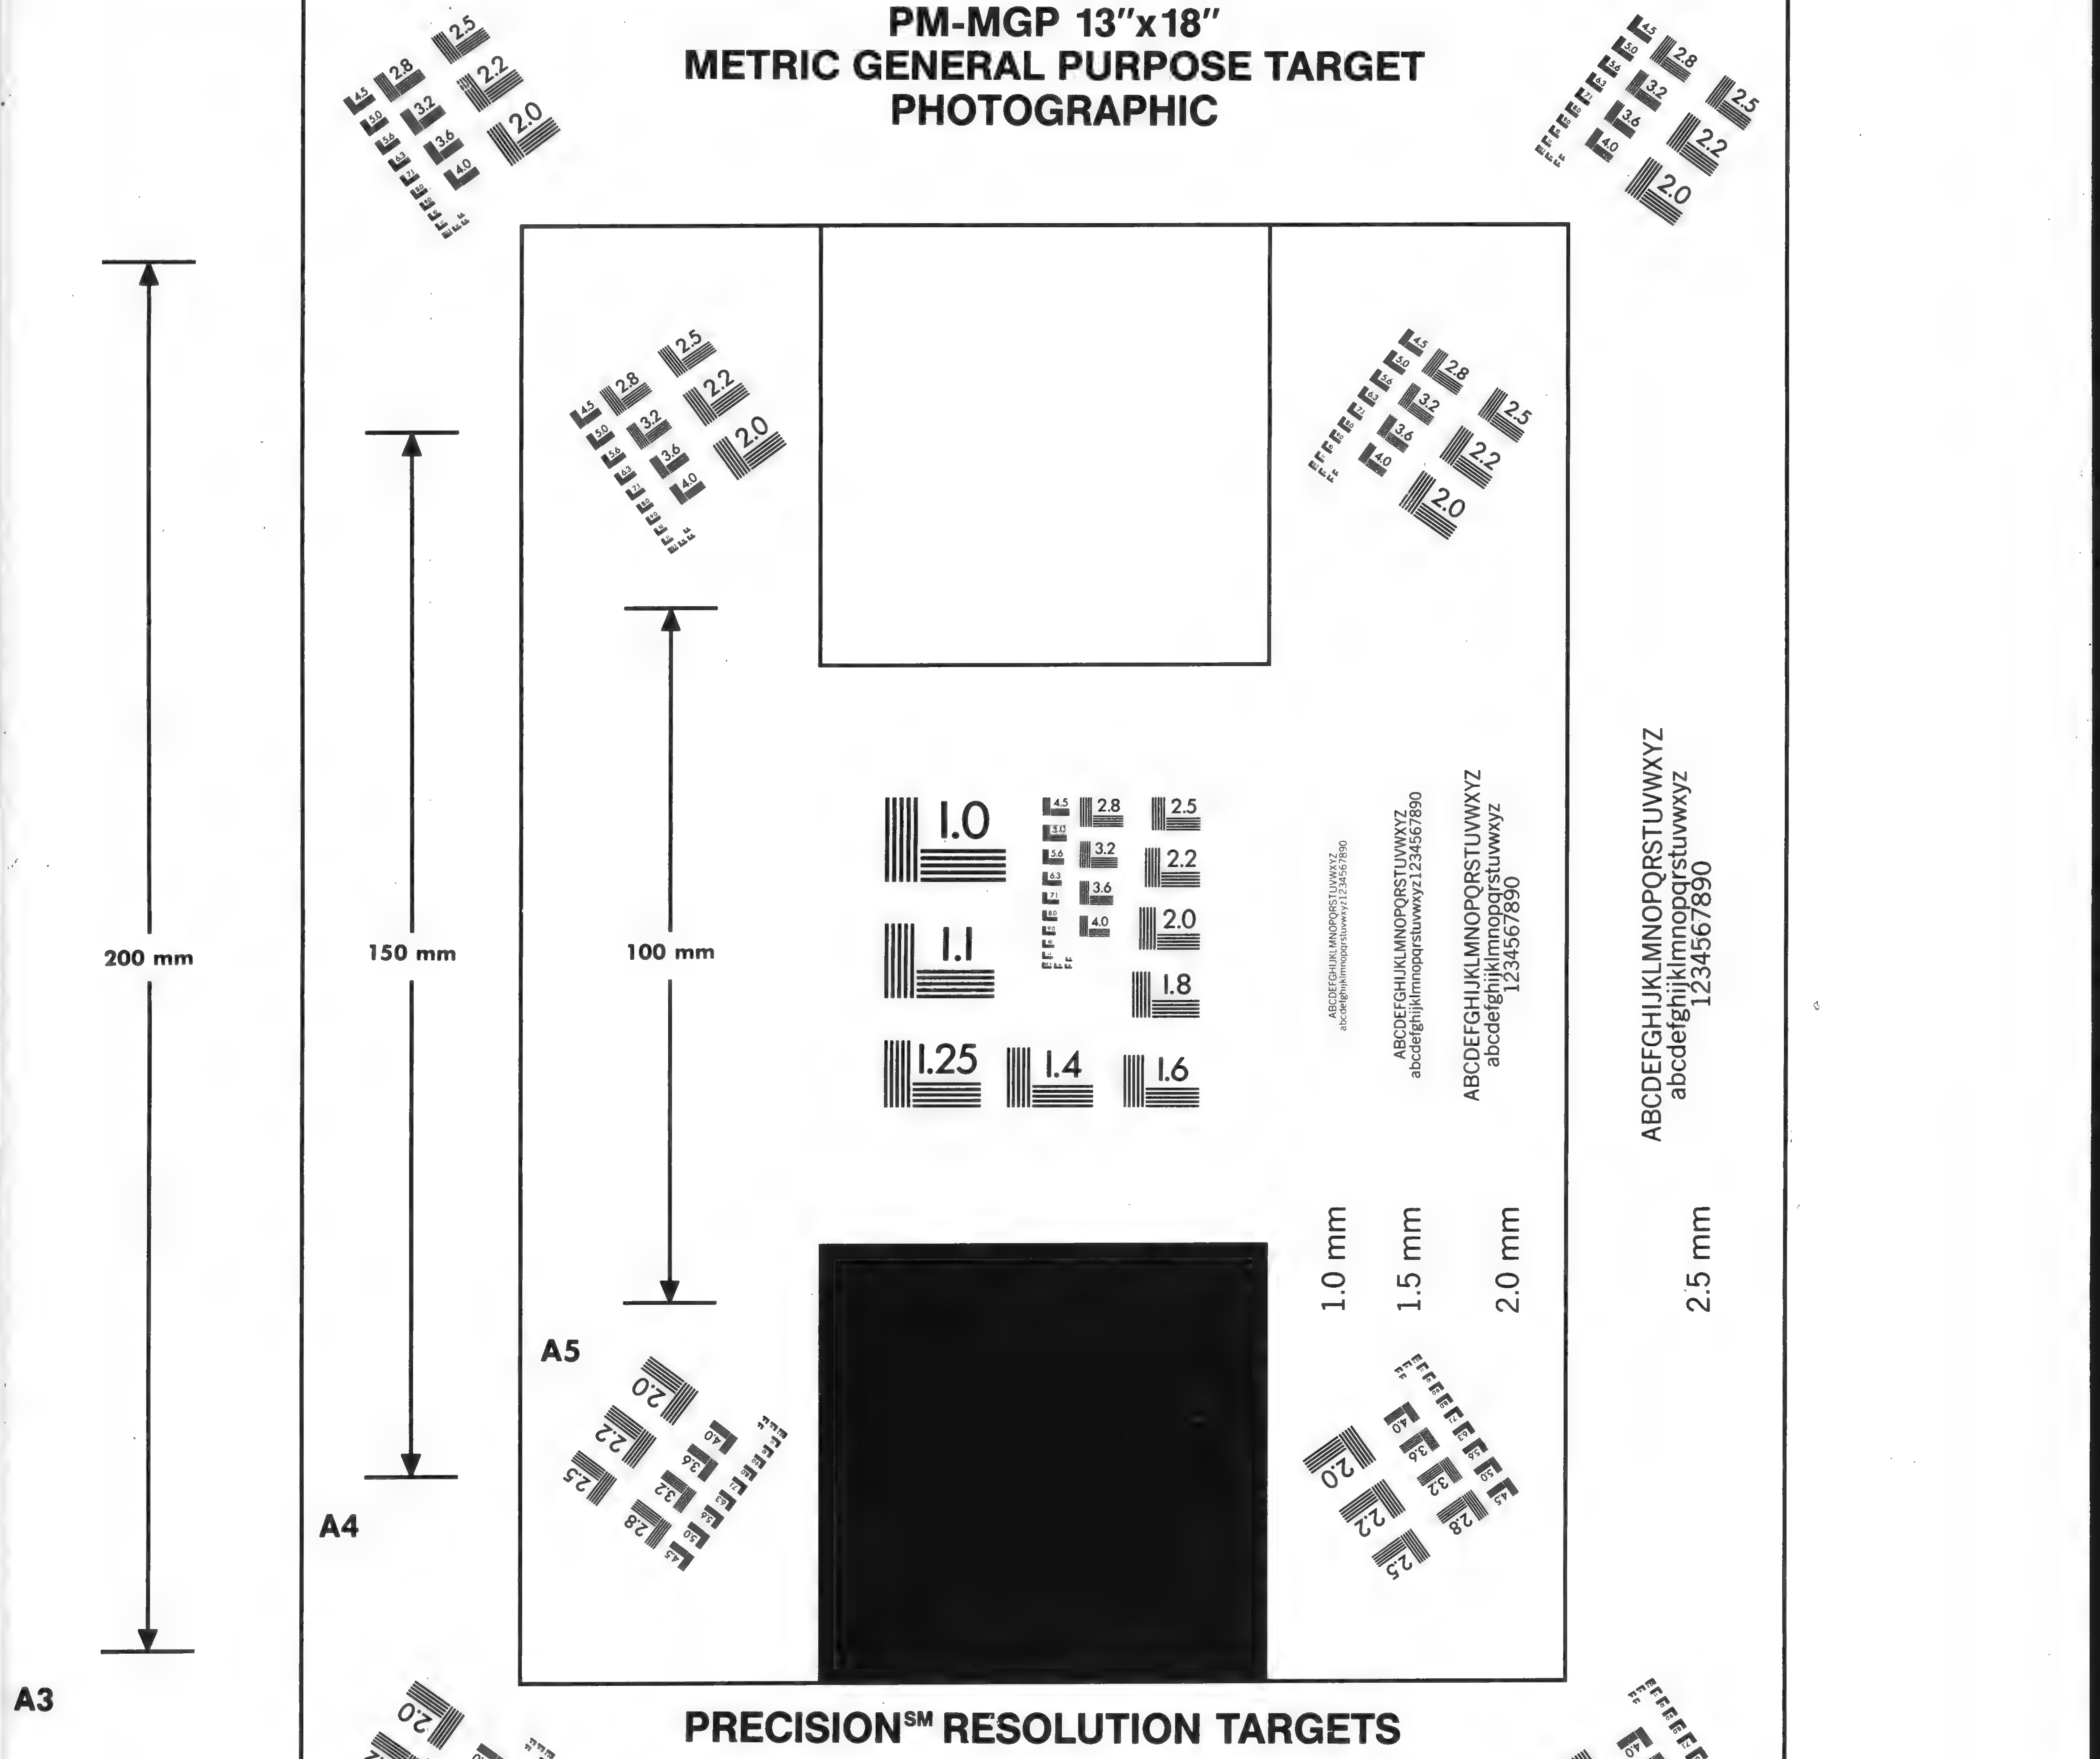
"I am gratified to see the large interest Americans take in concerts, recitals and opera," Mr. Koussevitzky said "One cannot despair of a country whose people seek the musicians. Music, great music, holds in the bars the elusive and undefinable qualities of beauty. The soul of man finds expression and it is music."

The conductor spoke rapidly, his eyes flashing, his hands working convulsively. His face is plastic and expressive as a child's, mirroring the passing moods and thoughts. He soon reclined in his chair and was lost in the contemplation of the concert.

"Every concert taxes his fullest powers," said George E. Judd, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony. "He comes off the stage wringing wet, but it is a holy sweat."

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

FEB 2 1925

Furtwaengler in Farewell.

The farewell of Wilhelm Furtwaengler, who conducted the Philharmonic orchestra at a symphony concert at Carnegie hall Friday evening, was made one of the most demonstrative gatherings of music lovers that New York has heard in some time. At the close of the concert the big audience cheered for a full quarter of an hour and cries of "Come back" and "Au revoir" resounded through the hall.

Of the symphony conductors heard during the week Furtwaengler is the most gifted of them all. He has a finer instinct for the music that he directs, he is a greater analyst and has a more complete control over the men. He knew the music so that he conducted the program entirely from memory, a feat rivaled only by Frederick Stock.

The concert was made up the "Surprize" symphony by Haydn, the symphonic poem "Death and Transfiguration," by Strauss, and the Beethoven fifth symphony. He gave a reading of the Haydn that was in the spirit of this earliest of symphonic music. He put into the Strauss poem the dramatic effects intended by the composer, perhaps giving the brasses more tone volume than necessary. The Beethoven symphony was well done.

Of the other conductors, Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with his imaginative force and with his refinement, ranks second. Waghalter of the State Symphony orchestra may be mentioned third as a musician of sterling qualities, though with less of the individual in his interpretations.

Carnegie Hall Sold.

Carnegie hall, the most important music hall of New York, has been sold to Robert E. Simon by the Carnegie estate, but for the next five years the hall and studios in the building will remain undisturbed. Several million dollars are involved in this deal.

The Polish Peasant Symphony orchestra fifty musicians will begin an extensive American tour Feb. 22, with a concert at the Metropolitan Opera house under the direction of Stanislaw Namyslowski. The organization was founded some forty years ago and is made up of shepherds, farm hands, dairymen and others. Polish music will be featured on the programs. S Hurok has arranged for their American tour.

PAPER- Transcript
DATE- Feb 4

FOR A THIRD TIME MR. KOUSSEVITZKY REVISITS NEW YORK

TWO CONCERTS IN UNFAVORING CIRCUMSTANCE

An Interfering Opera—Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony for the Eighth Time Within a Month—Mr. Hayes as Assisting Artist in a Novel Number—Comment as It Heard and Heeded

THERE is less than usual to record about the visit of the Boston Orchestra to New York last week. In the first place, the major reviewers naturally put by its concert on Saturday afternoon for the revival (after eight years) of "Götterdämmerung" at the Metropolitan Opera House. To the ears of their "second men" and to brief and cautious paragraphs, they left Mr. Koussevitzky busy with the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven; Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor. Ravel's version of M[illegible]'s "Pictures at An Exhibition." As [illegible] minor reviewers confined themsel[illegible]eralities. The conductor's "rea[illegible] the Seventh Symphony was less "[illegible] "temperamental" and "Russian" th[illegible] had anticipated Ravel's orchestral garb for Musorgsky might plausibly have been original dress, "so perfect was the fit." And so onward with little for interest or enlightenment.

In the second place, Mr. Koussevitzky ended the concert of Thursday evening with Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony—music long since odious to the reviewers by excess of repetition. Seven times within the month of January had it been played in New York before the Bostonian conductor undertook it. One or two of the newspaper-men declined point-blank to listen again. More sampled the new version briefly; but wrote with the weariness of satiety. Mr Newman, however, held firm to the end and found something worth the saying, in The Evening Post, about Mr. Koussevitzky's ways and works with the piece:

> Koussevitzky showed us Chaikovsky as he really was. He let him work himself into any paroxysm of terror he liked, and, when his nerve broke and he began to weep, let him weep and pity himself to his heart's content. Was it right or wrong to do so? The answer depends on what view you take of the conductor's functions. If you claim that your own conception of the music is the only possible right one, you will naively declare the other to be wrong. But if you take the view that in music like this—a human document, to use a term that has rather dropped out of fashion, a long chapter of highly emotional self-confession—the conductor is an actor as truly as the player of Hamlet or Œdipus is, you must allow an actor of genius to play the part as he feels it.
>
> It is futile to turn round on him and say that you do not like such a character as he portrays. You do not make it a complaint against the actor who shows Iago as a monster of iniquity that you could not live with such a character as Iago. It is equally irrelevant, æsthetically, to say that you have no sympathy with a character so neurotic as the Chaikovsky whom Koussevitzky shows us in the first two movements of the symphony. If Cézanne paints a crushed tomato in all the rich tints of putrefaction, it is no valid criticism of the painting to say that you don't like tomatoes, anyhow, and least of all when they are rotten. And it is no criticism of such a character as Koussevitzky draws in the early part of the symphony to say that you despise a man so lacking in self-control. Granting the postulate that such a character is conceivable; and that it is in just such music as this that just such a character as that would express itself, the conductor is justified in heightening the lights and deepening the shadows of a soul the very essence of which was the perpetual oscillation between self-terror and self-pity.
>
> It is futile, again, to lay it down dogmatically that the pace of the Finale was "too fast." It would have been too fast for any other reading; but it was not a shade too fast for this. The final Allegro, indeed, not only was justified by but itself justified, all that had gone before. When once the dark obsession that had tortured the man's mind in the earlier movements had been rolled away, it was natural that he should find relief in a dance as mad as this. There was thus nothing capricious or ill-governed in the reading; everything was under the most masterly control. One might or might not agree with it or like it; but it will be some time before anyone who heard it will forget it.

Nor did the conductor have the concert of Thursday wholly to hims[illegible] Mr. Roland Hayes, the tenor, was [illegible] artist. "For the first time," acc[illegible] The Sun, "a negro appeared in [illegible] as soloist with a great orche[illegible] a regular series of concerts." [illegible] sang Liszt's music (arranged f[illegible] tra by Busoni) to Petrarch's On[illegible] Hundred and Fourth Sonnet and "The [illegible]pose of The Holy Family" out of Berlioz's "Flight Into Egypt." As it proved, these less familiar pieces interested the reviewers much more than did Mr. Koussevitzky's exercises with Chaikovsky. Said Mr. Gilman in The Herald-Tribune, for example:

> Evidently the Boston Symphony Orchestra is on easy street these days, now that Mr. Koussevitzky has demonstrated that he is what the managerial world so happily calls "a box-office riot." We are moved to this cheering conclusion by the fact that the orchestra brought eight women-singers all the way from Boston (regardless of the fortune it costs to travel between the capital of Massachusetts and the capital of the world), only that they might sing ten measures behind the scenes at the close of a number on last evening's program. And those ten measures, in which a chorus of four sopranos and four altos merely sing "Hallelujah! Hallelujah!" as an epilogue to the tenor air of the Narrator in "The Repose of the Holy Family" from Berlioz's "L'Enfance du Christ," are optional. Berlioz says in his score that in the absence of a chorus the tenor may sing the ten bars of the first soprano.
>
> But the lordly Bostonians stooped to no such expedient. They magnificently choose to perform the piece as Berlioz obviously preferred that it should be done. And so, much to the surprise of the audience, who were unwarned by the program, Berlioz's "eight voices of unseen angels" floated out from behind the scenes after Mr. Hayes had finished his solo, and ended the excerpt as Berlioz had so poetically conceived it—on an ethereal cord of A major for the distant choir. The effect was enchanting. The Narrator had just sung of the angels who were keeping vigil over the Holy Family as they rested, and their "Hallelujah!" was an exquisite epilogue to the tale.
>
> The excerpt from Berlioz's tripartite oratorio is seldom heard in New York. It is, in the main, delectable music—a little insipid in places, as in the instrumental introduction, where the simplicity of the style is a bit too obviously sought. But there are delicious passages in it—music of a sweet, cool, dreaming loveliness, tenderly primitive, which must astonish those who know Berlioz only as the untamed Romanticist of the "Fantastic Symphony" and "Harold in Italy."

At the same concert of Thursday evening the New Yorkers also heard Debussy's Saraband and Dance shifted from piano to orchestra by Monsieur Ravel—announced and withdrawn by the conductor in Boston last autumn. They are familiar virtuoso-pieces in New York and nobody but Mr. Newman—from London—thought twice about them. He paused to say that these arrangements "take from our understanding of Debussy, but add considerably to our knowledge of Ravel. . . . One of the unfathomable mysteries of modern music is how each composer, using the same instruments as all the others, writes himself so completely upon his scoring that, as Sir Henry Wood has pointed out in an article in Dent's new Dictionary of Music, we can recognize any modern composer, independently of what he is saying, by the mere color-texture of his music. It is perhaps because the scoring of these two dances is so thoroughly Ravel that we feel them to be, in their orchestral form, not quite Debussy. But the scoring is in each case a model of taste and understanding, and the dances give unlimited opportunities for exquisite solo playing—opportunities fully improved last night."

This final saying may prepare the way for three sentences of epilogue from Henderson in The Sun, viz.: "Under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky the orchestra appears to be slowly moving toward a better estate. The old Boston strings of the days of Gericke and Nikisch were famous, and probably we shall not soon hear their like again, but the string tone last evening in the concerto was something to make the heart glad. It was opulent in sonority, and there was a fine muscularity in the bowing."

WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

FEB 3 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT NOTABLE

New Conductor to Feature Russian Numbers

The appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Worcester, Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, for its annual concert, is the outstanding musical event of the season. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, who has created so much enthusiasm in this country, is coming with the orchestra, it being his first appearance in this city. He has made a program for Worcester music lovers that will be enjoyed, it including a Bach concerto in three movements, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor.

There are three novelties on the program, two of which are Russian numbers, and all have been received with much praise everywhere. This is the only orchestra that will visit Worcester this season and it is the best symphony orchestra in the country.

Seats for the concert are on sale at Steinert's.

LEWISTON,
ME.
JOURNAL
FEB 4 1925

Boston Symphony to Return to Portland

It is good news to music-lovers in Lewiston and environs to learn that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual annual concert in Portland City Hall, under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission. The date is March 25.

Serel Koussevitszky, the famous conductor, of the Boston Symphony, who succeeded Monteux this year, has expressed much interest in American composers.

Knowing little of them when he landed in this country in September, he addressed himself at once to the task of studying them, with the promise of including many American compositions on his programs of the winter, a promise to which he seems to have adhered. Among American composers John Alden Carpenter appears to be his favorite, having been well known to him before he crossed the ocean.

Early after Koussevitszky arrived in this country he had the opportunity of hearing Sousa's Band, and showed much interest in the concert given by the famous bandmaster. He likewise attended recitals by Mme. Schumann-Heink and by Roland Hayes, the negro tenor.

One of his early novelty compositions on a Boston Symphony program was Pacific 231, by Nonegger, celebrating a locomotive, which was certainly American enough in theme.

PAPER- American
DATE- Feb 3

Koussevitsky, as Guest of Sohier Hear Mary Garden in Thais

Splendidly Apparelled Maids and Matrons Form Brilliant Coterie at Second Week's Opening Performance by Chicago Opera Company

By Betty Alden

MR. AND MRS. SOHIER WELCH ARE TO have M. Serge Koussevitzky in their Opera box this evening, when all the world of fashion will be out en masse to hear Garden in "Thais."

M. KOUSSEVITSKY has been in Washington with his Symphony players, and from all accounts coming up from our "Great Village Capital" the much lionized new leader of the Symphony and his matchless musicians made a tremendous hit?

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 3 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, 104 pieces, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will give its annual concert in Worcester Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, in Mechanics hall. There was a large advance sale when the public sale opened yesterday. There has been much enthusiasm over the appearance of Koussevitzky everywhere. In addition to a concerto by Bach in three movements, and Tschaikowsky's Fifth symphony in E minor, in four movements, the Worcester program includes three novelties, two of them Russian.

TORONTO, CANADA

FEB 4 1925

There was a variety in the symphonic concerts of the week through the visit of the Boston Symphony and the final concert of Wilhelm Furtwaengler, this latter being a special concert outside of the Philharmonic's regular series. Mr. Furtwaengler, we are assured, will come back again next year and share the season with Wilhelm Mengelberg. Willem Van Hoogstraten also led a final concert this week, being now assistant conductor, to the relief of many who have yawned through his tedious concerts during the past few years.

Mr. Koussevitzky had Roland Hayes, the Negro tenor as his soloist, Mr. Hayes singing an aria from Berlioz' "The Flight into Egypt" and save for a few lapses from pitch, doing it very well. Mr. Hayes' high voice has never been very well placed, but the hauntingly lovely quality of his medium voice, especially in mezza-voce passages, is something seldom equalled. Another feature of the program was an arrangement by Maximilian Steinberg, son-in-law of Rimsky Korsakoff, of Carl Philip Emmanuel Bach. The work is wholly charming and the arranging so well done that the result was one of great beauty and high muical interest as well. Two arrangements by Ravel of dances by Debussy were also very lovely and were well played. The program ended with Tchaikovsky's everlasting Fifth Symphony, played for the fifth time here during a month. The least said about this the soonest mended.

Mr. Furtwaengler achieved his farewell with a program which included the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" as its high spots. Both were very fine in every way. The Strauss number was played with less bombast than we are accustomed to hearing in the delirium, but it was poetic all through, and musicianly and everything else that is agreeable—and unusual in symphony concerts. Mr. Furtwaengler achieved a record in having a sold out house for every one of the nine concerts he gave here.

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

FEB 4 1925

The Boston Symphony orchestra is announced for appearance in Haverhill on Sunday, March 1.

At the Symphony concerts in Boston this week Henry Hadley will be the guest-conductor. As chief item on the program will be his own symphony, "North, South, East, West," which will have its first hearing in Boston. Strauss' "Don Juan" and Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," and a scene from the final act of Wagner's "Tristan" will complete the orchestral list. Madame Matzenauer will sing airs by Beethoven and Mozart.

PAPER- Herald
DATE- Feb 5

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

We are told that Mme. Leginska, whose name has been recently mentioned in the newspapers at least several times, pronounces it with the "g" not soft as in "gin," but hard as in "gout."

⁂

Henry Hadley will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week. He has conducted his own compositions: "The Culprit Fay" and "Lucifer" at these concerts in Boston, but he will now have the whole concert to himself. His program will comprise his Symphony No. 4, "North, East, South and West"—the title might be "Boxing the Compass"—Strauss's "Don Juan" and Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride." Mme. Matzenauer will lift up her voice in Beethoven's "Ah, Perfido!" and the air, "Parto," from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito."

Mr. Hadley wrote his symphony for the Litchfield (Ct.) County Choral Union and the first performance was in the Music Shed on the grounds of Carl Stoeckel's residence at Norfolk, Ct., on June 6, 1911. Mr. Hadley conducted. He wishes it to be understood that "East" does not here refer to New England scenery, climate or character—but to the far east, the Orient. The symphony will be the seventh work of Mr. Hadley's to be performed at these concerts since 1905. The second symphony, "The Four Seasons," was performed in 1905; the third, without a title, in 1908. Mr. Hadley will also conduct the symphony concert in Cambridge.

⁂

And so Mr. Koussevitzky will have a rest for a week. This brings up the question of an associate conductor. It is unquestionably a strain on a man to prepare and conduct the number of concerts now demanded for Boston and the towns outside. Maj. Higginson thought it advisable to give Ernst Schmidt, a violinist in the orchestra, to Dr. Muck as an associate, and so in the season of 1917-18 Mr. Schmidt conducted six pairs of concerts in a perfunctory and dull manner. Mr. Koussevitzky conducts at high pressure. How long will he be able to do his work so brilliantly?

No one wishes to see him suffer physically from his musical intensity. No one would welcome a "sound and safe" associate conductor who would be only a beater of long approved, orthodox tempi. As for the towns outside, the people naturally expect to see Mr. Koussevitzky at the head of the orchestra. They went the whole show. For in these days, the conductor comes first—the orchestra is second—and the poor devil of a composer is a bad third. Sometimes a Stravinsky comes along, and there is curiosity to see him, but as a rule there is less interest in a new work than in what a conductor may contrive to do with, or to, an old one.

Audiences naturally want the best. They do not welcome a substitute for the original leading woman in a play. They go to our Symphony concerts to see Mr. Koussevitzky, to feel his magnetic influence. And audiences are unwilling to spare a man's strength though by pleasing them he wears himself out.

⁂

Next Monday night John Charles Thomas will sing at the extra Symphony concert. He has chosen two favorite arias: "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade," and "Eri tu" from Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera."

CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
POST
FEB 5 1925

FIFTH SYMPHONY FINELY RENDERED

Tschaikowsky Work on Boston Symphony's Program

A feature of the coming appearance in Mechanics Hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. [illegible], of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky of Russia, will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. This was the first symphony of Tchaikovsky in which the composer's countryman was heard in America, when it was the principal number of the Pension Fund concert in Boston, Dec. 14. This performance made nothing less than a magnificent impression as attested to by the Boston newspapers in reviewing the concert.

The Herald said in closing its lengthy criticism: "Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the symphony with studied care, without undue stress of its emotional force, yet effectively, at times thrillingly. The audience listened with an absorption very marked. The applause at the end was overwhelming."

In addition to this symphony the program includes a Bach concerto in three movements, and three novelties, Berlioz's overture to "The Roman Carnival," Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovantchina" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's, "The Flight of the Bumble-bee" from the opera "Tsar Sultan."

Seats are on sale at Steinert's.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 5

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, will make his first appearance in Worcester on the evening of Tuesday, Feb. 17, when the orchestra will give its annual concert. Koussevitzky came from a four years' stay in Paris and London, where he was conductor and guest conductor of the famous symphony orchestras of those cities, and organized what became known as the concerts Koussevitzky.

His success in America, since coming to the Boston Symphony, has been phenomenal. No conductor of recent years has attracted so much attention or created more enthusiasm than this Russian who is the talk of the musical world of America. His Worcester program includes Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. There is a Bach concerto in three movements, three novelties, including the famous "Flight of the Bumble-Bee."

35

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

FEB 2 1925

Furtwaengler in Farewell.

The farewell of Wilhelm Furtwaengler, who conducted the Philharmonic orchestra at a symphony concert at Carnegie hall Friday evening, was made one of the most demonstrative gatherings of music lovers that New York has heard in some time. At the close of the concert the big audience cheered for a full quarter of an hour and cries of "Come back" and "Au revoir" resounded through the hall.

Of the symphony conductors heard during the week Furtwaengler is the most gifted of them all. He has a finer instinct for the music that he directs, he is a greater analyst and has a more complete control over the men. He knew the music so that he conducted the program entirely from memory, a feat rivaled only by Frederick Stock.

The concert was made up the "Surprize" symphony by Haydn, the symphonic poem "Death and Transfiguration," by Strauss, and the Beethoven fifth symphony. He gave a reading of the Haydn that was in the spirit of this earliest of symphonic music. He put into the Strauss poem the dramatic effects intended by the composer, perhaps giving the brasses more tone volume than necessary. The Beethoven symphony was well done.

Of the other conductors, Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with his imaginative force and with his refinement, ranks second. Waghalter of the State Symphony orchestra may be mentioned third as a musician of sterling qualities, though with less of the individual in his interpretations.

Carnegie Hall Sold.

Carnegie hall, the most important music hall of New York, has been sold to Robert E. Simon by the Carnegie estate, but for the next five years the hall and studios in the building will remain undisturbed. Several million dollars are involved in this deal.

The Polish Peasant Symphony orchestra fifty musicians will begin an extensive American tour Feb. 22, with a concert at the Metropolitan Opera house under the direction of Stanislaw Namyslowski. The organization was founded some forty years ago and is made up of shepherds, farm hands, dairymen and others. Polish music will be featured on the programs. S Hurok has arranged for their American tour.

PAPER- [illegible]

DATE- [illegible]

FOR A THIRD TIME MR. KOUSSEVITZKY REVISITS NEW YORK

TWO CONCERTS IN UNFAVORING CIRCUMSTANCE

An Interfering Opera—Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony for the Eighth Time Within a Month—Mr. Hayes as Assisting Artist in a Novel Number—Comment as It Heard and Heeded

THERE is less than usual to record about the visit of the Boston Orchestra to New York last week. In the first place, the major reviewers naturally put by its concert on Saturday afternoon for the revival (after eight years) of "Götterdämmerung" at the Metropolitan Opera House. To the ears of their "second men" and to brief and cautious paragraphs, they left Mr. Koussevitzky busy with the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven; Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor. Ravel's version of M[illegible]'s "Pictures at An Exhibition." As [illegible] minor reviewers confined themselv[illegible]eralities. The conductor's "rea[illegible] the Seventh Symphony was less "[illegible] "temperamental" and "Russian" th[illegible] had anticipated. Ravel's orchestral gar[illegible] for Musorgsky might plausibly have been original dress, "so perfect was the fit." And so onward with little for interest or enlightenment.

In the second place, Mr. Koussevitzky ended the concert of Thursday evening with Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony—music long since odious to the reviewers by excess of repetition. Seven times within the month of January had it been played in New York before the Bostonian conductor undertook it. One or two of the newspaper-men declined point-blank to listen again. More sampled the new version briefly; but wrote with the weariness of satiety. Mr Newman, however, held firm to the end and found something worth the saying, in The Evening Post, about Mr. Koussevitzky's ways and works with the piece:

> Koussevitzky showed us Chaikovsky as he really was. He let him work himself into any paroxysm of terror he liked, and, when his nerve broke and he began to weep, let him weep and pity himself to his heart's content. Was it right or wrong to do so? The answer depends on what view you take of the conductor's functions. If you claim that your own conception of the music is the only possible right one, you will naively declare the other to be wrong. But if you take the view that in music like this—a human document, to use a term that has rather dropped out of fashion, a long chapter of highly emotional self-confession—the conductor is an actor as truly as the player of Hamlet or Œdipus is, you must allow an actor of genius to play the part as he feels it.
>
> It is futile to turn round on him and say that you do not like such a character as he portrays. You do not make it a complaint against the actor who shows Iago as a monster of iniquity that you could not live with such a character as Iago. It is equally irrelevant, æsthetically, to say that you have no sympathy with a character so neurotic as the Chaikovsky whom Koussevitzky shows us in the first two movements of the symphony. If Cézanne paints a crushed tomato in all the rich tints of putrefaction, it is no valid criticism of the painting to say that you don't like tomatoes, anyhow, and least of all when they are rotten. And it is no criticism of such a character as Koussevitzky draws in the early part of the symphony to say that you despise a man so lacking in self-control. Granting the postulate that such a character is conceivable; and that it is in just such music as this that just such a character as that would express itself, the conductor is justified in heightening the lights and deepening the shadows of a soul the very essence of which was the perpetual oscillation between self-terror and self-pity.
>
> It is futile, again, to lay it down dogmatically that the pace of the Finale was "too fast." It would have been too fast for any other reading; but it was not a shade too fast for this. The final Allegro, indeed, not only was justified by but itself justified, all that had gone before. When once the dark obsession that had tortured the man's mind in the earlier movements had been rolled away, it was natural that he should find relief in a dance as mad as this. There was thus nothing capricious or ill-governed in the reading; everything was under the most masterly control. One might or might not agree with it or like it; but it will be some time before anyone who heard it will forget it.

Nor did the conductor have th[illegible] concert of Thursday wholly to hims[illegible] Mr. Roland Hayes, the tenor, was [illegible] artist. "For the first time," ac[illegible] The Sun, "a negro appeared in [illegible] as soloist with a great orche[illegible] a regular series of concerts." [illegible]es sang Liszt's music (arranged f[illegible]estra by Busoni) to Petrarch's On[illegible]undred and Fourth Sonnet and "The [illegible]pose of The Holy Family" out of Berlioz's "Flight Into Egypt." As it proved, these less familiar pieces interested the reviewers much more than did Mr. Koussevitzky's exercises with Chaikovsky. Said Mr. Gilman in The Herald-Tribune, for example:

> Evidently the Boston Symphony Orchestra is on easy street these days, now that Mr. Koussevitzky has demonstrated that he is what the managerial world so happily calls "a box-office riot." We are moved to this cheering conclusion by the fact that the orchestra brought eight women-singers all the way from Boston (regardless of the fortune it costs to travel between the capital of Massachusetts and the capital of the world), only that they might sing ten measures behind the scenes at the close of a number on last evening's program. And those ten measures, in which a chorus of four sopranos and four altos merely sing "Hallelujah! Hallelujah!" as an epilogue to the tenor air of the Narrator in "The Repose of the Holy Family" from Berlioz's "L'Enfance du Christ," are optional. Berlioz says in his score that in the absence of a chorus the tenor may sing the ten bars of the first soprano.
>
> But the lordly Bostonians stooped to no such expedient. They magnificently choose to perform the piece as Berlioz obviously preferred that it should be done. And so, much to the surprise of the audience, who were unwarned by the program, Berlioz's "eight voices of unseen angels" floated out from behind the scenes after Mr. Hayes had finished his solo, and ended the excerpt as Berlioz had so poetically conceived it—on an ethereal cord of A major for the distant choir. The effect was enchanting. The Narrator had just sung of the angels who were keeping vigil over the Holy Family as they rested, and their "Hallelujah!" was an exquisite epilogue to the tale.
>
> The excerpt from Berlioz's tripartite oratorio is seldom heard in New York. It is, in the main, delectable music—a little insipid in places, as in the instrumental introduction, where the simplicity of the style is a bit too obviously sought. But there are delicious passages in it—music of a sweet, cool, dreaming loveliness, tenderly primitive, which must astonish those who know Berlioz only as the untamed Romanticist of the "Fantastic Symphony" and "Harold in Italy."

At the same concert of Thursday evening the New Yorkers also heard Debussy's Saraband and Dance shifted from piano to orchestra by Monsieur Ravel—announced and withdrawn by the conductor in Boston last autumn. They are familiar virtuoso-pieces in New York and nobody but Mr. Newman—from London—thought twice about them. He paused to say that these arrangements "take from our understanding of Debussy; but add considerably to our knowledge of Ravel. . . . One of the unfathomable mysteries of modern music is how each composer, using the same instruments as all the others, writes himself so completely upon his scoring that, as Sir Henry Wood has pointed out in an article in Dent's new Dictionary of Music, we can recognize any modern composer, independently of what he is saying, by the mere color-texture of his music. It is perhaps because the scoring of these two dances is so thoroughly Ravel that we feel them to be, in their orchestral form, not quite Debussy. But the scoring is in each case a model of taste and understanding, and the dances give unlimited opportunities for exquisite solo [illegible]ying—opportunities fully improved last night."

This final saying may prepare the way for three sentences of epilogue from [illegible] Henderson in The Sun, viz.: "Under [illegible] direction of Mr. Koussevitzky the orche[illegible] appears to be slowly moving towar[illegible] better estate. The old Boston string[illegible] the days of Gericke and Nikisch [illegible]re famous, and probably we shall not [illegible]on hear their like again, but the string tone last evening in the concerto was something to make the heart glad. It was opulent in sonority, and there was a fine muscularity in the bowing."

WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

FEB 3 192

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT NOTABLE

New Conductor to Feature Russian Numbers

The appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Worcester, Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, for its annual concert, is the outstanding musical event of the season. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, who has created so much enthusiasm in this country, is coming with the orchestra, it being his first appearance in this city. He has made a program for Worcester music lovers that will be enjoyed, it including a Bach concerto in three movements, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor.

There are three novelties on the program, two of which are Russian numbers, and all have been received with much praise everywhere. This is the only orchestra that will visit Worcester this season and it is the best symphony orchestra in the country.

Seats for the concert are on sale at Steinert's.

LEWISTON,
ME.
JOURNAL

FEB 4 1925

Boston Symphony to Return to Portland

It is good news to music-lovers in Lewiston and environs to learn that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual annual concert in Portland City Hall, under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission. The date is March 25.

Serel Koussevitszky, the famous conductor, of the Boston Symphony, who succeeded Monteux this year, has expressed much interest in American composers.

Knowing little of them when he landed in this country in September, he addressed himself at once to the task of studying them, with the promise of including many American compositions on his programs of the winter, a promise to which he seems to have adhered. Among American composers John Alden Carpenter appears to be his favorite, having been well known to him before he crossed the ocean.

Early after Koussevitszky arrived in this country he had the opportunity of hearing Sousa's Band, and showed much interest in the concert given by the famous bandmaster. He likewise attended recitals by Mme. Schumann-Heink and by Roland Hayes, the negro tenor.

One of his early novelty compositions on a Boston Symphony program was Pacific 231, by Nonegger, celebrating a locomotive, which was certainly American enough in theme.

PAPER- American

DATE- Feb 3

Koussevitsky, as Guest of Sohier Hear Mary Garden in Thais

Splendidly Apparelled Maids and Matrons Form Brilliant Coterie at Second Week's Opening Performance by Chicago Opera Company

By Betty Alden

MR. AND MRS. SOHIER WELCH ARE TO have M. Serge Koussevitsky in their Opera box this evening, when all the world of fashion will be out en masse to hear Garden in "Thais."

M. KOUSSEVITSKY has been in Washington with his Symphony players, and from all accounts coming up from our "Great Village Capital" the much lionized new leader of the Symphony and his matchless musicians made a tremendous hit.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 3 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, 104 pieces, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will give its annual concert in Worcester Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, in Mechanics hall. There was a large advance sale when the public sale opened yesterday. There has been much enthusiasm over the appearance of Koussevitzky everywhere. In addition to a concerto by Bach in three movements, and Tschaikowsky's Fifth symphony in E minor, in four movements, the Worcester program includes three novelties, two of them Russian.

TORONTO, CANADA

FEB 4 1925

There was a variety in the symphonic concerts of the week through the visit of the Boston Symphony and the final concert of Wilhelm Furtwaengler, this latter being a special concert outside of the Philharmonic's regular series. Mr. Furtwaengler, we are assured, will come back again next year and share the season with Wilhelm Mengelberg. Willem Van Hoogstraten also led a final concert this week, being now assistant conductor, to the relief of many who have yawned through his tedious concerts during the past few years.

Mr. Koussevitzky had Roland Hayes, the Negro tenor as his soloist, Mr. Hayes singing an aria from Berlioz' "The Flight into Egypt" and save for a few lapses from pitch, doing it very well. Mr. Hayes' high voice has never been very well placed, but the hauntingly lovely quality of his medium voice, especially in mezza-voce passages, is something seldom equalled. Another feature of the program was an arrangement by Maximilian Steinberg, son-in-law of Rimsky Korsakoff, of Carl Philip Emmanuel Bach. The work is wholly charming and the arranging so well done that the result was one of great beauty and high muical interest as well. Two arrangements by Ravel of dances by Debussy were also very lovely and were well played. The program ended with Tchaikovsky's everlasting Fifth Symphony, played for the fifth time here during a month. The least said about this the soonest mended.

Mr. Furtwaengler achieved his farewell with a program which included the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" as its high spots. Both were very fine in every way. The Strauss number was played with less bombast than we are accustomed to hearing in the delirium, but it was poetic all through, and musicianly and everything else that is agreeable—and unusual in symphony concerts. Mr. Furtwaengler achieved a record in having a sold out house for every one of the nine concerts he gave here.

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

4 1925

The Boston Symphony orchestra is announced for appearance in Haverhill on Sunday, March 1.

At the Symphony concerts in Boston this week Henry Hadley will be the guest-conductor. As chief item on the program will be his own symphony, "North, South, East, West," which will have its first hearing in Boston. Strauss' "Don Juan" and Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," and a scene from the final act of Wagner's "Tristan" will complete the orchestral list. Madame Matzenauer will sing airs by Beethoven and Mozart.

PAPER- Herald

DATE- [illegible]

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

We are told that Mme. Leginska, whose name has been recently mentioned in the newspapers at least several times, pronounces it with the "g" not soft as in "gin," but hard as in "gout."

Henry Hadley will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week. He has conducted his own compositions: "The Culprit Fay" and "Lucifer" at these concerts in Boston, but he will now have the whole concert to himself. His program will comprise his Symphony No. 4, "North, East, South and West"—the title might be "Boxing the Compass"—Strauss's "Don Juan" and Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride." Mme. Matzenauer will lift up her voice in Beethoven's "Ah, Perfido!" and the air, "Parto," from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito."

Mr. Hadley wrote his symphony for the Litchfield (Ct.) County Choral Union and the first performance was in the Music Shed on the grounds of Carl Stoeckel's residence at Norfolk, Ct., on June 6, 1911. Mr. Hadley conducted. He wishes it to be understood that "East" does not here refer to New England scenery, climate or character—but to the far east, the Orient. The symphony will be the seventh work of Mr. Hadley's to be performed at these concerts since 1905. The second symphony, "The Four Seasons," was performed in 1905; the third, without a title, in 1908. Mr. Hadley will also conduct the symphony concert in Cambridge.

And so Mr. Koussevitzky will have a rest for a week. This brings up the question of an associate conductor. It is unquestionably a strain on a man to prepare and conduct the number of concerts now demanded for Boston and the towns outside. Maj. Higginson thought it advisable to give Ernst Schmidt, a violinist in the orchestra, to Dr. Muck as an associate, and so in the season of 1917-18 Mr. Schmidt conducted six pairs of concerts in a perfunctory and dull manner. Mr. Koussevitzky conducts at high pressure. How long will he be able to do his work so brilliantly?

No one wishes to see him suffer physically from his musical intensity. No one would welcome a "sound and safe" associate conductor who would be only a beater of long approved, orthodox tempi. As for the towns outside, the people naturally expect to see Mr. Koussevitzky at the head of the orchestra. They went the whole show. For in these days, the conductor comes first—the orchestra is second—and the poor devil of a composer is a bad third. Sometimes a Stravinsky comes along, and there is curiosity to see him, but as a rule there is less interest in a new work than in what a conductor may contrive to do with, or to, an old one.

Audiences naturally want the best. They do not welcome a substitute for the original leading woman in a play. They go to our Symphony concerts to see Mr. Koussevitzky, to feel his magnetic influence. And audiences are unwilling to spare a man's strength though by pleasing them he wears himself out.

Next Monday night John Charles Thomas will sing at the extra Symphony concert. He has chosen two favorite arias: "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade," and "Eri tu" from Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera."

CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

FEB 5 192

FIFTH SYMPHONY FINELY RENDERED

Tschaikowsky Work on Boston Symphony's Program

A feature of the coming appearance in Mechanics Hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. [illegible], of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky of Russia, will be Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. This was the first symphony of Tchaikowsky in which the composer's countryman was heard in America, when it was the principal number of the Pension Fund concert in Boston, Dec. 14. This performance made nothing less than a magnificent impression as attested to by the Boston newspapers in reviewing the concert.

The Herald said in closing its lengthy criticism: "Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the symphony with studied care, without undue stress of its emotional force, yet effectively, at times thrillingly. The audience listened with an absorption very marked. The applause at the end was overwhelming."

In addition to this symphony the program includes a Bach concerto in three movements, and three novelties, Berlioz's overture to "The Roman Carnival," Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble-bee" from the opera "Tsar Sultan."

Seats are on sale at Steinert's.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 5

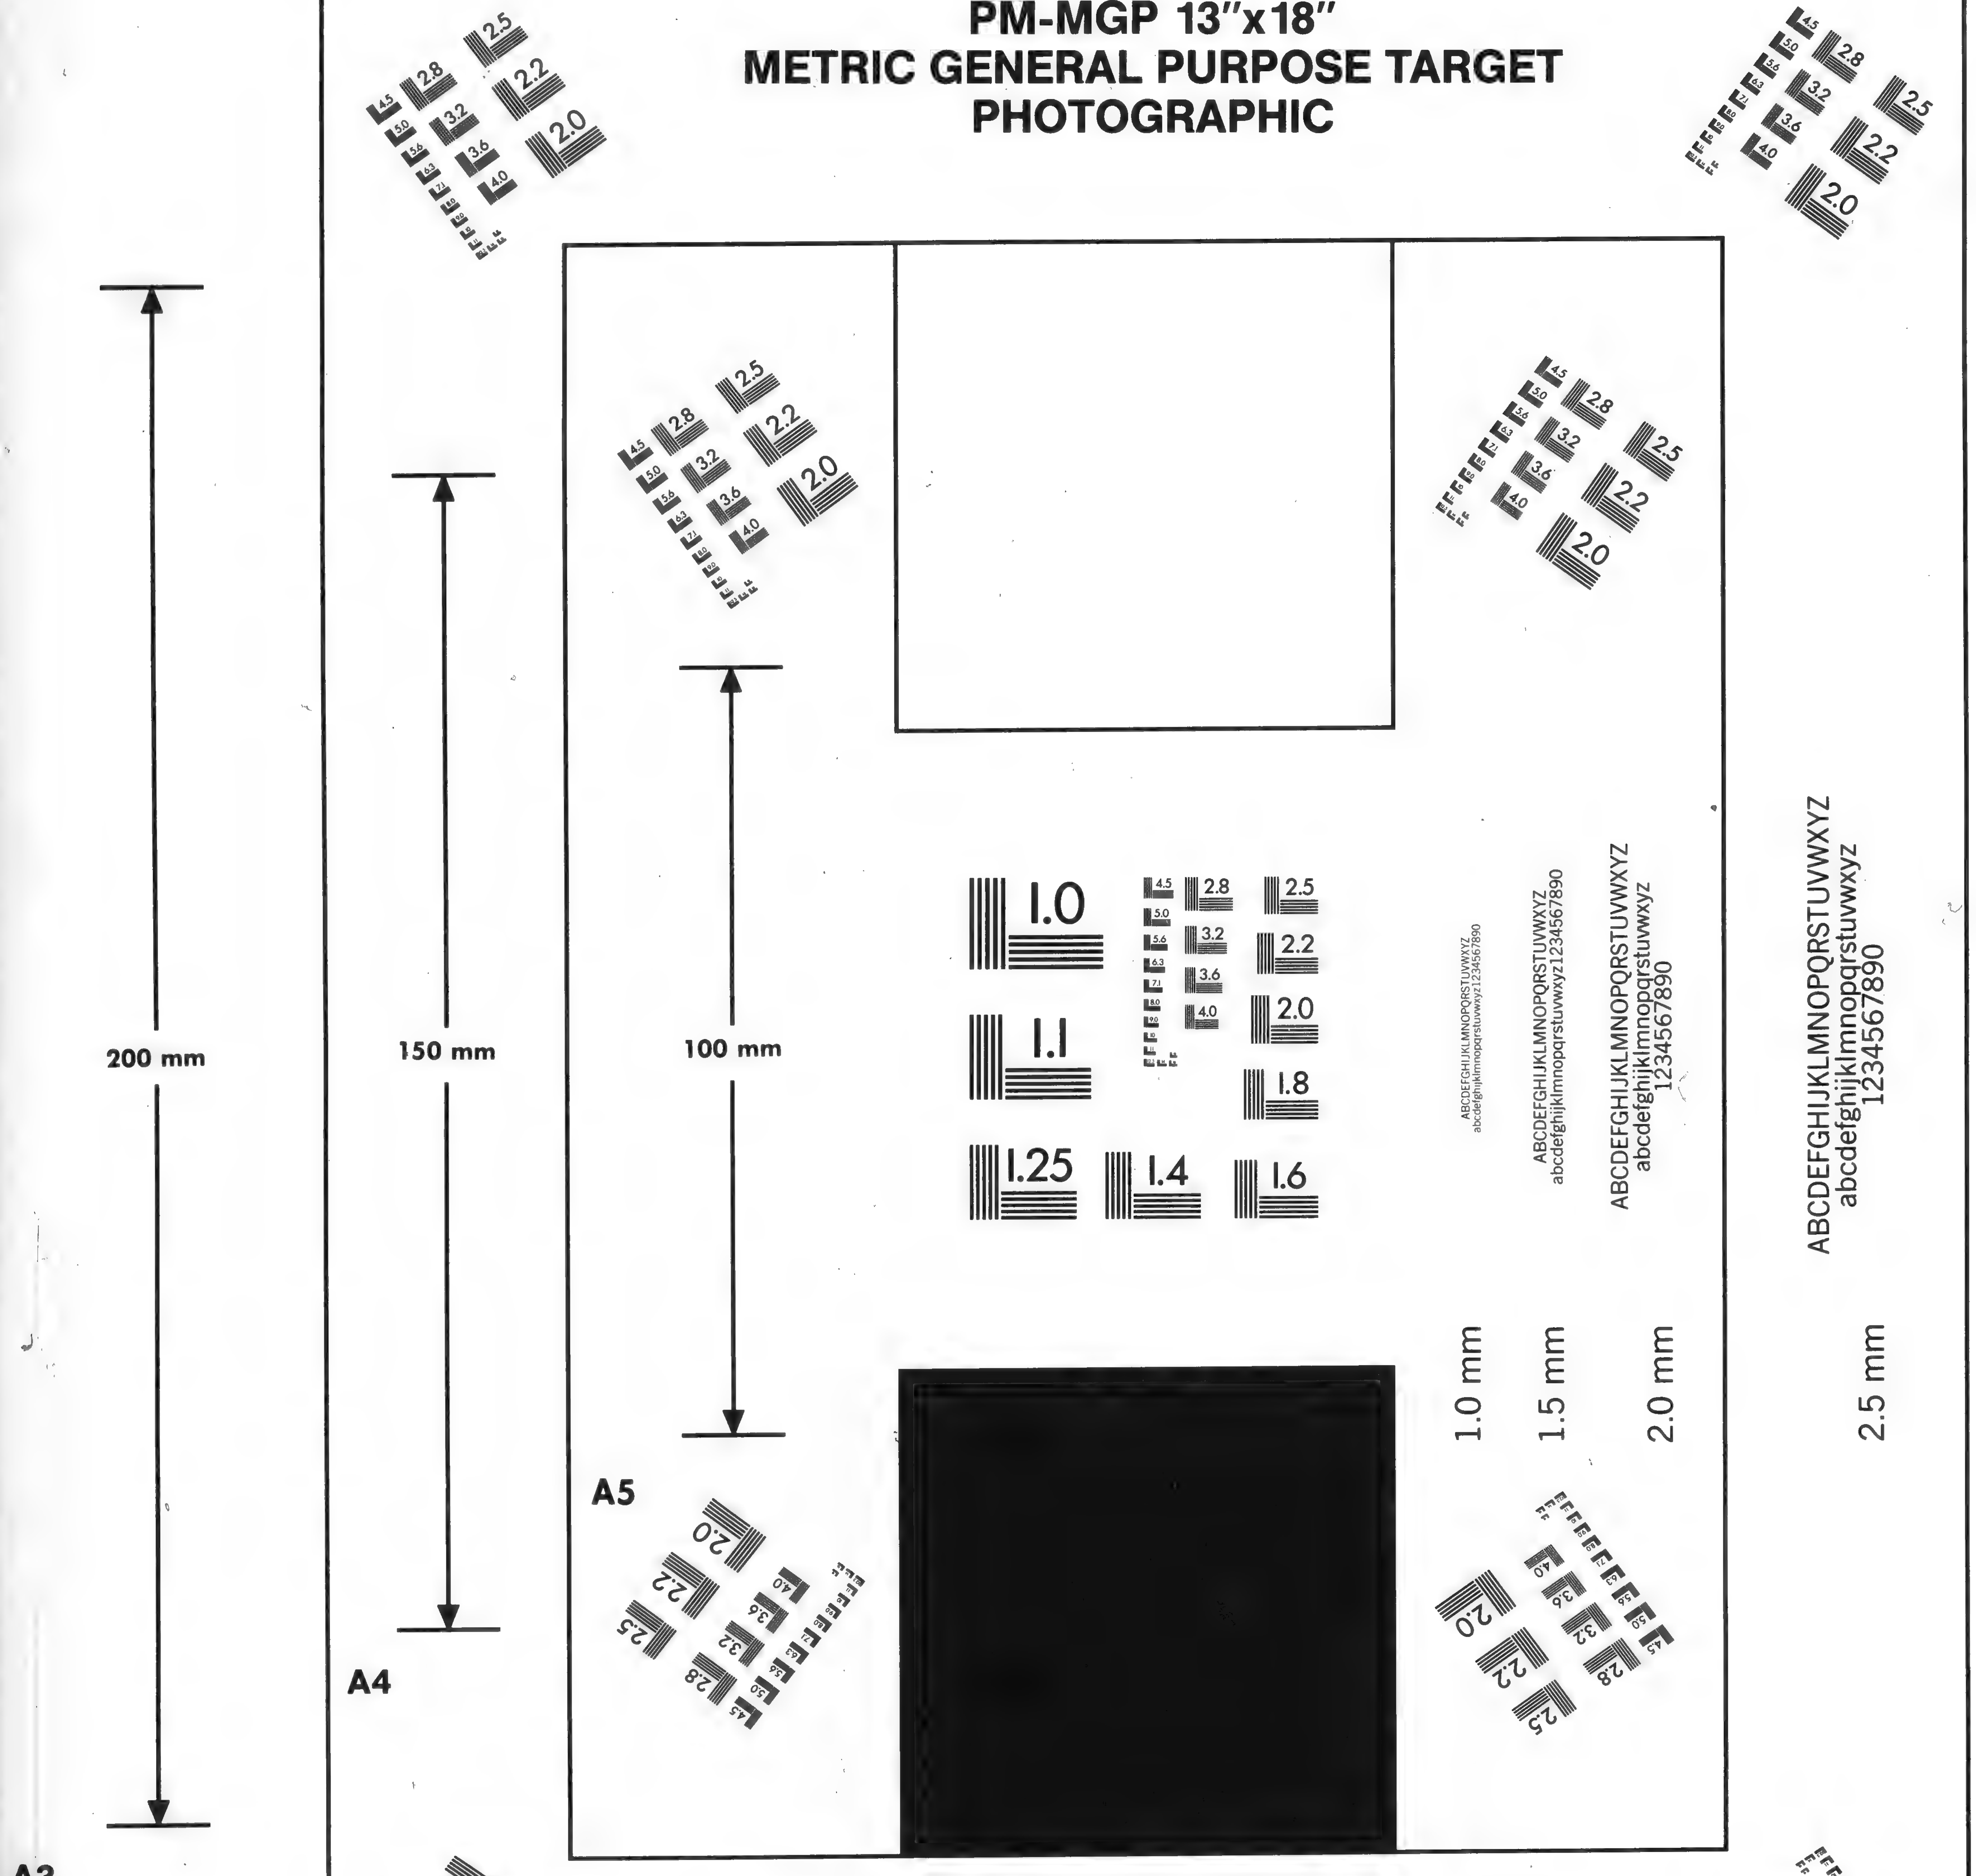
BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will make his first appearance in Worcester on the evening of Tuesday, Feb. 17, when the orchestra will give its annual concert. Koussevitzky came from a four years' stay in Paris and London, where he was conductor and guest conductor of the famous symphony orchestras of those cities, and organized what became known as the concerts Koussevitzky.

His success in America, since coming to the Boston Symphony, has been phenomenal. No conductor of recent years has attracted so much attention or created more enthusiasm than this Russian who is the talk of the musical world of America. His Worcester program includes Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. There is a Bach concerto in three movements, three novelties, including the famous "Flight of the Bumble-Bee."

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

36

'IIS CLIPPING FROM BROCKTON,
MASS.
ENTERPRISE
FEB 5 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA FORCED TO CUT OUT BROCKTON

Management Says It Cannot Obtain Suitable Place for Concert at Satisfactory Price--- First Booked for City Theatre But Full Quota of Sunday Programmes Allowed Under Lease Has Been Filled.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will not appear in Brockton this season, it has been announced definitely, this city having been erased from the itinerary. Failure to secure a suitable place in which to hold the concert at a figure satisfactory to all concerned, is the assigned reason.

After the orchestra had visited Brockton for its annual concert last January, it promptly was booked for 1925 at the City Theatre. It since has developed that it is impossible to grant the orchestra the use of the theatre by reason of the fact that the full quota of Sunday concerts allowed Messrs. Casey & Hayden, lessees of the theatre previously had been filled.

Regrets Are Expressed.

That it is a merely regrettable circumstance and reflects no criticism on either the lessees or the orchestra management, is obvious. Manager W. H. Judd said Wednesday that he and his associates had enjoyed their annual visit to Brockton and had looked forward to this one.

"But we are not coming this year because we cannot get the theatre or any other at a price satisfactory to both parties concerned," he explained. "We had the theatr but we haven't it now," he added.

Manager James J. Hayden, who expressed his regret at the turn of affairs and who has explained matters carefully to Mr. Judd, said, "I am allowed only three Sunday concerts by my lease. These had all been booked when it was discovered that the Symphony orchestra had planned to come again this year."

PAPER— Transcript
DATE— Feb 6

Four Corners of the Heavens

Last November Mr. Henry Hadley, associate conductor of the Philharmonic Society of New York, visited Boston and led the People's Orchestra through his own h-spirited first symphony. Last evening at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, he conducted Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra in the first of its three concerts for the week. This time, as well, as much interest was expressed in his own contribution to the program as in his orchestral leadership. That contribution was the last of his four symphonies in D minor: "North, East, South and West." It was written for the Norfolk, Connecticut, Festival and first performed in that town in 1911, about fourteen years after the initial performance of "Youth and Life." The fourth symphony is interesting. There is much to be said in its favor. It stood second on the program (after Smetana's "Bartered Bride") and enjoyed thus the position of especial favor, where instruments are warmed, whetted and underweigh. Seriously, and with a certain rude intensity, as Mr. Hadley looks at all his conducting, he interpreted his pages in the spirit of scholarship and produced very clear, precise and mildly inspired music.

For Mr. Hadley's Fourth Symphony is not colossal nor even monumental. It is melodic, firm, enjoyable. In comparison with Strauss and Wagner, who followed on its American heels, it is utterly transparent, structurally a skeleton, perfectly articulate. Not exactly program music, it tends to be, let us say, representational. No given idea is purely incidental. The effect of a movement is always strictly cumulative. The first movement, for example, "North." Here the opening chords with full brass announce something like waste, desolation, fields of snow. The two themes that follow, delightfully set and punctuated by a wary little three-note figure for basses and (later) woodwind, spell appreciable polar calm; following that, a tempest and, in Mr. Hadley's words, "the usual recapitulation." The second movement, "East," shelters rather obvious orientalisms in a calyx of rhythm It is chiefly memorable for the melancholy ingredient supplied by Mr. Longy's oboe, and Mr. Laurent's delicate flute passage over muted horns and strings. The alleged "restless energy" of the third and "South" movement springs from a conclave of assorted rhythms. The themes engaged here are reminiscent of good musical comedy matter. It was written too early to enjoy the piquancy of representative jazz. Even so, some Gershwin might lace it up in modern style for Mr. Lopez or Mr. Whiteman. It is ideally germane and indigenous.

On our western watershed Mr. Hadley found his material heroic, frontier-spirited, and epic. A glint of gun-metal, a black quartz arrowhead. This is his best music, spontaneous, energetic, vigorous. It carried a native freshness about it that an Easterner habitually associates with the West. Mr. Hardley, in his sudden, impulsive way, jumped to his toes at frequent intervals to summon brilliant sonorities.

Continued on Last Page

ticularly successful crescendos, and certain well-balanced antiphonal effects between sopranos and tenors. All these, small faults amid much excellence.

More serious is the lack of flexfbility in rhythm. The full illusion of Russian church music can hardly be secured without such flexibility. For it, as for much secular music of these composers, strict measures of Western music should yield to the free rhythm of the text. Full of pitfalls, this, for any conductor, but indispensable for full unfolding of the Russians.

A. H. M.

Incidents and Prospects

For the while, the "unified program" has laid hold upon Mr. Koussevitzky, as it once obsessed Dr. Muck. Not long ago Beethoven filled a pair of concerts; then Stravinsky; while now it is the turn of the elder Parisians. That is to say, for the Symphony Concerts of [illegible] Friday afternoon a[illegible] the conductor has de[illegible] program. The Director of the Conse[illegible] Monsieur Rábaud, begins it with "La Procession Nocturne." Monsieur Roussel continues it with an occasional piece, "Pour une Fête de Printemps," as yet unheard in Boston. Monsieur Dukas has next place with his poem of the dance, "The Peri"; while, to conclude, Monsieur d'Indy will be heard through the lengths and breadths of his Second Symphony.

Am[illegible]
[illegible] 7

SOMERVILLE MAN LEADS SYMPHONY IN CONCERT

The Symphony Orchestra, after being away for a week on a Southern trip, gave its fourteenth concert, with Henry Hadley as guest conductor. Mr. Hadley, who is associate conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and a composer of note, being a native of Somerville, chose as the first number on his program his own Symphony, "North, East, South and West," which never before had been heard in Boston.

Mr. Hadley's work is well-made and is interesting in that it attempts to suggest by music the outstanding character of the sections of the United States.

The soloist, Margaret Matzenauer, who sang music of Beethoven and Mozart, made one wish that her beautiful voice could have been heard with the Chicago company.

PAPER— Monitor
DATE— Feb 6

The Boston Symphony Plays in Philadelphia

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 27—(Special Correspondence)—Serge Koussevitzky himself, at the head of the rejuvenated Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared at the Academy of Music tonight before a Philadelphia Forum audience that filled the building to the last seat. He scored a great popular success for himself and for the orchestra in a program which contained but a single one of the works for which he is most famous although this program did demand four different styles of interpretation and conducting. It consisted of a "Concerto" for orchestra by Carl Phillipp Emanuel Bach, arranged by Maxmilian Steinberg, the Berlioz "Roman Carnival," two of the Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Fêtes" and the Beethoven symphony in A major (No. 7).

Of these numbers, Mr. Koussevitzky was at his best in the "Fêtes" of Debussy, of which he gave a superb reading, the little march in the middle section being beautifully taken as to tempo and the mood of the whole movement being in accord with the intention of the composer as set forth in the score. The "Nuages" seemed to be a bit gray and heavy in parts of the orchestral coloring, although there were many lovely spots in it.

Bach was taken in the strictly classic style in which the composition was conceived and, while it is not a great piece of music, it served admirably to open the program, give the conductor and the members of the orchestra a chance to hear the acoustics of the hall when filled and to show Mr. Koussevitzky's versatility as a conductor in a severely classic number when he has made his great reputation largely as the exponent of the ultramodern.

The Berlioz "Carneval Romain" was beautifully read, although there seemed here and there to be places in which the orchestra did not altogether realize the ideals of the conductor. The close of the work was very effective albeit a bit theatrical.

The symphony was interpreted generally in accordance with the traditional manner, although there was no lack of orginial touches in the reading. The last movement was taken at a terrific tempo and with a verve which closed the concert in a blaze of glory.

As a conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky is first of all an intense individualist. He apparently will not hesitate to change tempi or nuance as suits him to do, provided the effect gained thereby is what he desires. But at the same time, musical conviction and sincerity are shown in every element of his leadership. Such changes as he makes are evidently for the purpose of reading the great masterpieces of the musical past in accordance with the ideals of the present and not for the sake of change itself or for any mere tonal or emotional effect. Next, stands out the tremendous vitality of the man, an intense personality, and the self-evident fact that in his conducing he gives of himself even more than he demands from the members of the orchestra—and that is a lot.

At the same time, some of the work last evening was uneven. He would rise to tremendous heights in one passage and in another would not seem to be able to take the orchestra with him in all that he was trying to accomplish. How much of this is due to the orchestra itself and how much to the conuctor can be said only by those who have heard many concerts of the organization under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction. But his technique as a conductor is gigantic.

As to the orchestra it can be said only that Mr. Koussevitzky is working with an organization which does not by any means approach the old Boston Symphony. Yet, judging partly from indications and partly from specific results as shown in last evening's playing, the Boston Symphony is again very much to the fore among the great orchestras of the United States.

Transcript
Feb 7

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

There will be three Boston Symphony concerts next week in Symphony hall—the third of the Monday evening series and the 15th pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. John Charles Thomas will be the Monday soloist, singing arias of Massenet and Verdi. Serge Koussevitzky will also be heard in Stravinsky's Suite from the "Fire-Bird," Glinka's Overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla" and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major.

The program for the 15th pair of concerts will include the following works of contemporary French composers: "La Procession Nocturne" of Rabaud, Roussel's "Pour une Fete de Pr[illegible]

Herald Feb 7

PAGE FIVE

SYMPHONY GIVES 14TH CONCERT

Henry Hadley of New York Philharmonic Conducts by Invitation

PUTS ON OWN WORK NEVER HEARD HERE

By PHILIP HALE

Henry Hadley, associate conductor of the New York Philharmonic Society conducted, as a guest, yesterday afternoon the 14th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program was as follows: Hadley, Symphony, No. 4 D minor, "North, East, South and West" (first time in Boston); Beethoven "Ah, perfido!" (Mme. Matzenauer) Strauss, "Don Juan"; Mozart, "Parto" from "La Clemenza di Tito" (Mme. Matzenauer); Smetana, Overture to "The Sold Bride."

Mr. Koussevitzky, we hear, urged Mr. Hadley to conduct one of his own works surely a courteous act on Mr. Koussevitzky's part. Seven of Mr. Hadley's compositions, including two symphonies, had been played at these concerts during the last 19 years. He chose for performance yesterday the symphony that he composed for the festival of the Litchfield County (Ct.) Union in 1911. One might easily infer from the title of the work what Mr. Hadley has taken pains to say in his notes contributed to the program book; that the music suggests "the frozen North, the Far East, Southern negro ragtime rhythms and the spirit of the West of our Pacific coast." He was anxious that no one, hearing the second movement should think of New England as the "East" and try to find in the music the Puritan spirit, possibly a Salem witchcraft episode, colonial psalmody or the suggestion of east wind, codfish and twanging speech. No, Mr. Hadley's "East" should be the Orient of waving palms, camels, dancing girls languorous, voluptuous strains of music in strange modes, not to mention dates narghiles, afrites and geneii.

As a composer Mr. Hadley has facility, fluency, a knowledge of instrumental resources. In a word he has orchestral technic in considerable measure. He can write suave or impetuous themes and develop them with assurance and with euphonious or tempestuous results. What one misses in this symphony as in other works of his are motives with a decided profile pregnant thematic material revealing individuality, and individuality in the treatment of the material. This does not mean that he is not capable of often writing agreeable music or music that quickens the pulse—for the moment. Yesterday the audience enjoyed with good reason certain pages of the second movement, pages of an exotic nature the rhythmic gaiety of the scherzo and the pages in the finale that were especially characteristic of North American Indian music as we have been taught to recognize it by ethnologists who have devoted themselves laboriously to this branch of their industry.

As a conductor Mr. Hadley has authoritative control of the orchestra. He knows what he wishes as an interpreter and suceeds in obtaining it. He insists on rhythmic values; on the singing of lyric measures. He is spirited, enthusiastic. What he wished yesterday and what he did not wish to obtain from the players might be subjects for academic discussion. In "Don Juan" he seemed more insistent on showing the hero's strenuous, robust nature than caring for delicate nuances or fine poetic expression, except in the section with the love song for the oboe, which was beautifully played by Mr. Longy.

The orchestra was heartily responsive to Mr. Hadley's wishes. He was recalled by the applausive audience several times.

Mme. Matzenauer sang the dramatic recitative, "Ah, perfido," and the lyric measures of the two arias with incomparable beauty of tone, surpassing vocal skill and deep and contagious emotion. Nor in the florid measures at the end of Mozart's aria was she found wanting. The greater part of "Ah, perfido" is uninspired and boresome. We have read that Beethoven himself did not care greatly for this score with aria and thought it unsuitable for the concert hall. Mr. Hadley's orchestral accompaniment was sympathetic and supporting.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week—Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct— is as follows: Rabaud, "Nocturnal Procession"; Roussel, "For a Spring Festival"; Dukas, "The Peri"—Dance Poem; and d'Indy's Symphony No. 2, B flat major.

CINCINNATTI, OHIO
BILLBOARD
FEB 7 1925

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third concert of the Carnegie Hall series the evening of January 29. The reading given the Bach Concerto was one of much beauty, particularly in the Second movement and again in a Ravel arrangement of a dance by Debussy the Boston musicians delighted the huge audience. Roland Hayes, tenor, even tho the Liszt and Berlioz numbers were not well suited to his voice, delighted his hearers and was recalled time and time again to acknowledge the tremendous applause.

SYMPHONY BY HADLEY PERFORMED

Post Feb 7

Composer Conducts--- Mme. Matzenauer Soloist

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra, not from the conductor's stand, but from a seat in the first balcony of Symphony Hall, while the actual directing of the band fell to Henry Hadley, who, at Mr. Koussevitzky's invitation, conducted his own Fourth Symphony, and the remainder of the programme besides.

SKILLFULLY INSTRUMENTED

Heard here for the first time, Mr. Hadley's Symphony, which bears the title "North, East, South and West," disclosed a mastery of construction and the facile and skilful handling of the instruments that characterize all of this composer's orchestral pieces. In Mr. Hadley's own words, as quoted in the programme book: "This Symphony is a musical portrayal of moods suggesting, first, the frozen North; second, the Far East; third, our own Southern, darky ragtime rhythms; and fourth, the spirit of the West of our Pacific Coast."

Of the four movements the breezy and blustering Finale seemed at one hearing the most worth while. Mr. Hadley's Orient is strangely lacking in exotic feeling, and the Scherzo, though diverting to hear, seemed little more than a pleasant trifle inflated to symphonic proportions.

Cordially Received

Mr. Hadley conducted his music with familiar energy and animation. At the end he was enthusiastically applauded and recalled repeatedly, until finally he brought the men of the orchestra to their feet to share the plaudits.

For other orchestral numbers Mr. Hadley's programme offered Strauss' "Don Juan," which yesterday was conducted and played with more vigor than imagination, and Smetana's sparkling, chattering Overture to "The Bartered Bride," which received a brilliant if at times over-boisterous performance.

Her Choice Not Happy

Soloists have been the exception, not the rule, at the Symphony Concerts this season, but that of yesterday brought Mme. Matzenauer who, in her best vocal estate, pleased the audience through her performance of Beethoven's "Ah! Perfido" and the air, "Parto, Parto," from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito."

Although her singing was marked by conspicuous artistry and by exceeding beauty of tone, Mme. Matzenauer's choice of pieces seemed not altogether happy. Like Homer, Beethoven occasionally nodded, and this "Ah! Perfido" is clearly music perpetuated less by its intrinsic worth than by the name and fame of its composer. Even Mme. Matzenauer could not redeem its essential emptiness.

And charming though it is, the air of Mozart was too nearly in the same style and vein. Surely a piece of later origin would have made more effective contrast.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 7 1925

Boston Symphony

The Boston symphony orchestra, 10 pieces, with its remarkable conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is coming to Worcester, Tuesday evening, Feb 17, to give a concert in Mechanics hall. This is the only orchestra which will be heard in Worcester this season and it is unquestionably the best. Worcester has a strong liking for this Boston musical organization and the coming concert has the added charm of giving the music lovers a chance to see for the first time the new conductor, who has made so many friends in the musical world since coming to this country last fall. He has been the musical sensation of the cities during the winter, and the New York critics have hailed him as one of the best of all the conductors of all time. Seats for the concert are on sale at Steinert's.

HIS CLIPPING FROM

36 BROCKTON,
MASS.
ENTERPRISE
FEB 5 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA FORCED TO CUT OUT BROCKTON

Management Says It Cannot Obtain Suitable Place for Concert at Satisfactory Price--- First Booked for City Theatre But Full Quota of Sunday Programmes Allowed Under Lease Has Been Filled.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will not appear in Brockton this season, it has been announced definitely, this city having been erased from the itinerary. Failure to secure a suitable place in which to hold the concert at a figure satisfactory to all concerned, is the assigned reason.

After the orchestra had visited Brockton for its annual concert last January, it promptly was booked for 1925 at the City Theatre. It since has developed that it is impossible to grant the orchestra the use of the theatre by reason of the fact that the full quota of Sunday concerts allowed Messrs. Casey & Hayden, lessees of the theatre previously had been filled.

Regrets Are Expressed.

That it is a merely regrettable circumstance and reflects no criticism on either the lessees or the orchestra management, is obvious. Manager W. H. Judd said Wednesday that he and his associates had enjoyed their annual visit to Brockton and had looked forward to this one.

"But we are not coming this year because we cannot get the theatre or any other at a price satisfactory to both parties concerned," he plained. "We had the theatr but we haven't it now," he added.

Manager James J. Hayden, who expressed his regret at the turn of affairs and who has explained matters carefully to Mr. Judd, said, "I am lowed only three Sunday concert by my lease. These had all been booked when it was discovered that the Symphony orchestra had planned to come again this year."

PAPER- Tran
DATE- Feb 6

Four Corners of the Heavens

Last November Mr. Hadley, associate conductor of the Philharmonic Society of New York, visited Boston and led the People's Orchestra through his own h-spirited first symphony. Last evening at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, he ducted Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra in the first of its three concerts for the week. This time, as well, as much interest was expressed in his own contribution to the program as in his orchestral leadership. That contribution was the last of his four symphonies in D minor: "North, East, South and West." It was written for the Norfolk, Connecticut, Festival and first performed in that town in 1911, about fourteen years after the initial performance of "Youth and Life." The fourth symphony is interesting. There is much to be said in its favor. It stood second on the program (after Smetana's "Bartered Bride") and enjoyed thus the position of especial favor, where instruments are warmed, whetted and underweigh. Seriously, and with a certain rude intensity, as Mr. Hadley looks at all his conducting, he interpreted his pages in the spirit of scholarship and produced very clear, precise and mildly inspired music.

For Mr. Hadley's Fourth Symphony is not colossal nor even monumental. It is melodic, firm, enjoyable. In comparison with Strauss and Wagner, who followed on its American heels, it is utterly transparent, structurally a skeleton, perfectly articulate. Not exactly program music, it tends to be, let us say, representational. No given idea is purely incidental. The effect of a movement is always strictly cumulative. The first movement, for example, "North." Here the opening chords with full brass announce something like waste, desolation, fields of snow. The two themes that follow, delightfully set and punctuated by a wary little three-note figure for basses and (later) woodwind, spell appreciable polar calm; following that, a tempest and, in Mr. Hadley's words, "the usual recapitulation." The second movement, "East," shelters rather obvious orientalisms in a calyx of rhythm It is chiefly memorable for the melancholy ingredient supplied by Mr. Longy's oboe, and Mr. Laurent's delicate flute passage over muted horns and strings. The alleged "restless energy" of the third and "South" movement springs from a conclave of assorted rhythms. The themes engaged here are reminiscent of good musical comedy matter. It was written too early to enjoy the piquancy of representative jazz. Even so, some Gershwin might lace it up in modern style for Mr. Lopez or Mr. Whiteman. It is ideally germane and indigenous.

On our western watershed Mr. Hadley found his material heroic, frontier-spirited, and epic. A glint of gun-metal, a black quartz arrowhead. This is his best music, spontaneous, energetic, igorous. It carried a native freshness about it that an Easterner habitually associates with the West. Mr. Hadley, in his sudden, impulsive way, jumped to his toes at frequent intervals to summon brilliant sonorities.

Continued on Last Page

---

ticularly successful crescendos, and certain well-balanced antiphonal effects between sopranos and tenors. All these, small faults amid much excellence.

More serious is the lack of flexibility in rhythm. The full illusion of Russian church music can hardly be secured without such flexibility. For it, as for much secular music of these composers, strict measures of Western music should yield to the free rhythm of the text. Full of pitfalls, this, for any conductor, but indispensable for full unfolding of the Russians.

A. H. M.

Incidents and Prospects

For the while, the "unified program" has laid hold upon Mr. Koussevitzky, as it once obsessed Dr. Muck. Not long ago Beethoven filled a pair of concerts; then Stravinsky; while now it is the turn of the elder Parisians. That is to say, for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon a [illegible] the conductor has de[illegible]ogram. The Director of the Conse[illegible] Monsieur Rabaud, begins it with "La Procession Nocturne." Monsieur Roussel continues it with an occasional piece, "Pour une Fête de Printemps," as yet unheard in Boston. Monsieur Dukas has next place with his poem of the dance, "The Peri"; while, to conclude, Monsieur d'Indy will be heard through the lengths and breadths of his Second Symphony.

SOMERVILLE MAN LEADS SYMPHONY IN CONCERT

The Symphony Orchestra, after being away for a week on a Southern trip, gave its fourteenth concert, with Henry Hadley as guest conductor. Mr. Hadley, who is associate conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and a composer of note, being a native of Somerville, chose as the first number on his program his own Symphony, "North, East, South and West," which never before had been heard in Boston.

Mr. Hadley's work is well-made and is interesting in that it attempts to suggest by music the outstanding character of the sections of the United States.

The soloist, Margaret Matzenauer, who sang music of Beethoven and Mozart, made one wish that her beautiful voice could have been heard with the Chicago company.

Newman wrote not long

PAPER- Monitor
DATE- Feb 6

The Boston Symphony Plays in Philadelphia

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 27—(Special Correspondence)—Serge Koussevitzky himself, at the head of the rejuvenated Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared at the Academy of Music tonight before a Philadelphia Forum audience that filled the building to the last seat. He scored a great popular success for himself and for the orchestra in a program which contained but a single one of the works for which he is most famous although this program did demand four different styles of interpretation and conducting. It consisted of a "Concerto" for orchestra by Carl Phillipp Emanuel Bach, arranged by Maxmilian Steinberg, the Berlioz "Roman Carnival," two of the Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Fêtes" and the Beethoven symphony in A major (No. 7).

Of these numbers, Mr. Koussevitzky was at his best in the "Fêtes" of Debussy, of which he gave a superb reading, the little march in the middle section being beautifully taken as to tempo and the mood of the whole movement being in accord with the intention of the composer as set forth in the score. The "Nuages" seemed to be a bit gray and heavy in parts of the orchestral coloring, although there were many lovely spots in it.

Bach was taken in the strictly classic style in which the composition was conceived and, while it is not a great piece of music, it served admirably to open the program, give the conductor and the members of the orchestra a chance to hear the acoustics of the hall when filled and to show Mr. Koussevitzky's versatility as a conductor in a severely classic number when he has made his great reputation largely as the exponent of the ultramodern.

The Berlioz "Carneval Romain" was beautifully read, although there seemed here and there to be places in which the orchestra did not altogether realize the ideals of the conductor. The close of the work was very effective albeit a bit theatrical.

The symphony was interpreted generally in accordance with the traditional manner, although there was no lack of orginial touches in the reading. The last movement was taken at a terrific tempo and with a verve which closed the concert in a blaze of glory.

As a conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky is first of all an intense individualist. He apparently will not hesitate to change tempi or nuance as suits him to do, provided the effect gained thereby is what he desires. But at the same time, musical conviction and sincerity are shown in every element of his leadership. Such changes as he makes are evidently for the purpose of reading the great masterpieces of the musical past in accordance with the ideals of the present and not for the sake of change itself or for any mere tonal or emotional effect. Next, stands out the tremendous vitality of the man, an intense personality, and the self-evident fact that in his conducing he gives of himself even more than he demands from the members of the orchestra—and that is a lot.

At the same time, some of the work last evening was uneven. He would rise to tremendous heights in one passage and in another would not seem to be able to take the orchestra with him in all that he was trying to accomplish. How much of this is due to the orchestra itself and how much to the conuctor can be said only by those who have heard many concerts of the organization under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction. But his technique as a conductor is gigantic.

As to the orchestra it can be said only that Mr. Koussevitzky is working with an organization which does not by any means approach the old Boston Symphony. Yet, judging partly from indications and partly from specific results as shown in last evening's playing, the Boston Symphony is again very much to the fore among the great orchestras of the United States.

Transcr

Feb 7

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

There will be three Boston Symphony concerts next week in Symphony hall—the third of the Monday evening series and the 15th pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. John Charles Thomas will be the Monday soloist, singing arias of Massenet and Verdi. Serge Koussevitzky will also be heard in Stravinsky's Suite from the "Fire-Bird," Glinka's Overture to "Ruszlan and Ludmilla" and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major.

The program for the 15th pair of concerts will include the following works of contemporary French composers: "La Procession Nocturne" of Rabaud, Roussel's "Pour une Fete de Pr

---

Herald Feb 7

PAGE FIVE

SYMPHONY GIVES 14TH CONCERT

Henry Hadley of New York Philharmonic Conducts by Invitation

PUTS ON OWN WORK NEVER HEARD HERE

By PHILIP HALE

Henry Hadley, associate conductor of the New York Philharmonic Society conducted, as a guest, yesterday afternoon the 14th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program was as follows: Hadley, Symphony, No. 4 D minor, "North, East, South and West" (first time in Boston); Beethoven "Ah, perfido!" (Mme. Matzenauer) Strauss, "Don Juan"; Mozart, "Parto" from "La Clemenza di Tito" (Mme Matzenauer); Smetana, Overture to "The Sold Bride."

Mr. Koussevitzky, we hear, urged Mr Hadley to conduct one of his own works surely a courteous act on Mr. Koussevitzky's part. Seven of Mr. Hadley's compositions, including two symphonies had been played at these concerts during the last 19 years. He chose for performance yesterday the symphony that he composed for the festival of the Litchfield County (Ct.) Union in 1911 One might easily infer from the title of the work what Mr. Hadley has taken pains to say in his notes contributed to the program book; that the music suggests "the frozen North, the Far East, Southern negro ragtime rhythms and the spirit of the West of our Pacific coast." He was anxious that no one, hearing the second movement should think of New England as the "East" and try to find in the music the Puritan spirit, possibly a Salem witchcraft episode, colonial psalmody or the suggestion of east wind, codfish and twanging speech. No, Mr. Hadley's "East" should be the Orient of waving palms, camels, dancing girls languorous, voluptuous strains of music in strange modes, not to mention dates narghiles, afrites and geneii.

As a composer Mr. Hadley has facility, fluency, a knowledge of instrumental resources. In a word he has orchestral technic in considerable measure. He can write suave or impetuous themes and develop them with assurance and with euphonious or tempestuous results. What one misses in this symphony as in other works of his are motives with a decided profile pregnant thematic material revealing individuality, and individuality in the treatment of the material. This does not mean that he is not capable of often writing agreeable music or music that quickens the pulse—for the moment Yesterday the audience enjoyed with good reason certain pages of the second movement, pages of an exotic nature the rhythmic gaiety of the scherzo and the pages in the finale that were especially characteristic of North American Indian music as we have been taught to recognize it by ethnologists who have devoted themselves laboriously to this branch of their industry.

As a conductor Mr. Hadley has authoritative control of the orchestra. He knows what he wishes as an interpreter and suceeds in obtaining it. He insists on rhythmic values; on the singing of lyric measures. He is spirited, enthusiastic. What he wished yesterday and what he did not wish to obtain from the players might be subjects for academic discussion. In "Don Juan" he seemed more insistent on showing the hero's strenuous, robust nature than caring for delicate nuances or fine poetic expression, except in the section with the love song for the oboe, which was beautifully played by Mr. Longy.

The orchestra was heartily responsive to Mr. Hadley's wishes. He was recalled by the applausive audience several times.

Mme. Matzenauer sang the dramatic recitative, "Ah, perfido," and the lyric measures of the two arias with incomparable beauty of tone, surpassing vocal skill and deep and contagious emotion. Nor in the florid measures at the end of Mozart's aria was she found wanting. The greater part of "Ah, perfido" is uninspired and boresome. We have read that Beethoven himself did not care greatly for this score with aria and thought it unsuitable for the concert hall. Mr. Hadley's orchestral accompaniment was sympathetic and supporting.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week—Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct— is as follows: Rabaud, "Nocturnal Procession"; Roussel, "For a Spring Festival"; Dukas, "The Peri"—Dance Poem; and d'Indy's Symphony No. 2, B flat major.

CINCINNATTI, OHIO
BILLBOARD
FEB 7 1925

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third concert of the Carnegie Hall series the evening of January 29. The reading given the Bach Concerto was one of much beauty, particularly in the Second movement and again in a Ravel arrangement of a dance by Debussy the Boston musicians delighted the huge audience. Roland Hayes, tenor, even tho the Liszt and Berlioz numbers were not well suited to his voice, delighted his hearers and was recalled time and time again to acknowledge the tremendous applause.

SYMPHONY BY HADLEY PERFORMED

Post Feb 7

Composer Conducts--- Mme. Matzenauer Soloist

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra, not from the conductor's stand, but from a seat in the first balcony of Symphony Hall, while the actual directing of the band fell to Henry Hadley, who, at Mr. Koussevitzky's invitation, conducted his own Fourth Symphony, and the remainder of the programme besides.

SKILLFULLY INSTRUMENTED

Heard here for the first time, Mr. Hadley's Symphony, which bears the title "North, East, South and West," disclosed a mastery of construction and the facile and skilful handling of the instruments that characterize all of this composer's orchestral pieces. In Mr. Hadley's own words, as quoted in the programme book: "This Symphony is a musical portrayal of moods suggesting, first, the frozen North; second, the Far East; third, our own Southern, darky ragtime rhythms; and fourth, the spirit of the West of our Pacific Coast."

Of the four movements the breezy and blustering Finale seemed at one hearing the most worth while. Mr. Hadley's Orient is strangely lacking in exotic feeling, and the Scherzo, though diverting to hear, seemed little more than a pleasant trifle inflated to symphonic proportions.

Cordially Received

Mr. Hadley conducted his music with familiar energy and animation. At the end he was enthusiastically applauded and recalled repeatedly, until finally he brought the men of the orchestra to their feet to share the plaudits.

For other orchestral numbers Mr. Hadley's programme offered Strauss' "Don Juan," which yesterday was conducted and played with more vigor than imagination, and Smetana's sparkling, chattering Overture to "The Bartered Bride," which received a brilliant if at times over-boisterous performance.

Her Choice Not Happy

Soloists have been the exception, not the rule, at the Symphony Concerts this season, but that of yesterday brought Mme. Matzenauer who, in her best vocal estate, pleased the audience through her performance of Beethoven's "Ah! Perfido" and the air, "Parto, Parto," from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito."

Although her singing was marked by conspicuous artistry and by exceeding beauty of tone, Mme. Matzenauer's choice of pieces seemed not altogether happy. Like Homer, Beethoven occasionally nodded, and this "Ah! Perfido" is clearly music perpetuated less by its intrinsic worth than by the name and fame of its composer. Even Mme. Matzenauer could not redeem its essential emptiness.

And charming though it is, the air of Mozart was too nearly in the same style and vein. Surely a piece of later origin would have made more effective contrast.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 7 1925

Boston Symphony

The Boston symphony orchestra [illegible] pieces, with its remarkable conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is coming to Worcester, Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, to give a concert in Mechanics hall. This is the only orchestra which will be heard in Worcester this season and it is unquestionably the best. Worcester has a strong liking for this Boston musical organization and the coming concert has the added charm of giving the music lovers a chance to see for the first time the new conductor, who has made so many friends in the musical world since coming to this country last fall. He has been the musical sensation of the winter, and the New York critics have hailed him as one of the best of all the conductors of all time. Seats for the concert are on sale at Steinert's.

Transcript
Feb. 7

TRIPLE MR. HADLEY: GUEST - CONDUCTOR AND COMPOSER TOO

HIS FULL DAY AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Music from His Pen Once More in Familiar Quality — Ready Abilities as Leader—Strauss and Smetana for Supplements—Mme. Matzenauer Assists

IT is a paradoxical position in which a guest-conductor at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra finds himself. It may easily befall that good work will fail to bring him praise or that poor work will fail to bring him blame. Does he conduct with skill? He must still stand comparison with Mr. Koussevitzky, which few can do with success. Verdict negative. Does he conduct without skill? It is still the Boston Symphony Orchestra he is conducting; its colors remain undimmed. Verdict positive. In some such position Mr. Henry Hadley finds himself as guest conductor of the fourteenth program of the series of 1924-25.

Upon unimpeachable authority, it was at the request of Mr. Koussevitzky himself, that Mr. Hadley placed upon the program one of his own compositions, choosing his fourth symphony, the movements of which are entitled respectively North, East (Orient), South, West. The symphony was written while Mr. Hadley was conductor of the then Seattle Symphony Orchestra. Its first movement is intended to convey the idea of North, anywhere, Polar regions in general, not what we in this country have come to call "the North." So also Mr. Hadley has in mind the Orient when he writes "the East," not our own Atlantic seaboard. With the South and the West Mr. Hadley comes back to our native country, identifying the South with rag-time (in 1911 still associated with our Southern negroes) and the West by means of his own impressions in his new Western home. Precisely this last movement, coming most directly from Mr. Hadley's own experience, is most successful in characterizing the idea expressed by its title. There is the suggestion of the country not as yet quite tamed, the incidental Indian theme for English horn. But much more significantly, there is the big, buoyant, excited main theme. It captures the spirit of the West, where cities grow up over night, where streets are broad, where college boys, not to be outdone by their Eastern brothers, sit around a table to formulate what they are pleased to call their "traditions." We reach rag-time in the third movement through its association with the South via the negro. Note how much of our present jazz is contained in these tunes. Strip present jazz tunes of their orchestration, of certain rhythmically contrapuntal devices in the accompaniment, and the bed-rock of rag-time is at once apparent. More, such rag-time already contains practically everything in our jazz that can be used thematically in serious composition. Already in 1911 Mr. Hadley thought this movement "typically American suggesting restless energy." The movement is a clever exposition of such rag-time figures. It is a development of these themes that gives the flavor to this Scherzo; not anything that entered into it from any possible experience of Mr. Hadley. Where the West was suggested subjectively, by portraying its essential spirit, the South is suggested objectively, by taking from its citizens phrases to be developed.

Mr. Hadley's conception of the East and the North is again one that does not come from out of his experience. Hence they are again objective. But here Mr. Hadley cannot build his movements around themes practically taken from the natives of his East and North. In effect then, these movements are not as closely representative of East and North as are the first two movements of their own titles. For Mr. Hadley is much better at working out themes and raising tonal design than at suggesting subtle play of varied emotion or at musical delineation. It is difficult to see anything Oriental in the "sad oboe melody" of his second movement; the only suggestion of the Orient that this movement bears—and that a mild one—is in its lively dance section. So in the first movement, the sombre introduction does suggest snow, ice, barren waste; but the body of the movement, despite a certain ruggedness, is warm. It seems almost that the symphony as absolute music, without titles, would more surely hit its mark than with its present program. Mr. Hadley himself in the notes he has furnished for the program book, shows that he is more concerned with the symphony as a structure than as program music.

Mr. Hadley's forte as a composer, by the evidence of this piece, lies in his melodiousness; in his ability to invent telling themes; in his skill in developing his material with logic; in his varied and well-planned orchestration. His musical craftsmanship places him in an enviable position among American composers. Witness the number of major prizes he has received at the hands of expert committees. His besetting sin is his lack of originality, in the fullest sense of that term. Not that his music sounds like that of any other composer. But in 1911, indeed in 1924, he is writing as he was taught in 1894, as if Musorgsky and Debussy, to say nothing of other potent influences, had never existed. He is writing in the material common to musicians as far back as the last quarter of the previous century. It can be argued that it is a credit to Mr. Hadley to have resisted "Debussyism" and all the other recent "isms." True. It would be more to his credit to invent a style that is personal, that is entirely his own, rather than to use the common property of half a century. Every genius has sought such individual form of self-expression. The work of such as have not done this has quickly perished. Merit in resisting the "isms" of the day comes from outdistancing the common herd of contemporaries, not in lagging behind them. What a pity that Mr. Hadley's equipment as a composer is not being put to such use.

Mr. Hadley led the orchestra through his symphony and through the other appointed pieces of the afternoon with ability, with surety, with considerable sense of inevitability. Not over-much need comparisons be pressed. In the opening chords of his own music he drew from the men full sense of Polar barrenness. Once launched upon the body of the movement he secured full ruggedness from the horns, in the main theme, with flowing lyric song from his violins. He isolated and made clear the characteristic three-note figure that persists throughout so many measures. The tempestuous development he could have intensified. At the end, with solemn chords, he again evoked bleak dreariness and waste. In the second movement the oboe melody of plaintive spirit came forth with all the artistry that Mr. Longy bestows upon such periods. Proper background Mr. Hadley, conductor and composer, provided. In proper balance, with perfect illusion did the horns answer, while Mr. Burgin furnished complement for the oboe solo. Dance music brightened, gave mild suggestion of the Oriental, grew in intensity. That it achieved wildness is open to some question. In the rag-time movement gayety predominated. Mr. Hadley pointed rhythms, set in motion lively flow of sounds, charactered them. His last movement gave forth the pomp and boasting, the bustle and pretension which he learned to know in the West. In spite of the program note to the contrary, the Indian theme for English horn, bassoons and Indian drum, arrested the attention more than the structurally important love theme. Mr. Hadley built up a broad, deep, climax at the end. Loud applause followed. Mr. Hadley reappeared several times in acknowledgment, including one especial bow to the right balcony, where, according to report, sat Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mme. Matzenauer, as assisting artist, sang Beethoven's Scene and Air, "Ah! Perfido," and later the air of Sextus, "Parto, Parto" from Mozart's opera "La Clemenzia di Tito." She sang these formal pieces with the glow and warmth of her deep rich voice. Every changing mood of the composer she followed, be that composer the Beethoven of tragedy, of Olympian heights, or be it the polished Mozart, always characterizing, always elegant. With subtle gradations of tone she followed Beethoven accusing, storming, seeking retribution from the gods; more calmly forgiving, seeking punishment of gods upon self; making final attempt to avoid separation from the beloved before ending with an impassioned plea for mercy. With Mozart she traversed sombre beginnings, rose in rhythmic intensity, compassed florid ends. It was objective music. Mme. Matzenauer understood the manner of it. The breadths and the spacing, the serenities and the vivacities were at her command. Not to be ignored in this number were Mr. Sand's exquisitely molded roulades upon the accompanying clarinet.

The last time that the orchestra played Strauss's "Don Juan" it was also under a guest-conductor, Mr. Schnéevoigt, who heightened every phrase as if it were a miniature complete in itself, sweetening and thickening the love-passages withal. Mr. Hadley gave a more straight-forward reading. His version proceeds along broad lines, is not inclined to be expository or to linger too much over details. Of the women, who commentators tell us are to be found in the score, "Anna" was most tellingly introduced. Mr. Hadley chose to emphasize the two themes of Don Juan rather than the "Zerlinchen" or the "Countess" motivs. By such choice, his version of the score is of Don Juan, the hero, rather than of Don Juan, the lover; of the duel and the final death, rather than of the passions and disillusion. The breadth and the force of the music rather than the sensuous glow and progress stir him. There was little rhetorical preparation of themes. The cumulative effect of progressively increasing rhythms, Mr. Hadley does not fully appreciate. Hence his climaxes, with the same tonal forces at his command, do not seem as big as Mr. Koussevitzky's. For climax is as much a matter of rhythm as of volume of tone. . . . Altogether charming, telling and effective in every way was the closing overture, "The Bartered Bride" of Smetana. A straighforward reading is here highly desirable. Mr. Hadley provided it. A perfectly trained orchestra responded, gave forth the music with precision, clarity, verve.

A. H. M.

Mr. Longy to Retire

In May the Master-Oboist Leaves the Symphony Orchestra

AT the end of the current musical year, one of the noted virtuosi of the Symphony Orchestra will quit the band—Mr. Georges Longy, first oboe. He will retire at his own request, and Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor not a little regrets the decision. Not only will Mr. Longy leave the orchestra. He will also depart from Boston, returning for the remainder of his days to France whence he came. He is passing middle age. His work as oboist taxes him. The direction of a music school leaves him little leisure. He is disposed to sit in the sun and be idle.

The public of the Symphony Concerts, which has listened to Mr. Longy for a quarter of a century and weekly recognized both his presence and his voice, will keep him in remembrance and companion him with good wishes. In Europe and in America no oboist of his time has surpassed him in quality and finesse of tone; while few have equalled him in evenness and felicity of performance. These many years, Léon Pourteau has lain dead; but his memory abides, still setting the standard for the first clarinet of the orchestra. In turn, Mr. Longy bids fair to become its tradition for the first oboe.

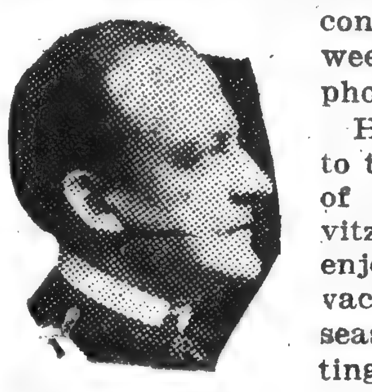
H. T. P.

Advertiser Feb 7

PAGE SIXTEEN

HADLEY AND MATZENAUER AT SYMPHONY

Henry Hadley, member of a family that has shed renown upon Greater Boston musicial life, is guest conductor at this week's Symphony concerts.



Henry Hadley

He was invited to take the place of Mr. Koussevitzky, who is enjoying a brief vacation. Last season this distinguished native of Somerville appeared at the Symphony concerts as conductor of one of his symphonic poems, "Ocean." Being so well known, he was warmly greeted.

YANKEE SYMPHONY

At the matinee yesterday he led the first performance here of his fourth symphony, which is largely American in spirit and which bears the title "North, South, East and West." It is a splendid composition. first of all, because it is so intensely American and free from the alien suggestions so often found in symphonic works written in this country.

The single exception to this is the third movement, which portrays Far East musings and has a somewhat conventional Oriental flavor. The Western finale is especially vigorous and colorful, with an effective episodical Indian theme.

The symphony was enthusiastically applauded, as it deserved to be.

MATZENAUER SINGS

Mme. Matzenauer, the soloist, displayed her opulent voice and superb artistry in the familiar "Ah, Perfidio" song by Beethoven and in the rarely heard "Parto, Parto" aria from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito.' The much admired Metropolitan Opera star was also heartily applauded.

Mr. Hadley gave a spirited reading of Strauss' "Don Juan," one of the German composer's most dramatic tone poems, and Smetana's delightful comedy overture, "The Sold Bride."

HADLEY CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Margarete Matzenauer Is Heard as Soloist

Globe Feb 7

Henry Hadley, associate conductor the New York Philharmonic Orchestr conducted yesterday's Symphony co cert as "Guest Conductor." The chi item on the program was Mr Hadley Fourth Symphony, "North, East, Sout West." Margarete Matzenauer, of t Metropolitan Opera, sang airs Mozart and Beethoven, as solois Strauss' "Don Juan" and Smetana overture to "The Bartered Bride" we the other numbers on Mr Hadley's pr gram. Mr Koussevitzky, from a se in the first balcony, was an interest auditor.

This is the first time that an Ame can has conducted a concert by t Boston Symphony Orchestra, thou many American composers have performances of their own works these concerts. Mr Hadley was born Somerville 54 years ago. He stud music in Boston and in Europe. home for some years has been in N York.

Mr Hadley's Fourth Symphony first performed in 1911 at Norfolk, Co It had not been given in Boston u yesterday, although various others his numerous compositions for orch tra have been heard from time to t at these concerts. According to p gram notes furnished by the compo himself the first movement is inten to suggest the frozen North, the sec the Far East, the third, our own Sou ern Darky ragtime rhythms, the fou the spirit of our Pacific Coast.

The composer and conductor was cordially applauded by orchestra and audience at the conclusion of the performance of the symphony.

A man who writes a symphony must either succeed in creating a work of genius or fail hopelessly. It is like writing an epic poem or a five-act tragedy in blank verse. Many have attempted to create works in these noble forms. Very few have succeeded, and among them are no Americans.

The only American symphony is still the one composed by a Czech, Dvorak's "From the New World." It goes without saying that Mr Hadley is a competent and experienced musician. He was at his best as conductor in his own work.

Mme Matzenauer sang with restraint and purity of style. Neither of her airs, "Parto, parto" from Mozart's "Titus" and Beethoven's scene and air "Ah Perfido," is among the supreme masterpieces. She was applauded cordially, but less cordially than on the occasions in the past when she has sung Wagner numbers at these concerts.

Mr Hadley was not successful in bringing out the romantic vehemence and tenderness of Strauss' "Don Juan." Nor did he achieve the requisite clarity in the impetuosity of Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture.

Mr Koussevitzky will conduct an all-French program next week, with d'Indy's second symphony and numbers by Rabaud, Dukas and Roussel.

PAPER Transcript
DATE Feb 7

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Orchestral

FOR the while, the "unified program" has laid hold upon Mr. Koussevitzky, as it once obsessed Dr. Muck. Not long ago Beethoven filled a pair of concerts; then Stravinsky; while now it is the turn of the elder Parisians. That is to say, for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening he has devised an "all-French" program. The Director of the Conservatory, Monsieur Rabaud, begins it with "La Procession Nocturne." Monsieur Roussel continues it with an occasional piece, "Pour une Fête de Printempts," as yet unheard in Boston. Monsieur Dukas has next place with his poem of the dance, "The Peri"; while, to conclude, Monsieur d'Indy will be heard through the lengths and breadths of his Second Symphony.

On Monday evening in Symphony Hall falls the third of the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts, with the orchestra in full force and high mettle, with Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor of insight, imagination and individuality, through music and players transmuting large powers into communicating fires. Mr. John Charles Thomas, now of full stature as concert-singer, will assist the orchestra in trite airs from Verdi's "Masked Ball" and Massenet's "Herodiade." Mr. Koussevitzky's numbers are the Overture to Glinka's opera, "Ruslan and Ludmilla"; the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird" and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

[illegible]
Feb 7

Symphony Scheduled For Three Appearances

There will be three Boston Symphony concerts next week in Symphony Hall—the third of the Monday Evening Series, and the 15th pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. John Charles Thomas will be the Monday soloist, singing arias of Massenet and Verdi. Serge Koussevitzky will also be heard in Stravinsky's Suite from the "Fire-Bird," Glink's Overture to "Ruszlan and Ludmilla," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A

WORCESTER, MASS.
POST
FEB 7 1925

CINCINNATTI, OHIO
BILLBOARD
7 1925

John Charles Thomas, well-known American baritone, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the third of the supplementary series of concerts in Boston, on February 9.

On Sunday afternoon, February 8 the

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
FEB 7 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN NEW NUMBERS

Famous Orchestra's Program Here Include Two Virtually Unknown Excerpts

Two excerpts from the music o Russia, virtually unknown to th western world until Koussevitzk introduced them, will be included o the program of his first appearanc in Worcester as the new conducto of the Boston Symphony orchestr The concert is in Mechanics ha Tuesday evening, Feb. 17.

The principal monuments of t genius of Moussorgsky are the t operas "Boris Godunov" and "Kh vantchina." The prelude to the la ter, which is to be played, depi the coming of dawn over the R Square in the Kremlin at Mosko The piece has its distinct color a mood suggestive of the subject.

"The Flight of the Bumble Bee" a little scherzo from Rimsky-K sakov's fairly opera, "Tsar Saltan," i which a prince transforms himsel into a bee for his own purposes. Thi tiny piece exacts an aerial lightnes and fleetness from the wood win which is a marvel of virtuosity. It charm is evident from the fact tha when Mr. Koussevitzky performed in Boston, an encore was demande and granted for the first time sin the first beginnings of the orche tra, 40 years ago.

Seats for the concert are on sa at Steinert's.

BOSTON SYMPHONY NOW AT ITS BEST

Russian Conductor, Music Add Charms to Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's annual Worcester concert in Mechanics Hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, is the outstandi musical event of the season. No symphony orchestra has so much charm for Worcester music lovers as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at this concert there is the added charm of the new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

He thrilled Europe by his remarkable program making, and was so much talked about that Olin Downes, of the New York Times, formerly music critic of the Boston Post, made a trip to Europe to get his own ideas of the magnetic personality of Koussevitzky. He came back enthusiastic and in a lengthy article predicted that th wonder conductor of America. In Boston he is much admired, and the symphony season was practically sold out when the announcements were made.

The Worcester program is attractive, the symphony being Tschaikovsky's Fifth, there is a Bach concerto, and there are three novelties, two of them Russian, and here is where Koussevitzky is seen at his best.

Seats for the concert are on sale at Steinert's.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
FEB 8 - 1925

Negro Soloist With Symphony.

A work little heard in New York and introducing a distinct novelty was brought by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky for a recent concert at Carnegie Hall, when Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, was used to sing an air from Berlioz oratorio, "The Flight Into Egypt." The novelty was the bringing of eight women from Boston to sing behind the scenes eight measures of Hallelujahs as a conclusion of this

---

NEW YORK
TELEGRAM
FEB 7 192

Serge Koussevitzky is not, contrary to rumor, to leave the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the conclusion of the present season, but will retain the post for at least two years more. Now the subject of an assistant conductor for Mr. Koussevitzky is agitating Boston.

PITTS SANBORN.

---

fell grievously short in authenticity of style and the poetry native to this music. It suffered from the conductor's disposition to stretch out phrase after phrase beyond the limits of its elasticity. It revealed unsparingly his lack of a perfectly graduated dynamic range, as well as his predilection for extremities of nuance. The passacaglia, most of all, Mr. Koussevitzky treated to a "reading" extraordinarily perverse and arbitrary, which not only diminished the potent drama of its pages, but, by its indefensible elongations of tempo, menaced the very continuity of its texture. In fine, the performance may have been essential Koussevitzky, but was assuredly not essentially Brahms.

H. F. P.

Transcript Feb 7

TRIPLE MR. HADLEY: GUEST - CONDUCTOR AND COMPOSER TOO

HIS FULL DAY AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Music from His Pen Once More in Familiar Quality — Ready Abilities as Leader—Strauss and Smetana for Supplements—Mme. Matzenauer Assists

IT is a paradoxical position in which a guest-conductor at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra finds himself. It may easily befall that good work will fail to bring him praise or that poor work will fail to bring him blame. Does he conduct with skill? He must still stand comparison with Mr. Koussevitzky, which few can do with success. Verdict negative. Does he conduct without skill? It is still the Boston Symphony Orchestra he is conducting; its colors remain undimmed. Verdict positive. In some such position Mr. Henry Hadley finds himself as guest conductor of the fourteenth program of the series of 1924-25.

Upon unimpeachable authority, it was at the request of Mr. Koussevitzky himself, that Mr. Hadley placed upon the program one of his own compositions, choosing his fourth symphony, the movements of which are entitled respectively North, East (Orient), South, West. The symphony was written while Mr. Hadley was conductor of the then Seattle Symphony Orchestra. Its first movement is intended to convey the idea of North, anywhere, Polar regions in general, not what we in this country have come to call "the North." So also Mr. Hadley has in mind the Orient when he writes "the East," not our own Atlantic seaboard. With the South and the West Mr. Hadley comes back to our native country, identifying the South with rag-time (in 1911 still associated with our Southern negroes) and the West by means of his own impressions in his new Western home. Precisely this last movement, coming most directly from Mr. Hadley's own experience, is most successful in characterizing the idea expressed by its title. There is the suggestion of the country not as yet quite tamed, the incidental Indian theme for English horn. But much more significantly, there is the big, buoyant, excited main theme. It captures the spirit of the West, where cities grow up over night, where streets are broad, where college boys, not to be outdone by their Eastern brothers, sit around a table to formulate what they are pleased to call their "traditions." We reach rag-time in the third movement through its association with the South via the negro. Note how much of our present jazz is contained in these tunes. Strip present jazz tunes of their orchestration, of certain rhythmically contrapuntal devices in the accompaniment, and the bed-rock of rag-time is at once apparent. More, such rag-time already contains practically everything in our jazz that can be used thematically in serious composition. Already in 1911 Mr. Hadley thought this movement "typically American suggesting restless energy." The movement is a clever exposition of such rag-time figures. It is a development of these themes that gives the flavor to this Scherzo; not anything that entered into it from any possible experience of Mr. Hadley. Where the West was suggested subjectively, by portraying its essential spirit, the South is suggested objectively, by taking from its citizens phrases to be developed.

Mr. Hadley's conception of the East and the North is again one that does not come from out of his experience. Hence they are again objective. But here Mr. Hadley cannot build his movements around themes practically taken from the natives of his East and North. In effect then, these movements are not as closely representative of East and North as are the first two movements of their own titles. For Mr. Hadley is much better at working out themes and raising tonal design than at suggesting subtle play of varied emotion or at musical delineation. It is difficult to see anything Oriental in the "sad oboe melody" of his second movement; the only suggestion of the Orient that this movement bears—and that a mild one—is in its lively dance section. So in the first movement, the sombre introduction does suggest snow, ice, barren waste; but the body of the movement, despite a certain ruggedness, is warm. It seems almost that the symphony as absolute music, without titles, would more surely hit its mark than with its present program. Mr. Hadley himself in the notes he has furnished for the program book, shows that he is more concerned with the symp ny as a structure than as program music.

Mr. Hadley's forte as a composer, by e evidence of this piece, lies in his melodic ness; in his ability to invent telling theme in his skill in developing his material wi logic; in his varied and well-planned o chestration. His musical craftsmansh places him in an enviable position amo American composers. Witness the nu ber of major prizes he has received at t hands of expert committees. His besetti sin is his lack of originality, in the full sense of that term. Not that his mu sounds like that of any other compos But in 1911, indeed in 1924, he is writi as he was taught in 1894, as if Musor sky and Debussy, to say nothing of oth potent influences, had never existed. He writing in the material common to musicians as far back as the last quart of the previous century. It can be argu that it is a credit to Mr. Hadley to have resisted "Debussyism" and all the other recent "isms." True. It would be more to his credit to invent a style that is personal, that is entirely his own, rather than to use the common property of half a century. Every genius has sought such individual form of self-expression. The work of such as have not done this has quickly perished. Merit in resisting the "isms" of the day comes from outdistancing the common herd of contemporaries, not in lagging behind them. What a pity that Mr. Hadley's equipment as a composer is not being put to such use.

Mr. Hadley led the orchestra through his symphony and through the other appointed pieces of the afternoon with ability, with surety, with considerable sense of inevitability. Not over-much need comparisons be pressed. In the opening chords of his own music he drew from the men full sense of Polar barrenness. Once launched upon the body of the movement he secured full ruggedness from the horns, in the main theme, with flowing lyric song from his violins. He isolated and made clear the characteristic three-note figure that persists throughout so many measures. The tempestuous development he could have intensified. At the end, with solemn chords, he again evoked bleak dreariness and waste. In the second movement the oboe melody of plaintive spirit came forth with all the artistry that Mr. Longy bestows upon such periods. Proper background Mr. Hadley, conductor and composer, provided. In proper balance, with perfect illusion did the horns answer, while Mr. Burgin furnished complement for the oboe solo. Dance music brightened, gave mild suggestion of the Oriental, grew in intensity. That it achieved wildness is open to some question. In the rag-time movement gayety predominated. Mr. Hadley pointed rhythms, set in motion lively flow of sounds, charactered them. His last movement gave forth the pomp and boasting, the bustle and pretention which he learned to know in the West. In spite of the program note to the contrary, the Indian theme for English horn bassoons and Indian drum, arrested the attention more than the structurally important love theme. Mr. Hadley built up a broad, deep, climax at the end. Loud applause followed. Mr. Hadley reappeared several times in acknowledgment, including one especial bow to the right balcony, where, according to report, sat Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mme. Matzenauer, as assisting artist, sang Beethoven's Scene and Air, "Ah! Perfido," and later the air of Sextus, "Parto, Parto" from Mozart's opera "La Clemenzia di Tito." She sang these formal pieces with the glow and warmth of her deep rich voice. Every changing mood of the composer she followed, be that composer the Beethoven of tragedy, of Olympian heights, or be it the polished Mozart, always characterizing, always elegant. With subtle gradations of tone she followed Beethoven accusing, storming, seeking retribution from the gods; more calmly forgiving, seeking punishment of gods upon self; making final attempt to avoid separation from the beloved before ending with an impassioned plea for mercy With Mozart she traversed sombre beginnings, rose in rhythmic intensity, compassed florid ends. It was objective music. Mme. Matzenauer understood the manner of it. The breadths and the spacing, the serenities and the vivacities were at her command. Not to be ignored in this number were Mr. Sand's exquisitely molded roulades upon the accompanying clarinet.

The last time that the orchestra played Strauss's "Don Juan" it was also under a guest-conductor, Mr. Schnéevoigt, who heightened every phrase as if it were a miniature complete in itself, sweetening and thickening the love-passages withal Mr. Hadley gave a more straight-forward reading. His version proceeds along broad lines, is not inclined to be expository or to linger too much over details. Of the women, who commentators tell us are to be found in the score, "Anna" was most tellingly introduced. Mr. Hadley chose to emphasize the two themes of Don Juan rather than the "Zerlinchen" or the "Countess" motivs. By such choice, his version of the score is of Don Juan, the hero, rather than of Don Juan, the lover; of the duel and the final death, rather than of the passions and disillusion. The breadth and the force of the music rather than the sensuous glow and progress sti him. There was little rhetorical preparation of themes. The cumulative effect of progressively increasing rhythms, Mr. Hadley does not fully appreciate. Hence his climaxes, with the same tonal forces at his command, do not seem as big as Mr. Koussevitzky's. For climax is as much a matter of rhythm as of volume of tone. . . . Altogether charming, telling and effective in every way was the closing overture, "The Bartered Bride" of Smetana. A straighforward reading is here highly desirable. Mr. Hadley provided it. A perfectly trained orchestra responded, gave forth the music with precision, clarity, verve.

A. H. M.

Mr. Longy to Retire

In May the Master-Oboist Leaves the Symphony Orchestra

AT the end of the current musical year, one of the noted virtuosi of the Symphony Orchestra will quit the band—Mr. Georges Longy, first oboe. He will retire at his own request, and Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor not a little regrets the decision. Not only will Mr. Longy leave the orchestra. He will also depart from Boston, returning for the remainder of his days to France whence he came. He is passing middle age. His work as oboist taxes him. The direction of a music school leaves him little leisure. He is disposed to sit in the sun and be idle.

The public of the Symphony Concerts, which has listened to Mr. Longy for a quarter of a century and weekly recognized both his presence and his voice, will keep him in remembrance and companion him with good wishes. In Europe and in America no oboist of his time has surpassed him in quality and finesse of tone; while few have equalled him in evenness and felicity of performance. These many years, Léon Pourteau has lain dead; but his memory abides, still setting the standard for the first clarinet of the orchestra. In turn, Mr. Longy bids fair to become its tradition for the first oboe.

H. T. P.

Advertiser Feb 7

PAGE SIXTEEN

HADLEY AND MATZENAUER AT SYMPHONY

Henry Hadley, member of a family that has shed renown upon Greater Boston musicial life, is guest conductor at this week's Symphony concerts. He was invited to take the place of Mr. Koussevitzky, who is enjoying a brief vacation. Last season this distinguished native of Somerville appeared at the Symphony concerts as conductor of one of his symphonic poems, "Ocean." Being so well known, he was warmly greeted.

Henry Hadley

YANKEE SYMPHONY

At the matinee yesterday he led the first performance here of his fourth symphony, which is largely American in spirit and which bears the title "North, South, East and West." It is a splendid composition first of all, because it is so intensely American and free from the alien suggestions so often found in symphonic works written in this country.

The single exception to this is the third movement, which portrays Far East musings and has a somewhat conventional Oriental flavor. The Western finale is especially vigorous and colorful, with an effective episodical Indian theme.

The symphony was enthusiastically applauded, as it deserved to be.

MATZENAUER SINGS

Mme. Matzenauer, the soloist, displayed her opulent voice and superb artistry in the familiar "Ah. Perfidio" song by Beethoven and in the rarely heard "Parto, Parto" aria from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito.' The much admired Metropolitan Opera star was also heartily applauded.

Mr. Hadley gave a spirited reading of Strauss' "Don Juan," one of the German composer's most dramatic tone poems, and Smetana's delightful comedy overture, "The Sold Bride."

HADLEY CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Margarete Matzenauer Is Heard as Soloist

Globe Feb 7

Henry Hadley, associate conductor the New York Philharmonic Orchestr conducted yesterday's Symphony co cert as "Guest Conductor." The chi item on the program was Mr Hadley Fourth Symphony, "North, East, Sout West." Margarete Matzenauer, of th Metropolitan Opera, sang airs Mozart and Beethoven, as solois Strauss' "Don Juan" and Smetana overture to "The Bartered Bride" we the other numbers on Mr Hadley's pr gram. Mr Koussevitzky, from a se in the first balcony, was an interest auditor.

This is the first time that an Ame can has conducted a concert by t Boston Symphony Orchestra, thou many American composers have performances of their own works these concerts. Mr Hadley w s born Somerville 54 years ago. He stud music in Boston and in Europe. home for some years has been in N York.

Mr Hadley's Fourth Symphony first performed in 1911 at Norfolk, Co It had not been given in Boston u yesterday, although various others his numerous compositions for orch tra have been heard from time to t at these concerts. According to gram notes furnished by the compo himself the first movement is inten to suggest the frozen North, the sec the Far East, the third, our own Sou ern Darky ragtime rhythms, the fou the spirit of our Pacific Coast.

The composer and conductor was cordially applauded by orchestra and audience at the conclusion of the performance of the symphony.

A man who writes a symphony must either succeed in creating a work of genius or fail hopelessly. It is like writing an epic poem or a five-act tragedy in blank verse. Many have attempted to create works in these noble forms Very few have succeeded, and among them are no Americans.

The only American symphony is still the one composed by a Czech, Dvorak's "From the New World" It goes without saying that Mr Hadley is a competent and experienced musician. He was at his best as conductor in his own work.

Mme Matzenauer sang with restraint and purity of style. Neither of her airs, "Parto, parto" from Mozart's "Titus" and Beethoven's scene and air "Ah Perfido," is among the supreme masterpieces. She was applauded cordially, but less cordially than on the occasions in the past when she has sung Wagner numbers at these concerts.

Mr Hadley was not successful in bringing out the romantic vehemence and tenderness of Strauss' "Don Juan." Nor did he achieve the requisite clarity in the impetuosity of Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture.

Mr Koussevitzky will conduct an all-French program next week, with d'Indy's second symphony and numbers by Rabaud, Dukas and Roussel.

37

PAPER Transcript

DATE Feb 7

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Orchestral

FOR the while, the "unified program" has laid hold upon Mr. Koussevitzky, as it once obsessed Dr. Muck. Not long ago Beethoven filled a pair of concerts; then Stravinsky; while now it is the turn of the elder Parisians. That is to say, for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening he has devised an "all-French" program. The Director of the Conservatory, Monsieur Rabaud, begins it with "La Procession Nocturne." Monsieur Roussel continues it with an occasional piece, "Pour une Fête de Printempts," as yet unheard in Boston. Monsieur Dukas has next place with his poem of the dance, "The Peri"; while, to conclude, Monsieur d'Indy will be heard through the lengths and breadths of his Second Symphony.

On Monday evening in Symphony Hall falls the third of the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts, with the orchestra in full force and high mettle, with Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor of insight, imagination and individuality, through music and players transmuting large powers into communicating fires. Mr. John Charles Thomas, now of full stature as concert-singer, will assist the orchestra in trite airs from Verdi's "Masked Ball" and Massenet's "Herodiade." Mr. Koussevitzky's numbers are the Overture to Glinka's opera, "Ruslan and Ludmilla"; the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird" and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

Symphony Scheduled For Three Appearances

There will be three Boston Symphony concerts next week in Symphony Hall—the third of the Monday Evening Series, and the 15th pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. John Charles Thomas will be the Monday soloist, singing arias of Massenet and Verdi. Serge Koussevitzky will also be heard in Stravinsky's Suite from the "Fire-Bird," Glink's Overture to "Ruszlan and Ludmilla," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A

WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

FEB 7 1925

CINCINNATTI, OHIO
BILLBOARD

1925

John Charles Thomas, well-known American baritone, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the third of the supplementary series of concerts in Boston, on February 9.

On Sunday afternoon, February 8 the

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 7 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN NEW NUMBERS

Famous Orchestra's Program Here Include Two Virtually Unknown Excerpts

Two excerpts from the music o Russia, virtually unknown to th western world until Koussevitzk introduced them, will be included o the program of his first appearanc in Worcester as the new conduct of the Boston Symphony orchestr The concert is in Mechanics ha Tuesday evening, Feb. 17.

The principal monuments of t genius of Moussorgsky are the t operas "Boris Godunov" and "Kh vantchina." The prelude to the la ter, which is to be played, depi the coming of dawn over the R Square in the Kremlin at Mosk The piece has its distinct color a mood suggestive of the subject.

"The Flight of the Bumble Bee" a little scherzo from Rimsky-K sakov's fairly opera, "Tsar Saltan," i which a prince transforms himsel into a bee for his own purposes. Thi tiny piece exacts an aerial lightnes and fleetness from the wood win which is a marvel of virtuosity. It charm is evident from the fact tha when Mr. Koussevitzky performed in Boston, an encore was demande and granted for the first time sin the first beginnings of the orche tra, 40 years ago.

Seats for the concert are on sa at Steinert's.

BOSTON SYMPHONY NOW AT ITS BEST

Russian Conductor, Music Add Charms to Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's annual Worcester concert in Mechanics Hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, is the outstandi musical event of the season. No symphony orchestra has so much c arm for Worcester music lovers as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at this cos-cert there is the added cha m of the new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

He thrilled Europe by his remarkable program making, and was so much talked about that Olin Downes, of the New York Times, formerly music critic of the Boston Post, made a trip to Europe to get his own ideas of the magnetic personality of Koussevitzky. He came back enthusiastic and in a lengthy article predicted that the wonder conductor of America. In Boston he is much admired, and the symphony season was practically sold out when the annuncements were made.

The Worcester program is attractive, the symphony being Tschaikovsky's Fifth, there is a Bach concerto, and there are three novelties, two of them Russian, and here is where Koussevitz[illegible] is seen at his best.

Seats f[illegible] concert are on sale at Steinert's.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

FEB 8 - 1925

Negro Soloist With Symphony.

A work little heard in New York and introducing a distinct novelty was brought by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky for a recent concert at Carnegie Hall, when Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, was used to sing an air from Belioz oratorio, "The Flight Into Egypt." The novelty was the bringing of eight women from Boston to sing behind the scenes eight measures of Hallelujahs as a conclusion of this excer usual, New York review-

---

NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

FEB 7 192

Serge Koussevitzky is not, contrary to rumor, to leave the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the conclusion of the present season, but will retain the post for at least two years more. Now the subject of an assistant conductor for Mr. Koussevitzky is agitting Boston.

PITTS SANBORN.

---

fell grievously short in authentic style and the poetry native to th music. It suffered from the conducto disposition to stretch out phrase aft phrase beyond the limits of its elasticit It revealed unsparingly his lack of perfectly graduated dynamic range, a well as his predilection for extremitie of nuance. The passacaglia, most of al Mr. Koussevitzky treated to a "reading extraordinarily perverse and arbitrar which not only diminished the poten drama of its pages, but, by its indefen sible elongations of tempo, menaced th very continuity of its texture. In fine the performance may have been essentia Koussevitzky, but was assuredly no essentially Brahms.

H. F. P.

Transcript Feb 7

TRIPLE MR. HADLEY: GUEST - CONDUCTOR AND COMPOSER TOO

HIS FULL DAY AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Music from His Pen Once More in Familiar Quality — Ready Abilities as Leader—Strauss and Smetana for Supplements—Mme. Matzenauer Assists

It is a paradoxical position in which a guest-conductor at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra finds himself. It may easily befall that good work will fail to bring him praise or that poor work will fail to bring him blame. Does he conduct with skill? He must still stand comparison with Mr. Koussevitzky, which few can do with success. Verdict negative. Does he conduct without skill? It is still the Boston Symphony Orchestra he is conducting; its colors remain undimmed. Verdict positive. In some such position Mr. Henry Hadley finds himself as guest conductor of the fourteenth program of the series of 1924-25.

Upon unimpeachable authority, it was at the request of Mr. Koussevitzky himself, that Mr. Hadley placed upon the program one of his own compositions, choosing his fourth symphony, the movements of which are entitled respectively North, East (Orient), South, West. The symphony was written while Mr. Hadley was conductor of the then Seattle Symphony Orchestra. Its first movement is intended to convey the idea of North, anywhere, Polar regions in general, not what we in this country have come to call "the North." So also Mr. Hadley has in mind the Orient when he writes "the East," not our own Atlantic seaboard. With the South and the West Mr. Hadley comes back to our native country, identifying the South with rag-time (in 1911 still associated with our Southern negroes) and the West by means of his own impressions in his new Western home. Precisely this last movement, coming most directly from Mr. Hadley's own experience, is most successful in characterizing the idea expressed by its title. There is the suggestion of the country not as yet quite tamed, the incidental Indian theme for English horn. But much more significantly, there is the big, buoyant, excited main theme. It captures the spirit of the West, where cities grow up over night, where streets are broad, where college boys, not to be outdone by their Eastern brothers, sit around a table to formulate what they are pleased to call their "traditions." We reach rag-time in the third movement through its association with the South via the negro. Note how much of our present jazz is contained in these tunes. Strip present jazz tunes of their orchestration, of certain rhythmically contrapuntal devices in the accompaniment, and the bed-rock of rag-time is at once apparent. More, such rag-time already contains practically everything in our jazz that can be used thematically in serious composition. Already in 1911 Mr. Hadley thought this movement "typically American suggesting restless energy." The movement is a clever exposition of such rag-time figures. It is a development of these themes that gives the flavor to this Scherzo; not anything that entered into it from any possible experience of Mr. Hadley. Where the West was suggested subjectively, by portraying its essential spirit, the South i suggested objectively, by taking from it citizens phrases to be developed.

Mr. Hadley's conception of the East an the North is again one that does not con from out of his experience. Hence they are again objective. But here Mr. Hadley cannot build his movements around themes practically taken from the natives of his East and North. In effect then, these movements are not as closely representative of East and North as are the first two movements of their own titles. For Mr. Hadley is much better at working out themes and raising tonal design than at suggesting subtle play of varied emotion or at musical delineation. It is difficult to see anything Oriental in the "sad oboe melody" of his second movement; the only suggestion of the Orient that this movement bears—and that a mild one—is in its lively dance section. So in the first movement, the sombre introduction does suggest snow, ice, barren waste; but the body of the movement, despite a certain ruggedness, is warm. It seems almost that the symphony as absolute music, without titles, would more surely hit its mark than with its present program. Mr. Hadley himself in the notes he has furnished for the program book, shows that he is more concerned with the sym[illegible]ny as a structure than as program music.

Mr. Hadley's forte as a composer, by [illegible]e evidence of this piece, lies in his melodio ness; in his ability to invent telling them in his skill in developing his material w logic; in his varied and well-planned o chestration. His musical craftsmansh places him in an enviable position amo American composers. Witness the nu ber of major prizes he has received at t hands of expert committees. His besetti sin is his lack of originality, in the full sense of that term. Not that his mu sounds like that of any other compos But in 1911, indeed in 1924, he is writi as he was taught in 1894, as if Muso sky and Debussy, to say nothing of oth potent influences, had never existed. He writing in the material common to musicians as far back as the last quart of the previous century. It can be argu that it is a credit to Mr. Hadley to have resisted "Debussyism" and all the other recent "isms." True. It would be more to his credit to invent a style that is personal, that is entirely his own, rather than to use the common property of half a century. Every genius has sought such individual form of self-expression. The work of such as have not done this has quickly perished. Merit in resisting the "isms" of the day comes from outdistancing the common herd of contemporaries, not in lagging behind them. What a pity that Mr. Hadley's equipment as a composer is not being put to such use.

Mr. Hadley led the orchestra through his symphony and through the other appointed pieces of the afternoon with ability, with surety, with considerable sense of inevitability. Not over-much need comparisons be pressed. In the opening chords of his own music he drew from the men full sense of Polar barrenness. Once launched upon the body of the movement he secured full ruggedness from the horns, in the main theme, with flowing lyric song from his violins. He isolated and made clear the characteristic three-note figure that persists throughout so many measures. The tempestuous development he could have intensified. At the end, with solemn chords, he again evoked bleak dreariness and waste. In the second movement the oboe melody of plaintive spirit came forth with all the artistry that Mr. Longy bestows upon such periods. Proper background Mr. Hadley, conductor and composer, provided. In proper balance, with perfect illusion did the horns answer, while Mr. Burgin furnished complement for the oboe solo. Dance music brightened, gave mild suggestion of the Oriental, grew in intensity. That it achieved wildness is open to some question. In the rag-time movement gayety predominated. Mr. Hadley pointed rhythms, set in motion lively flow of sounds, charactered them. His last movement gave forth the pomp and boasting, the bustle and pretention which he learned to know in the West In spite of the program note to the contrary, the Indian theme for English horn bassoons and Indian drum, arrested the attention more than the structurally important love theme. Mr. Hadley built up a broad, deep, climax at the end. Loud applause followed. Mr. Hadley reappeared several times in acknowledgment, including one especial bow to the right balcony, where, according to report, sat Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mme. Matzenauer, as assisting artist, sang Beethoven's Scene and Air, "Ah! Perfido," and later the air of Sextus, "Parto, Parto" from Mozart's opera "La Clemenzia di Tito." She sang these formal pieces with the glow and warmth of her deep rich voice. Every changing mood of the composer she followed, be that composer the Beethoven of tragedy, of Olympian heights, or be it the polished Mozart, always characterizing, always elegant. With subtle gradations of tone she followed Beethoven accusing, storming, seeking retribution from the gods; more calmly forgiving, seeking punishment of gods upon self; making final attempt to avoid separation from the beloved before ending with an impassioned plea for mercy. With Mozart she traversed sombre beginnings, rose in rhythmic intensity, compassed florid ends. It was objective music. Mme. Matzenauer understood the manner of it. The breadths and the spacing, the serenities and the vivacities were at her command. Not to be ignored in this number were Mr. Sand's exquisitely molded roulades upon the accompanying clarinet.

The last time that the orchestra played Strauss's "Don Juan" it was also under a guest-conductor, Mr. Schnéevoigt, who heightened every phrase as if it were a miniature complete in itself, sweetening and thickening the love-passages withal Mr. Hadley gave a more straight-forward reading. His version proceeds along broad lines, is not inclined to be expository or to linger too much over details. Of the women, who commentators tell us are to be found in the score, "Anna" was most tellingly introduced. Mr. Hadley chose to emphasize the two themes of Don Juan rather than the "Zerlinchen" or the "Countess" motivs. By such choice, his version of the score is of Don Juan, the hero, rather than of Don Juan, the lover; of the duel and the final death, rather than of the passions and disillusion. Th breadth and the force of the music rathe than the sensuous glow and progress sti him. There was little rhetorical prepara tion of themes. The cumulative effect o progressively increasing rhythms, Mr. Hadley does not fully appreciate. Hence his climaxes, with the same tonal forces at his command, do not seem as big as Mr. Koussevitzky's. For climax is as much a matter of rhythm as of volume of tone. . . . Altogether charming, telling and effective in every way was the closing overture, "The Bartered Bride" of Smetana. A straighforward reading is here highly desirable. Mr. Hadley provided it. A perfectly trained orchestra responded, gave forth the music with precision, clarity, verve.

A. H. M.

Mr. Longy to Retire

In May the Master-Oboist Leaves the Symphony Orchestra

At the end of the current musical year, one of the noted virtuosi of the Symphony Orchestra will quit the band—Mr. Georges Longy, first oboe. He will retire at his own request, and Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor not a little regrets the decision. Not only will Mr. Longy leave the orchestra. He will also depart from Boston, returning for the remainder of his days to France whence he came. He is passing middle age. His work as oboist taxes him. The direction of a music school leaves him little leisure. He is disposed to sit in the sun and be idle.

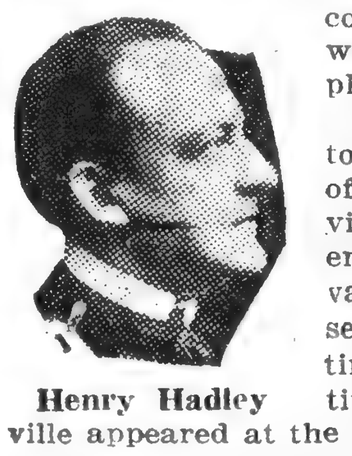
The public of the Symphony Concerts, which has listened to Mr. Longy for a quarter of a century and weekly recognized both his presence and his voice, will keep him in remembrance and companion him with good wishes. In Europe and in America no oboist of his time has surpassed him in quality and finesse of tone; while few have equalled him in evenness and felicity of performance. These many years, Léon Pourteau has lain dead; but his memory abides, still setting the standard for the first clarinet of the orchestra. In turn, Mr. Longy bids fair to become its tradition for the first oboe.

H. T. P.

Advertiser Feb 7

HADLEY AND MATZENAUER AT SYMPHONY

Henry Hadley, member of a family that has shed renown upon Greater Boston musical life, is guest conductor at this week's Symphony concerts. He was invited to take the place of Mr. Koussevitzky, who is enjoying a brief vacation. Last season this distinguished native of Somerville appeared at the Symphony concerts as conductor of one of his symphonic poems, "Ocean." Being so well known, he was warmly greeted.



Henry Hadley

YANKEE SYMPHONY

At the matinee yesterday he led the first performance here of his fourth symphony, which is largely American in spirit and which bears the title "North, South, East and West." It is a splendid composition. first of all, because it is so intensely American and free from the alien suggestions so often found in symphonic works written in this country.

The single exception to this is the third movement, which portrays Far East musings and has a somewhat conventional Oriental flavor. The Western finale is especially vigorous and colorful, with an effective episodical Indian theme.

The symphony was enthusiastically applauded, as it deserved to be.

MATZENAUER SINGS

Mme. Matzenauer, the soloist, displayed her opulent voice and superb artistry in the familiar "Ah, Perfidio" song by Beethoven and in the rarely heard "Parto, Parto" aria from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito.' The much admired Metropolitan Opera star was also heartily applauded.

Mr. Hadley gave a spirited reading of Strauss' "Don Juan," one of the German composer's most dramatic tone poems, and Smetana's delightful comedy overture, "The Sold Bride."

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
FEB 7 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN NEW NUMBERS

Famous Orchestra's Program Here Include Two Virtually Unknown Excerpts

Two excerpts from the music o Russia, virtually unknown to th western world until Koussevitzk introduced them, will be included o the program of his first appearanc in Worcester as the new conducto of the Boston Symphony orchestr The concert is in Mechanics ha Tuesday evening, Feb. 17.

The principal monuments of t genius of Moussorgsky are the tw operas "Boris Godunov" and "Kh vantchina." The prelude to the la ter, which is to be played, depi the coming of dawn over the R Square in the Kremlin at Mosko The piece has its distinct color a mood suggestive of the subject.

"The Flight of the Bumble Bee" a little scherzo from Rimsky-K sakov's fairly opera, "Tsar Saltan," in which a prince transforms himself into a bee for his own purposes. This tiny piece exacts an aerial lightnes and fleetness from the wood win which is a marvel of virtuosity. It charm is evident from the fact tha when Mr. Koussevitzky performed in Boston, an encore was demande and granted for the first time sin the first beginnings of the orche tra, 40 years ago.

Seats for the concert are on sa at Steinert's.

HADLEY CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Margarete Matzenauer Is Heard as Soloist

Globe Feb 7

Henry Hadley, associate conductor the New York Philharmonic Orchestr conducted yesterday's Symphony co cert as "Guest Conductor." The chi item on the program was Mr Hadley Fourth Symphony, "North, East, Sout West." Margarete Matzenauer, of th Metropolitan Opera, sang airs Mozart and Beethoven, as solois Strauss' "Don Juan" and Smetana overture to "The Bartered Bride" we the other numbers on Mr Hadley's pr gram. Mr Koussevitzky, from a se in the first balcony, was an interest auditor.

This is the first time that an Ame can has conducted a concert by t Boston Symphony Orchestra, thou many American composers have performances of their own works these concerts. Mr Hadley was born Somerville 54 years ago. He stud music in Boston and in Europe. home for some years has been in N York.

Mr Hadley's Fourth Symphony first performed in 1911 at Norfolk, Co It had not been given in Boston u yesterday, although various others his numerous compositions for orch tra have been heard from time to t at these concerts. According to p gram notes furnished by the compo himself the first movement is inten to suggest the frozen North, the sec the Far East, the third, our own Sou ern Darky ragtime rhythms, the fou the spirit of our Pacific Coast.

The composer and conductor was cordially applauded by orchestra and audience at the conclusion of the performance of the symphony.

A man who writes a symphony must either succeed in creating a work of genius or fail hopelessly. It is like writing an epic poem or a five-act tragedy in blank verse. Many have attempted to create works in these noble forms. Very few have succeeded, and among them are no Americans.

The only American symphony is still the one composed by a Czech, Dvorak's "From the New World." It goes without saying that Mr Hadley is a competent and experienced musician. He was at his best as conductor in his own work.

Mme Matzenauer sang with restraint and purity of style. Neither of her airs, "Parto, parto" from Mozart's "Titus" and Beethoven's scene and air "Ah Perfido," is among the supreme masterpieces. She was applauded cordially, but less cordially than on the occasions in the past when she has sung Wagner numbers at these concerts.

Mr Hadley was not successful in bringing out the romantic vehemence and tenderness of Strauss' "Don Juan." Nor did he achieve the requisite clarity in the impetuosity of Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture.

Mr Koussevitzky will conduct an all-French program next week, with d'Indy's second symphony and numbers by Rabaud, Dukas and Roussel.

WORCESTER, MASS.
POST
FEB 7 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY NOW AT ITS BEST

Russian Conductor, Music Add Charms to Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's annual Worcester concert in Mechanics Hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, is the outstanding musical event of the season. No symphony orchestra has so much charm for Worcester music lovers as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at this concert there is the added charm of the new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

He thrilled Europe by his remarkable program making, and was so much talked about that Olin Downes, of the New York Times, formerly music critic of the Boston Post, made a trip to Europe to get his own ideas of the magnetic personality of Koussevitzky. He came back enthusiastic and in a lengthy article predicted that the Russian would be the wonder conductor of America. In Boston he is much admired, and the symphony season was practically sold out when the announcements were made.

The Worcester program is attractive, the symphony being Tschaikovsky's Fifth, there is a Bach concerto, and there are three novelties, two of them Russian, and here is where Koussevitzky is seen at his best.

Seats for the concert are on sale at Steinert's.

37

PAPER Transcript
DATE Feb 7

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Orchestral

For the while, the "unified program" has laid hold upon Mr. Koussevitzky, as it once obsessed Dr. Muck. Not long ago Beethoven filled a pair of concerts; then Stravinsky; while now it is the turn of the elder Parisians. That is to say, for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening he has devised an "all-French" program. The Director of the Conservatory, Monsieur Rabaud, begins it with "La Procession Nocturne." Monsieur Roussel continues it with an occasional piece, "Pour une Fête de Printempts," as yet unheard in Boston. Monsieur Dukas has next place with his poem of the dance, "The Peri"; while, to conclude, Monsieur d'Indy will be heard through the lengths and breadths of his Second Symphony.

On Monday evening in Symphony Hall falls the third of the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts, with the orchestra in full force and high mettle, with Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor of insight, imagination and individuality, through music and players transmuting large powers into communicating fires. Mr. John Charles Thomas, now of full stature as concert-singer, will assist the orchestra in trite airs from Verdi's "Masked Ball" and Massenet's "Herodiade." Mr. Koussevitzky's numbers are the Overture to Glinka's opera, "Ruslan and Ludmilla"; the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird" and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

Symphony Scheduled For Three Appearances

There will be three Boston Symphony concerts next week in Symphony Hall—the third of the Monday Evening Series, and the 15th pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. John Charles Thomas will be the Monday soloist, singing arias of Massenet and Verdi. Serge Koussevitzky will also be heard in Stravinsky's Suite from the "Fire-Bird," Glink's Overture to "Ruszlan and Ludmilla," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A

CINCINNATI, OHIO
BILLBOARD
1925

John Charles Thomas, well-known American baritone, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the third of the supplementary series of concerts in Boston, on February 9.

On Sunday afternoon, February 8 the

NEW YORK
TELEGRAM
FEB 7 192

Serge Koussevitzky is not, contrary to rumor, to leave the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the conclusion of the present season, but will retain the post for at least two years more. Now the subject of an assistant conductor for Mr. Koussevitzky is agitating Boston.

PITTS SANBORN.

---

fell grievously short in authenticity style and the poetry native to this music. It suffered from the conductor's disposition to stretch out phrase after phrase beyond the limits of its elasticity. It revealed unsparingly his lack of a perfectly graduated dynamic range, as well as his predilection for extremities of nuance. The passacaglia, most of all, Mr. Koussevitzky treated to a "reading" extraordinarily perverse and arbitrary, which not only diminished the potent drama of its pages, but, by its indefensible elongations of tempo, menaced the very continuity of its texture. In fine, the performance may have been essential Koussevitzky, but was assuredly not essentially Brahms.

H. F. P.

FEB 8 - 1925

Negro Soloist With Symphony.

A work little heard in New York and introducing a distinct novelty was brought by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky for a recent concert at Carnegie Hall, when Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, was used to sing an air from Belioz oratorio, "The Flight Into Egypt." The novelty was the bringing of eight women from Boston to sing behind the scenes eight measures of Hallelujahs as a conclusion of this ex- cer[illegible] usual New York review-

38

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
FEB 8 1925

The day following the Furtwaengler farewell concert, one had the opportunity of comparing the Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony Orchestras. The [illegible] was on one of its periodical visits to New York and held forth in the same hall.

The Boston organization is fast reclaiming its place and hold upon musical New York. Time was when this orchestra's concerts were the high lights in any musical season here. Subscriptions to its concerts were held year after year by the same people and a long waiting list of prospective subscribers was in evidence.

Then came many troubles such as the Dr. Muck episode, the trouble with the musical union, etc. The excellent orchestra was almost disrupted and it fell behind in artistic worth, as compared with its former glories.

Pierre Monteux gradually brought it back to at least much of its former fame and now Mr. Koussevitzky is going Mr. Monteux one better.

The Boston Orchestra's concerts here are again given to absolute capacity audiences and are again taking on the high plane of excellence as of old.

At present, I think the Philharmonic Society is the finer of the two; certainly the New York orchestra has never played better than it is playing today.

Be that as it may, the Boston orchestra in its performance this week showed much of its old time skill and there can be no doubt that Mr. Koussevitzky is a man to be reckoned with in the field of orchestral conductors.

This Russian has a straightforward manner of conducting and one is impressed with the complete understanding of the man himself in all that relates to orchestral conducting.

The program in this concert embraced Handel's concerto grosso in D minor, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," and Beethoven's symphony in A major.

Te string section of the orchestra shone to its fullest glory in the Handel music. This section of the Boston orchestra has been famous since the days of Nikish. The Moussorgsky number proved to be most interesting and delightful. It is composed of some 10 short episodes. The music is in this Russian's most original style and the work has been arranged by Ravel in a fascinating style.

The orchestra published a very beautiful performance of the Beethoven symphony. In the finale, the conductor stood motionless, part of the time, and let his players go it alone. It was a piece of virtuosity not often seen in the concert halls here.

There was a great deal of enthusiasm shown by the audience for Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 8 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE ON FEB. 17

Worcester's only chance this season to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra is Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, when it makes its annual appearance here in Mechanics hall. With it comes Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, who has become so popular among musical people in this country since joining the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the season. As a program maker the new conductor is a marvel, and makes a strong appeal to the tastes of his hearers.

A feature of the coming appearance here of the orchestra under its new conductor, will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony in E minor. This was the first symphony of Tchaikovsky in which the composer's countryman was heard in America, when it was the principal number of the Pension Fund concert, Dec. 14 last.

Seats for the concert are on sale at Steinert's.

TOLEDO
OHIO
TIMES
FEB 8 1925

Orchestra Conductors.

In many respects the current music season has offered the most interesting situation with respect to symphony conductors this town has ever known. Never have there appeared so many within so brief a space of time; never have they been of such dissimilar qualities; never have the various supporters of each leader rallied more loyally behind their respective favorites.

Wilhelm Furtwaengler concluded, a few evenings ago, his 10 "guest" concerts with the Philharmonic. He finished with his auditors cheering him ecstatically (and Willem Mengelberg was sitting in a Carnegie Hall box, too.)

It wasn't especially pleasant for Mengelberg, who is just about to begin, as I write, his duties as the Philharmonic head . . . for the remainder of the season. Furtwaengler and Mengelberg are rivals. Each is great; and who shall say which is the greater? Furtwaengler will doubtless return next season. The details and length of his stay will depend on what arrangements can be made to release him from certain European conducting obligations.

Meanwhile, Koussevitsky goes merrily on with the Boston Symphony, and with a newly signed contract in his inside pocket. But Koussevitsky's New York popularity isn't exactly growing. Leopold Stokowski is holding his adherents, and also keeping the Philadelphia orchestra up to its usual concert-pitch.

Now for Mengelberg. He will have to do something unique to equal the recognition which has been showered on Furtwaengler.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
FEB 8

ORCHESTRA CONDUCTORS.

In many respects the current music season has offered the most interesting situation with respect to symphony orchestra conductors this town has ever known. Never have there appeared so many within so brief a space of time; never have they been of such dissimilar qualities; never have the various supporters of each leader rallied more loyally behind their respective favorites.

Wilhelm Furtwaengler concluded, a few evenings ago, his ten "guest" concerts with the Philharmonic. He finished with his auditors cheering him ecstatically (and Willem Mengelberg was sitting in a Carnegie hall box, too).

It wasn't especially pleasant for Mengelberg, who is just about to begin, as I write, his duties as the Philharmonic head, for the remainder of the season. Furtwaengler and Mengelberg are rivals. Each is great; and who shall say which is the greater? Furtwaengler will doubtless return next season.

Meanwhile, Koussevitzky goes merrily on with the Boston Symphony, and with a newly signed contract in his inside pocket. But Koussevitzy's New York popularity isn't exactly growing. Leopold Stokowski is holding his adherents, and also keeping the Philadelphia orchestra up to it usual concert-pitch.

THE OPERA FARE.

PAPER Herald

DATE Feb 8

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

There will be three concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall this week. The third of the Monday evening series will take place tomorrow night, with John Charles Thomas, baritone, singing "Eri Tu," from Verdi's "Masked Ball," and Massenet's "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade". Mr. Koussevitzky will also present Glinka's overture to "Russian and Loudmilla," Stravinsky's suite from "The Fire-Bird," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

At the concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct these works by contemporary French composers: Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," "Pour une Fete de Printemps," by Roussel; Dukas's "La Peri", and d'Indy's symphony, B flat major No. 2.

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
FEB 8 1925

With a wealth of musical events promised for the remainder of the month, and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in prospect for March, music lovers are keyed to keenest anticipation. In many respects the Boston Symphony concert will come as a climax of the season's musical events, for under the magic baton of Koussevitsky the great musical organization is rapidly coming back to its former greatness. No personality perhaps excites greater interest than that of a world famous conductor, and so while the Boston Symphony concert is always an event, it will gain added piquancy this year because it gives Portland people their first glimpse of this outstanding new leader in the American concert world.

PAPER Advertiser

DATE Feb 8

MONDAY SYMPHONY

John Charles Thomas will be the soloist at the third Monday symphony concert tomorrow night. He will sing two opera arias. Mr. Koussevitzky will also conduct a Glinka overture, Stravinsky's "Fire-bird" suite and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday night Mr. Koussevitzky will offer a program of works by modern French composers, embracing Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne," Roussel's "Spring Fete" and Vincent d'Indy's second symphony.

CINCINNATI,
OHIO
STAR
FEB 9 1925

Orchestra Conductors

In many respects the current music season has offered the most interesting situation with respect to symphony orchestra conductors this town has ever known. Never have there appeared so many within so brief a space of time; never have they been of such dissimilar qualities; never have the various supporters of each leader rallied more loyally behind their respective favorites.

Wilhelm Furtwaengler concluded, a few evenings ago, his ten "guest" concerts with the Philharmonic. He finished with his auditors cheering him ecstatically (and Willem Mengelberg was sitting in a Carnegie hall box, too.)

It wasn't especially pleasant for Mengelberg, who is just about to begin, as I write, his duties as the Philharmonic head . . . for the remainder of the season. Furtwaengler and Mengelberg are rivals. Each is great; and who shall say which is the greater? Furtwaengler will doubtless return next season. The details and length of his stay will depend on what arrangements can be made to release him from certain European conducting obligations.

Meanwhile, Koussevitzky goes merrily on with the Boston symphony, and with a newly signed contract in his inside pocket. But Koussevitzky's New York popularity isn't exactly growing. Leopold Stokowski is holding his adherents, and also keeping the Philadelphia orchestra up to its usual concert-pitch.

Now for Mengelberg. He will have to do something unique to equal the recognition which has been showered on Furtwaengler.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
FEB 10 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, comes to Worcester next Tuesday evening for its annual concert in Mechanics hall. Of a program of five numbers, including three novelties, of which two are Russian, the outstanding feature is Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony in E minor.

Ernest Newman, New York critic, said: "Koussevitzky's reading of the Tchaikovsky's Number Five is his own and opinion about it will be divided.

Seats for the Worcester concert are on sale at Steinert's.

THIRD OF THE EXTRA CONCERTS ost

eb 10

John Charles Thomas Soloist, With Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The late interregnum at the Symphony concerts ended, Mr. Koussevitzky returned last evening to his own, and it was good once more to feel his magnetic influence at work, to hear from the band its accustomed euphony and finesse, and the brilliance that is not blatancy.

THOMAS THE SOLOIST

For this third concert of the "extra series," Mr. Koussevitzky made a programme on which the two principal items were pieces in which conductor and orchestra had already distinguished themselves, the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

As preface came a performance of Glinka's Overture to his opera "Russlan and Ludmilla," an engaging composition from the pen of Russia's first composer of importance, long unheard here. Last evening it was brilliantly played.

The Monday concerts, at least, adhere consistently to the tradition of the "assisting artist," and on this occasion the soloist was John Charles Thomas, an American singer rapidly assuming an important place in opera house and concert-room. Two war-horses of all baritones, the sonorous "Eri tu" from Verdi's "Masked Ball" and the saccharine "Vision fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade," disclosed Mr. Thomas' voice at its best, while he sang with a blend of dignity and fervor b fitting a symphony concert. Nor was there any mistaking the pleasure that the audience received from his performance.

WORCESTER, MASS.
POST
FEB 10 1925

DOWNES IN TRIBUTE TO KOUSSEVITZKY

Conduct of Russian Number By Symphony Lauded

The outstanding musical feature of the season is the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in Mechanics Hall next Tuesday evening at 8.15 o'clock. There is a program of five numbers of which Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony in E Minor is the feature number. There are three novelties, two of the Russian, including "The Flight of the Bumble-bee," and there is a Bach concerto in three movements, but Tchaikovsky's Number Five is what the patrons will be waiting for. On December 30, the worst night of the year in New York, from the weather standpoint, Carnegie Hall was crowded to welcome the Boston symphony and Koussevitzky, and the fifth symphony was what drew them there.

Olin Downes of the Times, said "Nothing could better have illustrated the variety and contrast of qualities that go to the making of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, than this symphony which concluded the program. In majesty, in irrestible power, and in the control retained by the conductor, even in the moments of the most frantic rejoicing, this was a performance to remember, a performance of heroic and kindling glory. It is no common musician, or ordinary man, who does a thing like this and Mr. Koussevitzky, with his singular greatness, is not an artist to be reckoned by common measurements."

Tickets for the Worcester concert are on sale at Steinert's.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 10 192

Boston Symphony

A recent issue of the New Yo World has a lengthy article concer ing the Boston Symphony Orchest and its Russian conductor, Serg Koussevitzky. The annual concer by the orchestra wil be in Mechanic hall next Tuesday evening at 8.1 o'clock. The article was written b Deems Taylor, the widely known critic. He said "It cost something to wade, swim, slide, ski and otherwise navigate to Carnegie hall last night to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra play, and the highest compliment one can possibly pay the concert is to report, briefly, that it was worth it." Mr. Koussevitzky offered a rarely balanced and satisfying program and his choirs sang together in very plausible imitation of the morning stars."

Seats for the Worcester concert are on sale at Steinert's.

---

funny sayings with some really clever dancing.

Globe Feb 10

THOMAS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

For the third of the Monday night symphony concerts, Mr Koussevitzky offered last night a program that ranged musical history and musical geography, for it ran from Glinka to Stravinsky, and from Russia to Italy. The exciting suite from the "Oiseau de Feu" was perhaps the high point of the program for those who do not take their music as a ritual; for those who do not easily assimilate modern food, there was the four-square, repetitional Seventh Symphony, wonderfully played. Mr Koussevitsky conducted in his now well known headlong fashion. Listening to the allegro movement of the symphony, one man remarked, "If that conductor ever sees 'presto' written on a score, God help the orchestra!"

The soloist, Mr John Charles Thomas, dealt powerfully with the noble aria written for Renato in Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera." His voice was in excellent condition, and he was much at ease with the showy, old-fashioned song and recitative. Hhe more melodious, more tragic song from Massenet's "Herodiade" was even more pleasing, and audience and orchestra alike applauded Mr Thomas, obliging him to return to the stage many times to bow his thanks.

The Glinka overture, though it was performed in Boston as long ago as 1873, is not often heard here. It was interesting to hear it in juxtaposition to Stravinsky's fireworks, allowing a comparison of racial color; a malicious listener might have said it was interesting also to note the selection of a symphony that would hint that Mr Stravinsky's use of explosions and surprises, of abrupt breaks and rhythms insisted on, were by no means original discoveries.

The suite was magnificently played, and for once Mr Hale's dictum, that "no movement of the suite depends for its musical effect on the stage setting or a dramatic situation" was absolutely true. Listening to that music, one was forced to see stage color and dramatic action far more vivid and far more exciting than anything that human impressario could produce.

Of Mr Koussevitzky's reading of the Beethoven symphony, it is possible t say only that he gets more out of than most other conductors. It mu be added that he also takes it le seriously than some men do—which just as well. Perhaps more in Bosto than in other cities, there is a ten dency to accept anything labelled "sym phony by Beethoven" as perfection an a thing beyond which nobody ever cou go.

The fourth of the Monday evening concerts is announced for March 30, when Myra Hess, the pianist, will be the soloist.

38

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
FEB 8 1925

The day following the Furtwaengler farewell concert, one had the opportunity of comparing the Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony Orchestras. The latter was on one of its periodical visits to New York and held forth in the same hall.

The Boston organization is fast reclaiming its place and hold upon musical New York. Time was when this orchestra's concerts were the high lights in any musical season here. Subscriptions to its concerts were held year after year by the same people and a long waiting list of prospective subscribers was in evidence.

Then came many troubles such as the Dr. Muck episode, the trouble with the musical union, etc. The excellent orchestra was almost disrupted and it fell behind in artistic worth, as compared with its former glories.

Pierre Monteux gradually brought it back to at least much of its former fame and now Mr. Koussevitzky is going Mr. Monteux one better.

The Boston Orchestra's concerts here are again given to absolute capacity audiences and are again taking on the high plane of excellence as of old.

At present, I think the Philharmonic Society is the finer of the two; certainly the New York orchestra has never played better than it is playing today.

Be that as it may, the Boston orchestra in its performance this week showed much of its old time skill and there can be no doubt that Mr. Koussevitzky is a man to be reckoned with in the field of orchestral conductors.

This Russian has a straightforward manner of conducting and one is impressed with the complete understanding of the man himself in all that relates to orchestral conducting.

The program in this concert embraced Handel's concerto grosso in D minor, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," and Beethoven's symphony in A major.

Te string section of the orchestra shone to its fullest glory in the Handel music. This section of the Boston orchestra has been famous since the days of Nikish. The Moussorgsky number proved to be most interesting and delightful. It is composed of some 10 short episodes. The music is in this Russian's most original style and the work has been arranged by Ravel in a fascinating style.

The orchestra published a very beautiful performance of the Beethoven symphony. In the finale, the conductor stood motionless, part of the time, and let his players go it alone. It was a piece of virtuosity not often seen in the concert halls here.

There was a great deal of enthusiasm shown by the audience for Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 8 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE ON FEB. 17

Worcester's only chance this season to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra is Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, when it makes its annual appearance here in Mechanics hall. With it comes Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, who has become so popular among musical people in this country since joining the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the season. As a program maker the new conductor is a marvel, and makes a strong appeal to the tastes of his hearers.

A feature of the coming appearance here of the orchestra under its new conductor, will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony in E minor. This was the first symphony of Tchaikovsky in which the composer's countryman was heard in America, when it was the principal number of the Pension Fund concert, Dec. 14 last.

Seats for the concert are on sale at Steinert's.

TOLEDO
OHIO
TIMES
FEB 8 1925

Orchestra Conductors.

In many respects the current music season has offered the most interesting situation with respect to symphony conductors this town has ever known. Never have there appeared so many within so brief a space of time; never have they been of such dissimilar qualities; never have the various supporters of each leader rallied more loyally behind their respective favorites.

Wilhelm Furtwaengler concluded, a few evenings ago, his 10 "guest" concerts with the Philharmonic. He finished with his auditors cheering him ecstatically (and Willem Mengelberg was sitting in a Carnegie Hall box, too.)

It wasn't especially pleasant for Mengelberg, who is just about to begin, as I write, his duties as the Philharmonic head . . . . for the remainder of the season. Furtwaengler and Mengelberg are rivals. Each is great; and who shall say which is the greater? Furtwaengler will doubtless return next season. The details and length of his stay will depend on what arrangements can be made to release him from certain European conducting obligations.

Meanwhile, Koussevitsky goes merrily on with the Boston Symphony, and with a newly signed contract in his inside pocket. But Koussevitsky's New York popularity isn't exactly growing. Leopold Stokowski is holding his adherents, and also keeping the Philadelphia orchestra up to its usual concert-pitch.

Now for Mengelberg. He will have to do something unique to equal the recognition which has been showered on Furtwaengler.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
FEB 8

ORCHESTRA CONDUCTORS.

In many respects the current music season has offered the most interesting situation with respect to symphony orchestra conductors this town has ever known. Never have there appeared so many within so brief a space of time; never have they been of such dissimilar qualities; never have the various supporters of each leader rallied more loyally behind their respective favorites.

Wilhelm Furtwaengler concluded, a few evenings ago, his ten "guest" concerts with the Philharmonic. He finished with his auditors cheering him ecstatically (and Willem Mengelberg was sitting in a Carnegie hall box, too).

It wasn't especially pleasant for Mengelberg, who is just about to begin, as I write, his duties as the Philharmonic head, for the remainder of the season. Furtwaengler and Mengelberg are rivals. Each is great; and who shall say which is the greater? Furtwaengler will doubtless return next season.

Meanwhile, Koussevitzky goes merrily on with the Boston Symphony, and with a newly signed contract in his inside pocket. But Koussevitzy's New York popularity isn't exactly growing. Leopold Stokowski is holding his adherents, and also keeping the Philadelphia orchestra up to it usual concert-pitch.

THE OPERA FARE.

PAPER Herald

DATE Feb 8

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

There will be three concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall this week. The third of the Monday evening series will take place tomorrow night, with John Charles Thomas, baritone, singing "Eri Tu," from Verdi's "Masked Ball," and Massenet's "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade". Mr. Koussevitzky will also present Glinka's overture to "Russlan and Loudmilla," Stravinsky's suite from "The Fire-Bird," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

At the concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct these works by contemporary French composers: Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," "Pour une Fete de Printemps," by Roussel; Dukas's "La Peri", and d'Indy's symphony, B flat major No. 2.

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
FEB 8 1925

With a wealth of musical events promised for the remainder of the month, and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in prospect for March, music lovers are keyed to keenest anticipation. In many respects the Boston Symphony concert will come as a climax of the season's musical events, for under the magic baton of Koussevitsky the great musical organization is rapidly coming back to its former greatness. No personality perhaps excites greater interest than that of a world famous conductor, and so while the Boston Symphony concert is always an event, it will gain added piquancy this year because it gives Portland people their first glimpse of this outstanding new leader in the American concert world.

ations given for Miss

PAPER Advertiser

DATE Feb 8

MONDAY SYMPHONY

John Charles Thomas will be the soloist at the third Monday symphony concert tomorrow night. He will sing two opera arias. Mr. Koussevitzky will also conduct a Glinka overture, Stravinsky's "Fire-bird" suite and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday night Mr. Koussevitzky will offer a program of works by modern French composers, embracing Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne," Roussel's "Spring Fete" and Vincent d'Indy's second symphony.

CINCINNATI,
OHIO
STAR
FEB 9 1925

Orchestra Conductors

In many respects the current music season has offered the most interesting situation with respect to symphony orchestra conductors this town has ever known. Never have there appeared so many within so brief a space of time; never have they been of such dissimilar qualities; never have the various supporters of each leader rallied more loyally behind their respective favorites.

Wilhelm Furtwaengler concluded, a few evenings ago, his ten "guest" concerts with the Philharmonic. He finished with his auditors cheering him ecstatically (and Willem Mengelberg was sitting in a Carnegie hall box, too.)

It wasn't especially pleasant for Mengelberg, who is just about to begin, as I write, his duties as the Philharmonic head . . . for the remainder of the season. Furtwaengler and Mengelberg are rivals. Each is great; and who shall say which is the greater? Furtwaengler will doubtless return next season. The details and length of his stay will depend on what arrangements can be made to release him from certain European conducting obligations.

Meanwhile, Koussevitzky goes merrily on with the Boston symphony, and with a newly signed contract in his inside pocket. But Koussevitzky's New York popularity isn't exactly growing. Leopold Stokowski is holding his adherents, and also keeping the Philadelphia orchestra up to its usual concert-pitch.

Now for Mengelberg. He will have to do something unique to equal the recognition which has been showered on Furtwaengler.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
FEB 10 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, comes to Worcester next Tuesday evening for its annual concert in Mechanics hall. Of a program of five numbers, including three novelties, of which two are Russian, the outstanding feature is Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony in E minor.

Ernest Newman, New York critic, said: "Koussevitzky's reading of the Tchaikovsky's Number Five is his own and opinion about it will be divided.

Seats for the Worcester concert are on sale at Steinert's.

THIRD OF THE EXTRA CONCERTS

John Charles Thomas Soloist, With Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The late interregnum at the Symphony concerts ended, Mr. Koussevitzky returned last evening to his own, and it was good once more to feel his magnetic influence at work, to hear from the band its accustomed euphony and finesse, and the brilliance that is not blatancy.

THOMAS THE SOLOIST

For this third concert of the "extra series," Mr. Koussevitzky made a programme on which the two principal items were pieces in which conductor and orchestra had already distinguished themselves, the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

As preface came a performance of Glinka's Overture to his opera "Russlan and Ludmilla," an engaging composition from the pen of Russia's first composer of importance, long unheard here. Last evening it was brilliantly played.

The Monday concerts, at least, adhere consistently to the tradition of the "assisting artist," and on this occasion the soloist was John Charles Thomas, an American singer rapidly assuming an important place in opera house and concert-room. Two war-horses of all baritones, the sonorous "Eri tu" from Verdi's "Masked Ball" and the saccharine "Vision fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade," disclosed Mr. Thomas' voice at its best, while he sang with a blend of dignity and fervor b- fitting a symphony concert. Nor was there any mistaking the pleasure that the audience received from his performance.

WORCESTER, MASS.
POST
FEB 10 1925

DOWNES IN TRIBUTE TO KOUSSEVITZKY

Conduct of Russian Number By Symphony Lauded

The outstanding musical feature of the season is the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in Mechanics Hall next Tuesday evening at 8.15 o'clock. There is a program of five numbers of which Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony in E Minor is the feature number. There are three novelties, two of the Russian, including "The Flight of the Bumble-bee," and there is a Bach concerto in three movements, but Tchaikovsky's Number Five is what the patrons will be waiting for. On December 30, the worst night of the year in New York, from the weather standpoint, Carnegie Hall was crowded to welcome the Boston symphony and Koussevitzky, and the fifth symphony was what drew them there.

Olin Downes of the Times, said "Nothing could better have illustrated the variety and contrast of qualities that go to the making of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, than this symphony which concluded the program. In majesty, in irrestible pow|er, and in the control retained by the conductor, even in the moments of the most frantic rejoicing, this was a performance to remember, a performance of heroic and kindling glory. It is no common musician, or ordinary man, who does a thing like this and Mr. Koussevitzky, with his singular greatness, is not an artist to be reckoned by common measurements."

Tickets for the Worcester concert are on sale at Steinert's.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 10 192

Boston Symphony

A recent issue of the New Yo World has a lengthy article concer ing the Boston Symphony Orchest and its Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The annual concert by the orchestra wil be in Mechanics hall next Tuesday evening at 8.1 o'clock. The article was written by Deems Taylor, the widely known critic. He said "It cost something to wade, swim, slide, ski and otherwise navigate to Carnegie hall last night to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra play, and the highest compliment one can possibly pay the concert is to report, briefly, that it was worth it." Mr. Koussevitzky offered a rarely balanced and satisfying program and his choirs sang together in very plausible imitation of the morning stars."

Seats for the Worcester concert are on sale at Steinert's.

Morton, funny sayings with some really clever dancing.

Globe Feb 10

THOMAS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

For the third of the Monday night symphony concerts, Mr Koussevitzky offered last night a program that ranged musical history and musical geography, for it ran from Glinka to Stravinsky, and from Russia to Italy. The exciting suite from the "Oiseau de Feu" was perhaps the high point of the program for those who do not take their music as a ritual; for those who do not easily assimilate modern food, there was the four-square, repetitional Seventh Symphony, wonderfully played. Mr Koussevitzky conducted in his now well known headlong fashion. Listening to the allegro movement of the symphony, one man remarked, "If that conductor ever sees 'presto' written on a score, God help the orchestra!"

The soloist, Mr John Charles Thomas, dealt powerfully with the noble aria written for Renato in Verdi's 'Un Ballo in Maschera.' His voice was in excellent condition, and he was much at ease with the showy, old-fashioned song and recitative. The more melodious, more tragic song from Massenet's "Herodiade" was even more pleasing, and audience and orchestra alike applauded Mr Thomas, obliging him to return to the stage many times to bow his thanks.

The Glinka overture, though it was performed in Boston as long ago as 1873, is not often heard here. It was interesting to hear it in juxtaposition to Stravinsky's fireworks, allowing a comparison of racial color; a malicious listener might have said it was interesting also to note the selection of a symphony that would hint that Mr Stravinsky's use of explosions and surprises, of abrupt breaks and rhythms insisted on, were by no means original discoveries.

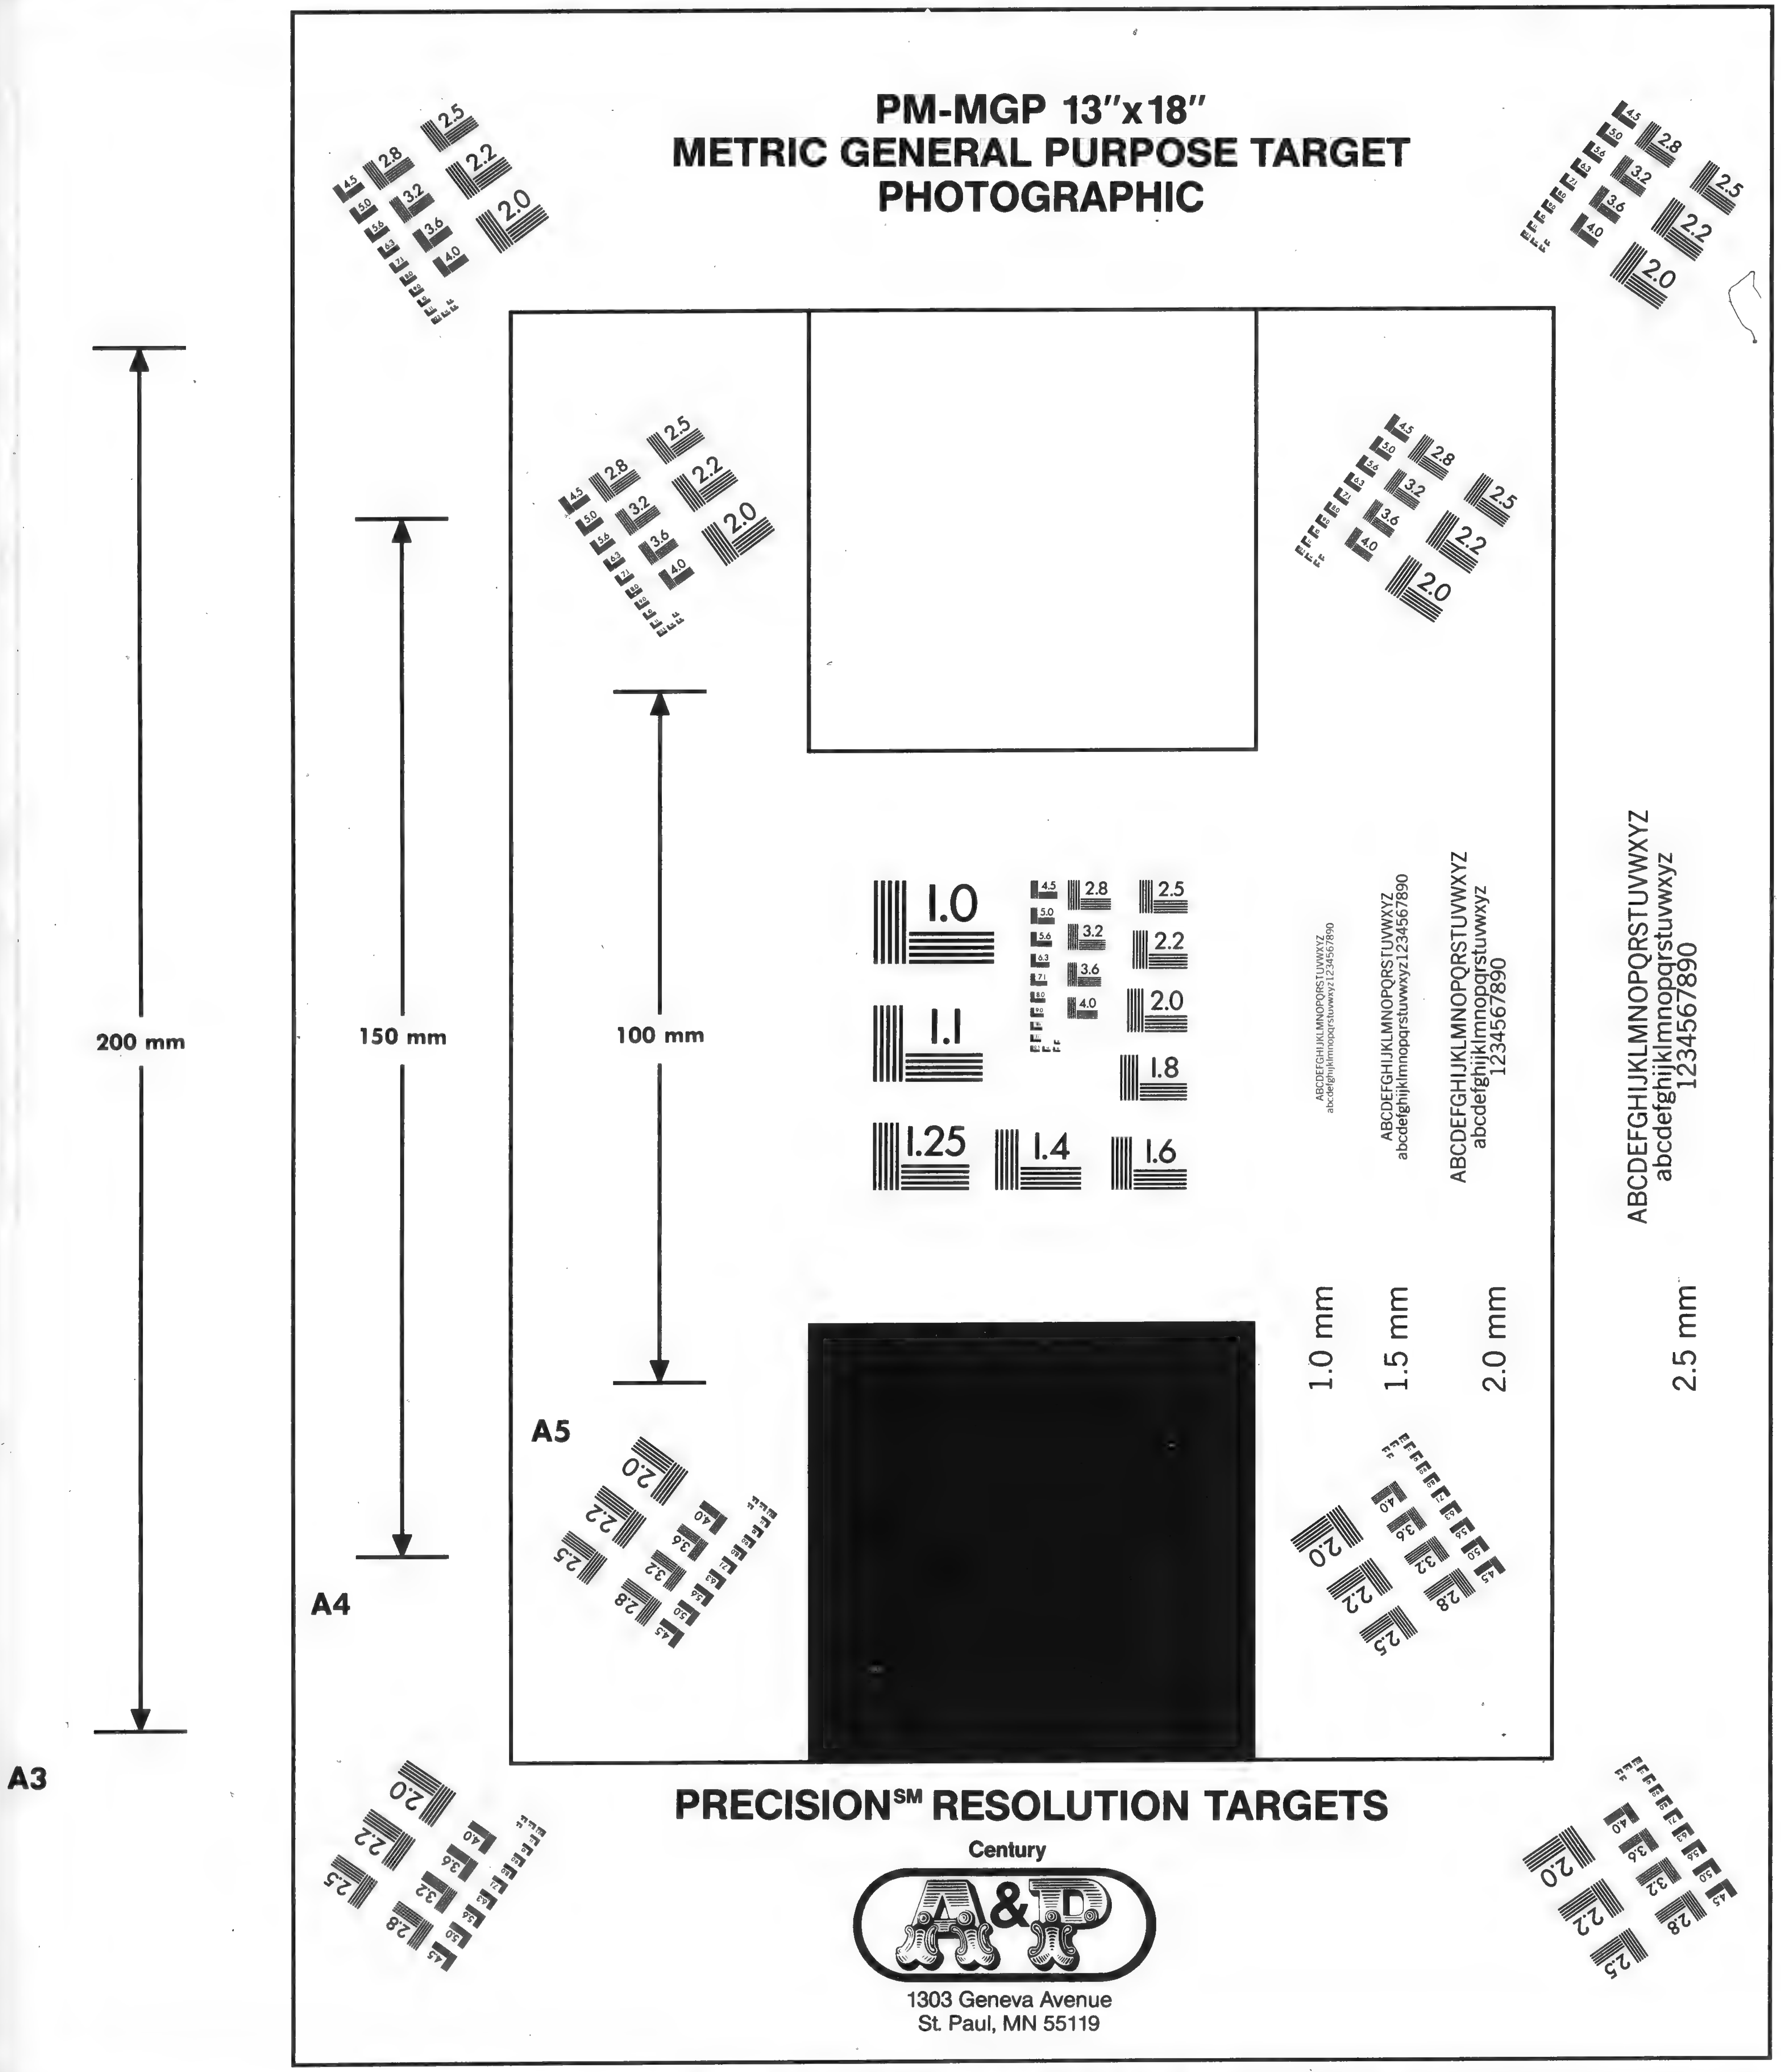
The suite was magnificently played, and for once Mr Hale's dictum, that "no movement of the suite depends for its musical effect on the stage setting or a dramatic situation" was absolutely true. Listening to that music, one was forced to see stage color and dramatic action far more vivid and far more exciting than anything that human impresario could produce.

Of Mr Koussevitzky's reading of the Beethoven symphony, it is possible to say only that he gets more out of it than most other conductors. It must be added that he also takes it less seriously than some men do—which is just as well. Perhaps more in Boston than in other cities, there is a tendency to accept anything labelled "symphony by Beethoven" as perfection and a thing beyond which nobody ever can go.

The fourth of the Monday evening concerts is announced for Marc when Myra Hess, the pianist, will be the soloist.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 11 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TUESDAY

The visit to Worcester next Tuesday evening of the Boston Symphony orchestra is the only chance local musical people will have to hear this famous organization this season. People visiting Boston for the symphony concerts will have difficulty in securing seats, for the entire course has been practically sold out. The concert is to be given in Mechanics hall at 8.15 o'clock and with the orchestra comes Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor, who created so much interest among musical people since assuming the leadership of the famous organization.

Everywhere the orchestra has visited Koussevitzky has been the lion of the hour, and his conducting is one of the outstanding events of the musical season. In New York he has been received with signal honors, and his interpretations of the famous old symphonies have aroused unusual interest. The program for Worcesters includes Tchaikovsky' Fifth symphony, which has been heard not too often in this country. Under Koussevitsky's baton this symphony has been one of the great features of symphony program makers.

Seats for the Worcester concert are on sale at Steinert's.

Herald
Feb. 12

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Again we ask, who wrote that pathetic ballad of home life: "Who Put the Overalls in Mrs. Crowley's Chowder?"

The program of the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening is devoted to contemporary French composers. It comprises Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession"; Roussel's "For a Spring Festival," which will be played in Boston for the first time; "The Beri," Dance Poem by Dukas, and d'Indy's Second Symphony, B flat major Roussel's piece has been performed in New York by the Philharmonic Society, led by Mr. Mengelberg. Mr. Monteux thought of bringing it out in Boston, and the announcement was made, but he substituted Roussel's "La Ville Rose." "For a Spring Festival" was composed early in 1920 near Grenoble about the time of Roussel's Symphony which Mr. Koussevitzky conducted early this season. The music is said to be in the composer's "new manner."

Next week Miss Nadia Boulanger, organist, will be the soloist. She will play a concerto in D minor by Handel, and take part in the performance of her sister Lili's "Pour les Funerailles d'un Soldat," and Aaron Copland's symphony for organ and orchestra. The program will also include Mozart's Serenade, "Kleine Nachmusik" (K. No. 525), and Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Tasso."

On Jan. 30 in Paris Mme. Janacopulos sang nothing but songs by Stravinsky. There was an audience. France has its heroes and heroines in peace as well as in war.

Meanwhile in New York the lions of the press, old and young, are endeavoring to assign Stravinsky his proper place among contemporary composers.

WATERBURY
CONN.
~~HERALD~~
American
FEB 12 1925

While Waterbury Languishes.

(Hartford Times.)

With Roland Hayes, Gigli, Chaliapin, Ponselle, Boston Symphony and others appearing in rapid succession Hartford may be said to be having a truly distinguished musical season. There is no need to go elsewhere to hear the celebrated artists of the day, as they are all finding the way to Hartford.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 13 19

Boston Symphony

The ~~Boston~~ symphony orchestra is coming to Worcester Tuesday evening to give a concert in Mechanics hall. With this orchestra of 104 pieces comes Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor, who has created so much enthusiasm in musical circles since coming to Boston as leader of the organization. A vital fact to be considered by music-loving people of Worcester is that this will be the only chance to hear the orchestra. A splendid program has been made up by Conductor Koussevitzky for the Worcester concert. It includes Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony, in E minor, which is artiscally done by this orchestra.

Seats for the concert are on sale at Steinert's.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
FEB 13 192

BOSTON SYMPHONY

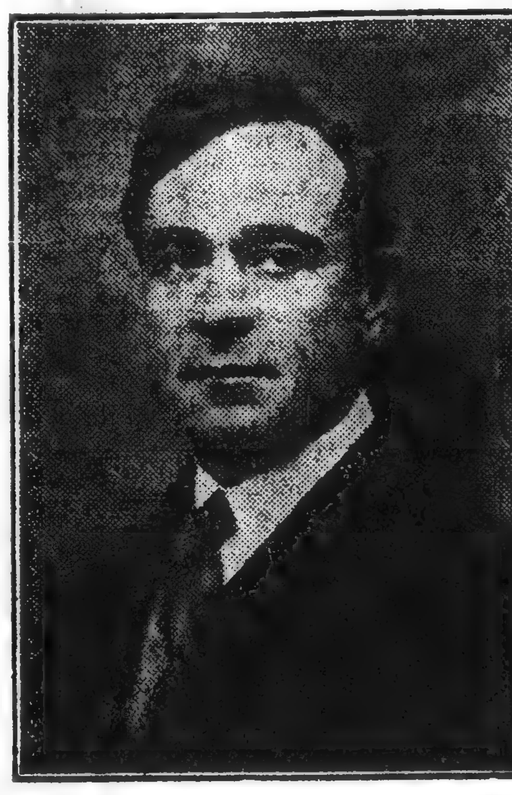
The visit to Worcester next Tuesday evening for its annual concert is the only opportunity Worcester symphony lovers will have to hear this organization, for there is no chance in hearing it if one goes to Boston for a concert. The entire season course of 61 concerts at Symphony hall is sold out and there are no tickets available for people from Worcester or any other city this season, an unprecedented record for the Boston orchestra. Seats for the concert are on sale at Steinert's

---

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
FEB 14 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE

Koussevitzky Will Direct His First Concert in Worcester Tuesday Night



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, 104 pieces, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gives its annual concert in Mechanics hall Tuesday evening. This is the first visit to Worcester of Koussevitsky, who created enthusiasm this season as conductor of this famous organization.

The program opens with C. P. E. Bach's Concerto in D major, three movements, one of the classics of modern music, are three novelties introduced, Berlioz's overture to "The Roman Carnival," and two Russian numbers, Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble-Bee," from the fairy opera, "The Bumble-Bee."

The closing number is the outstanding composition of the program, Tchaikowsky's Fifth symphony, played by this orchestra in Boston and New York this season, which has created profound interest. The management of the orchestra announces that seats for the orchestra concerts in Boston are sold out for the entire season and that the only chance the Worcester musical public will have to hear the orchestra this season will be on Tuesday evening. Seats are on sale at Steinert's.

Transcript
Feb. 14

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY GATHERS TOGETHER MUSIC FROM FRANCE

RABAUD AND ROUSSEL, DUKAS AND D'INDY

After Three Weeks, the Conductor Rejoins His Audience—Impeccable Tone-Picture; Sumptuous Tone-Poem; Piece That Baffles; Masterful, Mental and "Convincing" Symphony—The Mettle of Performance

THE signs were no bigger than a man's hand; but they may have been signs none the less. Yesterday, after an interval of three weeks, Mr. Koussevitzky was again conductor at the Symphony Concert. Roving upward, the eye spied empty seats here and there in the upper balcony, where the non-subscribing public, for a price and the waiting, may perch; while a few vacant chairs were also discoverable in the areas consecrated to the subscribing faithful. Attentive to the applause, some ears found it spasmodic and occasionally labored for the first times since Mr. Koussevitzky went to and fro upon the platform of Symphony Hall. Certainly, at no previous concert of the current year, have departures so filled the later intervals. The obvious explanation was, of course, the program. It consumed two hours, and [illegible] minutes more, which is longish on a Friday afternoon. It contained Mr. d'Indy's Symphony in B-flat, admittedly not the easiest of listening; while all else upon it was music of living, but elderly, Parisian composers—Mr. Rabaud of "La Procession Nocturne"; Mr. Roussel of "Pour une Fête de Printemps"; Mr. Dukas of "La Péri; Poème Dansé." Too much, said the by-standing wiseacres, and too much of one kind.

Even so, at the back of two or three heads lingered the impression that a spell had been broken and not quite reconstituted. Through fourteen pairs of concerts, interrupted only by occasional and expected weeks of journeying, Mr. Koussevitzky, at his post, had held this audience of Friday afternoon in the hollow of his hand. Then came not only the week in which there was no concert, but also the week in which orchestra and audience, by the inscrutable wisdom of the trustees, were delivered to Mr. Henry Hadley. No doubt, Mr. Koussevitzky needed his seven days of repose after seven days of successive concerts. Yet from Saturday, Jan. 24 until Friday, Feb. 13, he did not tread in public the familiar stage, working his will upon an expectant audience. Every old hand of the theater will be quick to say that such an interval was enough to loosen any conceivable spell laid by a mortal conductor. As likely as not the weeks to come will tighten and restore it. Yet there were—on Friday the Thirteenth—these signs of relaxation.

The program was too long, in part because the official counter of hours and minutes did not always reckon upon Mr. Koussevitzky's passion for the slow movement slow. Mr. d'Indy's Symphony is exacting; yet the other three pieces, each in its kind, were by no means tedious. Since Mr. Rabaud, as conductor no less than composer, first unfolded his tone-poem at the Symphony Concerts, nobody has had a mind to quarrel with it. A neater, smoother, better rounded specimen of its sort does not exist. As a museum-piece, it is almost certain to be preserved. Read a translation in the program-book of Lenau's suggesting poem, and the course of the music is simplicity and transparency themselves The murk, the stillness, the stir of the forest; the solitary and brooding Faust; the light, the song, the march, now near, now far, of the pious procession; the surge of Faust's answering emotion—all are written large and clear in Mr. Rabaud's measures. Every note that he sets upon his staves does exactly and economically its appointed office. More appropriate pages it is impossible to conceive, though imagination, invention and individuality hardly haunt them. Sound and scholarly, of a sweet nature and a pleasing voice is Mr. Rabaud. What more is there to ask of the younger days and the earlier work of a Director of the Conservatory—unless by some off-chance he happens to be a Gabriel Fauré? To play the music, moreover, obviously gave pleasure to Mr. Koussevitzky. He could languish through the slow introduction; not too fast need go the holy canticle and then—the tonal surge of Faust's emotion. Besides, was there not occasion for at least two of the conductor's unsurpassable diminuendi into silence?

Nor is the "Poème Dansé" of Mr. Paul Abraham Dukas a task and a weariness upon the ear, though doubtless it would more signify were the Prince and the Peri, the Flower of Immortality, and other trappings of old and ornate legend outspread as in the theater. Hardly upon the discreet platform of Symphony Hall does the music as tone-poem evoke golden mountains or crimson valleys; the face "more delicious than the face of Gurda-Ferrid" or the upraised and heaven-borne "flower of flame." Neither in Paris nor elsewhere has "The Peri" flourished on the stage of the dance. Mr. Diaghilev was not hospitable to her; the Opéra-Comique soon shut her in a dark closet; Mme. Pavlova tried, succeeded—and persisted not. Yet to the sensuous Persian fab[illegible] as Mr. Dukas seems to conceive it) he[illegible]s set an exceedingly sumptuous music. It is as thick of texture, as luxurious of [illegible]armony, as sinuous of progress, as tho[illegible]gh Messieurs Debussy and Ravel along with a whole French tradition were non-existent. It is of Mr. Dukas surrendered to his Semitic blood, cultivating the oriental flavors of Goldmark, not unaware of the Wagner who could be supersensuous.

A lush imagination invents, animates and achieves the music. It is soft and pulpy like an Eastern fruit. Hot and artificial, as of the forcing house, is the richness of color. Though the legend evoke the ends of the earth, noonday and sunset, images of the forest and of the mountain-top, the measures sound out of the thick walls, the moist and shadowy twilights of an Oriental palace. Studiously, "effectively," Mr. Dukas fashioned his "Poème Dansé" on his writing table for the theater. Possibly it cloyed there. Certainly it is over-luscious in the concert-hall—especially when Mr. Koussevitzky, being Russian and therefore quasi-Oriental, adds his own unguents and perfumes. Hearing him in "The Peri," it is easy to wish to hear him in Goldmark's "Sakountala."

It is within supposition—and maybe belief—that Mr. Albert Roussel, having written a piece of music for the sake of the music, cast his eye out of his study-window and saw the spring in the sky; that at the same moment his ear caught the echoes of a fête over the way at a neighbor's. Thereupon, being hard put for a title, he wrote "Pour une Fête de Printemps" at the top of his score and let it go at that. At the least this conjecture seems as plausible as the speculations arrayed in the program-book around these relatively innocent pages. They recall Mr. Roussel's memories of festivals in the Far East. They smack of the Place Pigalle and other haunts hard by the sacred Butte. They may be an idyl; they could be an interrupted Scherzo; possibly they are a Sinfonietta not a little compressed. Possibly also they are neither more nor less than a piece of music in which Mr. Roussel set ideas that germinated within him; developed them according to the imagination, the invention and the mood they stirred, and therewith rested content. The motivs and the reiterated figures hardly engross the ear; but Mr. Roussel leads them into measures that move with rhythmic animation through shadowy harmonies or vigorous progressions; that utilize skilfully assembled or parted or individualized instrumental voices. There is mood as well, from a quickening animation to a gentle, introspective musing; while throughout, the music swims in an atmosphere of its own—as though soft, grey spring veils overhung it with a little of mist and a little of mystery. With an occasional monotony, yet with a semi-occasional poetry of tones, it all sounds. Even Mr. Koussevitzky's sensitive ear and hand do not quite clarify his friend's music.

Upon Mr. d'Indy's Second Symphony—become the classic French Symphony of those latter days—the conductor spared not one of his revealing and enhancing powers. The High Priest of the Schola Cantorum is nothing if not architectural—and upon ear and mind Mr. Koussevitzky upreared the tonal edifice, lofty, firm-set and austere. More: he gave it an audible spaciousness and freedom of ascent, as though Franckian faiths and formulas, inbred in Mr. d'Indy, might not crib or halt it. At every turn he sharpened the rhythms until the music gained a new impetus, vitality, cumulation. Not a detail escaped him or seemed in the passing instant misconstrued, misplaced or over-emphasized. Often they were as edge and pungency upon the music; or else fell like high light upon it and upon the composer's imagination. Nowhere did Mr. Koussevitzky miss, nor anywhere would he soften, the hard, keen glint of contours and harmonies. The spare progressions, the stark sonorities sounded with Mr. d'Indy's taut-strung voice. Above all, the conductor caught and heightened the essential life of the music wherein the two principal motivs—and the motivs that they generate—go to and fro in advance and recession, in conflict not to be stayed or stilled. Vitalize Mr. Koussevitzky will and must. Least of all shall the "cerebral" d'Indy escape him. For once and throughout, there was no quarrelling with the ways and means.

So played, the limitations of the Symphony in B-flat are the limitations of the composer's mind and spirit. Sensuous he cannot be, and in spite of his intensity of creation, the years do not lessen the pages dry and the pages labored. To be simple or to give the illusion of simplicity was as strange to the d'Indy of these middle years of fertility and prime. In intricate conflict he must set his motivs. Complex must be the progress of his music. Afresh and afresh he must marshal and assort the contributing elements. Yet passion he knows, though it be passion of the mind and the spirit. Not without such impulse may music rise, take shape and command the listening imagination as does the first movement of the Symphony outspread. The exaltation of the slow division is as unmistakable and penetrating as the austerity. A third movement harks back to the grave song of the viola; of a sudden wills itself into new and stirring energies. From a fugue, characteristically expands and mounts the reverberant proclamation of the close.

It is quite true that Mr. d'Indy brings this music to pass by mental process. Strange to him are either the mighty outbursts or the mighty ease of Beethoven. Far from him, searching mind and heart, is the fullness of Brahms. He can no more sing with a Schubert than glow with a Wagner incandescent. He lacks Franck's communicating and enfolding humanity. By a power of mind he commands; by the passion with which he puts that power in play he conquers. A meaningless, a misleading, word to apply to work in the arts is "convincing." In the theater, the concert-hall, the picture-gallery, on the printed page, they can have no such purpose, gain no such end. Mr. d'Indy's Symphony in B-flat is the exception. Here at last, and for once, is music that convinces. No other way could he write it.

H. T. P.

American
Feb 14

SYMPHONY IN BRILLIANT PROGRAM

Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, arranged for yesterday afternoon's concert a program consisting entirely of works of contemporary French composers. This idea of "unifying" a program is not a new one, for Carl Muck used to be a great exponent of it. But it is always a question as to whether a program that has unity can at the same time have sufficient variety.

Mr. Koussevitzky was either lucky or very judicious, for his program sounded better than it looked on paper before the concert began. "La Procession Nocturne," by Henri Rabaud, former conductor of the orchestra, was played for the third time here, and each time it has sounded better. To this writer it was the most impressive piece on the program.

D'Indy's Second Symphony, which was played, is much too long, and cries out for cutting. It has some beautiful pages, nevertheless, which were eloquently rendered by the orchestra. Roussel's "Pour une Fete de Printemps" was the novelty, receiving its first performance in Boston. A single hearing left the listener very much bewildered, not with Roussel's purpose, for it is not necessary to have any particular purpose in writing music except to give vent to the writer's ideas, but bewildered as to the artistic beauty of the piece. There are some interesting rhythmic figures, but it will take further acquaintance to get anything more definite out of it.

Traveler
Feb 14

To Play Organ as Symphony Soloist

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 14 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE CONCERT HERE ON FEB. 24

Paul Kochanski, Famous Polish Violinist, to Be Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its ~~fourth~~ appearance of the season here on Tuesday, Feb. 24, when a concert will be given in the evening in Infantry Hall. The soloist will be Paul Kochanski, famous Polish violinist, who acquired his artistry under the direction of the Polish master, Mlynarski, and the Belgian, Cesar Thomson. He will appear in a concerto in A-minor by Vivaldi, the early Italian composer.

Serge Koussevitzky will present a symphony of modern Russia, Glazounov's Symphony, No. 8. This will be introduced by the overture to "Russland and Ludmilla," by Glinka. The closing number of the evening will be Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso; Lament and Triumph," a score which depicts with much tonal splendor the varying fortunes of the famous Italian poet.

AS missioner from the French Ministry of Fine Arts; as teacher of American students; as sister and mouthpiece of Lili Boulanger—composer of promise cut off in youth; as, finally, organist in her own right, Miss Nadia Boulanger will be guest at the Symphony Concerts of next week. She will play the solo-part in an ancient Concerto of Handel (in D minor) for organ and orchestra and in a modern Symphony for organ and orchestra written by Aaron Copland of the youngest generation of American composers. Miss Nadia will also be heard incidentally in her sister's orchestral dirge, "For the Burial of a S[illegible]lier." By way of prelude, Mr. Kousse[illegible] and the orchestra will play Mozart's [illegible] Night-Music"; while to end th[illegible] stands Liszt's resounding "Tass[illegible]

39

192
...or ...rm
...ts
...rge
...cert
...nics
8.15
...n by known
...thing to
...rwise
...ight
...hes-
...ent
...is ...orth a fare-
...ogram
...very
...ning
...are clever

...AT
...NCERT

...nday night
...oussevitzky that ranged geography,
Stravinsky,
...he exciting
Feu" was
...e program
...heir music
...not easily
...re was the
...venth Sym-
Mr Kous-now well
Listening to symphony, conductor
...n a score,

...s Thomas, noble aria
"Un Ballo
...s in excel-
...s much at
...d-fashioned more me...
Massenet's
...e pleasing,
...a alike ap-
...him to re-
...mes to bow

...ough it was long ago as ...ere. It was juxtaposition allowing a
...: a malicious
...it was inter-
...election of a
...hat Mr Stra-
...ns and sur-
...and rhythms
...eans original

...ently played,
dictum, that
...e depends for stage setting was absolutely
...usic, one was and dramatic
...d far more ex-
...at human im-reading of the

...is possible t...
...nore out of
...ctors. It mu...
...o takes it le...
...en do—which more in Boston
...here is a tend...
labelled "sym...
perfection ar...
...body ever ca...

...onday evening
for March 30,
...pianist, will be

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 1 1 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TUESDAY

The visit to Worcester next Tuesday evening of the Boston Symphony orchestra is the only chance local musical people will have to hear this famous organization this season. People visiting Boston for the symphony concerts will have difficulty in securing seats, for the entire course has been practically sold out. The concert is to be given in Mechanics hall at 8.15 o'clock and with the orchestra comes Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor, who created so much interest among musical people since assuming the leadership of the famous organization.

Everywhere the orchestra has visited Koussevitzky has been the lion of the hour, and his conducting is one of the outstanding events of the musical season. In New York he has been received with signal honors, and his interpretations of the famous old symphonies have aroused unusual interest. The program for Worcesters includes Tchaikovsky' Fifth symphony, which has been heard not too often in this country. Under Koussevitzky's baton this symphony has been one of the great features of symphony program makers.

Seats for the Worcester concert are on sale at Steinert's.

Herald
Feb 12

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Again we ask, who wrote that pathetic ballad of home life: "Who Put the Overalls in Mrs. Crowley's Chowder?"

The program of the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening is devoted to contemporary French composers. It comprises Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession"; Roussel's "For a Spring Festival," which will be played in Boston for the first time; "The Peri," Dance Poem by Dukas, and d'Indy's Second Symphony, B flat major. Roussel's piece has been performed in New York by the Philharmonic Society, led by Mr. Mengelberg. Mr. Monteux thought of bringing it out in Boston, and the announcement was made, but he substituted Roussel's "La Ville Rose." "For a Spring Festival" was composed early in 1920 near Grenoble about the time of Roussel's Symphony which Mr. Koussevitzky conducted early this season. The music is said to be in the composer's "new manner."

Next week Miss Nadia Boulanger, organist, will be the soloist. She will play a concerto in D minor by Handel, and take part in the performance of her sister Lili's "Pour les Funerailles d'un Soldat," and Aaron Copland's symphony for organ and orchestra. The program will also include Mozart's Serenade, "Kleine Nachmusik" (K. No. 525), and Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Tasso."

On Jan. 30 in Paris Mme. Janacopulos sang nothing but songs by Stravinsky. There was an audience. France has its heroes and heroines in peace as well as in war.

Meanwhile in New York the lions of the press, old and young, are endeavoring to assign Stravinsky his proper place among contemporary composers.

WATERBURY
CONN.
~~HERALD~~
American
FEB 12 1925

While Waterbury Languishes.

(Hartford Times.)

With Roland Hayes, Gigli, Chaliapin, Ponselle, Boston Symphony and others appearing in rapid succession Hartford may be said to be having a truly distinguished musical season. There is no need to go elsewhere to hear the celebrated artists of the day, as they are all finding the way to Hartford.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 1 3 19

Boston Symphony

The ~~Boston~~ symphony orchestra 's coming to Worcester Tuesday evening to give a concert in Mechanics hall. With this orchestra of 104 pieces comes Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor, who has created so much enthusiasm in musical circles since coming to Boston as leader of the organization. A vital fact to be considered by music-loving people of Worcester is that this will be the only chance to hear the orchestra. A splendid program has been made up by Conductor Koussevitzky for the Worcester concert. It includes Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony, in E minor, which is artiscally done by this orchestra.

Seats for the concert are on sale at Steinert's.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
FEB 1 3 192

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The visit ~~to~~ Worcester next Tuesday evening for its annual concert is the only opportunity Worcester symphony lovers will have to hear this organization, for there is no chance in hearing it if one goes to Boston for a concert. The entire season course of 61 concerts at Symphony hall is sold out and there are no tickets available for people from Worcester or any other city this season, an unprecedented record for the Boston orchestra. Seats for the concert are on sale at Steinert's

---

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
FEB 1 4 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE

Koussevitzky Will Direct His First Concert in Worcester Tuesday Night

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, 104 pieces, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gives its annual concert in Mechanics hall Tuesday evening. This is the first visit to Worcester of Koussevitzky, who created enthusiasm this season as conductor of this famous organization.

The program opens with C. P. E. Bach's Concerto in D major, three movements, one of the classics of modern music, are three novelties introduced, Berlioz's overture to "The Roman Carnival," and two Russian numbers, Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble-Bee," from the fairy opera, "The Bumble-Bee."

The closing number is the outstanding composition of the program, Tchaikowsky's Fifth symphony, played by this orchestra in Boston and New York this season, which has created profound interest. The management of the orchestra announces that seats for the orchestra concerts in Boston are sold out for the entire season and that the only chance the Worcester musical public will have to hear the orchestra this season will be on Tuesday evening. Seats are on sale at Steinert's.

Transcript
Feb 14

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY GATHERS TOGETHER MUSIC FROM FRANCE

RABAUD AND ROUSSEL, DUKAS AND D'INDY

After Three Weeks, the Conductor Rejoins His Audience—Impeccable Tone-Picture; Sumptuous Tone-Poem; Piece That Baffles; Masterful, Mental and "Convincing" Symphony—The Mettle of Performance

THE signs were no bigger than a man's hand; but they may have been signs none the less. Yesterday, after an interval of three weeks, Mr. Koussevitzky was again conductor at the Symphony Concert. Roving upward, the eye spied empty seats here and there in the upper balcony, where the non-subscribing public, for a price and the waiting, may perch; while a few vacant chairs were also discoverable in the areas consecrated to the subscribing faithful. Attentive to the applause, some ears found it spasmodic and occasionally labored for the first times since Mr. Koussevitzky went to and fro upon the platform of Symphony Hall. Certainly, at no previous concert of the current year, have departures so filled the later intervals. The obvious explanation was, of course, the program. It consumed two hours, and five minutes more, which is longish on a Friday afternoon. It contained Mr. d'Indy's Symphony in B-flat, admittedly not the easiest of listening; while all else upon it was music of living, but elderly, Parisian composers—Mr. Rabaud of "La Procession Nocturne"; Mr. Roussel of "Pour une Fête de Printemps"; Mr. Dukas of "La Péri; Poème Dansé." Too much, said the by-standing wiseacres, and too much of one kind.

Even so, at the back of two or three heads lingered the impression that a spell had been broken and not quite reconstituted. Through fourteen pairs of concerts, interrupted only by occasional and expected weeks of journeying, Mr. Koussevitzky, at his post, had held this audience of Friday afternoon in the hollow of his hand. Then came not only the week in which there was no concert, but also the week in which orchestra and audience, by the inscrutable wisdom of the trustees, were delivered to Mr. Henry Hadley. No doubt, Mr. Koussevitzky needed his seven days of repose after seven days of successive concerts. Yet from Saturday, Jan. 24 until Friday, Feb. 13, he did not tread in public the familiar stage, working his will upon an expectant audience. Every old hand of the theater will be quick to say that such an interval was enough to loosen any conceivable spell laid by a mortal conductor. As likely as not the weeks to come will tighten and restore it. Yet there were—on Friday the Thirteenth—these signs of relaxation.

The program was too long, in part because the official counter of hours and minutes did not always reckon upon Mr. Koussevitzky's passion for the slow movement slow. Mr. d'Indy's Symphony is exacting; yet the other three pieces, each in its kind, were by no means tedious. Since Mr. Rabaud, as conductor no less than composer, first unfolded his tone-poem at the Symphony Concerts, nobody has had a mind to quarrel with it. A neater, smoother, better rounded specimen of its sort does not exist. As a museum-piece, it is almost certain to be preserved. Read a translation in the program-book of Lenau's suggesting poem, and the course of the music is simplicity and transparency themselves The murk, the stillness, the stir of the forest; the solitary and brooding Faust; the light, the song, the march, now near, now far, of the pious procession; the surge of Faust's answering emotion—all are written large and clear in Mr. Rabaud's measures. Every note that he sets upon his staves does exactly and economically its appointed office. More appropriate pages it is impossible to conceive, though imagination, invention and individuality hardly haunt them. Sound and scholarly, of a sweet nature and a pleasing voice is Mr. Rabaud. What more is there to ask of the younger days and the earlier work of a Director of the Conservatory—unless by some off-chance he happens to be a Gabriel Fauré? To play the music, moreover, obviously gave pleasure to Mr. Koussevitzky. He could languish through the slow introduction; not too fast need go the holy canticle and then—the tonal surge of Faust's emotion. Besides, was there not occasion for at least two of the conductor's unsurpassable diminuendi into silence?

Nor is the "Poème Dansé" of Mr. Paul Abraham Dukas a task and a weariness upon the ear, though doubtless it would more signify were the Prince and the Peri, the Flower of Immortality, and other trappings of old and ornate legend outspread as in the theater. Hardly upon the discreet platform of Symphony Hall does the music as tone-poem evoke golden mountains or crimson valleys; the face "more delicious than the face of Gurda-Ferrid" or the upraised and heaven-borne "flower of flame." Neither in Paris nor elsewhere has "The Peri" flourished on the stage of the dance. Mr. Diaghilev was not hospitable to her; the Opéra-Comique soon shut her in a dark closet; Mme. Pavlova tried, succeeded—and persisted not. Yet to the sensuous Persian fab as Mr. Dukas seems to conceive it) s set an exceedingly sumptuous music. It is as thick of texture, as luxurious of armony, as sinuous of progress, as ugh Messieurs Debussy and Ravel along with a whole French tradition were non-existent. It is of Mr. Dukas surrendered to his Semitic blood, cultivating the oriental flavors of Goldmark, not unaware of the Wagner who could be supersensuous.

A lush imagination invents, animates and achieves the music. It is soft and pulpy like an Eastern fruit. Hot and artificial, as of the forcing house, is the richness of color. Though the legend evoke the ends of the earth, noonday and sunset, images of the forest and of the mountain-top, the measures sound out of the thick walls, the moist and shadowy twilights of an Oriental palace. Studiously, "effectively," Mr. Dukas fashioned his "Poème Dansé" on his writing table for the theater. Possibly it cloyed there. Certainly it is over-luscious in the concert-hall—especially when Mr. Koussevitzky, being Russian and therefore quasi-Oriental, adds his own unguents and perfumes. Hearing him in "The Peri," it is easy to wish to hear him in Goldmark's "Sakountala."

It is within supposition—and maybe belief—that Mr. Albert Roussel, having written a piece of music for the sake of the music, cast his eye out of his study-window and saw the spring in the sky; that at the same moment his ear caught the echoes of a fête over the way at a neighbor's. Thereupon, being hard put for a title, he wrote "Pour une Fête de Printemps" at the top of his score and let it go at that. At the least this conjecture seems as plausible as the speculations arrayed in the program-book around these relatively innocent pages. They recall Mr. Roussel's memories of festivals in the Far East. They smack of the Place Pigalle and other haunts hard by the sacred Butte. They may be an idyl; they could be an interrupted Scherzo; possibly they are a Sinfonietta not a little compressed. Possibly also they are neither more nor less than a piece of music in which Mr. Roussel set ideas that germinated within him; developed them according to the imagination, the invention and the mood they stirred, and therewith rested content. The motivs and the reiterated figures hardly engross the ear; but Mr. Roussel leads them into measures that move with rhythmic animation through shadowy harmonies or vigorous progressions; that utilize skilfully assembled or parted or individualized instrumental voices. There is mood as well, from a quickening animation to a gentle, introspective musing; while throughout, the music swims in an atmosphere of its own—as though soft, grey spring veils overhung it with a little of mist and a little of mystery. With an occasional monotony, yet with a semi-occasional poetry of tones, it all sounds. Even Mr. Koussevitzky's sensitive ear and hand do not quite clarify his friend's music.

Upon Mr. d'Indy's Second Symphony—become the classic French Symphony of these latter days—the conductor spared not one of his revealing and enhancing powers. The High Priest of the Schola Cantorum is nothing if not architectural—and upon ear and mind Mr. Koussevitzky upreared the tonal edifice, lofty, firm-set and austere. More: he gave it an audible spaciousness and freedom of ascent, as though Franckian faiths and formulas, inbred in Mr. d'Indy, might not crib or halt it. At every turn he sharpened the rhythms until the music gained a new impetus, vitality, cumulation. Not a detail escaped him or seemed in the passing instant misconstrued, misplaced or over-emphasized. Often they were as edge and pungency upon the music; or else fell like high light upon it and upon the composer's imagination. Nowhere did Mr. Koussevitzky miss, nor anywhere would he soften, the hard, keen glint of contours and harmonies. The spare progressions, the stark sonorities sounded with Mr. d'Indy's taut-strung voice. Above all, the conductor caught and heightened the essential life of the music wherein the two principal motives—and the motives that they generate—go to and fro in advance and recession, in conflict not to be stayed or stilled. Vitalize Mr. Koussevitzky will and must. Least of all shall the "cerebral" d'Indy escape him. For once and throughout, there was no quarrelling with the ways and means.

So played, the limitations of the Symphony in B-flat are the limitations of the composer's mind and spirit. Sensuous he cannot be, and in spite of his intensity of creation, the years do not lessen the pages dry and the pages labored. To be simple or to give the illusion of simplicity was as strange to the d'Indy of these middle years of fertility and prime. In intricate conflict he must set his motivs. Complex must be the progress of his music. Afresh and afresh he must marshal and assort the contributing elements. Yet passion he knows, though it be passion of the mind and the spirit. Not without such impulse may music rise, take shape and command the listening imagination as does the first movement of the Symphony outspread. The exaltation of the slow division is as unmistakable and penetrating as the austerity. A third movement harks back to the grave song of the viola; of a sudden wills itself into new and stirring energies. From a fugue, characteristically expands and mounts the reverberant proclamation of the close.

It is quite true that Mr. d'Indy brings this music to pass by mental process. Strange to him are either the mighty outbursts or the mighty ease of Beethoven. Far from him, searching mind and heart, is the fullness of Brahms. He can no more sing with a Schubert than glow with a Wagner incandescent. He lacks Franck's communicating and enfolding humanity. By a power of mind he commands; by the passion with which he puts that power in play he conquers. A meaningless, a misleading, word to apply to work in the arts is "convincing." In the theater, the concert-hall, the picture-gallery, on the printed page, they can have no such purpose, gain no such end. Mr. d'Indy's Symphony in B-flat is the exception. Here at last, and for once, is music that convinces. No other way could he write it.

H. T. P.

American
Feb 14

SYMPHONY IN BRILLIANT PROGRAM

Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, arranged for yesterday afternoon's concert a program consisting entirely of works of contemporary French composers. This idea of "unifying" a program is not a new one, for Carl Muck used to be a great exponent of it. But it is always a question as to whether a program that has unity can at the same time have sufficient variety.

Mr. Koussevitzky was either lucky or very judicious, for his program sounded better than it looked on paper before the concert began. "La Procession Nocturne," by Henri Rabaud, former conductor of the orchestra, was played for the third time here, and each time it has sounded better. To this writer it was the most impressive piece on the program.

D'Indy's Second Symphony, which was played, is much too long, and cries out for cutting. It has some beautiful pages, nevertheless, which were eloquently rendered by the orchestra. Roussel's "Pour une Fete de Printemps" was the novelty, receiving its first performance in Boston. A single hearing left the listener very much bewildered, not with Roussel's purpose, for it is not necessary to have any particular purpose in writing music except to give vent to the writer's ideas, but bewildered as to the artistic beauty of the piece. There are some interesting rhythmic figures, but it will take further acquaintance to get anything more definite out of it.

Traveler
Feb 14

To Play Organ as Symphony Soloist

AS missioner from the French Ministry of Fine Arts; as teacher of American students; as sister and mouthpiece of Lili Boulanger—composer of promise cut off in youth; as, finally, organist in her own right, Miss Nadia Boulanger will be guest at the Symphony Concerts of next week. She will play the solo-part in an ancient Concerto of Handel (in D minor) for organ and orchestra and in a modern Symphony for organ and orchestra written by Aaron Copland of the youngest generation of American composers. Miss Nadia will also be heard incidentally in her sister's orchestral dirge, "For the Burial of a S... ...ier." By way of prelude, Mr. Kousse... and the orchestra will play Mozart's ...Night-Music"; while to end the ... stands Liszt's resounding "Tass...

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 1 4 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE CONCERT HERE ON FEB. 24

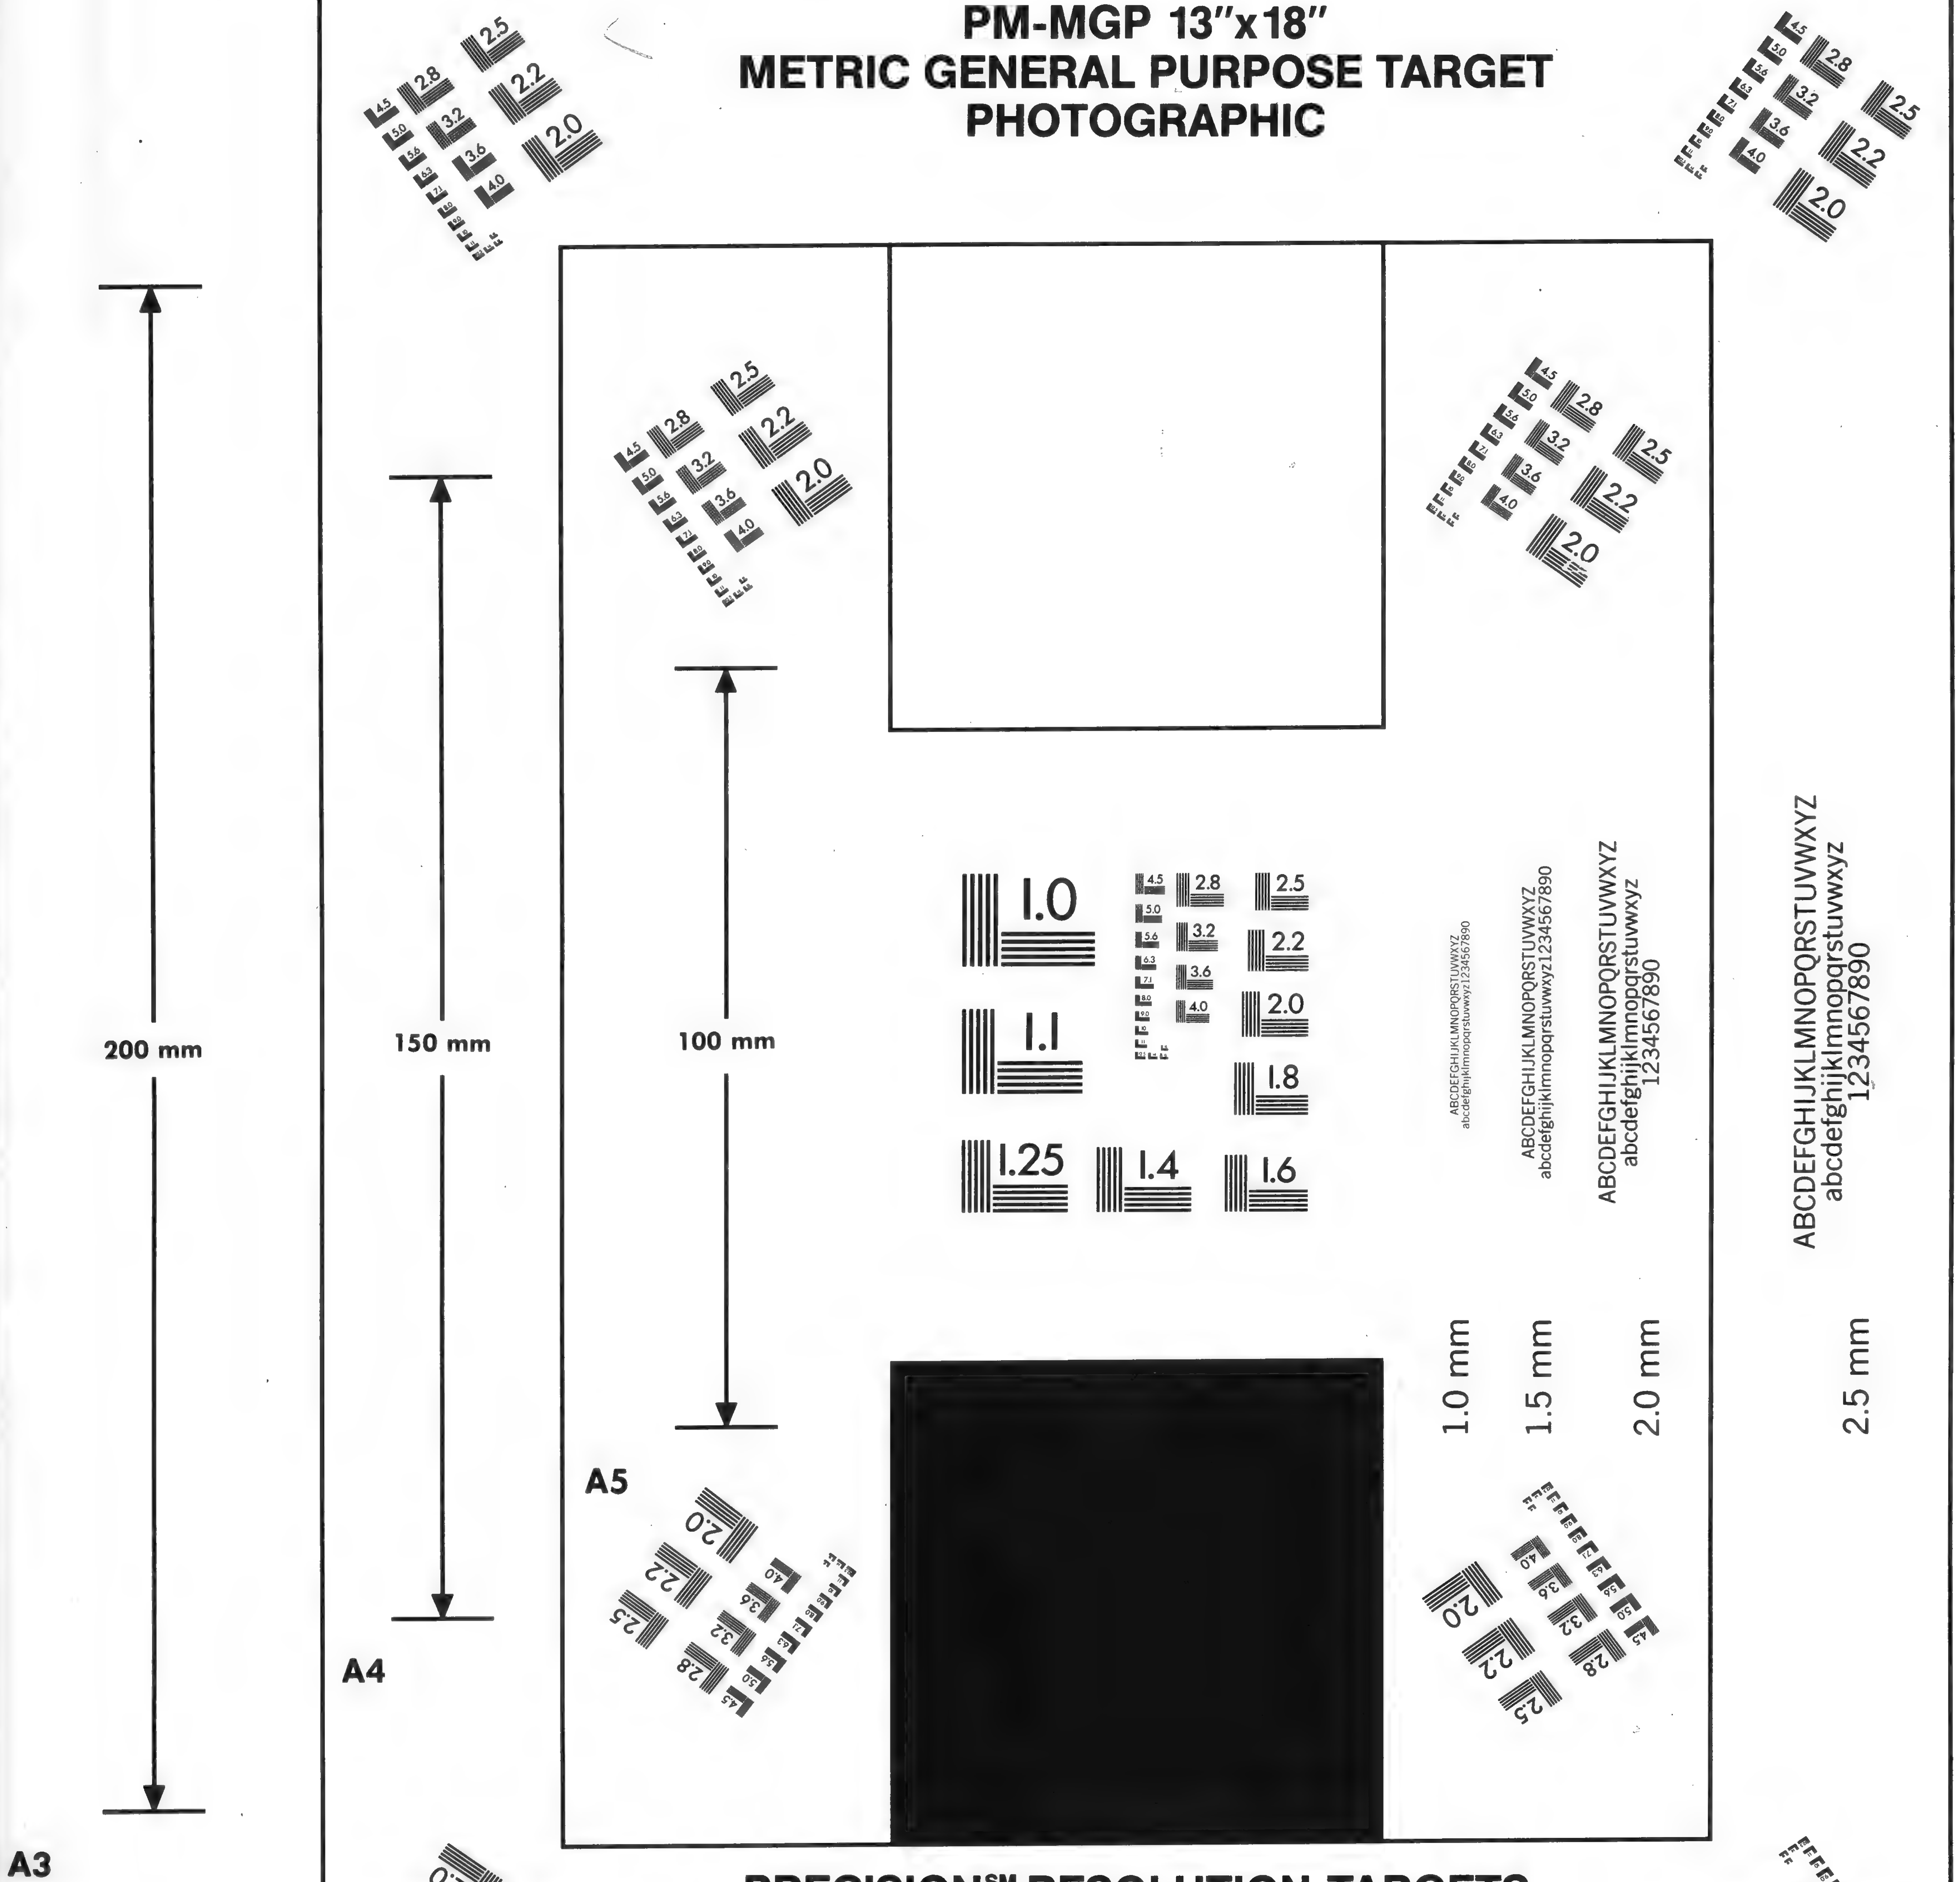
Paul Kochanski, Famous Polish Violinist, to Be Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its ~~fourth~~ appearance of the season here on Tuesday, Feb. 24, when a concert will be given in the evening in Infantry Hall. The soloist will be Paul Kochanski, famous Polish violinist, who acquired his artistry under the direction of the Polish master, Mlynarski, and the Belgian, Cesar Thomson. He will appear in a concerto in A-minor by Vivaldi, the early Italian composer.

Serge Koussevitsky will present a symphony of modern Russia, Glazounov's Symphony, No. 8. This will be introduced by the overture to "Russland and Ludmilla," by Glinka. The closing number of the evening will be Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso; Lament and Triumph," a score which depicts with much tonal splendor the varying fortunes of the famous Italian poet.

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
5.6
2.0
3.6
4.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
A5
A4
A3

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

40

Globe
Feb. 14

FRENCH PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Music by d'Indy, Roussel, Rabaud and Dukas Heard

Mr Koussevitzky again made a unified program for yesterday's Symphony concert, this time by turning to the work of living French composers. Roussel's "For a Spring Holiday," announced and withdrawn last season by Mr Monteux, was finally played for the first time in Boston. D'Indy's Second Symphony, Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession" and Dukas' "The Peri" had all been heard here before yesterday.

The audience did not seem greatly pleased with the concert. Applause was lukewarm, and, more significant, there were a few vacant seats in the second balcony, showing that less than the usual number had waited in line to hear the orchestra. Perhaps 10 times in the past 15 years have vacant seats been observable in the second balcony at the Friday concerts.

None of the greatest names in French music was represented on this program. Berlioz, Franck and Debussy cannot be numbered with the living, though their music is more alive than that of Dukas or Roussel. Honegger, the most vital, and Ravel, the cleverest of living French composers, were not represented.

This concert was an iluminating illustration of the extent to which contemporary French music is not French so much as cosmopolitan. The elders on the program, d'Indy and Rabaud, are of the generation that has never been able to escape the pervasive influence of Wagner, whose stamp is on many pages of M. d'Indy's laboriously eloquent symphony. M. Rabaud's exquisitely subtl taste and refined musical imagination had enabled him to erase almost completely from his work the imprint of Wagner. But his own creative power is not wholly adequate to fill the gap. Although he uses Wagner's harmonics he does not reiterate Wagner's ideas, but his own are less vivid than Wagner at second hand from M. d'Indy.

Dukas and Roussel, as the contrast between their early and their recent work proves, are men bound to keep "in the movement," to be contemporary. Roussel once wrote Debussy diluted with a good deal of rose water, as in his "Rosy City." Having since observed the vogue of the Stravinsky of "Le Sacre" Roussel in "For a Spring Holiday" has abjured his preceding musical faith, changed styles completely and produced muddled and enfeebled Stravinsky.

With Dukas it is not Stravinsky, but the Russians, whose music was popularized in Western Europe by the Diaghilev ballet that has won away his allegiance from the manner of his one really successful work, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The pseudo-Oriental color of Rimsky Korsakoff's 'Scheherezade," much diluted, tinges "The Peri."

There is in d'Indy's Second Symphony a logic essentially French in the choice and working out of themes. The work springs from two "germinating motives," to use the composer's term for his musical material, and nearly every measure in it is derived from one or the other of these motives. But the motives germinate because d'Indy will have it so, and not as Beethoven's do, because they and he could not help it.

In all this music Mr Koussevitzky strove to convey emotion, to be dramatic. But French good taste is not by nature emotional nor dramatic. One doesn't look for ecstasies from Louis XV furniture, or from the architecture of the Ecole des Beaux Arts, exemplified to Americans by our World's Fair Buildings. A Russian is not the best man to make the very real but very limited qualities of this second-clas French music felt.

P. R.

Traveler
Feb 14

Symphony Offers Modern Program

For the fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season Mr. Koussevitzky offered a unified program yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

The works of four contemporaneous French composers filled the program, beginning with "La Procession Nocture," symphonic poem of Henri Rabaud, one time conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and now director of the Conservatory. Mr. Rabaud conducted a performance of his own composition at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on December 27, 1918. A second performance was conducted by Mr. Monteux on April 23, 1920. Yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky gave an exquisite reading, one that veritably described the various moods of Lenau's pathetic poem. Vincent d'Indy's Symphony in B-flat major held second place on the program. This symphony also holds the distinction of being heard in Boston, when it was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the composer conducting in December, 1905. It was repeated on two other occasions, the last performance being that of November 17, 1922. There are four movements. The first two, long and languid in theme, are followed by the third movement, "modere," with its strongly rhythmed theme first brought out by the flute and later by the orchestral explosion of the various instruments. The fourth movement in two parts recalls the thematic ideas of the preceding movements either by solo or group instruments.

For the rest of the program there was Roussel's piece "Pour Une Fete de Printempts," heard yesterday for the first time in Boston, a piece interesting in its complexity with introduction and jubilant climax. The beautiful, spirited Poeme Danse "La Peri" of Dukas with its descriptive ballet, heard here last season with Mr. Monteux conducting, was the closing number.

Transcript
Feb 14

Symphony Soloist to Give Lecture

Nadia Boulanger, the distinguished French organist, will be the soloist at next week's pair of Boston Symphony concerts to take place in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. She will appear in the composition of her late sister, Lili Boulanger, entitled "For the Funeral of a Soldier," and likewise in Handel's concerto for organ and strings, in D minor, and Copland's symphony, which is to be heard for the first time here.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," and close it with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo."

Mlle. Boulanger will also give a lecture-rectial under the auspices of the Women's City Club on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 23, in Steinert hall. She will illustrate her subject, "Modern Music and Its Evolution," at the piano.

Globe
Feb 15

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Koussevitzky has chosen a program making ample use of Mlle Nadia Boulanger's abilities as organist for this week's Symphony concerts. Mlle Boulanger has not played before in Boston. She teaches organ and musical theory in Paris. She will play one of her dead sister's pieces. Lili Boulanger won the Prix de Rome for composition just before the war. Her tragic early death cut short a career of great promise. Those who knew her and her work claim that she would have become the first really great woman composer if she had only lived a few years longer. Mlle Nadia Boulanger will give a lecture recital free to the public, (with no tickets required, at Paine Hall, Harvard Music Building, Cambridge, Feb 24, at 8:15. This is an opportunity of a quality rarely offered to music lovers.

◆

Mlle Boulanger will play a symphony for organ and orchestra by Aaron Copland. Mr Copland was born in Brooklyn, N Y, in 1900, and has studied composition under Mlle Boulanger in Paris. This piece is said by those who heard it in New York to be in the atonal polytional idiom natural to musical youth of the present generation. At the close of the first performance last month by the New York Symphony Society in New York there were scattering hisses from the audience. Mr Walter Damrosch, who conducted, remarked to the audience that a youth who could write such a symphony at 24 would some day be capable of murder. But Mr Damrosch's views on music are notoriously conservative.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:1 Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. 16th program Concerto for strings and organ in D minor. Symphony for organ (first time here), Aaron Copland; "For the Funeral of a Soldier," Lili Boulanger; "Klein Nachtmusik," Mozart; "Tasso," Liszt. Soloist Nadia Boulanger.

Herald
Feb. 14

SYMPHONY IN 15TH CONCE

Program Devoted to Contemporaneous French Composers

WORK BY RABAUD PROVES FEATURE

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 15th Symphony concert in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, was devoted to contemporaneous French composers. It comprised Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession," d'Indy's Symphony, B flat major, No. 2; Roussel's "For a Spring Festival"; Dukas's "The Peri: Dance Poem."

Although d'Indy's symphony is one of the greatest of modern works; although Roussel's symphonic poem, fantaisie, what-you-call-it, was performed for the first time in Boston, the feature of the concert, as far as interpretation and performance were concerned, was Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession," inspired by the poem of Lenau, an episode in his "Faust" that also led Liszt to compose illustrative music.

Rabaud's symphonic poem had been played twice at the Symphony concerts: conducted by Mr. Rabaud, later by Mr. Monteux. It had been performed in Boston before Mr. Rabaud was persuaded to put it on a program: by the Orchestral Club led by Mr. Longy in 1903; by the N. E. Conservatory Orchestra, led by Mr. Chadwick in 1909.

(The reprinted article in the programbook stated that the excellent Rabaud was now living in Boston, although he has not visited this city since his departure as conductor in the spring of 1919. This carelessness in proof-reading led some persons yesterday to wonder why he did not stand up in the hall or rush impetuously to the platform in order to acknowledge the long-protracted applause.)

As we have said, the performance of this music yesterday was remarkable in every way, technically and poetically; one of Mr. Koussevitzky's most noteworthy achievements. The music itself deserved the care the conductor and the players bestowed upon it. It is true that in the music preceding the section portraying the solemn procession the influence of Wagner is shown, for there are suggestions of moods in "Parsifal" and the hearer is reminded of Amportas and his sufferings, but this is not disturbing, nor does it detract from the fine and imaginative quality of the work. It might be interesting to hear Liszt's treatment of the same subject.

From the performance of d'Indy's Symphony one might reasonably infer that the music did not appeal strongly to Mr. Koussevitzky's nature, for the interpretation was disappointing, especially in regard to the treatment of the musical structure, which did not stand out boldly, was not well defined. One might also say that the inherent nobility of this symphony was not revealed. D'Indy is anything but a melodramatic composer; he is neither spectacular nor a seeker after external decoration. The pure and lofty soul of Vincent dIndy was not in this performance.

One hardly knows what to say of the highly respectable Roussel's "Spring Festival." He is undoubtedly a man of high ideals and faithful to them, but we have yet to hear music by him that warms the cockles of the heart or leads one to forget the carking cares of this too daily life. His admirers have found much to praise in this "Spring Festival"; one speaks of the joy being tempered by dreamy melancholy (yes, the word is "dreamy," not "dreary"); and then speaks of the work as an "idyl"; while a third is reminded of oriental festivals. Thus do learned doctors disagree even in praise. Mr. Henderson of New York is sure that the festival was in Paris; that Pan was leaping about sporting a plug-hat with dryads masquerading as midinettes. From our recollection of the Neuilly festival, with its merry-go-rounds and horns, and shouting, we should say that M. Roussel's spring had come up, not slowly as in Coleridge's "Christabel," but with a rush and a bang up the Avenue du Roule. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the festival with gusto. The concert ended with a rather boisterous performance of "The Peri."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week will be an unusual one, with the organ a prominent instrument. Mozart, Eine Kleine Nachtmusik; Handel, Concerto, D minor for organ and strings; Lili Boulanger, "For the Funeral of a Soldier"; Copland, Symphony for organ and orchestra; Liszt, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph." Nadia Boulanger will be the organist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
Worcester, Mass.
FEB 14 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, Famous Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

CHANCE LEFT TO HEAR SYMPHONY

Hub Season Sold Out but Seats Here Available

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Worcester next Tuesday to give its annual concert in Mechanics Hall. Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor, comes with it, and it is the only chance Worcester symphony lovers will have to hear the orchestra or see the conductor.

The regular symphony season of 61 concerts in Boston is sold out, and patrons from this ciiy who are in the habit of going to Boston to get their symphony music will be disappointed, for there are no seats left for the course and the Worcester concert is the only chance to hear the orchestra this season for Worcester patrons. Next season it is expected the Boston season will be extended to 66 or 68 concerts which means the possible elimination of the New England cities that the orchestra visits.

The program for Tuesday night opens with C. P. E. Bach's Concerto in D Major, in three movements. There are three novelties, two of which are Russian. Berlioz's overture to "The Roman Carnival," Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovantchina" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble-Bee," from the fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." It was this selection that resulted in the orchestra playing an encore in Boston several weeks ago, the first encore ever responded to since the organization of the orchestra 40 years ago.

The closing number is Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor. This is the symphony which Koussekitzky has revived and which has created such enthusiasm in Boston and New York where he has played it.

Seats for the Worcester concert are on sale at Steinert's.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 15 1925

Kochanski with Boston Symphony

With Paul Kochanski, the celebrated violinist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, comes for its fourth concert of the season a week from next Tuesday. This is the last concert but one of the present season.

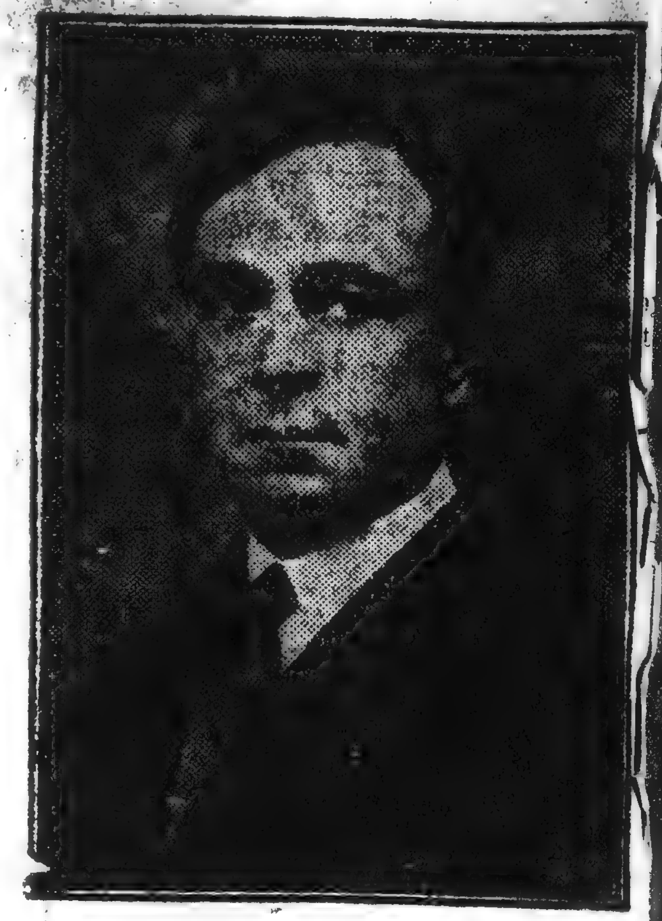
Koussevitzky's programme will have two Russian numbers, notably Glazounov's Eighth Symphony, one of his latest works. This illustrious composer of the Russian school though still living does not figure among the "radicals." The symphony will be introduced by Glinka's overture to "Russian and Ludmilla." The closing number will be Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo," a glorious pageant in tones descriptive of the tragedy and ultimate triumph of the great Italian poet.

Kochanski will appear with the orchestra in Concerto in A-minor by Vivaldi, the early Italian composer. Kochanski is a violinist from Poland, the country which has produced such a surprising number of geniuses upon this instrument, and this virtuoso holds an undisputable place among the greatest of these. Kochanski learned his art from the Polish master, Mlynarski, and the Belgian master, Cesar Thomson, thus perpetuating two illustrious lines of violin playing. His tours through the principal cities of Europe gave him the highest reputation before he came to this country in 1921. One of his first appearances was as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the regular Boston concerts.

* * *

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 15 1925

NOTED LEADER AND FAMED ORCHESTRA HERE ON TUESDAY



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The feature of the annual visit to Worcester by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians for a concert in Mechanics hall Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, will, of course, be the first appearance hereabouts of Serge Koussevitzky, the remarkable new Russian leader. This celebrity, who has made a profound impression in each city which he has visited at the head of the orchestra in this, his first season in America, will be heard in the coming Worcester concert in a symphony in which he has made a particularly vivid impression—the Fifth in E minor by his countryman, Tchaikovsky.

The performances have made nothing less than a magnificent impression, and according to the critics' verdict revealed new powers in the conductor and a new eloquence in the music, which, they concluded, may well outlast the other symphonies of this composer.

Two further numbers from the musical literature of Russia will be played—the "Prelude" to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina" and the Scherzo "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." Moussorgsky's "Prelude" depicts the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow. The Scherzo has an irresistible charm, which is evident from the fact that when Mr. Koussevitzky performed it in Boston, a repetition was demanded and granted for the first time since the beginnings of the orchestra 40 years ago. There will also be played Berlioz' brilliant overture, "The Roman Carnival," and, to open the concert, a concerto for orchestra in D major by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach.

It is well to know that the one chance Worcester has to hear the orchestra is Tuesday evening. Every seat for the Boston course concert is sold.

Seats for the concert are on sale at Steinert's.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
FEB 15 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

The fourth and last concert but one of the season here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, February 24th, with Paul Kochanski, the celebrated Polish violionist as the soloist.

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce to Providence at this concert a notable symphony of modern Russia which nevertheless is not of the "revolutionary" school—Glazounov's Symphony No. 8. This will be introduced by the Overture of "Russlan and Ludmilla" by Glinka, the early Russian composer. The closing number of the evening will be Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Tasso; Lament and Triumph," a score which depicts with much tonal splendor the varying fortunes of the famous Italian poet.

Paul Kochanski is one of the suprising number of geniuses of the violin who have come from Poland and he is by no means the least of them. This artist is a pupil of the Polish master, Mlynarski and the Belgian master, Cesar Thomson, thus perpetuating two illustrious lines of violin playing. His tours through the principal cities of Europe gave him the highest reputation before he first came to this country in 1921. One of his first appearances was as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the regular Boston concerts, an occasion which will long be remembered by those who then heard him.

CATHOLIC WOMAN'S CLUB

40

Globe
Feb 14

FRENCH PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Music by d'Indy, Roussel, Rabaud and Dukas Heard

Mr Koussevitzky again made a unified program for yesterday's Symphony concert, this time by turning to the work of living French composers. Roussel's "For a Spring Holiday," announced and withdrawn last season by Mr Monteux, was finally played for the first time in Boston. D'Indy's Second Symphony, Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession" and Dukas' "The Peri" had all been heard here before yesterday.

The audience did not seem greatly pleased with the concert. Applause was lukewarm, and, more significant, there were a few vacant seats in the second balcony, showing that less than the usual number had waited in line to hear the orchestra. Perhaps 10 times in the past 15 years have vacant seats been observable in the second balcony at the Friday concerts.

None of the greatest names in French music was represented on this program. Berlioz, Franck and Debussy cannot be numbered with the living, though their music is more alive than that of Dukas or Roussel. Honegger, the most vital, and Ravel, the cleverest of living French composers, were not represented.

This concert was an iluminating illustration of the extent to which contemporary French music is not French so much as cosmopolitan. The elders on the program, d'Indy and Rabaud, are of the generation that has never been able to escape the pervasive influence of Wagner, whose stamp is on many pages of M. d'Indy's laboriously eloquent symphony. M. Rabaud's exquisitely subtl taste and refined musical imagination had enabled him to erase almost completely from his work the imprint of Wagner. But his own creative power is not wholly adequate to fill the gap. Although he uses Wagner's harmonics he does not reiterate Wagner's ideas, but his own are less vivid than Wagner at second hand from M. d'Indy.

Dukas and Roussel, as the contrast between their early and their recent work proves, are men bound to keep "in the movement," to be contemporary. Roussel once wrote Debussy diluted with a good deal of rose water, as in his "Rosy City." Having since observed the vogue of the Stravinsky of "Le Sacre" Roussel in "For a Spring Holiday" has abjured his preceding musical faith, changed styles completely and produced muddled and enfeebled Stravinsky.

With Dukas it is not Stravinsky, but the Russians, whose music was popularized in Western Europe by the Diaghilev ballet that has won away his allegiance from the manner of his one really successful work, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The pseudo-Oriental color of Rimsky Korsakoff's 'Scheherezade," much diluted, tinges "The Peri."

There is in d'Indy's Second Symphony a logic essentially French in the choice and working out of themes. The work springs from two "germinating motives," to use the composer's term for his musical material, and nearly every measure in it is derived from one or the other of these motives. But the motives germinate because d'Indy will have it so, and not as Beethoven's do, because they and he could not help it.

In all this music Mr Koussevitzky strove to convey emotion, to be dramatic. But French good taste is not by nature emotional nor dramatic. One doesn't look for ecstasies from Louis XV furniture, or from the architecture of the Ecole des Beaux Arts, exemplified to Americans by our World's Fair Buildings. A Russian is not the best man to make the very real but very limited qualities of this second-clas French music félt. P. R.

Trav
Feb 14

Symphony Offers Modern Program

For the fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season Mr. Koussevitzky offered a unified program yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

The works of four contemporaneous French composers filled the program, beginning with "La Procession Nocture," symphonic poem of Henri Rabaud, one time conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and now director of the Conservatory. Mr. Rabaud conducted a performance of his own composition at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on December 27, 1918. A second performance was conducted by Mr. Monteux on April 23, 1920. Yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky gave an exquisite reading, one that veritably described the various moods of Lenau's pathetic poem. Vincent d'Indy's Symphony in B-flat major held second place on the program. This symphony also holds the distinction of being heard in Boston, when it was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the composer conducting in December, 1905. It was repeated on two other occasions, the last performance being that of November 17, 1922. There are four movements. The first two, long and languid in theme, are followed by the third movement, "modere," with its strongly rhythmed theme first brought out by the flute and later by the orchestral explosion of the various instruments. The fourth movement in two parts recalls the thematic ideas of the preceding movements either by solo or group instruments.

For the rest of the program there was Roussel's piece "Pour Une Fete de Printempts," heard yesterday for the first time in Boston, a piece interesting in its complexity with introduction and jubilant climax. The beautiful, spirited Poeme Danse "La Peri" of Dukas with its descriptive ballet, heard here last season with Mr. Monteux conducting, was the closing number.

Feb 14

Symphony Soloist to Give Lecture

Nadia Boulanger, the distinguished French organist, will be the soloist at next week's pair of Boston Symphony concerts to take place in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. She will appear in the composition of her late sister, Lili Boulanger, entitled "For the Funeral of a Soldier," and likewise in Handel's concerto for organ and strings, in D minor, and Copland's symphony, which is to be heard for the first time here.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the propram with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," and close it with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo."

Mlle. Boulanger will also give a lecture-rectial under the auspices of the Women's City Club on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 23, in Steinert hall. She will illustrate her subject, "Modern Music and Its Evolution," at the piano.

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Koussevitzky has chosen a program making ample use of Mlle Nadia Boulanger's abilities as organist for this week's Symphony concerts. Mlle Boulanger has not played before in Boston. She teaches organ and musical theory in Paris. She will play one of her dead sister's pieces. Lili Boulanger won the Prix de Rome for composition just before the war. Her tragic early death cut short a career of great promise. Those who knew her and her work claim that she would have become the first really great woman composer if she had only lived a few years longer. Mlle Nadia Boulanger will give a lecture recital free to the public, with no tickets required, at Paine Hall, Harvard Music Building, Cambridge, Feb 24, at 8:15. This is an opportunity of a quality rarely offered to music lovers.

◆

Mlle Boulanger will play a symphony for organ and orchestra by Aaron Copland. Mr Copland was born in Brooklyn, N Y, in 1900, and has studied composition under Mlle Boulanger in Paris. This piece is said by those who heard it in New York to be in the atonal polytional idiom natural to musical youth of the present generation. At the close of the first performance last month by the New York Symphony Society in New York there were scattering hisses from the audience. Mr Walter Damrosch, who conducted, remarked to the audience that a youth who could write such a symphony at 24 would some day be capable of murder. But Mr Damrosch's views on music are notoriously conservative.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:1 Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. 16th program Concerto for strings and organ in D minor. Symphony for organ (first time here), Aaron Copland; "For the Funera of a Soldier," Lili Boulanger; "Klein Nachtmusik," Mozart; "Tasso," Liszt Soloist Nadia Boulanger.

Herald
Feb 14

SYMPHONY IN 15TH CONCE

Program Devoted to Contemporaneous French Composers

WORK BY RABAUD PROVES FEATURE

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 15th Symphony concert in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, was devoted to contemporaneous French composers. It comprised Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession," d'Indy's Symphony, B flat major, No. 2; Roussel's "For a Spring Festival"; Dukas's "The Peri: Dance Poem."

Although d'Indy's symphony is one of the greatest of modern works; although Roussel's symphonic poem, fantaisie, what-you-call-it, was performed for the first time in Boston, the feature of the concert, as far as interpretation and performance were concerned, was Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession," inspired by the poem of Lenau, an episode in his "Faust" that also led Liszt to compose illustrative music.

Rabaud's symphonic poem had been played twice at the Symphony concerts: conducted by Mr. Rabaud, later by Mr. Monteux. It had been performed in Boston before Mr. Rabaud was persuaded to put it on a program: by the Orchestral Club led by Mr. Longy in 1903; by the N. E. Conservatory Orchestra, led by Mr. Chadwick in 1909.

(The reprinted article in the program-book stated that the excellent Rabaud was now living in Boston, although he has not visited this city since his departure as conductor in the spring of 1919. This carelessness in proof-reading led some persons yesterday to wonder why he did not stand up in the hall or rush impetuously to the platform in order to acknowledge the long-protracted applause.)

As we have said, the performance of this music yesterday was remarkable in every way, technically and poetically; one of Mr. Koussevitzky's most noteworthy achievements. The music itself deserved the care the conductor and the players bestowed upon it. It is true that in the music preceding the section portraying the solemn procession the influence of Wagner is shown, for there are suggestions of moods in "Parsifal" and the hearer is reminded of Amportas and his sufferings, but this is not disturbing, nor does it detract from the fine and imaginative quality of the work. It might be interesting to hear Liszt's treatment of the same subject.

From the performance of d'Indy's Symphony one might reasonably infer that the music did not appeal strongly to Mr. Koussevitzky's nature, for the interpretation was disappointing, especially in regard to the treatment of the musical structure, which did not stand out boldly, was not well defined. One might also say that the inherent nobility of this symphony was not revealed. D'Indy is anything but a melodramatic composer; he is neither spectacular nor a seeker after external decoration. The pure and lofty soul of Vincent dIndy was not in this performance.

One hardly knows what to say of the highly respectable Roussel's "Spring Festival." He is undoubtedly a man of high ideals and faithful to them, but we have yet to hear music by him that warms the cockles of the heart or leads one to forget the carking cares of this too daily life. His admirers have found much to praise in this "Spring Festival"; one speaks of the joy being tempered by dreamy melancholy (yes, the word is "dreamy," not "dreary"); and then speaks of the work as an "idyl"; while a third is reminded of oriental festivals. Thus do learned doctors disagree even in praise. Mr. Henderson of New York is sure that the festival was in Paris; that Pan was leaping about sporting a plug-hat with dryads masquerading as midinettes. From our recollection of the Neuilly festival, with its merry-go-rounds and horns, and shouting, we should say that M. Roussel's spring had come up, not slowly as in Coleridge's "Christabel," but with a rush and a bang up the Avenue du Roule. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the festival with gusto. The concert ended with a rather boisterous performance of "The Peri."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week will be an unusual one, with the organ a prominent instrument. Mozart, Eine Kleine Nachtmusik; Handel, Concerto, D minor for organ and strings; Lili Boulanger, "For the Funeral of a Soldier"; Copland, Symphony for organ and orchestra; Liszt, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph." Nadia Boulanger will be the organist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
Worcester, Mass.
FEB 14 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, Famous Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

CHANCE LEFT TO HEAR SYMPHONY

Hub Season Sold Out but Seats Here Available

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Worcester next Tuesday to give its annual concert in Mechanics Hall. Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor, comes with it, and it is the only chance Worcester symphony lovers will have to hear the orchestra or see the conductor.

The regular symphony season of 61 concerts in Boston is sold out, and patrons from this city who are in the habit of going to Boston to get their symphony music will be disappointed, for there are no seats left for the course and the Worcester concert is the only chance to hear the orchestra this season for Worcester patrons. Next season it is expected the Boston season will be extended to 66 or 68 concerts which means the possible elimination of the New England cities that the orchestra visits.

The program for Tuesday night opens with C. P. E. Bach's Concerto in D Major, in three movements. There are three novelties, two of which are Russian. Berlioz's overture to "The Roman Carnival," Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovantchina" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble-Bee," from the fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." It was this selection that resulted in the orchestra playing an encore in Boston several weeks ago, the first encore ever responded to since the organization of the orchestra 40 years ago.

The closing number is Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor. This is the symphony which Koussekitzky has revived and which has created such enthusiasm in Boston and New York where he has played it.

Seats for the Worcester concert are on sale at Steinert's.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 15 1925

NOTED LEADER AND FAMED ORCHESTRA HERE ON TUESDAY

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The feature of the annual visit to Worcester by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians for a concert in Mechanics hall Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, will, of course, be the first appearance hereabouts of Serge Koussevitzky, the remarkable new Russian leader. This celebrity, who has made a profound impression in each city which he has visited at the head of the orchestra in this, his first season in America, will be heard in the coming Worcester concert in a symphony in which he has made a particularly vivid impression—the Fifth in E minor by his countryman, Tchaikovsky.

The performances have made nothing less than a magnificent impression, and according to the critics' verdict revealed new powers in the conductor and a new eloquence in the music, which, they concluded, may well outlast the other symphonies of this composer.

Two further numbers from the musical literature of Russia will be played—the "Prelude" to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina" and the Scherzo "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." Moussorgsky's Prelude" depicts the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow. The Scherzo has an irresistible charm, which is evident from the fact that when Mr. Koussevitzky performed it in Boston, a repetition was demanded and granted for the first time since the beginnings of the orchestra 40 years ago. There will also be played Berlioz' brilliant overture, "The Roman Carnival," and, to open the concert, a concerto for orchestra in D major by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach.

It is well to know that the one chance Worcester has to hear the orchestra is Tuesday evening. Every seat for the Boston course concert is sold.

Seats for the concert are on sale at Steinert's.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 15 1925

Kochanski with Boston Symphony

With Paul Kochanski, the celebrated violinist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, comes for its fourth concert of the season a week from next Tuesday. This is the last concert but one of the present season.

Koussevitzky's programme will have two Russian numbers, notably Glazounov's Eighth Symphony, one of his latest works. This illustrious composer of the Russian school though still living does not figure among the "radicals." The symphony will be introduced by Glinka's overture to "Russian and Ludmilla." The closing number will be Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo," a glorious pageant in tones descriptive of the tragedy and ultimate triumph of the great Italian poet.

Kochanski will appear with the orchestra in Concerto in A-minor by Vivaldi, the early Italian composer. Kochanski is a violinist from Poland, the country which has produced such a surprising number of geniuses upon this instrument, and this virtuoso holds an undisputable place among the greatest of these. Kochanski learned his art from the Polish master, Mlynarski, and the Belgian master, Cesar Thomson, thus perpetuating two illustrious lines of violin playing. His tours through the principal cities of Europe gave him the highest reputation before he came to this country in 1921. One of his first appearances was as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the regular Boston concerts.

* * *

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
FEB 15 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

The fourth and last concert but one of the season here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, February 24th, with Paul Kochanski, the celebrated Polish violionist as the soloist.

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce to Providence at this concert a notable symphony of modern Russia which nevertheless is not of the "revolutionary" school—Glazounov's Symphony No 8. This will be introduced by the Overture of "Ruslan and Ludmilla" by Glinka, the early Russian composer. The closing number of the evening will be Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Tasso; Lament and Triumph," a score which depicts with much tonal splendor the varying fortunes of the famous Italian poet.

Paul Kochanski is one of the suprising number of geniuses of the violin who have come from Poland and he is by no means the least of them. This artist is a pupil of the Polish master, Mlynarski and the Belgian master, Cesar Thomson, thus perpetuating two illustrious lines of violin playing. His tours through the principal cities of Europe gave him the highest reputation before he first came to this country in 1921. One of his first appearances was as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the regular Boston concerts, an occasion which will long be remembered by those who then heard him.

CATHOLIC WOMAN'S CLUB.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
POST
1921

MASS.
G TE
3 17 19

[illegible]
Feb 15

41

ORGANIST COMES FROM DISTINGUISHED MUSICAL FAMILY

Nadia Boulanger, who will appear as organist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, belongs to a very musical family. Her grandfather and father were instructors in the Paris conservatory and her sister, Lili, the younger of the two, won a high reputation as a composer before she died. Miss Nadia won many honors as a student in the conservatory, chief among them a first prize in harmony, a first prize in piano accompaniment, organ, conterpoint, fugue, and in 1908 the second "Grand Prix de Rome." She was graduated when she was 16 years old.

For the last 14 years she has been the assistant of Dallier, professor of harmony at the Paris conservatory, and his assistant as organist at the Madeleine. She is professor of harmony at the American conservatory, Fontainebleau; professor of organ, harmony, counterpoint and fugue at the Paris Normal Music school, critic of the Monde Musical. She is associated with several musical societies.

She is favorably known also as a composer. She and the late Raoul Pugno, who is remembered in Boston by his brilliant piano playing, wrote an opera, "The Dead City," for which d'Annuzio made a special version of the play in which Duse gave a memorable performance.

She will not appear at the Symphony concerts this week as a composer, but as an organist and a teacher, for she taught Mr. Copland, whose symphony for organ and orchestra is dedicated to her, and she gave lessons to her sister Lili, whose "For the Funeral of a Soldier" will be performed. She will also play an organ concerto edited by Guilmant, who was her organ teacher.

NADIA BOULANGER, ORGANIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS WEEK, TEACHER OF HER FAMOUS SISTER AND AARON COPLAND, BOTH OF WHOM WILL BE REPRESENTED ON THE PROGRAM

The life of Lili Boulanger, who, born in 1893, died in 1918, was triumphant and tragic. Constant ill-health prevented her from having regular musical instruction until she was 16 years, although she was musically precocious. Nadia formed her taste and disciplined her. Then Lili studied with Georges Caussade; later with Paul Vidal, and in 1913, she did what no woman had ever done from the time the Paris Conservatory was founded. She was awarded the first "Grand Prix de Rome.". There was a long standing prejudice against the admission of women to the Villa Medicis at Rome, but jury and audience were unanimous in awarding the prize to Lili before her competing contata, "Faust and Helen," had been one-third performed.

She went to Rome and there worked diligently for a year in spite of her wretched health. The war obliged her to return to Paris. In 1915-16, sick as she was, she was busy as a member of a Franco-American committee in aid of French musicians. She was once again in Rome, but only for a little time. Her courage was indomitable. Even on her sick bed she busied herself by sketching musical ideas. The list of her compositions includes works for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra, the 129th psalm, a "Hindu Prayer," a "Pie Jesu," songs, etc. She had nearly completed a lyric drama, Maeterlinck's "Princess Maleine."

"For the Funeral of a Soldier" was composed when she was 18 years old. It was suggested by a poem of de Musset's.

Henri Prunieres said of Lili: "Her sublime resignation in the face of death seemed to bring forth the full beauty of her genius."

PORTLAND,
ORE.
JOURNAL
FEB 15 1925

The Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky came to New York for its third visit of the season on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The weather on Thursday evening was unspeakable, but there was not an empty place in the entire Carnegie hall. There was considerable excitement over the presence as soloist of Roland Hayes, who has won an extraordinary following among song-lovers. Mr. Hayes was heard in the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch by Liszt, with accompaniment arranged for orchestra by Busoni. This was sung in Italian and followed immediately by the air, "The Repose of the Holy Family" from the Berlioz "The Flight Into Egypt." Of these Mr. Hayes was infinitely more at home and more successful in the French number than in the Italian one. Both were of excessively difficult and both called into play all his skill as artist as well as his vocal equipment. He was recalled many times. Mr. Koussevitzky again aroused much interest and curiosity for he had a program, in fact a pair of most conservative ones. He opened with a concerto for orchestra in D major by C. P. E. Bach arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, a sarabande and Dance by Debussy orchestrated by Ravel, and the only outright orchestral number was the Tschaikowsky Fifth endowed with many individual touches, some of which seemed unduly slow and others were different in rhythms from what the average concert goer has heard and believed to be authoritative; yet who better than Mr. Koussevitzky should know what moods abound in a Tschaikowsky symphony? On Saturday afternoon the program contained three numbers only. These were the Concerto Grosso in D minor of Handel and Beethoven's A major, No. 7, between which the conductor placed the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition" arranged for orchestra by Ravel. The Boston symphony program notes concerning this work are of more than passing interest. The rights of performing this Ravel orchestration belong exclusively to the Russian conductor and he is not permitted to rent or give the score to any other conductor. There are, however, other orchestral arrangements of the same work including one by Touschmalov which was played in Chicago by Frederick Stock's admirable orchestra March 19-20, 1920. There was an equally large and enthusiastic audience on Saturday afternoon. The next pair of concerts will be given March 12-24 with Albert Spalding soloist for both concerts.

* * *

Van Hoogstraten took

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
FEB 15 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor Of Boston Symphony Orchestra

One of the Famous Directors Who Worked Up From The Orchestral Ranks—Began Musical Career As a Virtuoso of the Doublebass

Many a conductor has started his career as a virtuoso of some particular instrument. Stokowski the conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra, for example, and Stock, the Chicago conductor, both worked up from the orchestral ranks; while Pierre Monteux' instrument, as a student, was the viola.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will ~~make his~~ first appearance in Portland at a concert under Music Commission auspices, March 25, at City Hall, has the sole distinction of having been a virtuoso of the double bass. Circumstances of his early choice are these. When as a boy of 14 he entered the Moscow Conservatory, he was required by the rules of the institution to study, for the orchestral class, either a brass instrument or the doublebass. Koussevitzky chose the latter and later became a pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec. He developed an extraordinary proficiency and for the first 10 years of his professional career toured Euope, east and west, giving recitals upon this unusual instrument. He even composed a Concerto for it which he played with the leading orchestras of the time.

It must not be supposed that Koussevitzky used the unwieldy doublebass of the mordern orchestra which, of course, is built for volume and depth of "ground tone." He acquired an instrument made by Amati, the illustrious Italian and contemporary of Stradivarius, in the 17th century.

These early Italian basses were really chamber instruments considerably smaller than those to which we are accustomed, and of course infinitely more adaptable for solo purposes. Koussevitzky's doublebass can be likened to an enlarged and deepened 'cello, retaining all the tonal beauty of this more familiar instrument.

Koussevitzky's fame as a virtuoso was high indeed, and there is every indication that his mastery of the instrument was a thing to wonder at. A particular musical treat must have been the joint recitals which he gave in Paris with Cassadessus, the leader of the renowned Society of Ancient Instruments.

The rigors of a conductor's duties have compeplled Koussevitzky more less to lay aside his beloved "Amati" but it has never been far from him and, indeed, he brought it to America with him.

French Organist at Symphony Concerts

NADIA BOULANGER, a French organist, will be soloist at the Symphony concerts this week. She will take part in the performance of Handel's concerts for strings and organ in D minor, Aaron Copland's symphony for organ, which is new to Boston, and in a piece called "Funeral of a Soldier," written by her sister, Lili.

Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," and Liszt's "Tasco," are also on the program.

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
FEB 15 1925

NADIA BOULANGER, French organist, to be soloist at this week's Symphony concerts.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
FEB 16 1925

SPOKANE,
WASH.
SPOKESMAN-REVIEW
FEB 15 1925

Many Orchestra Conductors and Followers Mark Season

In many respects the current music season has ofefred the most interesting situation with respect to symphony ochestra conductors this city has ever known.

Never have there appeared so many within so brief a space of time; never have they been of such dissimilar qualities; never have the various supporters of each leader rallied more loyally behind their respective favorites.

Wilhelm Furtwaengler concluded, a few evenings ago, his 10 "guest" concerts with the Philharmonic. He finished with his auditors cheering him ecsatically (and Wilhelm Mengelberg was sitting in a Carnegie hall box, too).

It wasn't especially pleasant for Mengelberg, who is just about to begin, as I write, his duties as the Philharmonic head for the remainder of the season.

Furtwaengler and Mengelberg are rivals. Each is great; and who shall say which is the greater? Furtwaengler will doubtless return next season. The details and length of his stay will depend on what arrangements can be made to release him from certain European conducting obligations.

Meanwhile, Koussevitzky goes merrily on with the Boston Symphony, and with a newly signed contract in his inside pocket. But Koussevitzky's New York popularity isn't exactly growing. Leopold Stokowski is holding his adherents, and also keeping the Philadelphia orchestra up to its usual concert pitch.

Now for Mengelberg. He will have to do something unique to equal the recognition which has been showered on Furtwaengler.

Metropolitan Overcomes Its

---

college.

The re-engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony for at least another year—until May, 1926—was confirmed at Symphony Hall on Jan. 29. A longer tenure than another year for the Russian leader could not be vouched for, but opinion holds that Mr. Koussevitzy can retain the coveted berth for a third year if he so desires.

Patrons are delighted with the fact that a front-rank conductor, magnetic in personality and one who can hold old and new audiences, will safeguard the destinies of the organization for another year and perhaps longer.

Aside from theh pleasure felt in the fact that the Boston Symphony will visit Portland this Spring, there is eager anticipation to see the new Russian conductor whose personality is said to be as fascinating as his leadership is forceful and magnetic.

Dr. Hubbard E. Milliken of the Cape Shore left Friday for a trip to Panama and South America.

Boston Symphony Concert Tomorrow

The annual Worcester concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Mechanics hall tomorrow night. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conducttor, who came to the orchestra last fall, will make his first bow to a Worcester audience. The program includes Tchaikowsky's Fifth symphony, Bach's Concerto in D major, and three novelties, a Berlioz composition and two Russian numbers, including Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble-Bee," from the fairy opera "Tsar Saltan."

There are manifold sides to the genius of Koussevitzky. Not a little of his fame is due to his readings of the classical masters. No one can instill a more vivid and beautiful life into the music of the 18th century. Koussevitzky, the romanticist, is also irresistible. The fervors of Wagner, or Berlioz, or Tchaikowsky flame gloriously under his baton. Koussevitzky will appear both as classicist and romanticist in the concert here.

Then there is a third angle to his striking achievements—his championship of music of the modern schools. No conductor scrutinizes more eargerly, or sets forth more staunchly and understandingly the most important music of the present

---

PORTLAND,
ORE.
JOURNAL
FEB 15 1925

New York does not get the American premiere of the Stravinsky piano concerto after all. This honor, if honor it be, fell to Boston, where the Russian played it on January 23 and 24 with the Boston Symphony orchestra under his countryman, Koussevitzky. Stravinsky is also scheduled to play it in Chicago.

Herald
Feb 15

BOULANGER NEXT SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Nadia Boulanger, the distinguished French organist now visiting America, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. She will play with the orchestra a concerto in D minor, by Handel, for strings and orgen, in Aaron Copland's symphony for organ, which will have its first performance here, and in the composition of her late sister, Lili Boulanger, entitled "For the Funeral of a Soldier." Mr. Koussevitzky will open the concert with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," and close it with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

4-0
42

Daniel

SYMPHONY'S MUSIC LOST FROM AUTO

Boston Post

Run Over, But Found Intact in Police Station

Feb. 16

For close on a quarter of an hour an anxious audience at Symphony Hall, on Saturday evening, awaited the beginning of the Symphony concert. Then it was announced from the stage that the order of the programme had been changed and that Roussel's "Pour une Fete de Printemps" would begin it, to be followed by Dukas' "La Peri." No reason was then and there announced. But the story is this:

me there on week days.

SYMPHONY'S MUSIC LOST IN HIGHWAY

Continued from First Page

When Serge Koussevitzky left his home in Jamaica Plain for the trip to Symphony Hall a suitcase containing the score (the conductor's parts) of the four pieces to be played that evening supposedly accompanied him. Presumably it was left on the step of the car, not placed inside. At least upon arrival at the concert hall the precious case was missing. Hurriedly the chauffeur was dispatched to search for it at the Jamaica Plain house, where it was believed it must have been left.

The appointed hour of the concert came, but there was no sign of the returning chauffeur. A telephone call elicited the information that he had reached the house, had been unable to find the scores, and had departed again, but the maid who answered the telephone call knew not where or whither.

Use Duplicate Scores

By good fortune there were in the library of the Symphony orchestra duplicate scores of the Roussel and the Dukas pieces, and so it was that the concert began with those compositions. And some five minutes after Mr. Koussevitzky took his place upon the platform there appeared "back-stage" the triumphant chauffeur, bearing a bent and battered suitcase that had apparently been run over by some passing vehicle, but holding safe within it the missing music.

Failing to find the suitcase at the house, the chauffeur had hastened to police station 13, not far away, and there found that some honest person had turned in the damaged but still invaluable case but a moment before. Back again he hurried to Symphony Hall—and all was well!

Second Loss in Season

Indeed it is credibly reported that Mr. Koussevitzky's "reading" of d'Indy's Symphony quite excelled the illuminating performance of that impressive music which he had given at the concert of Friday afternoon, nor did Rebaud's "La Procession Nocturne" suffer in performance through its changed position on the programme and its intermediate wanderings.

It may be recalled in passing that once before this season a Symphony concert programme was changed, though scarcely on such short notice, when the theft of a suitcase deprived the orchestra of a needed E-flat clarinet. Surely Fate dogs the doings of the Symphony Orchestra when suitcases are in question.

COMPOSITIONS NEW HERE ON PROGRAM

Symphony Will Play Notable Moussorgsky Numbers

Two excerpts from the music of Russia, virtually unknown to the western world until Koussevitzky introduced them, will be on the program of his first appearance in Mechanics Hall as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock.

The principal monuments of the genius of Moussorgsky are the two operas "Boris Godunov" and "Khovantchina." The prelude to the latter, which is to be played, depicts the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow. The piece has its distinct color and mood suggestive of the subject.

"The Fight of the Bumble Bee" is a little Scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan," in which a prince transforms himself into a bee for his own purposes. This tiny piece exacts an aerial lightness and fleetness from the wood wind which is a marvel of virtuosity. Its charm is evident from the fact that when Mr. Koussevitzky performed it in Boston, an encore was demanded and granted for the first time since the beginning of the orchestra, 40 years ago.

WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

FEB 17 192

Boston Symphony Mechanics Hall Tonight

The Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 pieces, with Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor, comes to Mechanics hall tonight for its annual Worcester concert. This is the only opportunity open to Worcester symphony lovers to hear the orchestra this season. The Boston course of 61 concerts is entirely sold out, and the Boston management could not take care of Worcester patrons at Boston concerts because of this condition.

The program is one of the most attractive that the organization has ever offered here, the outstanding number being Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor, a composition revived by Koussevitzky which has created much enthusiasm in Boston and New York.

The reading of this symphony by the conductor is regarded by critics as remarkable. The program opens with C. P. E. Bach's concerto for orchestra in D major, in three movements.

There is also a group of novelties, a Berlioz composition, overture to "The Roman Carnival," and two Russian novelties which Koussevitzky has introduced. The first is Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," and Rimsky-Korsakow's "The Flight of the Bumble-Bee," the latter one of the sensations of the symphony season. It was this selection that caused the orchestra to respond to an encore for the first time since its organization 40 years ago.

Seats for the concert are on sale at Steinert's.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 18 1925

WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

FEB 18 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY SCORES BIG HIT

Worcester Audience Is Enthused by Splendid Concert

Borne on the winds of common report came the tidings that this year the Boston Symphony Orchestra was doing what amusement managers delight to characterize as "packing them in." Philadelphia, New York, Cambridge, filled every seat in spacious auditoriums, while down in staid old Boston nothing like it had ever been witnessed by Back Bay antiquity. This—at least the top layer of it—being due, 'twas said, to the guiding, and where the public was concerned, the leading hand of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Mechanics Hall last evening proved that Worcester had heard the reports, for the audience was larger than customary at orchestral concerts, but the many vacant seats made it clear that the reports were not wholly credited. Today they are, and, barring pestilence or famine, our only hall will be far too small for those who will try to hear the next concert given here by this organization and its wonderful conductor.

For Worcester abandoned its century-old calm last night and actually let itself go in tremendous bursts of enthusiasm, even to the extent of remaining seated to applaud without restraint long after the program was completed.

The reason for the enthusiasm over Mr. Koussevitzky and his men is clear enough. Not only is he a fine conductor and a wonderful program maker but he personally is impressively magnetic. Without any apparent intent to pose or strike effective attitudes he creates the impression that he is something more than the leader of his men; that if the forces beneath his baton number one hundred he himself is number one hundred and one.

He seems as it were to go with those he leads and with him and first this section and then that of the great orchestra moves the melody and the rhythm. And with the method come results, precision, fire, force and unity of attack. In common with the rest who saw and listened, this commentator was quite swept off his feet. Yet no one should get the impression that sensationalism is to be seen in this great leader for to leave such a thought would be injustice.

Russian in Tone

Naturally enough the program was quite Russian, not so much, we imagine, because of the conductor's nativity, but because he does not underrate the power of Russian music to sway the average concertgoer. New was a Bach concerto arranged for full orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, himself a Russian composer of note. It was delicately and beautifully played.

The brilliant Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture was given with a brilliancy matching its own. A musicianly tuneful prelude by Moussorgsky; a tantalizing morceau by Rimsky-Korsakov picturing the flight of a bumblebee and the fifth Tchaikovsky symphony completed the Russian menu. The symphony was given with brilliant fire and enthusiasm, the barbaric finale being superbly played.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

Program Under Koursevitzky Features Russian Works

Tonight the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 104 pieces, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, comes to Mechanics Hall for its annual Worcester concert. It is the only chance Worcester patrons will have to hear the orchestra this season, for all the tickets for the entire series of 61 symphony concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston, are sold.

While the management appreciates the Worcester concerts it is a fact that the only place to hear the orchestra this season is in Mechanics Hall tonight.

Koussevitsky, the new Russian conductor, has created so much enthusiasm where the orchestra has appeared that there is considerable interest to see him. The program for tonight's concert opens with Bach's Concerto for Orchestra in D Major, three movements, and the closing number is Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, which is played by this orchestra under the baton of Koussevitzky with remarkable charm, so much so that the critics in Boston and New York have given columns of space to praise of his work in this particular direction.

Between these two numbers is a group of three novelties, opening with Berlioz's overture to "The Roman Carnival," and including two Russian novelties, introduced in this country by Koussevitzky. One is Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," the other Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble-Bee," from the opera "Tsar Saltan," the novelty that Koussevitzky has played and over which so much interest has been aroused.

Seats are on sale at Steiner[illegible].

Rudolph Gorsher, publicity.

Koussevitzky and Boston Orchestra Well Received

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, without any doubt, added considerably to his laurels last night at the concert given in Mechanics hall before an audience which showed unusual enthusiasm for Worcester and especially for a symphony program.

The feeling is strong that this marked appreciation was rather for the superb conducting of the Russian than, to the same degree, for the somewhat difficult Philipp Emanuel Bach symphony, the concerto for orchestra in D major, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, which opened the program. It was a delight, however, to listen to the beautiful tone quality of the instruments and to the orchestra's ready response to the conductor's baton, eccentric though it was. This delightfully melodic music was played with fine balance and uncommon warmth.

The overture from "The Roman Carnival," opus 9, by Berlioz, the chief thematic material of which was taken by the composer from his opera "Benvenuto Cellini." The theme of the overture is built from fragments immediately developed but with constant returns to the theme introduced at the beginning. This overture preceded a characteristically Russian work, the prelude to "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky, an interesting example of what the Russian temperament produces.

One of the most happily received numbers on the program was "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," scherzo from "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan" by Rimsky-Korsakov, which presented a beautifully constructed tone poem, admirably executed by the Boston aggregation. The illusion is cleverly created in this work, according to the stage direction given in the opera, "Out of the Sea Comes a Bumble-Bee and Flies About the Swan."

The second part of the program was devoted to Tchaikovsky's symphony, number 5 in E minor, opus 64, which brought forth a literal storm of applause from the audience, forcing the talented Koussevitsky to return time and time again to bow his acknowledgement and that of the orchestral artists. Doubtless the fact that this music was more familiar to many of the audience than the remainder of the program accounts in part for the response, but in any case the unusual phrasing and masterly interpretation made it more than interesting.

The second movement was especially beautiful with its judicious blend of dignity and romantic fervor which contrasted with the rather sentimental reading of the first, particularly of the waltz-like second theme. Following the delightful third movement, the valse, one was quite unprepared for the dramatic height of the finale with its mad rejoicing which culminated in a climax which will not soon be forgotten by those who heard it. It brought glory to the brilliantly gifted conductor and to his musicians of rare ability.

HAVERHILL
MASS.
GAZETTE
ISSUE OF

FEB 18 1925

Boston Symphony at Academy March 1

Serge Koussevitzky, the brilliant new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has lent a new prestige to the Boston Symphony concerts this season, has been compared to the late Arthur Nikisch, who was one of the first celebrities in the line of Boston Symphony conductors. In the leader who is now a memory and in his successor are found the meteoric flash of genius which gives a certain electric quality to their performances and makes them wholly impressive. The symphony plays at the Academy March 1.

The genius of the two, of course, are very different. Each is an individuality in the history of great conductors. Yet, there is a certain type similarity in the two. Koussevitzky as a younger man looked upon Nikisch's leadership as an ideal a thing to strive for. Besides being an ardent admirer of the elder leader, he was a close friend. Yet it must not be forgotten that Koussevitzky is a Russian while Nikisch was a Hungarian. That in itself implies a difference in viewpoint and character.

There are manifold sides to the genius of Koussevitzky. Not a little of his fame is due to his readings of the classical masters. No one can instill a more vivid and beautiful life into the music of the 18th century. Koussevitzky, the romanticist, is also irresistible. The fervors of Wagner, or Berlioz, or Tchaikovsky flame gloriously under his baton. Koussevitzky appears both as classicist and romanticist in the coming concert here.

Then there is a third angle to his striking achievements—his championship of music of the modern schools. No conductor scrutinizes more eagerly and sets forth more staunchly and understandingly the most important music of our own day.

UTICA, N. Y.
Observer-Dispatch

FEB 18 1925

Symphony's Music Run Over By Auto But End Was Well

For close on a quarter of an hour an anxious audience at Symphony Hall, Boston, Saturday evening, awaited the beginning of the Boston Symphony concert. Then it was announced from the stage that the order of the program had been changed and that Roussel's "Pour Une Fete de Printemps" would begin it, to be followed by Dukas's "La Peri." No reason was then and there announced. But the story is this:

When Serge Roussevitsky left his home in Jamaica Plain for the trip to Symphony Hall a suitcase containing the score (the conductor's parts) of the four pieces to be played that evening supposedly accompanied him. Presumably it was left on the step of the car, not placed inside. At least upon arrival at the concert the precious case was missing. Hurriedly the chauffeur was dispatched to search for it at the Jamaica Plain house, where it was believed it must have been left.

The appointed hour of the concert came, but there was no sign of the returning chauffeur. A telephone call elicited the information that he had reached the house, had been unable to find the scores, and had departed again, but the maid who answered the telephone call knew not where or whither.

By good fortune there were in the library of the Symphony Orchestra duplicate scores of the Roussel and the Dukas pieces, and so it was that the concert began with those compositions. And some five minutes after Mr. Koussevitsky took his place upon the platform there appeared "back-stage" the triumphant chauffeur, bearing a bent and battered suitcase that had apparently been run over by some passing vehicle, but holding safe within it the missing music.

Failing to find the suitcase at the house, the chauffeur had hastened to police station 13, not far away, and there found that some honest person had turned in the damaged but still invaluable case [illegible] moment before. Back again [illegible] to Symphony Hall—and [illegible] well!

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

FEB 18

At the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Haverhill on Sunday afternoon, March 1, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct his musicians in the Hadyn Symphony in G major, the Berloiz overture, The Roman Carnival, the shorter Russian numbers which featured the Lowell program, concluding with a Wagner group including The Ride of the Valkyries, the Prelude to Lohengrin and that to Mastersingers of Nuremburg.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

FEB 18 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

By M. S. R.

Last evening gave Worcester music lovers a wonderful treat. One went to the concert with a fear of being disappointed that Koussevitzky would not come up to one's expectations. And those who expected a sensational conductor must have been disappointed.

He showed no mannerisms, no unnecessary beating of the rhythm, no dangling white cuffs. He used his baton only for brilliancy of effect, pianissimo passages and change of tempo.

One had understood that there would be no tuning up of instruments on the stage, but there was the usual bee-hive of excitement as each man played away at his own little tune while waiting for the conductor to put in an appearance.

The program opened with a Concerto for orchestra in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach. The term "concerto" is perhaps a little misleading. One expects to see some solo performer, but it must be remembered that such terms as "concerto" and "sonata" have today a very different meaning from what they did in the time of the pre-classicists. According to Bach's conception, a concerto is a composition in which every instrument becomes a solo instrument and is given a chance to show its prowess. This was brought out especially in the third movement which was rich in polyphony—the first violins tossing the theme to the seconds, then to the wood-winds, and finally the bass viols who gave it out with ponderous agility.

Unconsciously one had rather expected a Russian flavor to Koussevitzky's interpretation of this work, but it was given a very conservative reading. This was followed by the overture, "The Roman Carnival," Opus 9, by Berlioz, intended originally as an interlude to his opera "Benevenuto Cellini," a work depicting the dissolute life of the sculptor. It is another example where the comparatively short excerpt becomes more popular than the entire opera. The remaining three numbers were given over to Russian compositions, the first two, Moussorgsky's Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," and Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," gave the audience an insight into the Russian Nationalists' school. Moussorgsky, greatly underrated in his lifetime, is now being called the Shakespeare of Russian music. He shows much greater originality and genius than Rimsky-Korsakov. In this Prelude he has worked out the idea of the sun rising against the turrets of the Kremlin—an idea similar to Greig's "Morning," but infinitely more objective. It has been said that one may see color in music. Here, if anywhere, is this true. At the beginning of the prelude, one can imagine bright streaks of light soaring up into the heavens. Then gradually as the sun approaches the horizon, there appear rosy tints in the sky, which later change to the clear blue of the morning. When one compares this prelude to that charming song in which Moussorgsky immortalizes that very unpopular insect, "The Flea," one has a faint idea of his breadth of expression.

"The Flight of the Bumble Bee," was to the majority of the people the most popular number. It had an irresistible charm and freshness that was more than captivating. Here, at least, was something tangible to think about— a bee buzzing over the water. But after all, one is forced to admit that a bee is more interesting buzzing in an orchestra than in one's ear in a garden.

Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor closed the program. Everything has already been said of the composer. A man, erratic, morose, despondent, idealistic. His music is a panorama of the history of Russia. His first movement shows one the mutterings and groans of an oppressed people. From a technical standpoint. this movement seemed rather verbose and tiring. The second movement showed more entrancing counter-melodies against a wonderful theme. The third movement depicted by means of a delightful waltz, the aristocracy enjoying itself in luxury, trying to forget the oppression of the common people. The last movement opened in the style of a chorale. It is in a more optimistic vein than the first movement. It is soul stirring and highly emotional. Although Tschaikowsky writes passages of a deeper sentiment, yet he never descends to sentimentality.

In these Russian numbers one could not help but realize that Koussivitzky is a wonderful interpreter of Slavic music. Does not the same blood run in his veins so that his readings of these compositions are not the result of a western education but rather something inherent?

Not only Boston but the entire country is fortunate in securing such a conductor—a man who can keep up the standing and reputation of the Boston Symphony, and who, by his magnetic personality and seriousness of purpose, can make his listeners want to know and understand more about this elusive subject of music.

Transcript
Feb 19

Transcript
Feb 17

A NEW HAND KNOCKS UPON THE DOORS OF OUR CONCERT-HALLS

MR. COPLAND FROM THE YOUNGEST GENERATION

His Symphony for Organ and Orchestra as It Will Be Heard Tomorrow—Impressions in New York—The Purpose of the Composer—Mr. Damrosch's Quip—Nadia Boulanger as Guest

FROM Paris, Miss Nadia Boulanger has come to New York and Boston to be the guest of Mr. Damrosch's and Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestras. At home she is an organist, a teacher, a lecturer and a reviewer with music, discharging these functions with an equal ability, sitting high in the precious Parisian hierarchy. She is also the sister of Lili Boulanger, composer of promise and performance, by death cut off untimely. Therefore into Carnegie Hall and Symphony Hall, Miss Nadia brings one of Miss Lili's pieces that overseas her memory and her work may also be extolled. It is music for orchestra and organ. "Pour les Funerailles d'un Soldat," and it will be played at Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. Then and there Miss Nadia will also be heard in a Concerto of Handel for Organ and Orchestra, and in a Symphony for the same voices written by Mr. Aaron Copland of Brooklyn and of the youngest generation of American composers. These pieces all had place in Miss Boulanger's concert in New York with Mr. Damrosch's orchestra. Hearing them upon a Sunday in January, Mr. Gilman wrote in The Herald-Tribune:

> Mr. Damrosch had set on his program as chief item the Symphony for Organ and Orchestra by young Mr. Ahron Copland. Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn in 1900; studied with Miss Nadia Boulanger in Paris; and dedicated his symphony to his distinguished teacher, who, in gracious return for the compliment, played the organ part in the piece. Mr. Copland finished his score last autumn, and yesterday's performance was his first. As a composer he is not wholly unknown hereabouts. We heard and liked two piano-pieces of his that he played at a concert of the League of Composers last November. Rubin Goldmark was his master in harmony and composition before Mr. Copland went abroad, where Miss Boulanger took him in hand and taught him what little had been left unimparted by that most human of pedagogues, the admirable Goldmark. Mr. Copland has composed a ballet in two acts; a piece for string quartet; choral numbers; songs; piano pieces.
>
> It need scarcely be said that Mr. Copland is a child of his time. Naturally enough, his speech is the atonal, polytonal speech of today. Why anyone should expect him or his fellows to write in any other idiom than that which is characteristic of 1925 is more than we can understand. Let us get used to the fact that it is as normal for the youth of 1925 to write in two keys simultaneously as it was for the youth of 1825 to confine himself frugally to one. The question to ask ourselves is: What does the young man of 1925 have to say to us in his superposed keys? Does he make music that has profile; that is imaginative, memorable; or does he merely repeat the clichcés that have already formed themselves by the impress of this new style upon current musical thinking?
>
> There are pages in Mr. Copland's symphony (which is in three movements, and uses the organ "as an integral part of the orchestra rather than as a solo instrument") which have bite and power, both rhythmical and harmonic. These pages are chiefly in the Finale, in which Mr. Copland has most to say. At its best his music is astringent, unsentimental, muscular, direct. Mr. Damrosch, hearing some hisses at the end of the piece, remarked to his audience that a youth who could write such a Symphony at twenty-four would be capable some day of murder. That was a bit rough on Mr. Copland. He does not strike us as one of the murderous kind. The real murderers among composers are the unimaginative standpatters; those who, unaware that music is perpetually enlarging its range of expression, slay us with the boredom engendered by stale romanticisms, stale classicisms. Mr. Copland, even though he does present us with some second-hand Stravinsky—his second movement is redolent of "Petrushka"; even though he suggests to us in his first movement a kind of Prospect Park Schönberg, is nevertheless, on the whole, working out his own musical destiny in his own way, and we shall follow his pursuit of it with lively interest.
>
> The other youthful music on Mr. Damrosch's program was a dirge, "Pour les Funerailles d'un Soldat," for Organ and Orchestra, by the lamented Lili Boulanger, sister of Nadia, who died in 1918 at the age of twenty-four. She composed this threnody, in her eighteenth year, to verses by Alfred de Musset. Monsieur Camille Mauclair, in his biographical sketch, described the piece as "the noblest inspiration that has been revealed to us since the Funeral March of the 'Eroica Symphony.'" It is perhaps not quite great a masterpiece as that some- t astonishing phrase would have s to expect. Yet Lili Boulanger's is affecting and potent music,

Child of the Times

Aaron Copland

American Composer of the Youngest Generation Whose Symphony for Organ and Orchestra Will Be Played at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow

in the employment of stops and her classic reticence were exquisite. Her transitions from one manual to another were planned with the same impeccable taste and invariably with a view to correct musical results. Her entire performance in short disclosed a fine musicianship, a sensitive and highly cultivated art and great delicacy of feeling.

"Miss Lili Boulanger's funeral music proved to be something of uncommon worth. The basic theme of the composition is the venerable 'Dies Iræ,' which is treated with imagination and made to expand into new material. The organ is not over prominent but is essential. Its part gives character to the whole music. The orchestration is admirable and the general effect of the piece, which is developed with stirring eloquence, is genuinely impressive.

"Of Mr. Copland's interesting and uneven composition it is more difficult to write. The symphony employs the organ merely as an addition to the ensemble and as a source of certain solo-tints not to be obtained from the other instruments, most of which are called upon for important and fully exposed solos. The first movement, an andante, has a well defined mood which is skilfully sustained throughout. This movement shows the influence of French modernistic music, but not so greatly as the others. The scherzo, rising at times to the verge of importance, is held back continually by a palpable striving after striking effects. This is still more the case with the finale, a lento followed by an allegro moderato. The harmonies of course have the modern acidity, but to this no one need offer any objection. The real defect of the symphony is its undisguised search for thrills. When Mr. Copland discards, as he probably will in time, the struggles, the abrupt intrusions of irrelevant instrumental ejaculations, the physical pantings, the shattering of lines, and the obscuration of the perspectives which seem so vital to the young generation, he may produce something of lasting worth. His symphony is bold and vigorous and sometimes it is almost beautiful."

Interlude

In his old age, Mr. Damrosch delights to be chatterer and fun-maker in the concert-hall, and his quip about murder at the expense of Mr. Copland has already been recorded. Next day Mr. Ernest Newman, another elderly dispenser of humor about music and musicians, took cue as follows:

> A number of composers have written admirable music in their early twenties, but not one of them has developed into a murderer. The truth is that murder as a fine art is much more difficult than writing sympho> in the arms of her lover, and he and his servants slew them both, after which he became a distinguished composer. He was thirty years of age at the time. Till then he had been only an aristocratic dilettante; his tragic experience made him the greatest master of pathetic expression of his day. His biographer, Dr. Ferdinand Keiner, is certain that but for this decisive event in his life we should not have had the Gesualdo we now know.

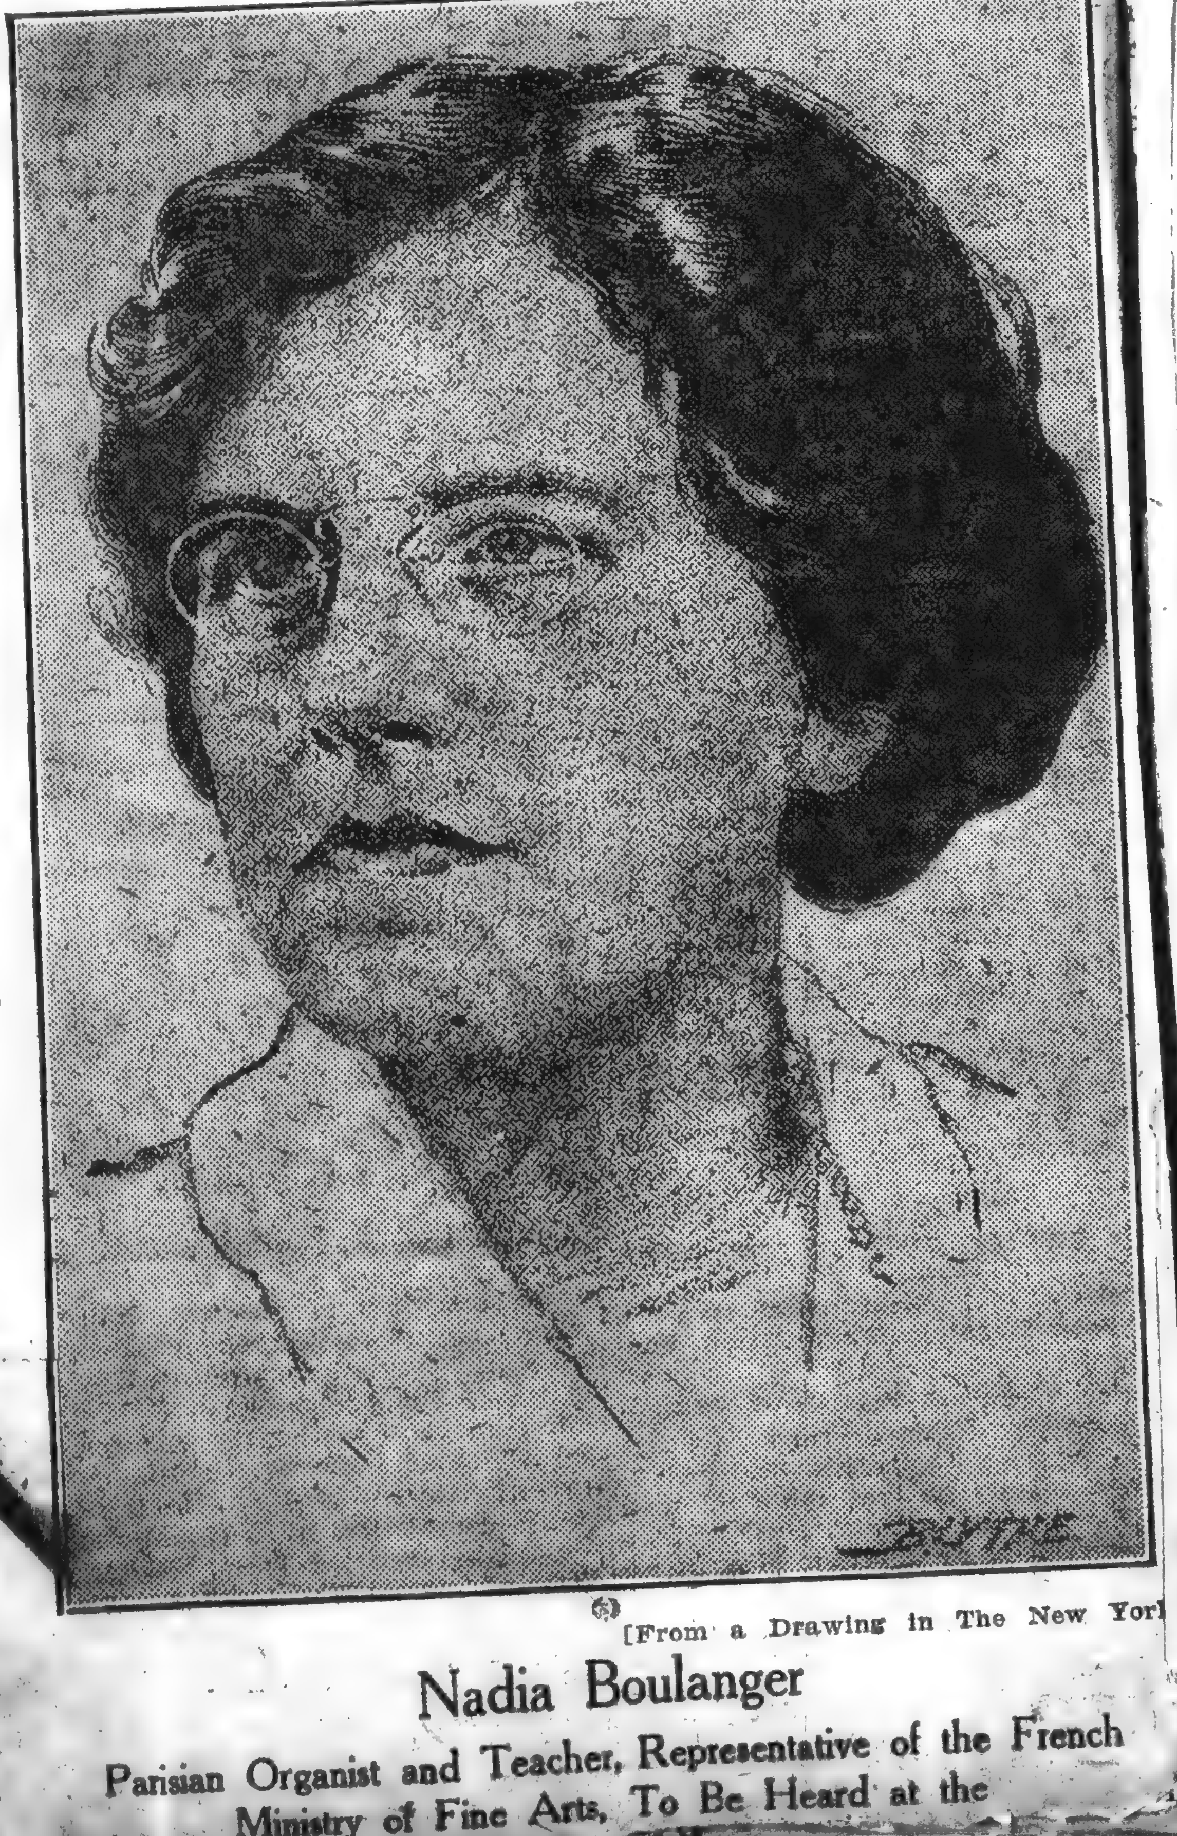
>
> The medicine seems a little drastic, perhaps; but the world would not grudge it to more than one composer whom I could name, if only it would be sure to improve his music. It is not for me, of course, to say on whom the composer who thinks of taking up this post-graduate course should practice. His first thought—a pardonable one, no doubt—would be to kill one of his critics; but everyone will agree that killing a critic is no murder. If I might offer the composer a suggestion, it would be that he might start with a fiddler or a tenor.

Mr. Copland Again

To return to Mr. Copland's Symphony, Mr. Virgil Thomson writes a note about one or two salient traits of the music: "In form it is simply and lightly built, following the plan of Beethoven's 'Moonlight Sonata'; that is to say a slow song-like movement; a lively Scherzo; and a Finale in sonata-form. The composer's preoccupation is always rhythmic, and the counterpoint and the counter-tonalities are always determined by the necessity for clarity in the development and contrast of rhythms. . . . The technical interest centers in the Scherzo, which is an attempt to make abstract music out of the raw material of jazz. Mr. Copland has not wished to write jazz, music which either impels or suggests the dance, but merely to make use

Vivid and Vigorous



[From a Drawing in The New York

Nadia Boulanger

Parisian Organist and Teacher, Representative of the French Ministry of Fine Arts, To Be Heard at the Symphony

43

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

FEB 18 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

By M. S. R.

Last evening gave Worcester music lovers a wonderful treat. One went to the concert with a fear of being disappointed that Koussevitzky would not come up to one's expectations. And those who expected a sensational conductor must have been disappointed.

He showed no mannerisms, no unnecessary beating of the rhythm, no dangling white cuffs. He used his baton only for brilliancy of effect, pianissimo passages and change of tempo.

One had understood that there would be no tuning up of instruments on the stage, but there was the usual bee-hive of excitement as each man played away at his own little tune while waiting for the conductor to put in an appearance.

The program opened with a Concerto for orchestra in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach. The term "concerto" is perhaps a little misleading. One expects to see some solo performer, but it must be remembered that such terms as "concerto" and "sonata" have today a very different meaning from what they did in the time of the pre-classicists. According to Bach's conception, a concerto is a composition in which every instrument becomes a solo instrument and is given a chance to show its prowess. This was brought out especially in the third movement which was rich in polyphony—the first violins tossing the theme to the seconds, then to the wood-winds, and finally the bass viols who gave it out with , ponderous agility.

Unconsciously one had rather expected a Russian flavor to Koussevitzky's interpretation of this work, but it was given a very conservative reading. This was followed by the overture, "The Roman Carnival," Opus 9, by Berlioz, intended originally as an interlude to his opera "Benevenuto Cellini," a work depicting the dissolute life of the sculptor. It is another example where the comparatively short excerpt becomes more popular than the entire opera. The remaining three numbers were given over to Russian compositions, the first two, Moussorgsky's Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," and Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," gave the audience an insight into the Russian Nationalists' school. Moussorgsky, greatly underrated in his lifetime, is now being called the Shakespeare of Russian music. He shows much greater originality and genius than Rimsky-Korsakov. In this Prelude he has worked out the idea of the sun rising against the turrets of the Kremlin—an idea similar to Greig's "Morning," but infinitely more objective. It has been said that one may see color in music. Here, if anywhere, is this true. At the beginning of the prelude, one can imagine bright streaks of light soaring up into the heavens. Then gradually as the sun approaches the horizon, there appear rosy tints in the sky, which later change to the clear blue of the morning. When one compares this prelude to that charming song in which Moussorgsky immortalizes that very unpopular insect, "The Flea," one has a faint idea of his breadth of expression.

"The Flight of the Bumble Bee," was to the majority of the people the most popular number. It had an irresistible charm and freshness that was more than captivating. Here, at least, was something tangible to think about— a bee buzzing over the water. But after all, one is forced to admit that a bee is more interesting buzzing in an orchestra than in one's ear in a garden.

Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor closed the program. Everything has already been said of the composer. A man, erratic, morose, despondent, idealistic. His music is a panorama of the history of Russia. His first movement shows one the mutterings and groans of an oppressed people. From a technical standpoint, this movement seemed rather verbose and tiring. The second movement showed more entrancing counter-melodies against a wonderful theme. The third movement depicted by means of a delightful waltz, the aristocracy enjoying itself in luxury, trying to forget the oppression of the common people. The last movement opened in the style of a chorale. It is in a more optimistic vein than the first movement. It is soul stirring and highly emotional. Although Tschaikowsky writes passages of a deeper sentiment, yet he never descends to sentimentality.

In these Russian numbers one could not help but realize that Koussivitzky is a wonderful interpreter of Slavic music. Does not the same blood run in his veins so that his readings of these compositions are not the result of a western education but rather something inherent?

Not only Boston but the entire country is fortunate in securing such a conductor—a man who can keep up the standing and reputation of the Boston Symphony, and who, by his magnetic personality and seriousness of purpose, can make his listeners want to know and understand more about this elusive subject of music.

A NEW HAND KNOCKS UPON THE DOORS OF OUR CONCERT-HALLS

MR. COPLAND FROM THE YOUNGEST GENERATION

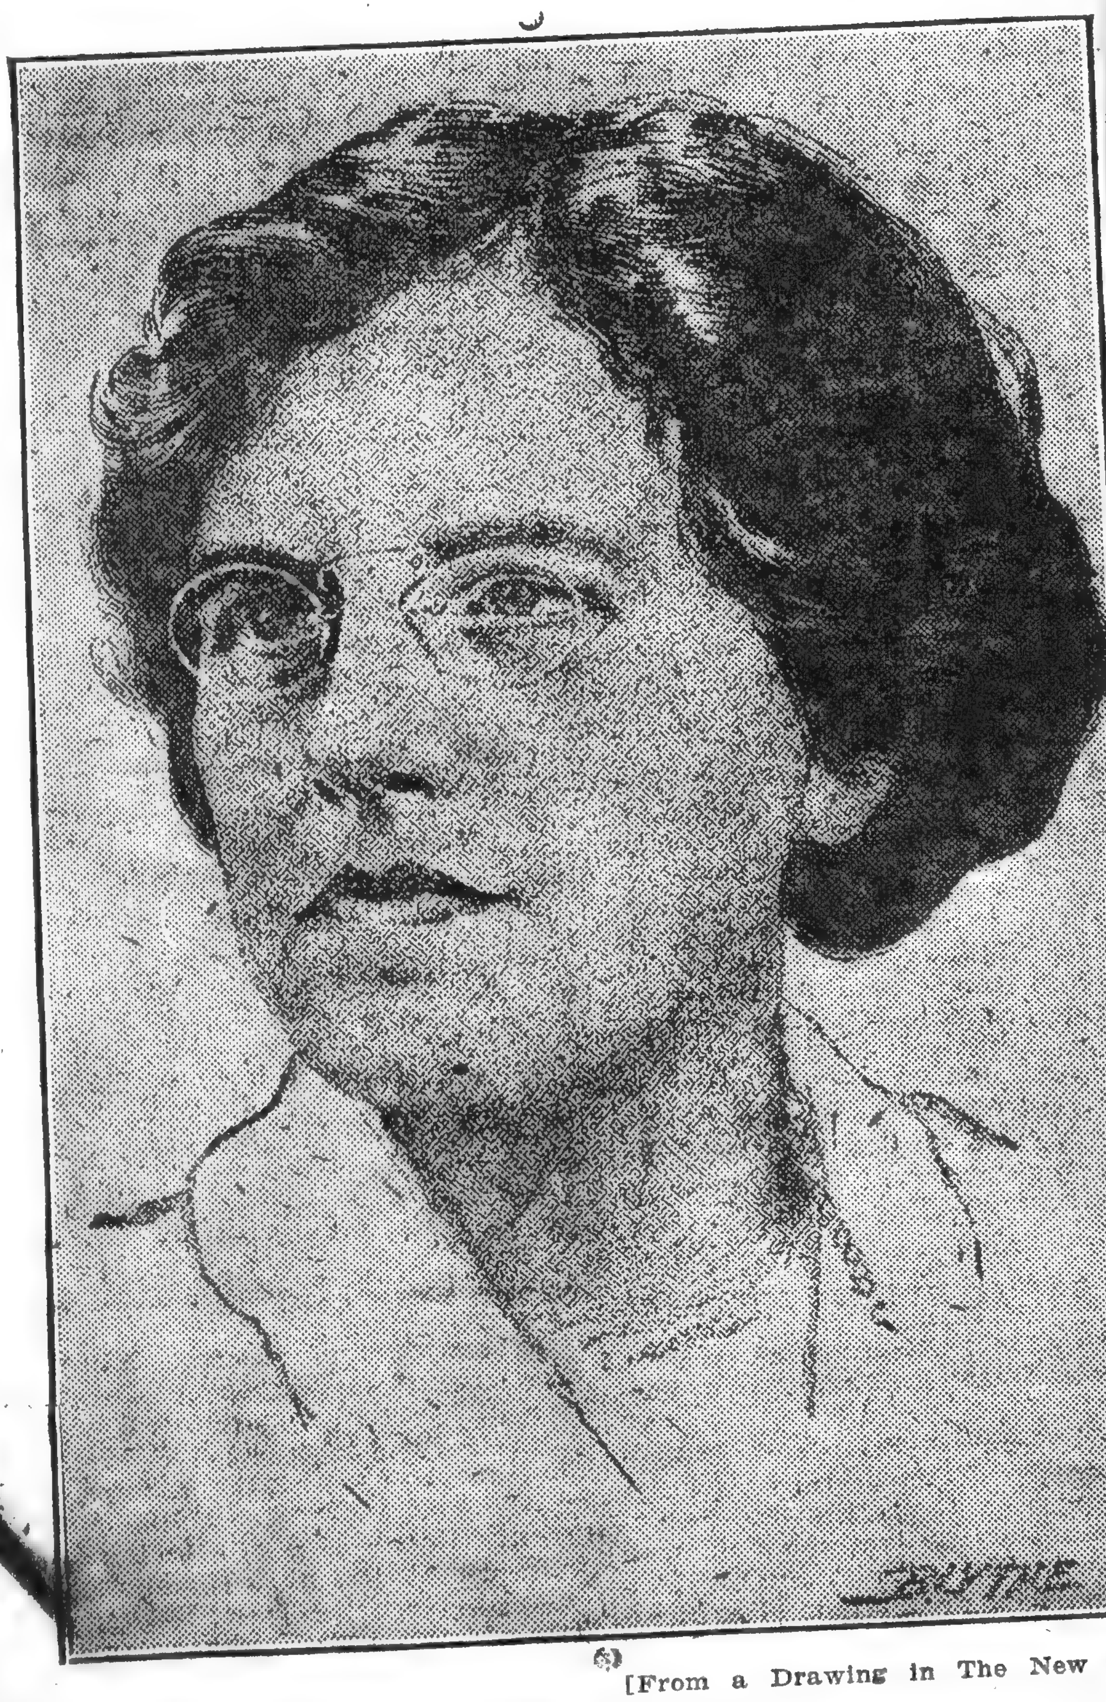
His Symphony for Organ and Orchestra as It Will Be Heard Tomorrow—Impressions in New York—The Purpose of the Composer—Mr. Damrosch's Quip—Nadia Boulanger as Guest

Child of the Times

Aaron Copland

American Composer of the Youngest Generation Whose Symphony for Organ and Orchestra Will Be Played at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow

Vivid and Vigorous



[From a Drawing in The New Yor

Nadia Boulanger

Parisian Organist and Teacher, Representative of the French Ministry of Fine Arts, To Be Heard at the Symphony

FROM Paris, Miss Nadia Boulanger has come to New York and Boston to be the guest of Mr. Damrosch's and Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestras. At home she is an organist, a teacher, a lecturer and a reviewer with music, discharging these functions with an equal ability, sitting high in the precious Parisian hierarchy. She is also the sister of Lili Boulanger, composer of promise and performance, by death cut off untimely. Therefore into Carnegie Hall and Symphony Hall, Miss Nadia brings one of Miss Lili's pieces that overseas her memory and her work may also be extolled. It is music for orchestra and organ. "Pour les Funerailles d'un Soldat," and it will be played at Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. Then and there Miss Nadia will also be heard in a Concerto of Handel for Organ and Orchestra, and in a Symphony for the same voices written by Mr. Aaron Copland of Brooklyn and of the youngest generation of American composers. These pieces all had place in Miss Boulanger's concert in New York with Mr. Damrosch's orchestra. Hearing them upon a Sunday in January, Mr. Gilman wrote in The Herald-Tribune:

> Mr. Damrosch had set on his program as chief item the Symphony for Organ and Orchestra by young Mr. Ahron Copland. Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn in 1900; studied with Miss Nadia Boulanger in Paris; and dedicated his symphony to his distinguished teacher, who, in gracious return for the compliment, played the organ part in the piece. Mr. Copland finished his score last autumn, and yesterday's performance was his first. As a composer he is not wholly unknown hereabouts. We heard and liked two piano-pieces of his that he played at a concert of the League of Composers last November. Rubin Goldmark was his master in harmony and composition before Mr. Copland went abroad, where Miss Boulanger took him in hand and taught him what little had been left unimparted by that most human of pedagogues, the admirable Goldmark. Mr. Copland has composed a ballet in two acts; a piece for string quartet; choral numbers; songs; piano pieces.
>
> It need scarcely be said that Mr. Copland is a child of his time. Naturally enough, his speech is the atonal, polytonal speech of today. Why anyone should expect him or his fellows to write in any other idiom than that which is characteristic of 1925 is more than we can understand. Let us get used to the fact that it is as normal for the youth of 1925 to write in two keys simultaneously as it was for the youth of 1825 to confine himself frugally to one. The question to ask ourselves is: What does the young man of 1925 have to say to us in his superposed keys? Does he make music that has profile; that is imaginative, memorable; or does he merely repeat the clichés that have already formed themselves by the impress of this new style upon current musical thinking?
>
> There are pages in Mr. Copland's symphony (which is in three movements, and uses the organ "as an integral part of the orchestra rather than as a solo instrument") which have bite and power, both rhythmical and harmonic. These pages are chiefly in the Finale, in which Mr. Copland has most to say. At its best his music is astringent, unsentimental, muscular, direct. Mr. Damrosch, hearing some hisses at the end of the piece, remarked to his audience that a youth who could write such a Symphony at twenty-four would be capable some day of murder. That was a bit rough on Mr. Copland. He does not strike us as one of the murderous kind. The real murderers among composers are the unimaginative standpatters; those who, unaware that music is perpetually enlarging its range of expression, slay us with the boredom engendered by stale romanticisms, stale classicisms. Mr. Copland, even though he does present us with some second-hand Stravinsky—his second movement is redolent of "Petrushka"; even though he suggests to us in his first movement a kind of Prospect Park Schönberg, is nevertheless, on the whole, working out his own musical destiny in his own way, and we shall follow his pursuit of it with lively interest.
>
> The other youthful music on Mr. Damrosch's program was a dirge, "Pour les Funerailles d'un Soldat," for Organ and Orchestra, by the lamented Lili Boulanger, sister of Nadia, who died in 1918 at the age of twenty-four. She composed this threnody, in her eighteenth year, to verses by Alfred de Musset. Monsieur Camille Mauclair, in his biographical sketch, described the piece as "the noblest inspiration that has been revealed to us since the Funeral March of the 'Eroica Symphony.'" It is perhaps not quite [illegible] great a masterpiece as that some[illegible]t astonishing phrase would have [illegible]s to expect. Yet Lili Boulanger's [illegible] is affecting and potent music, [illegible]ritten for the orchestra and in the employment of stops and her classic reticence were exquisite. Her transitions from one manual to another were planned with the same impeccable taste and invariably with a view to correct musical results. Her entire performance in short disclosed a fine musicianship, a sensitive and highly cultivated art and great delicacy of feeling.

"Miss Lili Boulanger's funeral music proved to be something of uncommon worth. The basic theme of the composition is the venerable 'Dies Iræ,' which is treated with imagination and made to expand into new material. The organ is not over prominent but is essential. Its part gives character to the whole music. The orchestration is admirable and the general effect of the piece, which is developed with stirring eloquence, is genuinely impressive.

"Of Mr. Copland's interesting and uneven composition it is more difficult to write. The symphony employs the organ merely as an addition to the ensemble and as a source of certain solo-tints not to be obtained from the other instruments, most of which are called upon for important and fully exposed solos. The first movement, an andante, has a well defined mood which is skilfully sustained throughout. This movement shows the influence of French modernistic music, but not so greatly as the others. The scherzo, rising at times to the verge of importance, is held back continually by a palpable striving after striking effects. This is still more the case with the finale, a lento followed by an allegro moderato. The harmonies of course have the modern acidity, but to this no one need offer any objection. The real defect of the symphony is its undisguised search for thrills. When Mr. Copland discards, as he probably will in time, the struggles, the abrupt intrusions of irrelevant instrumental ejaculations, the physical pantings, the shattering of lines, and the obscuration of perspectives which seem so vital to the young generation, he may produce something of lasting worth. His symphony is bold and vigorous and sometimes it is almost beautiful."

Interlude

In his old age, Mr. Damrosch delights to be chatterer and fun-maker in the concert-hall, and his quip about murder at the expense of Mr. Copland has already been recorded. Next day Mr. Ernest Newman, another elderly dispenser of humor about music and musicians, took cue as follows:

> A number of composers have written admirable music in their early twenties, but not one of them has developed into a murderer. The truth is that murder as a fine art is much more difficult than writing symphonies though the ordinary sort of > in the arms of her lover, and he and his servants slew them both, after which he became a distinguished composer. He was thirty years of age at the time. Till then he had been only an aristocratic dilettante; his tragic experience made him the greatest master of pathetic expression of his day. His biographer, Dr. Ferdinand Keiner, is certain that but for this decisive event in his life we should not have had the Gesualdo we now know.

>
> The medicine seems a little drastic, perhaps; but the world would not grudge it to more than one composer whom I could name, if only it would be sure to improve his music. It is not for me, of course, to say on whom the composer who thinks of taking up this post-graduate course should practice. His first thought—a pardonable one, no doubt—would be to kill one of his critics; but everyone will agree that killing a critic is no murder. If I might offer the composer a suggestion, it would be that he might start with a fiddler or a tenor.

Mr. Copland Again

To return to Mr. Copland's Symphony, Mr. Virgil Thomson writes a note about one or two salient traits of the music: "In form it is simply and lightly built, following the plan of Beethoven's 'Moonlight Sonata'; that is to say a slow song-like movement; a lively Scherzo; and a Finale in sonata-form. The composer's preoccupation is always rhythmic, and the counterpoint and the counter-tonalities are always determined by the necessity for clarity in the development and contrast of rhythms. . . . The technical interest centers in the Scherzo, which is an attempt to make abstract music out of the raw material of jazz. Mr. Copland has not wished to write jazz, music which either impels or suggests the dance, but merely to make use

Transcript
Feb 19

44

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Kochanski, the violinist, is now—it appears—to play with the Symphony Orchestra. Only in Providence next Tuesday and in Cambridge next Thursday will he be heard. In either city he is worth the seeking; while in both Ravel's new "Tzigane" will be one of his pieces.

Mr. Koussevitzky's passion for the "unified program" still rages unabated. Next Friday and Saturday, it is to be Russian—with Glazunov's Eighth Symphony; Glinka's Overture to the opera, "Russlan and Ludmilla"; Chaikovsky's Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; three pieces of Liyadov about witches and such-like.

At her concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 1, Mme Jeritza will sing two operatic pieces—an air from Massenet's "Le Cid" and an air from Verdi's "Forza del Destino," both pieces in which she has never appeared at the Metropolitan. She will be heard also in French and in German songs.

Herald
Feb 19

The Symphony concert tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night is for the glory of the remarkable Boulanger Sisters; Lili, who is dead, and Nadia, who will play the organ in a concerto by Handel, edited by Guilmant, her teacher, and in a symphony for organ and orchestra by Aaron Copland of New York, who studied with her. Lili Boulanger will be represented by her piece "For the Funeral of a Soldier," which was performed privately at the Paris Conservatory early in 1913 by the Orchestra Class, M. d'Indy, conductor; publicly at a Lamoureux concert in 1915. The program will also include Mozart's Suite "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" which Georg Schneevoight brought out here at a symphony concert on March 7, 8 of last year when he conducted as a guest. The concert will end with a performance of Liszt's "Tasso" depicting at some length his Lamentation and his Triumph.

The program of next week will be Russian: Glinka's overture to "Russlon and Lioudmilla"; Glazounov's Symphony No. 8 (first time here); Liadov, "Kikimora," also and for the first time his "Eight Russian Popular Melodies," and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet."

ALBANY,
N. Y.
NEWS
FEB 2 0 1925

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussivitzky, director, will give a concert at the Capitol theatre, Wednesday night, March 11. This will be the first of a supplemental series of concerts under the direction of Ben Franklin.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
FEB 21 1925

Boston Symphony

With Paul Kochanski, the celebrated Polish violinist, as the soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra will make the fourth and last appearance but one of the season here in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. Serge Koussevitzky will present two notable Russian works at this concert—the overture to "Russion and Ludmilla," by Glinka, and Eighth Symphony in E-flat by Glazounov. This score is one of the latest of the Russian master, and is accounted one of the finest. The concert will end with Liszt's splendid pageant in tones, the symphonic poem "Tasso."

Although this will be Kochanski's first appearance in Providence his genius is well known and much admired both in New York and Boston, for these cities still vividly remember his debut in 1921, the season in which he first came to America. His Boston appearance was as soloist with this orchestra in its regular series of concerts. Before that, Kochanski had toured the length and breadth of Europe, again and again, and was ranged with the very first of living violinists. This virtuoso uses a rare Spanish "Stradivarius" which was especially made by the master of Cremona for the Spanish crown in 1687. It is inlaid with ivory and has decorative work on the sides and scroll. It was formerly in the possession of Ole Bull, the great Norwegian virtuoso. Kochanski will play a concerto by Vivaldi, an Italian contemporary of Stradivarius.

Transcript
Feb 21

Symphony

FOR ONCE FLAVOR OF PERSONALITY SPICES THE FRIDAY CONCERT

NADIA BOULANGER, HER SISTER, AND HER PUPIL

Mr. Copland's Symphony, According to the Logic and Brilliance of the Modernist Mode—"The Funeral of a Soldier" in Simple Eloquence—Mr. Koussevitzky All-Pervading

MUCH of the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was given over to the distinguished visitor, Mademoiselle Nadia Boulanger, organist, composer, teacher, critic from Paris. Mademoiselle Boulanger, with the orchestra, played Handel's Concerto in D minor for Organ and String Orchestra; a new Symphony for Organ and Orchestra by her pupil, Mr. Aaron Copland of New York, young composer just beginning to be heard; and, also for the first time in Boston, "For the Funeral of a Soldier," by her younger sister, Lili Boulanger, who died an untimely death in 1918. As if by way of introduction, that diminutive symphony, first introduced here by Mr. Monteux, Mozart's so-called "Serenade," "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," preceded Handel's concerto. For final piece there was Liszt's second symphonic poem "Tasso; Lament and Triumph." The program lasted what is coming to be the accustomed two hours.

Center of interest among the works presented was found in Mr. Copland's Symphony. The score calls for all the instruments of the large present-day symphony orchestra, with full percussion section, including kettledrums, bass drum, cymbals, snare drum, tambourine, wood block, xylophone. The work, the composer tells us, was begun last May in Paris, was completed in November in New York. It is a thoroughly modern work of that particular species of moderntity first introduced by Igor Stravinsky in his "Sacre du Printemps." Treatment of material, to be sure, varies widely from such as Stravinsky would have given. Vocabulary, general style, however, is that of "Sacre," with some suggestions, in the first two movements, of the "Fire-bird." Formally in the planning of his material, in the ascendtng climactic order of his movements, in the shrewd disposition of formalistic schemes ranging from Bach to Franck, Mr. Copland showed great cleverness and originality. For, like the most recent Stravinsky, the symphony shows no hint of program, it is absolute music of the most frank and uncompromising kind. A prelude begins it. After the manner of Bach in his preludes, "there is but one theme, announced by the organ, which occurs several times after slight episodic digressions." But this prelude also announces, quite unassumingly, a short motive or "motto" as the composer calls it, which is to recur in some form or other throughout the three movements of the work—favorite device of Franck and d'Indy. It is in this movement, which is a modern counterpart of the formal contrapuntal schemes of Bach, that the practiced listener is led somehow to think of "L'Oiseau de Feu." It is a piece of work exceeding well done.

But the scheme grows larger, interest increases. The "simple" prelude leads to a more complex scherzo. There are two themes, there is a trio section. But a two-note accompaniment figure underlying all else establishes the rhythmic and emotional character of the movement. At times there is definite feeling in these rhythms of the swing of jazz—which by the way we have repeatedly been told in most categorical manner, could not possibly germinate in anything else but the rhythmic simplicities and ineptitudes of the dance music in which it originated, which really says nothing more than that such critics think that jazz cannot go beyond what their own limited imaginations can at present see in it. Witness some of the rhythms of this scherzo in reply. Dissonances sharpen; complexities, of thematic treatment as of rhythm, increase. Sense of riot, of fury pervades it. We begin to look to "Le Sacre" for sources of material. But the appoggiatura-like use of the two-note figure seems an original device of the composer. When taken in the brass instruments, however, this device seems out of keeping with the character of the instruments, is not, cannot be done well, does not give the effect one mentally expects it to give.

The last movement is in sonata-form. The composer has obligingly met all the criticisms that history has ever made on sonata-form. As the most important movement of the symphony, he has put it last, at the point of climax, instead of placing in this position of honor something of slighter and more ephemeral structure and significance. With Mr. Copland it comes as final culmination of the increase in importance already seen in the first two movements. More, the symphony is not so long that one is too tired at the last to get the significance of so important a movement at the end.

The form itself exposes the material, the first theme based on the three-note motto, the second sung above a reiterated bass formed from the motto (see Beethoven's tempt a second work, say in the idiom of "Le Sacre." Surely its language is so individualistic that the number of works that can be written in that language is just one. And this squares with the practise of Stravinsky himself. A new piece, of these proportions, in the most modern style, demands nothing short of a new idiom. Mr. Copland was present to make his bows to the audience, to receive at the platform congratulations from Mr. Koussevitzky and Mademoiselle Boulanger.

But there was a second new work on this program, Mademoiselle Lili Boulanger's "Pour les funerailles d'un soldat." It was unfortunate for any new work to make claim, even with intervening intermission, on the attention after the nerve-racking symphony. Mademoiselle Boulanger was less than eighteen years old when she wrote it. It is effective, eloquent piece, in the pre-Stravinskian modern idiom. Always somber, melancholy with chestral instruments, a procedure ally doomed to unfavorable compariso the orchestra. But the organ has its peculiar colors and sonorities not in the orchestra, which moreover co admirably with the orchestra. Suc Miss Boulanger made of her instru in the solo passages and the ensemb Handel's concerto, of Copland's symp of her sister's piece for the funeral soldier. Incidentally, it is much t credit of these two modern compos write a score in which the organ fi place so fully and thoroughly as an in and essential part of the orchestral s

The purely orchestral numbers for sort of frame into which the numbers organ were placed. Mozart's Seren by no means one of his greatest Yet it is a charming piece, full composer's elegance, polish, sunsh fined geniality. Through the two plementing themes of the Allegro, their slight development; the singing manza with its alternating themes; stately minuet with its fluid "sotto vo trio; the final Rondo in the form that M zart and Beethoven were both so frequen to use. Mr Koussevitzky led the orche tra with a simple directness, with a fee ing at once of surety and precision an of suppleness and exquisite grace, tha can only be characterized as ideal, warm present-day, living voice of the classics.

Liszt's symphonic poems of the trials and the triumph of the poet Tasso formed at once a suitable piece to follow Mlle. Boulanger's funeral music, and a stirring close for the program. It has long been hailed as one of the very best of Liszt's symphonic poems. Mr. Koussevitzky pointed the griefs, heightened the triumphs of the poet, kindled the flames of the final stirring apotheosis. It was a superb performance in every way.

A. H. M.

xant nd it with oming ns of be. ranist evi-mulündhnic, hardmusi-t of bring with orhout p it and tra. less atcolor-

Advertiser
Feb 21

SEVERAL STARS APPLAUDED AT THE SYMPHONY

France and the United States are strongly represented on this week's Symphony program, played for the first time yesterday at the matinee concert.

The soloist is Nadia Boulanger, one of the leading French organists, an artist remarkable for her fine technic and truly poetic feeling.

Nadia Boulanger

The outstanding novelty on the program is a symphony for organ and orchestra by one of the youngest of American composers, Aaron Copland, of New York, who studied in Paris with Mme. Boulanger.

The symphony shows genuine talen; also evidence of young Copland's French training. It is a work in the most modern manner. Technically it is often astounding. It made extraordinary demands upon both performers and hearers. There were times when it made even Stravinsky seem tame and anemic. Mme. Boulanger and Mr. Koussevitzky deserved applause for their heroic efforts. The composer was also called to the stage and warmly applauded.

FRENCH NOVELTY

Another interesting novelty is a dirge, "For the Funeral of a Soldier," written for organ and orchestra by Lili Boulanger, the soloist's sister, who died a few years ago, just as her genius was finding recognition. The music is nobly dramatic and was nobly and most sympathetically played.

The distinguished organist also played the solo part in the Handel concerto for organ and strong orchestra. Her all-around artistry was thoroughly enjoyed.

The matinee crowd was likewise delighted with the performance of Mozart's serenade for string orchestra, which opened the concert, and with Mr. Koussevitzky's intensely brilliant and dramatic interpretation of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," which was the closing number. The conductor was recalled to receive a rousing ovation.

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS
2 1 1925

VIOLINIST TO ACCOMPANY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

With Paul Kochanski, the celebrated Polish violinist, as the soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make the fourth and last appearance but one of the season here in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. Serge Koussevitsky will present two notable Russian works at this concert—tho overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla" by Glinka, and the Eighth Symphony in E-flat by Glazounov.

Although this will be Kochanski's first appearance in Providence, his genius is well known and much admired both in New York and Boston, for these cities still vividly remember his debut in 1921, the season in which he first came to America. His Boston appearance was as soloist with this orchestra in its regular series of concerts. Before that, Kochanski had toured the length and breadth of Europe again and again, and was ranked with the very first of living violinists.

Globe
Feb 21

NADIA BOULANGER AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe

Copland's Organ Symphony Clapped and Hissed

Feb 21

Yesterday, for the third time in recent seasons, a new modernist piece was hissed by a few convinced conservatives and violently applauded by a greater number of musical radicals, while the majority of the Symphony audience sat in more or less pained silence. The bone of contention this time was a symphony for organ and orchestra by Aaron Copland, born in Brooklyn, N Y, in 1900.

The organ part was played by Nadia Boulanger, under whom Mr Copland studied theory and composition in Paris. Mlle Boulanger has a great reputation as teacher of theory and composition, and was a prize winner in organ playing at the Paris Conservatoire. In a Handel concerto, and her sister Lili's "For a Soldier's Funeral," as well as in her pupil's symphony she proved herself an admirable organist and a superb musician.

Mr Copland's symphony, in which the organ is used as part of the orchestra rather than as a solo instrument, is original and powerful music. If he were only a Russian or a Frenchman, one would be more certain that the American musical public will recognize his great gift, which may turn out to be real genius, and is certainly talent of a rare and high order.

There is nothing peculiar to any national school of composition about his music. One can, of course, see that he has heard and learned from the work of other living composers. But this symphony is no mere imitative music. Its composer has ideas and has been taught how to express them.

Like the youthful Wagner and the elderly Liszt, Mr Copland enjoys making a big noise. He has the gusto, the insensitiveness to nuances, the lack of all the delicacies of such characteristically American creative artists as Whitman and H. L. Mencken. But his music is not mere barbaric yawp. It has substance and a design. It is too crudely orchestrated and too logically constructed. Mr Koussevitzky, notably seconded by Mlle Boulanger, gave an eloquent interpretation of this significant modern work.

The other new piece, "For a Soldier's Funeral," by Mlle Boulanger's younger sister Lili, whose death was a great loss to French music, is pathetically and simply eloquent. According to the program books yesterday there is a baritone solo in the original version of this piece. It was not sung at this concert.

Handel's D minor organ concerto, in the arrangement published by Guilmant, with an air for organ solo from a concerto grosso, proved Mlle Boulanger a musician of unusual ability and a notable organist. The exquisite taste of her interpretations set them above any mere virtuoso performance. Hers is that highest form of art which conceals art.

Mr Koussevitzky gave a lively, clean cut, but never elegant, never nuanced reading of Mozart's "Kleine Nacht Musik." He piles on stresses remorsely in the allegro movements, though this ~~music is delicate in texture.~~ In the slow movement he made the exquisite beauty of the themes felt.

Liszt's bombastic and empty "Tasso," in a performance noisier but less thrilling than most of those Koussevitzky has given here, brought the concert to a close. Mr Koussevitzky's superb reading of Copland's symphony, his impressive Handel and his no less impressive interpretation of Lili Boulanger's music made ample amends for any deficiencies elsewhere in his part of the performance.

Mr Copland, who was present, must have been pleased with the presentation of his work, a performance of quality too seldom vouchsafed Americal compositions.

P. R.

Post
Feb 21

BARBARIC MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Copland's Work Brutal—Woman Organist Soloist

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Without recourse to fine and invidious distinctions, it may be said at the outset that the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon offered great music, debatable music and just "music."

To mention the pieces in the order of the programme, there was first Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," after that a Concerto for organ and orchestra by Handel, then a Symphony for organ and orhcestra by Aaron Copland, in both of which Nadia Boulanger, renowned French organist, presided at the churchly instrument.

FULL OF NOVEL INTEREST

An intermission, chiefly given over to discussion of Mr. Copland's disturbing composition, followed, and the balance of the programme consisted of Lili Boulanger's "Pour les Funerailles d'un Soldat" and finally, as Mr. Koussevitzky's first venture here with the music of Liszt, that composer's magniloquent tone-poem, "Tasso."

A concert abounding in novel interest and not without picturesque incident was this, though from a purely musical standpoint others have proved more rewarding. As the sister of the precocious and promising Lili Boulanger, stricken down in the 25th year of a life shadowed by persistent illness, and withal a singularly accomplished musician in her own right, Nadia Boulanger is a welcome guest at the Symphony Concerts.

A Skilled Organist

Individuality shines not in performance on the organ as it does, say, in the playing of the piano or the violin, but it was easy to recognize in Miss Boulanger's performance both the workings of a forceful personality and the skill of the virtuoso.

Rightfully Lili Boulanger's piece should have had, in place of the organ, a baritone solo and a chorus, and inevitably the absence of these voice parts robbed the music of some of its potential effectiveness. Extravagantl proclaimed by one incautious com mentator the greatest threnody i music since the Funeral March i Beethoven's "Eroica,' this "Pour le Funerailles d'un Soldat," although remarkable achievement for a com poser of 17, seemed yesterday not on undeserving of such high praise b in point of fact relatively characte less. To be sure there is an elegia mood well sustained, and the entranc of the "Dies Irae" is of sinister effec but there is throughout an absence notable thematic invention.

Copland's Symphony

Moreover, it is this same dearth salient musical ideas that is the fir complaint to be urged against M Copland's Symphony, though man would sooner protest the brutal di sonances of the Finale which led Wa ter Damrosch to remark, on the occa sion of the piece's first performance b the Symphony Society of New Yor that the man who could write suc music at 24 might some day be capab of murder.

Ugly, as such things are measure nowadays, some of Mr. Copland Symphony assuredly is, but at leas there lies in this harsh final move ment a suggestion of force and power, if also a suggestion that M Copland in writing, has looked no only in his heart, but also in the scor of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps. Again there are striking measure also dynamically brutal, in th Schenzo, but here is also much tha seems trifling, while the first move ment conveys too often the impres sion of futility.

Brought to the Platform

It is only fair to add, however, tha both Miss Boulanger and Mr. Kousse vitzky profess to find in Mr. Copland music the promise of true greatnes Both gave their best in yesterday performance—and this music is great technical difficulty, while at th end the applause, in which tentativ hisses were mingled, brought Mr. Cop land from his seat to the edge of th platform, where both conductor an soloist shook him warmly by th hand. The applause continuing, Mi Boulanger and Mr. Koussevitzky turned many times, and finally the la ter brought the deserving and har working orchestra to its feet. Th despite individual disapprobation, M Copland may justly feel that his Sy phony triumphed.

Mozart's "Night Music"

For the rest a few words may ice. If not one of Mozart's most portant compositions, this little "Ni Music" is altogether delightful, an was played yesterday with un

Advertisement.

44

Transcript
Feb 19

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Kochanski, the violinist, is n[illegible]it appears—to play with the Symphon[illegible]or-chestra. Only in Providence next Tu[illegible]ay and in Cambridge next Thursday will [illegible]e be heard. In either city he is worth the[illegible]eeking: while in both Ravel's new "T[illegible]ane" will be one of his pieces.

Mr. Koussevitzky's passion for th[illegible] "unified program" still rages unabated[illegible] Next Friday and Saturday, it is to be [illegible]Russian—with Glazunov's Eighth Sym[illegible]hony; Glinka's Overture to the opera, "[illegible]sslan and Ludmilla"; Chaikovsky's [illegible]tasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; three pieces o[illegible]yadov about witches and such-like.

At her concert in Symphony [illegible]all on Sunday afternoon, March 1, Mme Jeritza will sing two operatic pieces—an air from Massenet's "Le Cid" and an air from Verdi's "Forza del Destino," both pieces in which she has never appeared at the Metropolitan. She will be heard also in French and in German songs.

Feb 19

The Symphony concert tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night is for the glory of the remarkable Boulanger Sisters; Lili, who is dead, and Nadia, who will play the organ in a concerto by Handel, edited by Guilmant, her teacher, and in a symphony for organ and orchestra by Aaron Copland of New York, who studied with her. Lili Boulanger will be represented by her piece "For the Funeral of a Soldier," which was performed privately at the Paris Conservatory early in 1913 by the Orchestra Class, M. d'Indy, conductor; publicly at a Lamoureux concert in 1915. The program will also include Mozart's Suite "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" which Georg Schneevoight brought out here at a symphony concert on March 7, 8 of last year when he conducted as a guest. The concert will end with a performance of Liszt's "Tasso" depicting at some length his Lamentation and his Triumph.

The program of next week will be Russian: Glinka's overture to "Russlon and Lioudmilla"; Glazounov's Symphony No. 8 (first time here); Liadov, "Kikimora," also and for the first time his "Eight Russian Popular Melodies," and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet."

ALBANY,
N. Y.
NEWS
FEB 20 1925

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussivitzky, director, will give a concert at the Capitol theatre, Wednesday night, March 11. This will be the first of a supplemental series of concerts under the direction of Ben Franklin.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
FE[illegible]192[illegible]

Boston Symphony

With Paul Kochanski, the celebrated Polish violinist, as the soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra will make the fourth and last appearance but one of the season here in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. Serge Koussevitzky will present two notable Russian works at this concert—the overture to "Russion and Ludmilla," by Glinka, and Eighth Symphony in E-flat by Glazounov. This score is one of the latest of the Russian master, and is accounted one of the finest. The concert will end with Liszt's splendid pageant in tones, the symphonic poem "Tasso."

Although this will be Kochanski's first appearance in Providence his genius is well known and much admired both in New York and Boston, for these cities still vividly remember his debut in 1921, the season in which he first came to America. His Boston appearance was as soloist with this orchestra in its regular series of concerts. Before that, Kochanski had toured the length and breadth of Europe, again and again, and was ranged with the very first of living violinists. This virtuoso uses a rare Spanish "Stradivarius" which was especially made by the master of Cremona for the Spanish crown in 1687. It is inlaid with ivory and has decorative work on the sides and scroll. It was formerly in the possession of Ole Bull, the great Norwegian virtuoso. Kochanski will play a concerto by Vivaldi, an Italian contemporary of Stradivarius.

Transcript
Feb 21

Symphony

FOR ONCE FLAVOR OF PERSONALITY SPICES THE FRIDAY CONCERT

NADIA BOULANGER, HER SISTER, AND HER PUPIL

Mr. Copland's Symphony, According to the Logic and Brilliance of the Modernist Mode—"The Funeral of a Soldier" in Simple Eloquence—Mr. Koussevitzky All-Pervading

MUCH of the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was given over to the distinguished visitor, Mademoiselle Nadia Boulanger, organist, composer, teacher, critic from Paris. Mademoiselle Boulanger, with the orchestra, played Handel's Concerto in D minor for Organ and String Orchestra; a new Symphony for Organ and Orchestra by her pupil, Mr. Aaron Copland of New York, young composer just beginning to be heard; and, also for the first time in Boston, "For the Funeral of a Soldier," by her younger sister, Lili Boulanger, who died an untimely death in 1918. As if by way of introduction, that diminutive symphony, first introduced here by Mr. Monteux, Mozart's so-called "Serenade," "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," preceded Handel's concerto. For final piece there was Liszt's second symphonic poem "Tasso; Lament and Triumph." The program lasted what is coming to be the accustomed two hours.

Center of interest among the works presented was found in Mr. Copland's Symphony. The score calls for all the instruments of the large present-day symphony orchestra, with full percussion section, including kettledrums, bass drum, cymbals, snare drum, tambourine, wood block, xylophone. The work, the composer tells us, was begun last May in Paris, was completed in November in New York. It is a thoroughly modern work of that particular species of moderntity first introduced by Igor Stravinsky in his "Sacre du Printemps." Treatment of material, to be sure, varies widely from such as Stravinsky would have given. Vocabulary, general style, however, is that of "Sacre," with some suggestions, in the first two movements, of the "Fire-bird." Formally in the planning of his material, in the ascendtng climactic order of his movements, in the shrewd disposition of formalistic schemes ranging from Bach to Franck, Mr. Copland showed great cleverness and originality. For, like the most recent Stravinsky, the symphony shows no hint of program, it is absolute music of the most frank and uncompromising kind. A prelude begins it. After the manner of Bach in his preludes, "there is but one theme, announced by the organ, which occurs several times after slight episodic digressions." But this prelude also announces, quite unassumingly, a short motive or "motto" as the composer calls it, which is to recur in some form or other throughout the three movements of the work—favorite device of Franck and d'Indy. It is in this movement, which is a modern counterpart of the formal contrapuntal schemes of Bach, that the practiced listener is led somehow to think of "L'Oiseau de Feu" It is a piece of work exceeding well done.

But the scheme grows larger, interest increases. The "simple" prelude leads to a more complex scherzo. There are two themes, there is a trio section. But a two-note accompaniment figure underlying all else establishes the rhythmic and emotional character of the movement. At times there is definite feeling in these rhythms of the swing of jazz—which by the way we have repeatedly been told in most categorical manner, could not possibly germinate in anything else but the rhythmic simplicities and ineptitudes of the dance music in which it originated, which really says nothing more than that such critics think that jazz cannot go beyond what their own limited imaginations can at present see in it. Witness some of the rhythms of this scherzo in reply. Dissonances sharpen; complexities, of thematic treatment as of rhythm, increase. Sense of riot, of fury pervades it. We begin to look to "Le Sacre" for sources of material. But the appoggiatura-like use of the two-note figure seems an original device of the composer. When taken in the brass instruments, however, this device seems out of keeping with the character of the instruments, is not, cannot be done well, does not give the effect one mentally expects it to give.

The last movement is in sonata-form. The composer has obligingly met all the criticisms that history has ever made on sonata-form. As the most important movement of the symphony, he has put it last, at the point of climax, instead of placing in this position of honor something of slighter and more ephemeral structure and significance. With Mr. Copland it comes as final culmination of the increase in importance already seen in the first two movements. More, the symphony is not so long that one is too tired at the last to get the significance of so important a movement at the end.

The form itself exposes the material, the first theme based on the three-note motto, the second sung above a reiterated bass formed from the motto (see Beethoven's tempt a second work, say in the idiom of "Le Sacre." Surely its language is so individualistic that the number of works that can be written in that language is just one. And this squares with the practise of Stravinsky himself. A new piece, of these proportions, in the most modern style, demands nothing short of a new idiom. Mr. Copland was present to make his bows to the audience, to receive at the platform congratulations from Mr. Koussevitzky and Mademoiselle Boulanger.

But there was a second new work on this program, Mademoiselle Lili Boulanger's "Pour les funerailles d'un soldat." It was unfortunate for any new work to make claim, even with intervening intermission, on the attention after the nerve-racking symphony. Mademoiselle Boulanger was less than eighteen years old when she wrote it. It is effective, eloquent piece, in the pre-Stravinskian modern idiom. Always somber, melancholy with chestral instruments, a procedure ally doomed to unfavorable compariso the orchestra. But the organ has its peculiar colors and sonorities not in the orchestra, which moreover co admirably with the orchestra. Such Miss Boulanger made of her instru in the solo passages and the ensemb Handel's concerto, of Copland's symp of her sister's piece for the funeral soldier. Incidentally, it is much t credit of these two modern compose write a score in which the organ fin place so fully and thoroughly as an in and essential part of the orchestral s

The purely orchestral numbers forn sort of frame into which the numbers organ were placed. Mozart's Seren by no means one of his greatest Yet it is a charming piece, full composer's elegance, polish, sunsh fined geniality. Through the tw plementing themes of the Allegro, their slight development; the singing manza with its alternating themes; stately minuet with its fluid "sotto voc trio; the final Rondo in the form that M zart and Beethoven were both so frequent to use. Mr Koussevitzky led the orche tra with a simple directness, with a fee ing at once of surety and precision an of suppleness and exquisite grace, tha can only be characterized as ideal, warm, present-day, living voice of the classics.

Liszt's symphonic poems of the trials and the triumph of the poet Tasso formed at once a suitable piece to follow Mlle. Boulanger's funeral music, and a stirring close for the program. It has long been hailed as one of the very best of Liszt's symphonic poems. Mr. Koussevitzky pointed the griefs, heightened the triumphs of the poet, kindled the flames of the final stirring apotheosis. It was a superb performance in every way.

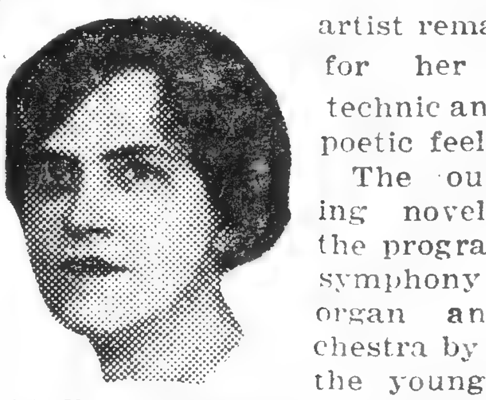
A. H. M.

Advertiser
Feb 21

SEVERAL STARS APPLAUDED AT THE SYMPHONY

France and the United States are strongly represented on this week's Symphony program, played for the first time yesterday at the matinee concert.

The soloist is Nadia Boulanger, one of the leading French organists, an artist remarkable for her fine technic and truly poetic feeling.



Nadia Boulanger

The outstanding novelty on the program is a symphony for organ and orchestra by one of the youngest of American composers, Aaron Copland, of New York, who studied in Paris with Mme. Boulanger.

The symphony shows genuine talen; also evidence of young Copland's French training. It is a work in the most modern manner. Technically it is often astounding. It made extraordinary demands upon both performers and hearers. There were times when it made even Stravinsky seem tame and anemic. Mme. Boulanger and Mr. Koussevitzky deserved applause for their heroic efforts. The composer was also called to the stage and warmly applauded.

FRENCH NOVELTY

Another interesting novelty is a dirge, "For the Funeral of a Soldier," written for organ and orchestra by Lili Boulanger, the soloist's sister, who died a few years ago, just as her genius was finding recognition. The music is nobly dramatic and was nobly and most sympathetically played.

The distinguished organist also played the solo part in the Handel concerto for organ and strong orchestra. Her all around artistry was thoroughly enjoyed.

The matinee crowd was likewise delighted with the performance of Mozart's serenade for string orchestra, which opened the concert, and with Mr. Koussevitzky's intensely brilliant and dramatic interpretation of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," which was the closing number. The conductor was recalled to receive a rousing ovation.

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS
2 1 1925

VIOLINIST TO ACCOMPANY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

With Paul Kochanski, the celebrated Polish violinist, as the soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make the fourth and last appearance but one of the season here in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. Serge Koussevitsky will present two notable Russian works at this concert—the overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla" by Glinka, and the Eighth Symphony in E-flat by Glazounov.

Although this will be Kochanski's first appearance in Providence, his genius is well known and much admired both in New York and Boston, for these cities still vividly remember his debut in 1921, the season in which he first came to America. His Boston appearance was as soloist with this orchestra in its regular series of concerts. Before that, Kochanski had toured the length and breadth of Europe again and again, and was ranked with the very first of living violinists.

Globe
Feb 21

NADIA BOULANGER AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Copland's Organ Symphony Clapped and Hissed

Yesterday, for the third time in recent seasons, a new modernist piece was hissed by a few convinced conservatives and violently applauded by a greater number of musical radicals, while the majority of the Symphony audience sat in more or less pained silence. The bone of contention this time was a symphony for organ and orchestra by Aaron Copland, born in Brooklyn, N Y, in 1900.

The organ part was played by Nadia Boulanger, under whom Mr Copland studied theory and composition in Paris. Mlle Boulanger has a great reputation as teacher of theory and composition, and was a prize winner in organ playing at the Paris Conservatoire. In a Handel concerto, and her sister Lili's "For a Soldier's Funeral," as well as in her pupil's symphony she proved herself an admirable organist and a superb musician.

Mr Copland's symphony, in which the organ is used as part of the orchestra rather than as a solo instrument, is original and powerful music. If he were only a Russian or a Frenchman, one would be more certain that the American musical public will recognize his great gift, which may turn out to be real genius, and is certainly talent of a rare and high order.

There is nothing peculiar to any national school of composition about his music. One can, of course, see that he has heard and learned from the work of other living composers. But this symphony is no mere imitative music. Its composer has ideas and has been taught how to express them.

Like the youthful Wagner and the elderly Liszt, Mr Copland enjoys making a big noise. He has the gusto, the insensitiveness to nuances, the lack of all the delicacies of such characteristically American creative artists as Whitman and H. L. Mencken. But his music is not mere barbaric yawp. It has substance and a design. It is too crudely orchestrated and too logically constructed. Mr Koussevitzky, notably seconded by Mlle Boulanger, gave an eloquent interpretation of this significant modern work.

The other new piece, "For a Soldier's Funeral," by Mlle Boulanger's younger sister Lili, whose death was a great loss to French music, is pathetically and simply eloquent. According to the program books yesterday there is a baritone solo in the original version of this piece. It was not sung at this concert.

Handel's D minor organ concerto, in the arrangement published by Guilmant, with an air for organ solo from a concerto grosso, proved Mlle Boulanger a musician of unusual ability and a notable organist. The exquisite taste of her interpretations set them above any mere virtuoso performance. Hers is that highest form of art which conceals art.

Mr Koussevitzky gave a lively, clean cut, but never elegant, never nuanced reading of Mozart's "Kleine Nacht Musik." He piles on stresses remorsely in the allegro movements, though this music ~~is delicate in texture.~~ In the slow movement he made the exquisite beauty of the themes felt.

Liszt's bombastic and empty "Tasso," in a performance noisier but less thrilling than most of those Koussevitzky has given here, brought the concert to a close. Mr Koussevitzky's superb reading of Copland's symphony, his impressive Handel and his no less impressive interpretation of Lili Boulanger's music made ample amends for any deficiencies elsewhere in his part of the performance.

Mr Copland, who was present, must have been pleased with the presentation of his work, a performance of a quality too seldom vouchsafed American compositions.

P. R.

Post
Feb 21

BARBARIC MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Copland's Work Brutal—Woman Organist Soloist

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Without recourse to fine and invidious distinctions, it may be said at the outset that the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon offered great music, debatable music and just "music."

To mention the pieces in the order of the programme, there was first Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," after that a Concerto for organ and orchestra by Handel, then a Symphony for organ and orhcestra by Aaron Copland, in both of which Nadia Boulanger, renowned French organist, presided at the churchly instrument.

FULL OF NOVEL INTEREST

An intermission, chiefly given over to discussion of Mr. Copland's disturbing composition, followed, and the balance of the programme consisted of Lili Boulanger's "Pour les Funerailles d'un Soldat" and finally, as Mr. Koussevitzky's first venture here with the music of Liszt, that composer's magniloquent tone-poem, "Tasso."

A concert abounding in novel interest and not without picturesque incident was this, though from a purely musical standpoint others have proved more rewarding. As the sister of the precocious and promising Lili Boulanger, stricken down in the 25th year of a life shadowed by persistent illness, and withal a singularly accomplished musician in her own right, Nadia Boulanger is a welcome guest at the Symphony Concerts.

A Skilled Organist

Individuality shines not in performance on the organ as it does, say, in the playing of the piano or the violin, but it was easy to recognize in Miss Boulanger's performance both the workings of a forceful personality and the skill of the virtuoso.

Rightfully Lili Boulanger's piece should have had, in place of the or gan, a baritone solo and a chorus, an inevitably the absence of these voice parts robbed the music of some of it potential effectiveness. Extravagantl proclaimed by one incautious com mentator the greatest threnody i music since the Funeral March Beethoven's "Eroica," this "Pour le Funerailles d'un Soldat," although remarkable achievement for a com poser of 17, seemed yesterday not on undeserving of such high praise b in point of fact relatively characte less. To be sure there is an elegia mood well sustained, and the entranc of the "Dies Irae" is of sinister effec but there is throughout an absence notable thematic invention.

Copland's Symphony

Moreover, it is this same dearth salient musical ideas that is the fir complaint to be urged against M Copland's Symphony, though man would sooner protest the brutal di sonances of the Finale which led Wa ter Damrosch to remark, on the occa sion of the piece's first performance b the Symphony Society of New York that the man who could write suc music at 24 might some day be capab of murder.

Ugly, as such things are measure nowadays, some of Mr. Copland Symphony assuredly is, but at leas there lies in this harsh final move ment a suggestion of force and power, if also a suggestion that M Copland in writing, has looked n only in his heart, but also in the scor of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps. Again there are striking measure also dynamically brutal, in th Scherzo, but here is also much tha seems trifling, while the first move ment conveys too often the impres sion of futility.

Brought to the Platform

It is only fair to add, however, tha both Miss Boulanger and Mr. Kousse vitzky profess to find in Mr. Copland music the promise of true greatnes Both gave their best in yesterday performance—and this music is great technical difficulty, while at th end the applause, in which tentativ hisses were mingled, brought Mr. Cop land from his seat to the edge of th platform, where both conductor an soloist shook him warmly by th hand. The applause continuing, Mi Boulanger and Mr. Koussevitzky turned many times, and finally the la ter brought the deserving and har working orchestra to its feet. Th despite individual disapprobation, M Copland may justly feel that his Sy phony triumphed.

Mozart's "Night Music"

For the rest a few words may ice. If not one of Mozart's most portant compositions, this little "Ni Music" is altogether delightful, and vas played yesterday with uns

Advertisement.

Transcript Feb 19

44

In[illegible]dents and Prospects

Mr. Kochanski, the violinist, is n[illegible]it appears—to play with the Symphony [illegible]chestra. Only in Providence next Tu[illegible]ay and in Cambridge next Thursday wil[illegible]be heard. In either city he is worth the[illegible]eking: while in both Ravel's new "T[illegible]ane" will be one of his pieces.

Mr. Koussevitzky's passion for th[illegible]'unified program" still rages unabated[illegible]Next Friday and Saturday, it is to be [illegible]Russian—with Glazunov's Eighth Sym[illegible]hony; Glinka's Overture to the opera, "[illegible]sslan and Ludmilla"; Chaikovsky's [illegible]tasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; three pieces o[illegible]yadov about witches and such-like.

At her concert in Symphony [illegible]all on Sunday afternoon, March 1, Mme Jeritza will sing two operatic pieces—an air from Massenet's "Le Cid" and an air from Verdi's "Forza del Destino," both pieces in which she has never appeared at the Metropolitan. She will be heard also in French and in German songs.

Feb 19

The Symphony concert tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night is for the glory of the remarkable Boulanger Sisters; Lili, who is dead, and Nadia, who will play the organ in a concerto by Handel, edited by Guilmant, her teacher, and in a symphony for organ and orchestra by Aaron Copland of New York, who studied with her. Lili Boulanger will be represented by her piece "For the Funeral of a Soldier," which was performed privately at the Paris Conservatory early in 1913 by the Orchestra Class, M. d'Indy, conductor; publicly at a Lamoureux concert in 1915. The program will also include Mozart's Suite "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" which Georg Schneevoight brought out here at a symphony concert on March 7, of last year when he conducted as a guest. The concert will end with a performance of Liszt's "Tasso" depicting at some length his Lamentation and his Triumph.

The program of next week will be Russian: Glinka's overture to "Russlon and Lioudmilla"; Glazounov's Symphony No. 8 (first time here); Lladov, "Kikimora," also and for the first time his "Eight Russian Popular Melodies," and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet."

ALBANY,
N. Y.
NEWS
FEB 2 0 1925

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussivitzky, director, will give a concert at the Capitol theatre, Wednesday night, March 11. This will be the first of a supplemental series of concerts under the direction of Ben Franklin.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
[illegible]

Boston Symphony

With Paul Kochanski, the celebrated Polish violinist, as the soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra will make the fourth and last appearance but one of the season here in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. Serge Koussevitzky will present two notable Russian works at this concert—the overture to "Russion and Ludmilla," by Glinka, and Eighth Symphony in E-flat by Glazounov. This score is one of the latest of the Russian master, and is accounted one of the finest. The concert will end with Liszt's splendid pageant in tones, the symphonic poem "Tasso."

Although this will be Kochanski's first appearance in Providence his genius is well known and much admired both in New York and Boston, for these cities still vividly remember his debut in 1921, the season in which he first came to America. His Boston appearance was as soloist with this orchestra in its regular series of concerts. Before that, Kochanski had toured the length and breadth of Europe, again and again, and was ranged with the very first of living violinists. This virtuoso uses a rare Spanish "Stradivarius" which was especially made by the master of Cremona for the Spanish crown in 1687. It is inlaid with ivory and has decorative work on the sides and scroll. It was formerly in the possession of Ole Bull, the great Norwegian virtuoso. Kochanski will play a concerto by Vivaldi, an Italian contemporary of Stradivarius.

Transcript Feb 21

Symphony

FOR ONCE FLAVOR OF PERSONALITY SPICES THE FRIDAY CONCERT

NADIA BOULANGER, HER SISTER, AND HER PUPIL

Mr. Copland's Symphony, According to the Logic and Brilliance of the Modernist Mode—"The Funeral of a Soldier" in Simple Eloquence—Mr. Koussevitzky All-Pervading

MUCH of the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was given over to the distinguished visitor, Mademoiselle Nadia Boulanger, organist, composer, teacher, critic from Paris. Mademoiselle Boulanger, with the orchestra, played Handel's Concerto in D minor for Organ and String Orchestra; a new Symphony for Organ and Orchestra by her pupil, Mr. Aaron Copland of New York, young composer just beginning to be heard; and, also for the first time in Boston, "For the Funeral of a Soldier," by her younger sister, Lili Boulanger, who died an untimely death in 1918. As if by way of introduction, that diminutive symphony, first introduced here by Mr. Monteux, Mozart's so-called "Serenade," "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," preceded Handel's concerto. For final piece there was Liszt's second symphonic poem "Tasso; Lament and Triumph." The program lasted what is coming to be the accustomed two hours.

Center of interest among the works presented was found in Mr. Copland's Symphony. The score calls for all the instruments of the large present-day symphony orchestra, with full percussion section, including kettledrums, bass drum, cymbals, snare drum, tambourine, wood block, xylophone. The work, the composer tells us, was begun last May in Paris, was completed in November in New York. It is a thoroughly modern work of that particular species of moderntity first introduced by Igor Stravinsky in his "Sacre du Printemps." Treatment of material, to be sure, varies widely from such as Stravinsky would have given. Vocabulary, general style, however, is that of "Sacre," with some suggestions, in the first two movements, of the "Fire-bird." Formally in the planning of his material, in the ascendtng climactic order of his movements, in the shrewd disposition of formalistic schemes ranging from Bach to Franck, Mr. Copland showed great cleverness and originality. For, like the most recent Stravinsky, the symphony shows no hint of program, it is absolute music of the most frank and uncompromising kind. A prelude begins it. After the manner of Bach in his preludes, "there is but one theme, announced by the organ, which occurs several times after slight episodic digressions." But this prelude also announces, quite unassumingly, a short motive or "motto" as the composer calls it, which is to recur in some form or other throughout the three movements of the work—favorite device of Franck and d'Indy. It is in this movement, which is a modern counterpart of the formal contrapuntal schemes of Bach, that the practiced listener is led somehow to think of "L'Oiseau de Feu" It is a piece of work exceeding well done.

But the scheme grows larger, interest increases. The "simple" prelude leads to a more complex scherzo. There are two themes, there is a trio section. But a two-note accompaniment figure underlying all else establishes the rhythmic and emotional character of the movement. At times there is definite feeling in these rhythms of the swing of jazz—which by the way we have repeatedly been told in most categorical manner, could not possibly germinate in anything else but the rhythmic simplicities and ineptitudes of the dance music in which it originated, which really says nothing more than that such critics think that jazz cannot go beyond what their own limited imaginations can at present see in it. Witness some of the rhythms of this scherzo in reply. Dissonances sharpen; complexities, of thematic treatment as of rhythm, increase. Sense of riot, of fury pervades it. We begin to look to "Le Sacre" for sources of material. But the appoggiatura-like use of the two-note figure seems an original device of the composer. When taken in the brass instruments, however, this device seems out of keeping with the character of the instruments, is not, cannot be done well, does not give the effect one mentally expects it to give.

The last movement is in sonata-form. The composer has obligingly met all the criticisms that history has ever made on sonata-form. As the most important movement of the symphony, he has put it last, at the point of climax, instead of placing in this position of honor something of slighter and more ephemeral structure and significance. With Mr. Copland it comes as final culmination of the increase in importance already seen in the first two movements. More, the symphony is not so long that one is too tired at the last to get the significance of so important a movement at the end.

The form itself exposes the material, the first theme based on the three-note motto, the second sung above a reiterated bass formed from the motto (see Beethoven's tempt a second work, say in the idiom of "Le Sacre." Surely its language is so individualistic that the number of works that can be written in that language is just one. And this squares with the practise of Stravinsky himself. A new piece, of these proportions, in the most modern style, demands nothing short of a new idiom. Mr. Copland was present to make his bows to the audience, to receive at the platform congratulations from Mr. Koussevitzky and Mademoiselle Boulanger.

But there was a second new work on this program, Mademoiselle Lili Boulanger's "Pour les funerailles d'un soldat." It was unfortunate for any new work to make claim, even with intervening intermission, on the attention after the nerve-racking symphony. Mademoiselle Boulanger was less than eighteen years old when she wrote it. It is effective, eloquent piece, in the pre-Stravinskian modern idiom. Always somber, melancholy with chestral instruments, a procedure ally doomed to unfavorable compariso the orchestra. But the organ has its peculiar colors and sonorities not in the orchestra, which moreover co admirably with the orchestra. Suc Miss Boulanger made of her instru in the solo passages and the ensem Handel's concerto, of Copland's sym of her sister's piece for the funeral soldier. Incidentally, it is much credit of these two modern compos write a score in which the organ fi place so fully and thoroughly as an in and essential part of the orchestral s

The purely orchestral numbers for sort of frame into which the numbers organ were placed. Mozart's Serenade is by no means one of his greatest works. Yet it is a charming piece, full of that composer's elegance, polish, sunshine, re-plementing themes of the Allegro, with their slight development; the singing Romanza with its alternating themes; the stately minuet with its fluid "sotto voce" trio; the final Rondo in the form that Mozart and Beethoven were both so frequently to use. Mr Koussevitzky led the orchestra with a simple directness, with a feeling at once of surety and precision and of suppleness and exquisite grace, that can only be characterized as ideal, warm, present-day, living voice of the classics.

Liszt's symphonic poems of the trials and the triumph of the poet Tasso formed at once a suitable piece to follow Mlle. Boulanger's funeral music, and a stirring close for the program. It has long been hailed as one of the very best of Liszt's symphonic poems. Mr. Koussevitzky pointed the griefs, heightened the triumphs of the poet, kindled the flames of the final stirring apotheosis. It was a superb performance in every way.

A. H. M.

Advertiser Feb 21

SEVERAL STARS APPLAUDED AT THE SYMPHONY

France and the United States are strongly represented on this week's Symphony program, played for the first time yesterday at the matinee concert.

The soloist is Nadia Boulanger, one of the leading French organists, an artist remarkable for her fine technic and truly poetic feeling.

Nadia Boulanger

The outstanding novelty on the program is a symphony for organ and orchestra by one of the youngest of American composers, Aaron Copland, of New York, who studied in Paris with Mme. Boulanger.

The symphony shows genuine talen; also evidence of young Copland's French training. It is a work in the most modern manner. Technically it is often astounding. It made extraordinary demands upon both performers and hearers. There were times when it made even Stravinsky seem tame and anemic. Mme. Boulanger and Mr. Koussevitzky deserved applause for their heroic efforts. The composer was also called to the stage and warmly applauded.

FRENCH NOVELTY

Another interesting novelty is a dirge, "For the Funeral of a Soldier," written for organ and orchestra by Lili Boulanger, the soloist's sister, who died a few years ago, just as her genius was finding recognition. The music is nobly dramatic and was nobly and most sympathetically played.

The distinguished organist also played the solo part in the Handel concerto for organ and strong orchestra. Her all around artistry was thoroughly enjoyed.

The matinee crowd was likewise delighted with the performance of Mozart's serenade for string orchestra, which opened the concert, and with Mr. Koussevitzky's intensely brilliant and dramatic interpretation of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," which was the closing number. The conductor was recalled to receive a rousing ovation.

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS
2 1 1925

VIOLINIST TO ACCOMPANY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

With Paul Kochanski, the celebrated Polish violinist, as the soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make the fourth and last appearance but one of the season here in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. Serge Koussevitsky will present two notable Russian works at this concert—the overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla" by Glinka, and the Eighth Symphony in E-flat by Glazounov.

Although this will be Kochanski's first appearance in Providence, his genius is well known and much admired both in New York and Boston, for these cities still vividly remember his debut in 1921, the season in which he first came to America. His Boston appearance was as soloist with this orchestra in its regular series of concerts. Before that, Kochanski had toured the length and breadth of Europe again and again, and was ranked with the very first of living violinists.

Globe Feb 21

NADIA BOULANGER AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Scott

Copland's Organ Symphony Clapped and Hissed

Feb 21

Yesterday, for the third time in recent seasons, a new modernist piece was hissed by a few convinced conservatives and violently applauded by a greater number of musical radicals, while the majority of the Symphony audience sat in more or less pained silence. The bone of contention this time was a symphony for organ and orchestra by Aaron Copland, born in Brooklyn, N Y, in 1900.

The organ part was played by Nadia Boulanger, under whom Mr Copland studied theory and composition in Paris. Mlle Boulanger has a great reputation as teacher of theory and composition, and was a prize winner in organ playing at the Paris Conservatoire. In a Handel concerto, and her sister Lili's "For a Soldier's Funeral," as well as in her pupil's symphony she proved herself an admirable organist and a superb musician.

Mr Copland's symphony, in which the organ is used as part of the orchestra rather than as a solo instrument, is original and powerful music. If he were only a Russian or a Frenchman, one would be more certain that the American musical public will recognize his great gift, which may turn out to be real genius, and is certainly talent of a rare and high order.

There is nothing peculiar to any national school of composition about his music. One can, of course, see that he has heard and learned from the work of other living composers. But this symphony is no mere imitative music. Its composer has ideas and has been taught how to express them.

Like the youthful Wagner and the elderly Liszt, Mr Copland enjoys making a big noise. He has the gusto, the insensitiveness to nuances, the lack of all the delicacies of such characteristically American creative artists as Whitman and H. L. Mencken. But his music is not mere barbaric yawp. It has substance and a design. It is too crudely orchestrated and too logically constructed. Mr Koussevitzky, notably seconded by Mlle Boulanger, gave an eloquent interpretation of this significant modern work.

The other new piece, "For a Soldier's Funeral," by Mlle Boulanger's younger sister Lili, whose death was a great loss to French music, is pathetically and simply eloquent. According to the program books yesterday there is a baritone solo in the original version of this piece. It was not sung at this concert.

Handel's D minor organ concerto, in the arrangement published by Guilmant, with an air for organ solo from a concerto grosso, proved Mlle Boulanger a musician of unusual ability and a notable organist. The exquisite taste of her interpretations set them above any mere virtuoso performance. Hers is that highest form of art which conceals art.

Mr Koussevitzky gave a lively, clean cut, but never elegant, never nuanced reading of Mozart's "Kleine Nacht Musik." He piles on stresses remorsely in the allegro movements, though this music is delicate in texture. In the slow movement he made the exquisite beauty of the themes felt.

Liszt's bombastic and empty "Tasso," in a performance noisier but less thrilling than most of those Koussevitzky has given here, brought the concert to a close. Mr Koussevitzky's superb reading of Copland's symphony, his impressive Handel and his no less impressive interpretation of Lili Boulanger's music made ample amends for any deficiencies elsewhere in his part of the performance.

Mr Copland, who was present, must have been pleased with the presentation of his work, a performance of a quality too seldom vouchsafed American compositions.

P. R.

Post Feb 21

BARBARIC MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Copland's Work Brutal—Woman Organist Soloist

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Without recourse to fine and invidious distinctions, it may be said at the outset that the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon offered great music, debatable music and just "music."

To mention the pieces in the order of the programme, there was first Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," after that a Concerto for organ and orchestra by Handel, then a Symphony for organ and orhcestra by Aaron Copland, in both of which Nadia Boulanger, renowned French organist, presided at the churchly instrument.

FULL OF NOVEL INTEREST

An intermission, chiefly given over to discussion of Mr. Copland's disturbing composition, followed, and the balance of the programme consisted of Lili Boulanger's "Pour les Funerailles d'un Soldat" and finally, as Mr. Koussevitzky's first venture here with the music of Liszt, that composer's magniloquent tone-poem, "Tasso."

A concert abounding in novel interest and not without picturesque incident was this, though from a purely musical standpoint others have proved more rewarding. As the sister of the precocious and promising Lili Boulanger, stricken down in the 25th year of a life shadowed by persistent illness, and withal a singularly accomplished musician in her own right, Nadia Boulanger is a welcome guest at the Symphony Concerts.

A Skilled Organist

Individuality shines not in performance on the organ as it does, say, in the playing of the piano or the violin, but it was easy to recognize in Miss Boulanger's performance both the workings of a forceful personality and the skill of the virtuoso.

Rightfully Lili Boulanger's piece should have had, in place of the organ, a baritone solo and a chorus, and inevitably the absence of these voice parts robbed the music of some of its potential effectiveness. Extravagantly proclaimed by one incautious commentator the greatest threnody in music since the Funeral March in Beethoven's "Eroica," this "Pour les Funerailles d'un Soldat," although a remarkable achievement for a composer of 17, seemed yesterday not only undeserving of such high praise but in point of fact relatively characterless. To be sure there is an elegiac mood well sustained, and the entrance of the "Dies Irae" is of sinister effect but there is throughout an absence of notable thematic invention.

Copland's Symphony

Moreover, it is this same dearth of salient musical ideas that is the first complaint to be urged against Mr. Copland's Symphony, though many would sooner protest the brutal dissonances of the Finale which led Walter Damrosch to remark, on the occasion of the piece's first performance by the Symphony Society of New York, that the man who could write such music at 24 might some day be capable of murder.

Ugly, as such things are measured nowadays, some of Mr. Copland's Symphony assuredly is, but at least there lies in this harsh final movement a suggestion of force and of pow a suggestion that M

TREMONT EVES. at 8:15 MAT. TODAY 2:15
ENGAGEMENT FOR 2 WEEKS ONLY
EXTRA HOLIDAY MAT. NEXT MON.
MARILYN MILLER
Sir James Barrie's Famous Fantasy
PETER PAN

HANDICAP
A Romance of the Turf with CLAIRE WINDSOR-FRANK KEENAN-LLOYD HUGHES
MACK SENNETT COMEDY
Other Films

though rather long for its sub-e; and a hearing of it renewed n regret for the extinction of a sh and beautiful talent. Miss Na-a Boulanger displayed her admirable echnique and fine taste in her perormance of the organ part in the mu-ic by her sister and by Copland, and nore conspicuously in an organ-concerto of Handel (No. 4 of the third set, Op. 7), which was her third con-ribution to the program. She was warmly greeted by a large house.

Another Ear

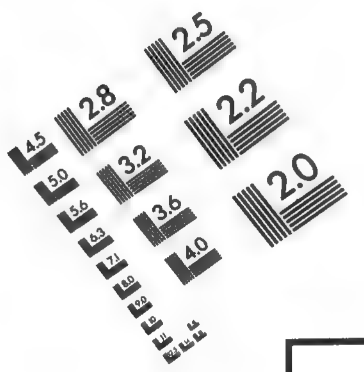
In turn Mr. Henderson for the Sun lisned to the concert with pleasure; wrote cordingly; and added some particulars aived aside by Mr. Gilman: "Miss Bounger's performance of the Concerto by andel gave the clearest view of her gan-playing which was especially noterthy for perfection of style. Her taste murder is as easy as jazz—and a mere musical training is no preparation for this higher art. I therefore cannot recommend a course in counterpoint and fugue to any bright young man who may be thinking of taking up murder, either as a hobby or a profession.

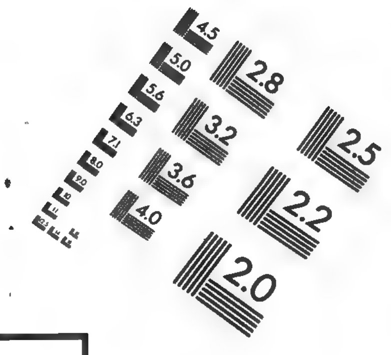
But though music is a poor sort of preparation for murder, there are grounds for thinking that an occasional murder might be the making of a composer. So far as I can trust my memory at the moment, only one composer of any eminence has a murder to his credit. This is Gesualdo Prince of Venosa, a sixteenth century composer of madrigals, whose harmony . . . is of a richness, an audacity and at the same time a certainty of effect, for which we may look in vain in any other writer of his time. . . . Now Gesualdo was a double murderer. On Oct. 27, 1590, he surprised his first wife, Maria d'Avalos,

REDUCTION
RATIO
13x

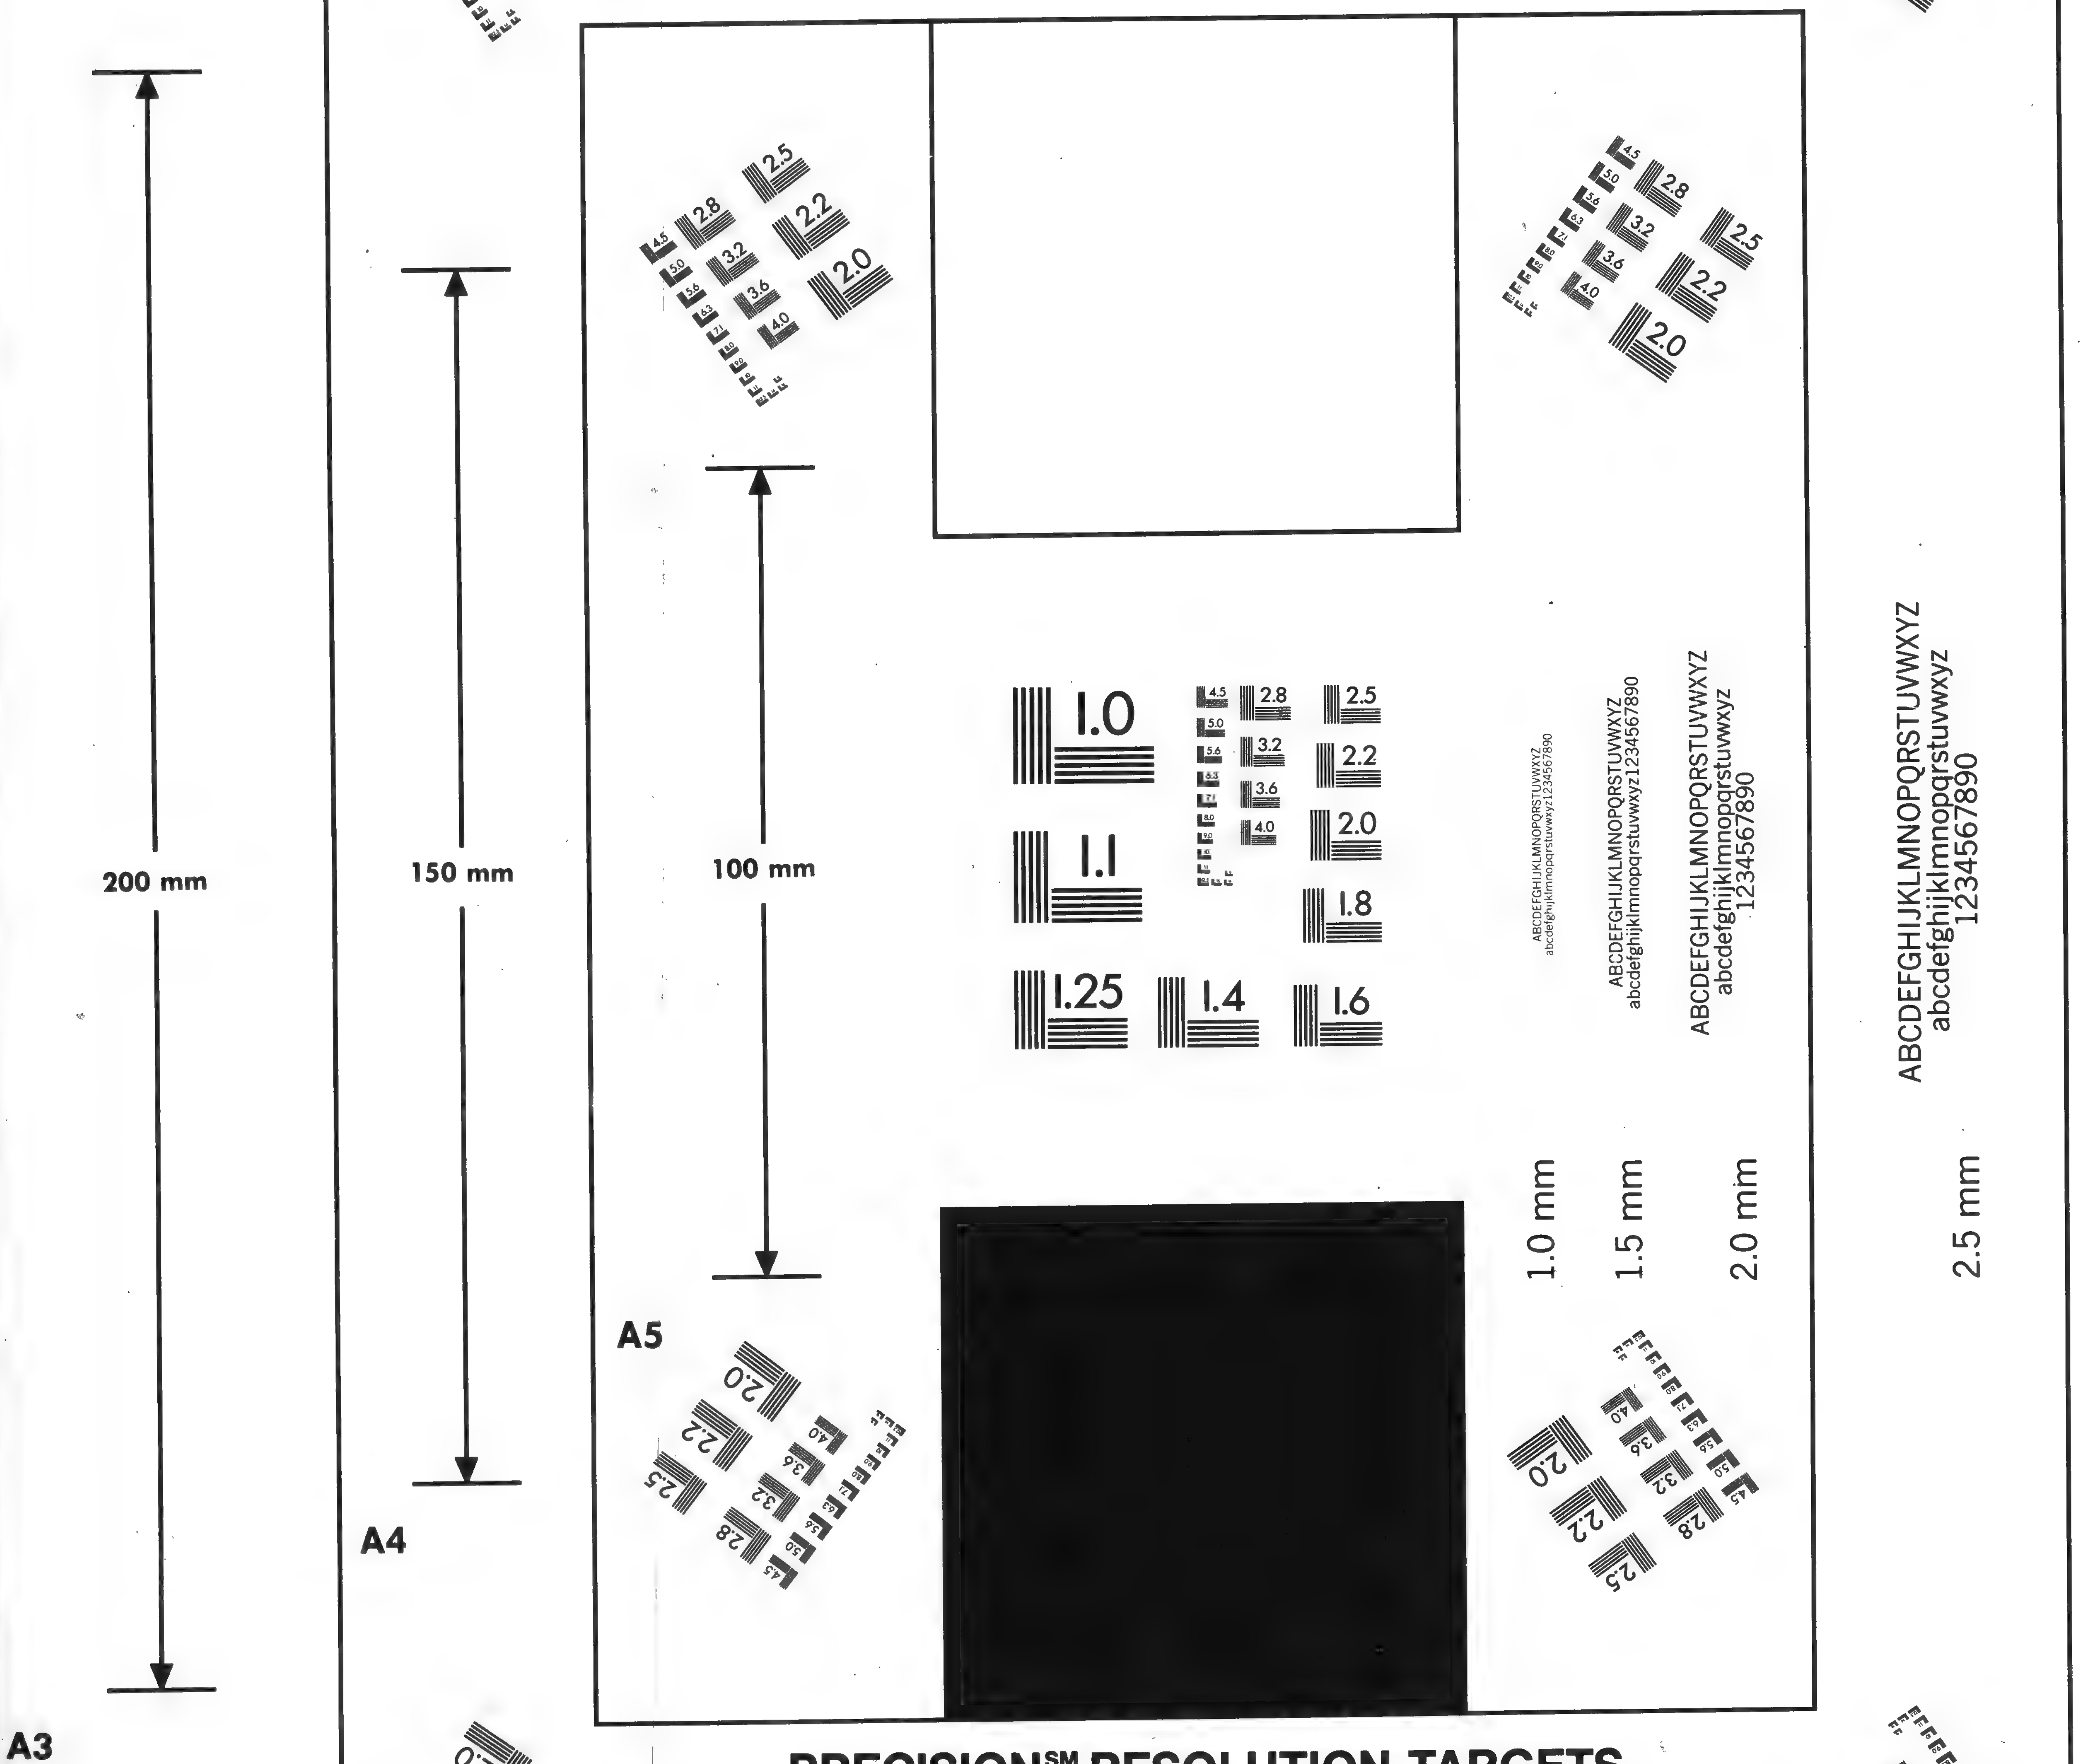
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0

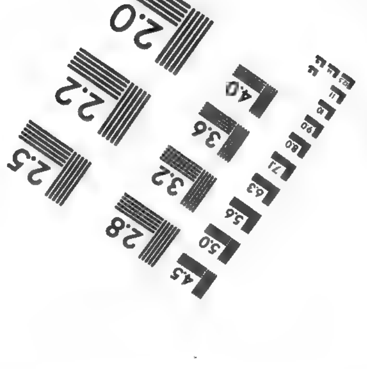


4.5
2.8
5.0
5.6
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

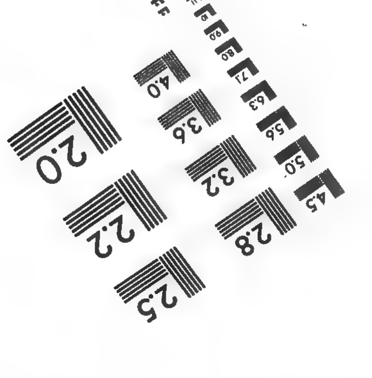


200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS



2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5
5.0
5.6



2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5
5.0

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

45

NEW YORK
POST

FEB 2 1 1925

Orchestras in New York and London and a Comparison—Visiting Conductors the Rule Abroad—Players Should Be Trained to Take Up New Ideas on the Jump

By ERNEST NEWMAN

I HAVE BEEN asked to give my impressions of American orchestras, but I do so only with the greatest diffidence. On the subject of "American orchestras" in general, indeed, I am in no way qualified to speak, for during my stay here I have only been out of New York once, and that to hear an orchestra—the Philadelphia—that I had already heard here. I should have liked to hear the Chicago, the Detroit, the St. Louis, and the Cleveland orchestras but it has proved impossible. I have very scanty data to go upon even as regards the New York orchestras and the only two visiting organizations I have heard—the Philadelphia and the Boston Symphony. I know how easy it is for a stranger to miss the true focus of home affairs in matters musical; therefore I can only put forward what follows as first and perhaps superficial impressions.

One of the difficulties of writing about orchestras is that, strictly speaking, there is no such thing as an orchestra; or if there is, the listener does not come into direct contact with it. He only hears performances; and the quality of these depends as much on the conductor as on the personnel. In a broad way, of course, we can say that the material of one orchestra is very good, and that of another very poor; but as regards orchestras of about the same quality as regards material, it is difficult to separate the orchestra and the conductor. A first-rate orchestra can play poorly under a poor conductor, and a second-rate orchestra will sometimes play miles above itself under a man of genius.

I SHOULD HAVE liked, then, had it been possible, to hear each orchestra under two or three conductors, for that would have afforded me a better basis for comparison with our London orchestras. There the only orchestra that corresponds to any of the American orchestras, in that it always plays under the same conductor, is the Queen's Hall Orchestra, which is conducted by Sir Henry Wood. It is a good orchestra, but I should not call it first-class. Our other orchestras are made up, to some extent, of the same players,—that is to say, the London Symphony Orchestra, for instance, provides many of the men for the London Philharmonic. The general rule in London, apart from the Queen's Hall Orchestra, is to engage several visiting conductors each season. This difference between the English and the American methods of necessity leads to rather different results in performance.

A New York musical friend told me one evening that I would not hear the Philharmonic at its best, as Mengelberg would arrive to take charge only three weeks or so before I left, and the orchestra would take rather longer than that to settle down again into his ways and become thoroughly responsive to him. That remark of itself was sufficient to indicate the difference between the American and the English methods. In London, if Mengelberg were engaged to conduct one of the L. S. O. concerts, he would probably get, at the most, a couple of rehearsals, so that he would have to establish a connection with the men, get to understand them and get them to understand him, and be judged by the audience on the night of the concert, on the strength of some six hours' acquaintance with his instrument. Under circumstances such as these, nothing like the precision of the American orchestras is possible, working, as they do, for months or years together under the same conductor. It is this superb precision, the sense of a magnificent, smoothly running machine, that first impresses the visitor from London. In these respects I have never heard anywhere an orchestra that was superior to the Philadelphia; the cleanness of its ensemble playing is always a delight. If the Philharmonic, fine as its work has often been, rarely gave me quite the same thrill, that may be because the men, as I gather, were not working under the ideal American conditions. This perfection of teamwork can come only from constantly playing under the same conductor. It is not everything, of course, in itself, but it is a great deal.

THAT THE AMERICAN orchestras are not so adaptable as the English seems to me to be fairly evident from my short experience of them. In working for that precision and unanimity that is so admirable, I fancy they lose a little in individual initiative. The American players do not seem to me to have the spirit of adventure in them that ours have. Our men are gamblers, and they develop a gambler's virtues and defects. They will take terrifying risks with new and complicated and insufficiently rehearsed works, and frequently the results are disastrous. But being compelled to take such risks, never knowing what they may be called upon to do next, and feeling that, whatever it is, they have to be prepared for it, develops in them an unusual sharpness of apprehension and an unusual quickness of response to a strange conductor—if, of course, he happens to be a man of genius.

Vladimir Golschmann is hardly that, so perhaps the test was not a fair one; but I cannot imagine the London Symphony Orchestra playing under him for the first time as poorly as the New York Symphony Orchestra did. The latter was obviously as ill at ease under the new conductor as a horse would be under a new rider after being accustomed mainly to the same one for years. Our London players, then, seem to me more quickly adaptable than the American. The London Symphony Orchestra (a co-operative organization, by the way, the players governing and financing themselves and engaging their own conductors) has been in existence now about twenty years. During that time they have played under a large number of the best conductors, no two of them alike in their technique or in their conception of the standard works. Can it be wondered at that under these conditions the players have developed an adaptability that often enables them to do surprisingly well in face of the most paralyzing difficulties?

It is perhaps this sense of adventure that sometimes gives their playing a nervous intensity that I have not often met with in New York. I have just been reading Jim Corbett's reminiscences, and I find that he shook his head before going into one of his later fights and said to his trainer, "I don't like this: I feel too good." The trainer could not quite see his point of view, but Corbett was right; his confidence had one of its roots at least in a subconscious indifference; and an artist does not get the best results out of himself when there is not some touch at least of preliminary—I will not say nervousness, but nerve; if that is absent, it is a sign that the machine is not keyed up to its highest potentiality. In all the finest playing that I have heard in New York, the impression has been one not of nervous adventure but of steady confidence,—a feeling that the magnificent machine could not possibly go wrong.

THIS precision has been a welcome experience for me, for since 1914 the standard of orchestral performance in England has been gradually declining. This has been due to many causes, but the chief of them, as can be imagined, are economic. Hardly one of our leading orchestras can look forward with perfect confidence any season to even another year of life. The American orchestras are lucky in their endowments and their security of tenure. The best that I have heard is undoubtedly the Philadelphia; but the Philharmonic runs it close. The Boston is evidently in a transition stage. With its American tradition of long-term conductors it is bound to take a little time to give itself up entirely to a new spirit; but if it is fortunate enough to retain Koussevitzky for another year or two, and will make a few obviously necessary changes in its personnel, it will become a marvellous instrument. It is already a remarkable one. The New York Symphony Orchestra I heard only two or three times; it has apparently become so part and parcel of Mr. Damrosch that it is difficult for an outsider to estimate it purely and simply as an orchestra. The State Symphony Orchestra, again, I heard only under Mr. Stransky, and, for one concert, under Mr. Waghalter.

In another article I propose to offer some reflections on conductors, programs, and other features of New York musical life in the last five months.

Transcript
Feb 21

Orchestral

AT THE Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Koussevitzky will return, in degree, to the "all-Russian" program that he proposed and put by some weeks ago. As now rearranged, it traverses the Overture to Gluck's opera, "Russian and Ludmilla," the Eighth Symphony, in E-flat, of Glazunov, hitherto unheard in Boston; three short-pieces of Lyadov, suggested by Russian folk-tales, and Chaikovsky's Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"—a piece in which the conductor is said to shine. By report also Glazunov's Symphony has more German than Russian flavors.

Glinka's Overture and Glazunov's Symphony will also be played at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday. To them, for final number, Mr. Koussevitzky has joined Liszt's tone-poem, "Tasso," music from which he wrings the last drop. Mr. Paul Kochanski, the violinist, assists the orchestra, playing an ancient Concerto by Vivaldi and Ravel's new rhapsody, "Tzigane." He will not be heard at the concerts of the orchestra in Boston and he is well worth the seeking in Cambridge.

The People's Symphony Orchestra will return to regular courses at its concert in the St. James Theater tmorrow afternoon. Mr. Mollenhauer will conduct. Miss Ethel Woodman will sing an air from "Samson and Delilah"; and the orchestra will be heard in Beethoven's First Symphony; Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," and Saint-Saëns's Barcarolle, "Night in Lisbon."

Herald
Feb 2,

16TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Copland and Lili Boulanger Works Heard First Time in Boston

NADIA BOULANGER IS THE ORGANIST

By PHILIP HALE

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, "Eine kleine Nachtmusik"; Handel, concert, D minor, for organ and strings; Copland, symphony for organ and orchestra (first time in Boston); Lili Boulanger, "For the Funeral of a Soldier" (first time in Boston); Liszt, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph." Nadia Boulanger, the organist, made her first appearance in Boston.

Mr. Koussevitzky has a genius for interpreting music of the 18th century. He is not obsequious in the presence of Dame Tradition, a lady of a doubtful reputation, though some bow down to her as the heathen to gods of wood and stone. He does not seek to modernize this old music by swelling it out of all proportion. He sings the melodies of Mozart, beautiful in their lines; the lively pages are not mere bustle and confusion; they have grace, elegance, aristocratic distinction, however swift the pace. Instrumental music in Mozart's time was not expected by the Viennese or any other public to be intensely passionate. Mr. Koussevitzky knows this; he knows how foolish it would be to pour new, heady, and heating wine into old musical bottles; he serves the wine of Mozart that is today fresh, sparkling and of exquisite bouquet. Hearing this little Serenade, which to Mozart was no doubt of slight importance, interpreted and played as it was yesterday, one realizes why composers of all nations and of all schools, including even the wild-eyed ultra-moderns, unite in homage to Mozart, as the greatest of composers.

Mr. Copland, born in Brooklyn, now living in New York, having studied in this country, went to Paris in 1921, where he continued to study, returning to this country last summer. His teacher in Paris was Miss Nadia Boulanger, who yesterday played the organ part of the symphony dedicated to her.

A good many were yesterday shocked by this symphony; perhaps affronted, regarding it as a personal insult to subscribers eager to hear music that they knew and liked. Yes, there are some, and they are voluble, who resent the putting of unfamiliar works on Symphony programs. They have no curiosity about what is going on in the musical world. They have ears, but they do not hear, and they are unwilling to hear, unless the new composition is by a local composer with whom they have at least a bowing acquaintance.

Mr. Koussevitzky is to be thanked for courageously introducing new works even when they are of a stronge design, even if they are apparently ugly at first hearing, provided always that the composers have really something to say, however raucous or hysterical their speech; but these composers must not stammer; they must not be detected in the act of experimenting.

Mr. Copland is now 24 years old. His symphony, written in 1924, was produced in New York last month. The music is definitely planned and gives proof of the composer's talent. It is an honest work, this symphony, though some may with equal honesty think this talent is here misguided. They may cry out against pages that are noise, not sound; of acid harmonies that have not the saving grace of exciting surprise, that leave the hearer indifferent or bored. But the Prelude, in the nature of a reverie, has decided character, it establishes and maintains a mood. Here the composer is simplest and most effective. His stormy outbursts later are too often futile orchestral ragings with occasional measures that are grotesque in their puffing and snorting. The rhythmic freedom with its constant changes is noteworthy as showing the influence of Stravinsky, an influence observable in other ways.

It is not an atrocious crime for a composer to be young; but youth is yeastly in its strivings, and it has its idols. The Stravinsky idol towers in the musical cathedral, and many are the young worshippers. Its brightness is excellent and the form thereof terrible, as in the image seen by the dreaming Nebuchadnezzar. Its head may be of gold; its breast and arms of silver; but its feet are part of clay.

In Mr. Copeland's Symphony there is much brass, there is clay; but there is also something of fine silver, if not a little gold.

The performance of this difficult work was brilliant.

Lili Boulanger, the younger sister of Miss Nadia, died in her 25th year, having won the greatest musical prize in France, the prix de Roma, and a high reputation for composition achieved in the face of constant ill-health. "For the Funeral of a Soldier," written before she was 20 years old, was performed at the Paris Conservatory by the convervatory class led by d' Indy early in 1913; it was performed at a Colonne-Lamoureux concert in 1915. It [illegible] a majestic lamentation, epic in its grief, with the sonorous chanting of the "Dies Irae," a dirge for the last rites paid a mighty conqueror.

Miss Nadia Boulanger, an organist of established reputation in Paris, played solo and ensemble pages with technical skill and as an accomplished musician.

The concert ended by a superb performance of Liszt's "Tasso," one of his most eloquent symphonic poems, one that still proudly and defiantly bears its 70 years and more.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is all-Russian: Glinka, Overture to "Russian and Lioudmilla"; Glazourzov, Symphony, E flat, No. 8 (first time in Boston); Liadov, "Kikimora," "The Enchanted Lake" and "Baba-Yagu"; Tchaikovsky, "Romeo and Juliet."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 2 2 1925

Boston Symphony Next Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky, gives its fourth concert of the season next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall. Paul Kochanski, who will play Vivaldi's Concerto in A minor, is the soloist.

Mr. Kochanski has played in this country for four years and has adopted it as his permanent residence. He comes from the land of Chopin and Paderswski, where he was born in 1887. He is one of the artists whose early talent and proficiency brought him to public attention first as a "prodigy." At the age of 9, after studying the violin with Mlynarski, he gave a concert in Warsaw.

When he became 15 he went to Brussels to study with Cesar Thomson, and three years later at the conservatory won the first prize. This enabled him to make his London debut in 1907 while still in his 'teens.

He became a professor at the Conservatory of Music at Warsaw, followed by an appointment at Petrograd, as it was then, succeeding Auer. There he remained from 1915 to 1912. Late in 1919 he gave several recitals in Warsaw and appeared 14 times with the principal orchestras of Poland.

In the fall of the next year he returned to London, the scene of his debut 13 years before, playing with the London Symphony Orchestra under Albert Coates and in recitals. In 1921 he came to this country at the invitation of Walter Damrosch to appear with the New York Symphony Orchestra.

Kochanski's Stradivarius is an instrument of extreme rarity and interest. It is one of three which the master of Cremona made for the Spanish Crown in 1687. It is inlaid with ivory in the purfling with intaglio work on the sides and scroll. This particular one was stolen and, after passing through many hands, came to the possession of the great Norwegian virtuoso, Ole Bull. Thence it passed into two private English collections and rested for a time in the British Museum. Kochanski got permission to try it in a public concert and was so enraptured by the extreme sweetness and richness of its tone, that he did not rest until he could call this unusual Stradivarius his own.

Serge Koussevitzky will present at this concert Glazounov's Eighth Symphony, Glinka's Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," and Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Tasso."

The Providence Public Library has "Contemporary Russian Composers," by Montague-Nathan, and his "History of Russian Music," containing biographical accounts of Glazounov. There is also an account of Glinka in the last named book. In a recent number of Musical America, which the library has on file, it is stated that Koussevitzky has been engaged for another year with the orchestra.

The library has the vocal score of the opera, "Giovanni Gallurese," which was given last Thursday in New York, and a number of articles in periodicals about the composer, Italo Montemezzi, who was present at its performance.

A new dictionary of music has just been added, called "Dictionary of Modern Music and Musicians," edited by A. Eaglefield-Hull. It covers the period from 1880 to the present time. The chief technical article is on harmony. A series of critical articles on opera, chamber music, songs, etc., in the various countries are included. It is of special value in giving biographies of the very modern composers, and for the list of references at the end of each article.

Some other dictionaries in the collection of music literature are the "New Encyclopedia of Music and Musicians," by Pratt, published in 1924; "International Who's Who in Music, and Musical Gazetteer," by Saerchinger, published in 1918; "Biographical Dictionary of Musicians," by Baker. 1919, and the standard work in six volumnes, one of which is devoted to American composers, "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," by Sir George Grove.

Two other books of interest added recently are the "Art of Violin Playing," by the well-known Hungarian violinist, Carl Flesch, and "Music of the Past," by Wanda Landowska, who has spent a good deal of her life in showing the value of the harsichord as a musical instrument.

* * *

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 2 2 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Albert Spalding, foremost American violinist and one of the greatest living virtuosi of the violin, will be the soloist at the next Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the Academy on Friday evening, March 13. Koussevitzky's program for this concert has not as yet been announced.

46

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

FEB 22 1925

Ernest Newman

Orchestras in New York and London and a Comparison—Visiting Conductors the Rule Abroad—Players Should Be Trained to Take Up New Ideas on the Jump

By ERNEST NEWMAN

I HAVE been asked to give my impressions of American orchestras, but I do so only with the greatest diffidence. On the subject of "American orchestras" in general, indeed, I am in no way qualified to speak, for during my stay here I have only been out of New York once, and that to hear an orchestra—the Philadelphia—that I had already heard in New York. I should have liked to hear the Chicago, the Detroit, the St. Louis and the Cleveland orchestras, but it has proved impossible. I have very scanty data to go upon even as regards the New York orchestras and the only two visiting organizations I have heard—the Philadelphia and the Boston Symphony. I know how easy it is for a stranger to miss the true focus of home affairs in matters musical; therefore I can only put forward what follows as first and, perhaps, superficial impressions.

One of the difficulties of writing about orchestras is that, strictly speaking, there is no such thing as an orchestra; or if there is, the listener does not come into direct contact with it. He only hears performances; and the quality of these depends as much on the conductor as on the personnel. In a broad way, of course, we can say that the material of one orchestra is very good, and that of another very poor; but as regards orchestras of about the same quality as regards material, it is difficult to separate the orchestra and the conductor. A first-rate orchestra can play poorly under a poor conductor, and a second-rate orchestra will sometimes play miles above itself under a man of genius.

I SHOULD have liked, then, had it been posible, to hear each orchestra under two or three conductors, for that would have afforded me a better basis for comparison with our London orchestras. There the only orchestra that corresponds to any of the American orchestras, in that it always plays under the same conductor, is the Queen's Hall Orchestra, which is conducted by Sir Henry Wood. It is a good orchestra, but I should not call it first-class.

Our other orchestras are made up, to some extent, of the same players—that is to say, the London Symphony Orchestra, for instance, provides many of the men for the London Philharmonic. The general rule in London, apart from the Queen's Hall Orchestra, is to engage several visiting conductors each season. This difference between the English and the American methods of necesssity leads to rather different results in performance.

A New York musical friend told me one evening that I would not hear the Philharmonic at its best, as Mengelberg would arrive to take charge only three weeks or so before I left, and the orchestra would take rather longer than that to settle down again into his ways and become thoroughly responsive to him. That remark of itself was sufficient to indicate the difference between the American and the English methods.

In London, if Mengelberg were engaged to conduct one of the L. S. O. concerts, he would probably get, at the most, a couple of rehearsals, so that he would have to establish a connection with the men, get to understand them and get them to understand him, and be judged by the audience on the night of the concert, on the strength of some six hours' acquaintance with his instrument. Under circumstances such as these, nothing like the precision of the American orchestras is possible, working, as they do, for months or years together under the same conductor.

It is this superb precision, the sense of a magnificent, smoothly running machine, that first impresses the visitor from London. In these respects I have never heard anywhere an orchestra that was superior to the Philadelphia; the cleanness of its ensemble playing is always a delight. If the Philharmonic, fine as its work [illegible] often been, rarely gave me quite the same thrill, that may be because the men, as I gather, were not working under the ideal American conditions. This perfection of teamwork can come only from constantly playing under the same conductor. It is not everything, of course, in itself, but it is a great deal.

THAT the American orchestras are not so adaptable as the English seems to me to be fairly evident from my short experience of them. In working for that precision and unanimity that is so admirable, I fancy they lose a little in individual initiative. The American players do not seem to me to have the spirit of adventure in them that ours have. Our men are gamblers, and they develop a gambler's virtues and defects. They will take terrifying risks with new and complicated and insufficiently rehearsed works, and frequently the results are disastrous. But, being compelled to take such risks, never knowing what they may be called upon to do next and feeling that, whatever it is, they have to be prepared for it, develops in them an unusual quickness of response to a strange conductor—if, of course, he happens to be a man of genius.

Vladimir Golschmann is hardly that, so, perhaps, the test was not a fair one, but I cannot imagine the London Symphony Orchestra playing under him for the first time as poorly as the New York Symphony Orchestra did. The latter was obviously as ill at ease under the new conductor as a horse would be under a new rider after being accustomed mainly to the same one for years. Our London players, then, seem to me more quickly adaptable than the American.

The London Symphony Orchestra (a co-operative organization, by the way, the players governing and financing themselves and engaging their own conductors) has been in existence now about twenty years. During that time they have played under a large number of the best conductors, no two of them alike in their technique or in their conception of the standard works. Can it be wondered at that under these conditions the players have developed an adaptability that often enables them to do surprisingly well in face of the most paralyzing difficulties?

It is, perhaps, this sense of adventure that sometimes gives their playing a nervous intensity that I have not often met with in New York.

I have just been reading Jim Corbett's reminiscences, and I find that he shook his head before going into one of his later fights and said to his tranier, "I don't like this: I feel too good." The trainer could not quite see his point of view, but Corbett was right; his confidence had one of its roots at least in a subconscious indifference; and an artist does not get the best results out of himself when there is not some touch at least of preliminary—I will not say nervousness, but nerve; if that is absent, it is a sign that the machine is not keyed up to its highest potentiality.

In all the finest playing that I have heard in New York, the impression has been one not of nervous adventure but of steady confidence—a feeling that the magnificent machine could not possibly go wrong.

THIS precision has been a welcome experience for me, for since 1914 the standard of orchestral performance in England has been gradually declining. This has been due to many causes, but the chief of them, as can be imagined, are economic. Hardly one of our leading orchestras can look forward with perfect confidence any season to even another year of life. The American orchestras are lucky in their endowments and their security of tenure.

The best that I have heard is undoubtedly the Philadelphia; but the Philharmonic runs it close. The Boston is evidently in a transition stage. With its American tradition of long-term conductors it is bound to take a little time to give itself up entirely to a new spirit; but if it is fortunate enough to retain Koussevitzky for another year or two, and will make a few obviously necessary changes in its personnel, it will become a marvelous instrument. It is already a remarkable one. The New York Symphony Orchestra I heard only two or three times; it has apparently become so part and parcel of Mr. Damrosch that it is difficult for an outsider to estimate it purely and simply as an orchestra. The State Symphony Orchestra, again, I heard only under Mr. Stransky, and, for one concert, under Mr. Waghalter.

Providence Journal
Feb 22

Boston Symphony to Introduce Glazounov's Latest Composition Here Tuesday

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is hardly customary for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to perform at a concert out of Boston a composition unknown there, yet when the orchestra, in its concert at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening plays the Eighth Symphony of Glazounov, it will introduce to Providence a work that the Boston public as yet has not heard, albeit a work with which that public will speedily make acquaintance. For this Symphony stands also upon the all-Russian programme for the concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday.

But here is no Russian music that need cause foreboding in the minds of those perturbed by reports of Stravinskian modernity. As composer Glazounov, now in his 60th year, embodied in his career the prevailing and, as some hold, the regrettable tendencies of Russian music during the last quarter of a century before the appearance of those present-day "modernists," Stravinsky and Prokofiev. Beginning as a disciple of the group of so-called Nationalists, a pupil in fact of the most accomplished of that coterie, the brilliant and gifted Rimsky-Korsakov, Glazunov has gradually freed himself from specifically Russian influences and has become a zealous upholder of the doctrines of Brahms; in short, a writer of absolute music that is far more Teutonic than Slavic in character.

In this Eighth and, to date, last of his symphonies, Glazunov has at length definitely freed himself, not only of all Russianisms, but also of all romantic and programmatic tendencies. Here is music existing for itself alone, germinating from a few motives in the approved neo-classical fashion, devoid of all racial coloring, true "absolute" music.

The broadly flowing first movement that gathers impulse and energy as it proceeds, might easily have been written by any German composer—granting the requisite skill in constructon—who, imbued with the ideals of Brahms, had then mastered the orchestral technique of Richard Strauss.

In the sombre second movement we find perhaps the nearest approach to Russian mood and feeling, but the harmonic and orchestral idioms here employed are those that are to-day the common heritage of the composers of every nation.

By evidence of the printed page (by no means always a trustworthy guide) the ensuing Scherzo is the most original, most ingenious, and likewise the freshest and most spontaneous movement of the four. Here Glazunov discloses himself as a brilliant and facile manipulator of orchestral resources—a mastery again displayed, though in somewhat different guise, in the Finale, which returns to the expansive utterance of the first movement.

In his fascinating memoirs Rimsky-Korsakov has much to say of Glazunov, whom he greatly admired both as man and as musician. He pays eloquent tribute to the younger composer's technical mastery as it was evinced in early youth and he notes appreciatively Glazunov's extraordinary musical memory. Merely from having heard it played over by the composer, Glazunov was able to write down from memory the Overture to Bordin's "Prince Igor" and certain other portions of the opera, when he and Rimsky took it upon themselves to complete the work that their fellow-composer left unfinished at his death.

Not only Glazunov's Symphony will be played for the first time in Providence at this concert; the numbers which precede and follow it upon the programme, Glinka's Overture to "Russian and Lioudmilla" and the Concerto in A minor of Vivaldi, in which Paul Kochanski will be the solo violinist, are likewise of novel interest. Indeed, on the programme only the final piece, Liszt's romantic and resounding tone-poem "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," last played here by the Boston Orchestra in 1921 under Mr. Monteux, brings the touch of familiarity.

It is difficult for 20th century Americans to realize the reverence in which 19th century Russians held the true founder and father of their national school of music, Michael Ivanovich Glinka (1803-1857). Thus Rimsky-Korsakov writes of one of his early teachers: "Kanille opened my eyes to many things. With what rapture I learned from him that 'Russlan and Lioudmilla' really was the best opera in the world, that Clinka was a supreme genius. Until then I had felt it intuitively—now I heard it from a real musician."

But if we of the present can place Glinka upon no such pedestal, we can at least appreciate the charm and brilliance of his talent as exemplified in this Overture, and for that matter in certain other of his pieces known on this side of the world. And as the fountainhead of one of the richest, most fertile and most significant of modern schools of composition, his importance in music history is not easily overestimated.

As for Vivaldi's Concerto, the music of this great Italian contemporary of Bach stands hardly in need of elucidation or analysis, while Paul Kochanski, one of the ablest of contemporary violinists, may be trusted to bring it to fully revealing performance. Final word, then, should be bestowed upon the concluding piece of the evening, and no better guide can be found to "Tasso," one of the best-liked of Liszt's 12 symphonic poems, than the composer's own statement of his intentins:

"I wished to define the contrast expressed in the title of the work, and it was my object to describe the grand antithesis of the genius, illused and misunderstood in life, but in death surrounded with a halo of glory whose rays were to penetrate the hearts of his persecutors. Tassos loved and suffered in Ferrara, was avenged in Rome, and lives to this day in the popular songs of Venice. These three viewpoints are inseparably connected with his career. To render them musically I invoke his mighty shadow, as he wanders by the lagoons of Venice, proud and sad in countenance, or watching the feasts at Ferrara, where his master works were created. I followed him to Rome, the Eternal City, which bestowed upon him the crown of glory, and in him canonized the martyr and the poet."

Advertiser
Feb 22

Russian Program at Symphony Concerts

MUSIC from Russia will comprise the Symphony program next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Serge Koussevitzky will present Glinka's overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," Glazounov's symphony in E-flat, three pieces by Liadov based on Russian folk songs—"Kikimora," "The Enchanted Lake," and "Baba Yaga" and Tchaikovsky's overture—fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 22 1925

Albert Spalding, American violinist, will be the soloist at the next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the Academy on Friday evening, March 13. Mr. Koussevitzky's program for this concert has not yet been announced.

Madame Teodora Wisniowska

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 22 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Albert Spalding, foremost American violinist, and one of the greatest living virtuosi of the violin, will be the soloist at the next Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at the Academy on Friday evening, March 13. Mr. Koussevitzky's program for this concert has as no as yet been announced

---

[illegible]

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Music from Russia will be heard at the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening: Glinka's overture to "Russian and Lioudmilla," Glazounov's Symphony No. 8, E-flat; three pieces by Liadov, "Kikimora", "The Enchanted Lake" and "Baba Yaga", and Tchaikowsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet."

[illegible]

Mr Koussevitzky again annou[illegible] for the Symphony concerts this w[illegible] the all-Russian program which he [illegible]andoned some time since in favor [illegible] an all-Beethoven program. One w[illegible]ders whether we are going to have [illegible] due course an all-Italian program, a[illegible] all-English program, a Scandinavia[illegible] program, and finally an all-America[illegible] program. But is not the nationality [illegible] the composer in most cases a poor [illegible]ide for the seeker after the unified [illegible]program? Rubinstein and Musor[illegible]y, Stravinsky and Medtner, Russians [illegible]nd contemporaries, have otherwise litt[illegible] in common.

◆

The delay in beginning and chan[illegible]d order of pieces on the program at [illegible]e Saturday symphony a week ago w[illegible]e necessary because the orchestral sco[illegible]s used by Mr Koussevitzky were [illegible]ft behind by an error and had to b[illegible]ound. He had taken them home to stu[illegible] and the chauffeur forgot to put them [illegible] the automobile.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15 Boston Symphony Orchestra, 17th program: Overture to "Russlan and L[illegible]milla," Glinka; Eighth Symphony, G[illegible]zunov; "Kikimora," "The Enchant[illegible] Lake," and "Baba Yaga," Liadov; ov[illegible]ture, fantasy, "Romeo and Jul[illegible] Tchaikovsky.

47

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

FEB 22 1925

Paul Kochanski

Young Violinist Here Tuesday Evening With Boston Symphony Orchestra

Of the many younger artists who have blazed their way into prominence, Paul Kochanski, soloist here next Tuesday, night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is perhaps the foremost.

Probably no young artist has made more retical appearances in various parts of the world than he. Being constantly in demand, he has been heard many times in the principal capitals of Europe, touring France, England, Germany, Russia, Poland, Spain, Greece, Turkey and Egypt, as well as manking annual visits to the United States, Canada and South America.

A native of the land of Chopin and Paderewski, a possessor of the coveted Premier Prix avec la plus grande distinction de Bruzelles, Kochanski made his debut, at the age of 19, in London, creating a profound impression because of his dignity, repose and command of style. Two years later, he returned to his native land to accept the appointment of professor in the Conservatory of Warsaw. Later, he held similar posts in the Conservatories of Petrograd and Kieff.

Early in 1921, he was engaged by Walter Damrosch as assisting artist for a special New York concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra. The success was electrical, immediately causing a demand for his services for five additional Metropolitan appearances within the following five weeks.

Stradivarius executed a number of special sets of instruments on order, that made for the Spanish Crown about 1687 being of historical significance. These instruments, five in number were inlaid with ivory in the purling with intaglio work on the sides and scroll. One of the violins was stolen and eventually came into the hands of Ole Bull. Then it passed into the collection of Charles Plowden and from thence to C. Oldman, the famous English collector. After his death, by virtue of a bequest in his will, it was transferred to the British Museum where it remained for two years, but the protest of a number of eminent violinists (Ysaye, Sauret, Arbos, Wilhelmj and others) against so valuable an instrument being withdrawn from the musical world, resulted in its return to the widow who placed it with Hill of London for safekeeping. About 12 years ago, Paul Kochanski happened into Hill's place and was shown the "Spanish" Strad which was loaned to him for his recital. The tone and beauty of this remarkable violin evoked so great a demonstration from the audience that the violinist at once opened negotiations for its purchase.

This particular violin is of the second period or when Stradivarius left the imitated form and followed his own fancy leading to individual modification of form, arching, sound-holes, scroll, while the varnish is of a golden hue, soft and transparent. The wood is of the best quality pine, solid, sound and sonorous. The inner framework is of willow.

Providence
Journal
Feb 22

Paul Kochanski

Polish violinist is soloist with Boston Symphony next Tuesday night.

Boston Symphony Next Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky, gives its fourth concert of the season next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall. Paul Kochanski, who will play Vivaldi's Concerto in A-minor, is the soloist.

Mr. Kochanski has played in this country for four years and has adopted it as his permanent residence. He comes from the land of Chopin and Paderswski, where he was born in 1887. He is one of the artists whose early talent and proficiency brought him to public attention first as a "prodigy." At the age of 9, after studying the violin with Mlynarski, he gave a concert in Warsaw.

When he became 15 he went to Brussels to study with Cesar Thomson, and three years later at the conservatory won the first prize. This enabled him to make his London debut in 1907 while still in his 'teens.

He became a professor at the Conservatory of Music at Warsaw, followed by an appointment at Petrograd, as it was then, succeeding Auer. There he remained from 1913 to 1912. Late in 1919 he gave several recitals in Warsaw and appeared 14 times with the principal orchestras of Poland.

In the fall of the next year he returned to London, the scene of his debut 13 years before, playing with the London Symphony Orchestra under Albert Coates and in recitals. In 1921 he came to this country at the invitation of Walter Damrosch to appear with the New York Symphony Orchestra.

Kochanski's Stradivarius is an instrument of extreme rarity and interest. It is one of three which the master of Cremona made for the Spanish Crown in 1687. It is inlaid with ivory in the purling with intaglio work on the sides and scroll. This particular one was stolen and, after passing through many hands, came to the possession of the great Norwegian virtuoso, Ole Bull. Thence it passed into two private English collections and rested for a time in the British Museum. Kochanski got permission to try it in a public concert and was so enraptured by the extreme sweetness and richness of its tone, that he did not rest until he could call this unusual Stradivarius his own.

Serge Koussevitzky will present at this concert Glazounov's Eighth Symphony, Glinka's Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," and Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Tasso."

The Providence Public Library has "Contemporary Russian Composers," by Montague-Nathan, and his "History of Russian Music," containing biographical accounts of Glazounov. There is also an account of Glinka in the last named book. In a recent number of Musical America, which the library has on file, it is stated that Koussevitzky has been engaged for another year with the orchestra.

The library has the vocal score of [illegible]

Globe
Feb 22

Unified Symphony Programs

Musical reviewers occasionally write about "unified programs" for Symphony and other concerts. Mr Koussevitzky has lately given occasion for comment of this sort by an all-French, and an announced all-Russian program. What does the phrase "a unified program" mean? How can this unity be secured, is it worth the trouble? If some readers could catechise the reviewers and the program makers they might ask, among others, these questions.

Most programs at concerts and recitals of all sorts are miscellanies concocted according to one of several fashionable formulae. You begin a song recital with old airs dated before 1800. Then a group of German lieder, a group of French songs, and a group of more or less pretty trifles in English. Or you begin a piano recital with a Bach fuge made into a terrific show piece by Busoni or Liszt. Then you play a long number, like Beethoven's "Appassionata" sonata, or Chopin's with the Funeral March (B flat minor, op 35) or Schumann's "Carnaval."

Then you play a Chopin group. Then a few modern pieces, usually not anything more dangerously radical than Dubussy's "Reflets dans l'eau." You must end with a bang, represented usually by one of Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsodies." So run two current schemes, after which half the recital programs are patterned.

Symphony concert programs are determined by the position of the symphony on the program, if as usual, there is one. If you put the symphony first, the latecomers will either (a) be admitted after the first movement making an unpleasant and utterly inartistic break in the performance of what should be a single musical unit, or else (b) you exclude all latecomers for anywhere from 20 minutes to an hour, something many subscribers, valued by the business management of the orchestra, are sure to resent bitterly.

Where to Put the Symphony

The Boston Symphony concerts have always been afflicted until this season with latecomers admitted after the first movement of the symphony, whom neither Dr Muck's ironic sneer, M. Rabaud's patient courtesy Mr Monteux' occasional shrug of impatience nor any other consideration ever brought to a realizing sense of the error of their ways.

Mr Koussevitzky has succeeded where each of his predecessors failed in suppressing applause between movements of the symphony. Latecomers would be out of luck if he put the symphony first on the program. But he follows the other model and puts it last or else precedes it by a short overture or other brief number so that the latecomers do not suffer.

If your symphony program contains a symphony, that takes care of half of it, and the problem is what to put in the other half, and how to connect with the half containing the symphony. If there happens to be a soloist he must give his concerto somewhere. Mr Monteux used to make concertos an excuse for omitting the symphony, but to do this often is to risk making the concerts not "Symphony Concerts" but a mongrel species of highbrow Pops. Of course such a piece as one of Bach's "Brandenburg Concertos" or Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" might properly be given instead of a symphony.

Now, what does unity mean as applied to programs. It is usually taken as meaning a program by composers of the same country and century, or of the work of a single composer, or of music suggested by some nonmusical phenomenon as Shakespere's plays.

It would for instance be possible to fill a whole symphony program with the different pieces inspired by Boecklin's painting "The Isle of the Dead." There are tone poems by Rachmaninoff, Reger, and Weingartner and probably others could be unearthed by diligent search in Germany. But isn't this sort of thing the unity upon which not the art of music but the art of card indexing is founded?

Unity of Tone and Feeling

Is not the true unity a unity of tone and feeling, which often exists between pieces of music which no card catalogue would ever group together? Dr Muck had a sensitive feeling for this sort of unity, and often made his programs unified in this internal and imaginative way, though he seldom used any external unifying device.

Debussy and Mozart are, for instance, composers who spiritually belong together, though they are of different ages and countries and write in quite different musical idioms. Almost anything by these two goes well [illegible] where Debussy and Beethoven, or Mozart and Richard Strauss would [illegible] match at all.

This true unity does not exist between composers whose only bond of union is that they happened to inhabit the same country at the same time. Living in the same house for a lifetime will not make people spiritually and imaginatively akin, even when they are born blood brothers. Unity of tone is a much more subtle thing than most program makers assume.

It does not always exist between the works of a single great composer. For instance, who would believe that the composer of the overture to "Rienzi" was some day going to write the prelude to "Tristan," or that the same man wrote in the same opera, "Tannhauser," things so utterly disparate in merit and tone as the intolerable "Evening Star" and the tremendous "Hymn to Venus"? Yet an all-Wagner program would commonly be assumed to be a "unified program."

Unless it be done subtly there is no use in unifying a concert program. And even if done subtly it may be overdone. Imagine for instance Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, Liszt's "Tasso," and a violin concerto by Bruch. The music would be insufferably monotonous in tone, to say nothing of the here irrelevant question as to its intrinsic worth. Yet a subtly unified program like the best of Muck's is a joy forever.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

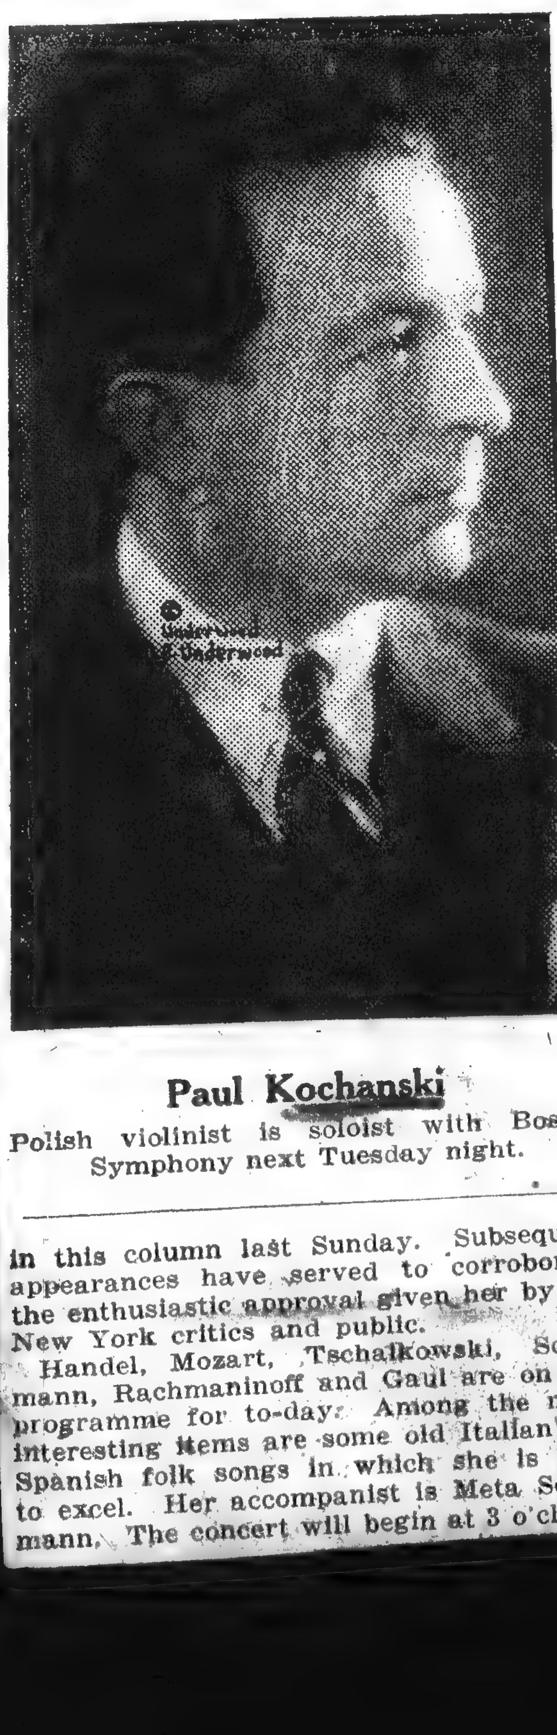
FEB 22 1925

Dusolina Giannini, Soprano, Sings at Providence Music League Concert This Afternoon at Albee Theatre. Paul Kochanski with Boston Symphony Tuesday Night.

This afternoon the Providence Music League presents its second programme of the season at the Albee Theatre with Dusolina Giannini as the soloist. Miss Giannini is a soprano whose voice and charming presence have brought her great popularity in a remarkably brief time. She has been before the public barely two years, but during that period has sung far and wide and made her name known.

It first came to the ears of the music public following a tremendously successful debut in New York with the Schola Cantorum two years ago this coming month, the circumstances of which were related in this column last Sunday. Subsequent appearances have served to corroborate the enthusiastic approval given her by the New York critics and public.

Handel, Mozart, Tschaikowski, Schumann, Rachmaninoff and Gaul are on her programme for to-day. Among the most interesting items are some old Italian and Spanish folk songs in which she is said to excel. Her accompanist is Meta Schumann. The concert will begin at 3 o'clock.



Paul Kochanski

Polish violinist is soloist with Boston Symphony next Tuesday night.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

FEB 2 2 1925

Paul Kochanski

Young Violinist Here Tuesday Evening With Boston Symphony Orchestra

Of the many younger artists who have blazed their way into prominence, Paul Kochanski, soloist here next Tuesday, night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is perhaps the foremost.

Probably no young artist has made more retical appearances in various parts of the world than he. Being constantly in demand, he has been heard many times in the principal capitals of Europe, touring France, England, Germany, Russia, Poland, Spain, Greece, Turkey and Egypt, as well as making annual visits to the United States, Canada and South America.

A native of the land of Chopin and Paderewski, a possessor of the coveted Premier Prix avec la plus grande distinction de Bruzelles, Kochanski made his debut, at the age of 19, in London, creating a profound impression because of his dignity, repose and command of style. Two years later, he returned to his native land to accept the appointment of professor in the Conservatory of Warsaw. Later, he held similar posts in the Conservatories of Petrograd and Kieff.

Early in 1921, he was engaged by Walter Damrosch as assisting artist for a special New York concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra. The success was electrical, immediately causing a demand for his services for five additional Metropolitan appearances within the following five weeks.

Stradivarius executed a number of special sets of instruments on order, that made for the Spanish Crown about 1687 being of historical significance. These instruments, five in number, were inlaid with ivory in the purling with intaglio work on the sides and scroll. One of the violins was stolen and eventually came into the hands of Ole Bull. Then it passed into the collection of Charles Plowden and from thence to C. Oldman, the famous English collector. After his death, by virtue of a bequest in his will, it was transferred to the British Museum where it remained for two years, but the protest of a number of eminent violinists (Ysaye, Sauret, Arbos, Wilhelmj and others) against so valuable an instrument being withdrawn from the musical world, resulted in its return to the widow who placed it with Hill of London for safekeeping. About 12 years ago, Paul Kochanski happened into Hill's place and was shown the "Spanish" Strad which was loaned to him for his recital. The tone and beauty of this remarkable violin evoked so great a demonstration from the audience that the violinist at once opened negotiations for its purchase.

This particular violin is of the second period or when Stradivarius left the imitated form and followed his own fancy leading to individual modification of form, arching, sound-holes, scroll, while the varnish is of a golden hue, soft and transparent. The wood is of the best quality pine, solid, sound and sonorous. The inner framework is of willow.

Providence
Journal
Feb 22

© Underwood & Underwood

Paul Kochanski

Polish violinist is soloist with Boston Symphony next Tuesday night.

Boston Symphony Next Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky, gives its fourth concert of the season next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall. Paul Kochanski, who will play Vivaldi's Concerto in A-minor, is the soloist.

Mr. Kochanski has played in this country for four years and has adopted it as his permanent residence. He comes from the land of Chopin and Paderswski, where he was born in 1887. He is one of the artists whose early talent and proficiency brought him to public attention first as a "prodigy." At the age of 9, after studying the violin with Mlynarski, he gave a concert in Warsaw.

When he became 15 he went to Brussels to study with Cesar Thomson, and three years later at the conservatory won the first prize. This enabled him to make his London debut in 1907 while still in his 'teens.

He became a professor at the Conservatory of Music at Warsaw, followed by an appointment at Petrograd, as it was then, succeeding Auer. There he remained from 1915 to 1912. Late in 1919 he gave several recitals in Warsaw and appeared 14 times with the principal orchestras of Poland.

In the fall of the next year he returned to London, the scene of his debut 13 years before, playing with the London Symphony Orchestra under Albert Coates and in recitals. In 1921 he came to this country at the invitation of Walter Damrosch to appear with the New York Symphony Orchestra.

Kochanski's Stradivarius is an instrument of extreme rarity and interest. It is one of three which the master of Cremona made for the Spanish Crown in 1687. It is inlaid with ivory in the purling with intaglio work on the sides and scroll. This particular one was stolen and, after passing through many hands, came to the possession of the great Norwegian virtuoso, Ole Bull. Thence it passed into two private English collections and rested for a time in the British Museum. Kochanski got permission to try it in a public concert and was so enraptured by the extreme sweetness and richness of its tone, that he did not rest until he could call this unusual Stradivarius his own.

Serge Koussevitzky will present at this concert Glazounov's Eighth Symphony, Glinka's Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," and Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Tasso."

The Providence Public Library has "Contemporary Russian Composers," by Montague-Nathan, and his "History of Russian Music," containing biographical accounts of Glazounov. There is also an account of Glinka in the last named book. In a recent number of Musical America, which the library has on file, it is stated that Koussevitzky has been engaged for another year with the orchestra.

The library has the vocal score of the

Globe
Feb 22

Unified Symphony Programs

Musical reviewers occasionally write about "unified programs" for Symphony and other concerts. Mr Koussevitzky has lately given occasion for comment of this sort by an all-French, and an announced all-Russian program. What does the phrase "a unified program" mean? How can this unity be secured, is it worth the trouble? If some readers could catechise the reviewers and the program makers they might ask, among others, these questions.

Most programs at concerts and recitals of all sorts are miscellanies concocted according to one of several fashionable formulae. You begin a song recital with old airs dated before 1800. Then a group of German lieder, a group of French songs, and a group of more or less pretty trifles in English. Or you begin a piano recital with a Bach fuge made into a terrific show piece by Busoni or Liszt. Then you play a long number, like Beethoven's "Appassionata" sonata, or Chopin's with the Funeral March (B flat minor, op 35) or Schumann's "Carnaval."

When you play a Chopin group. Then a few modern pieces, usually not anything more dangerously radical than Dubussy's "Reflets dans l'eau." You must end with a bang, represented usually by one of Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsodies." So run two current schemes, after which half the recital programs are patterned.

Symphony concert programs are determined by the position of the symphony on the program, if as usual, there is one. If you put the symphony first, the latecomers will either (a) be admitted after the first movement making an unpleasant and utterly inartistic break in the performance of what should be a single musical unit, or else (b) you exclude all latecomers for anywhere from 20 minutes to an hour, something many subscribers, valued by the business management of the orchestra, are sure to resent bitterly.

Where to Put the Symphony

The Boston Symphony concerts have always been afflicted until this season with latecomers admitted after the first movement of the symphony, whom neither Dr Muck's ironic sneer, M. Rabaud's patient courtesy Mr Monteux' occasional shrug of impatience nor any other consideration ever brought to a realizing sense of the error of their ways.

Mr Koussevitzky has succeeded where each of his predecessors failed in suppressing applause between movements of the symphony. Latecomers would be out of luck if he put the symphony first on the program. But he follows the other model and puts it last or else precedes it by a short overture or other brief number so that the latecomers do not suffer.

If your symphony program contains a symphony, that takes care of half of it, and the problem is what to put in the other half, and how to connect with the half containing the symphony. If there happens to be a soloist he must give his concerto somewhere. Mr Monteux used to make concertos an excuse for omitting the symphony, but to do this often is to risk making the concerts not "Symphony Concerts" but a mongrel species of highbrow Pops. Of course such a piece as one of Bach's "Brandenburg Concertos" or Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" might properly be given instead of a symphony.

Now, what does unity mean as applied to programs. It is usually taken as meaning a program by composers of the same country and century, or of the work of a single composer, or of music suggested by some nonmusical phenomenon as Shakespere's plays.

It would for instance be possible to fill a whole symphony program with the different pieces inspired by Boecklin's painting "The Isle of the Dead." There are tone poems by Rachmaninoff, Reger, and Weingartner and probably others could be unearthed by diligent search in Germany. But isn't this sort of thing the unity upon which not the art of music but the art of card indexing is founded?

Unity of Tone and Feeling

Is not the true unity a unity of tone and feeling, which often exists between pieces of music which no card cataloguer would ever group together? Dr Muck had a sensitive feeling for this sort of unity, and often made his programs unified in this internal and imaginative way, though he seldom used any external unifying device.

Debussy and Mozart are, for instance, composers who spiritually belong together, though they are of different ages and countries and write in quite different musical idioms. Almost anything by these two goes well together, where Debussy and Beethoven, or Mozart and Richard Strauss would not match at all.

This true unity does not exist between composers whose only bond of union is that they happened to inhabit the same country at the same time. Living in the same house for a lifetime will not make people spiritually and imaginatively akin, even when they are both blood brothers. Unity of tone is a much more subtle thing than most program makers assume.

It does not always exist between the works of a single great composer. For instance, who would believe that the composer of the overture to "Rienzi" was some day going to write the prelude to "Tristan," or that the same man wrote in the same opera, "Tannhauser," things so utterly disparate in merit and tone as the intolerable "Evening Star" and the tremendous "Hymn to Venus"? Yet an all-Wagner program would commonly be assumed to be a "unified program."

Unless it be done subtly there is no use in unifying a concert program. And even if done subtly it may be overdone. Imagine for instance Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, Liszt's "Tasso," and a violin concerto by Bruch. The music would be insufferably monotonous in tone, to say nothing of the here irrelevant question as to its intrinsic worth. Yet a subtly unified program like the best of Muck's is a joy forever.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 2 2 1925

Dusolina Giannini, Soprano, Sings at Providence Music League Concert This Afternoon at Albee Theatre. Paul Kochanski with Boston Symphony Tuesday Night.

This afternoon the Providence Music League presents its second programme of the season at the Albee Theatre with Dusolina Giannini as the soloist. Miss Giannini is a soprano whose voice and charming presence have brought her great popularity in a remarkably brief time. She has been before the public barely two years, but during that period has sung far and wide and made her name known.

It first came to the ears of the music public following a tremendously successful concert in New York with the Schola Cantorum two years ago this coming month, the circumstances of which were related in this column last Sunday. Subsequent appearances have served to corroborate the enthusiastic approval given her by the New York critics and public.

© Underwood & Underwood

Paul Kochanski

Polish violinist is soloist with Boston Symphony next Tuesday night.

Handel, Mozart, Tschaikowski, Schumann, Rachmaninoff and Gaul are on her programme for to-day: Among the most interesting items are some old Italian and Spanish folk songs in which she is said to excel. Her accompanist is Meta Schumann. The concert will begin at 3 o'clock.

48

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT
FEB 22 1925

Matters of Moment in Music

By ERNEST NEWMAN

Guest Critic New York Evening Post

I have been asked to give my impressions of American orchestras, but I do so only with the greatest diffidence. On the subject of "American orchestras" in general, indeed, I am in no way qualified to speak, for during my stay here I have only been out of New York once, and that to hear an orchestra—the Philadelphia—that I had already heard here. I should have liked to hear the Chicago, the Detroit, the St. Louis, and the Cleveland orchestras but it has proved impossible. I have very scanty data to go upon even as regards the New York orchestras and the only two visiting organizations I have heard—the Philadelphia and the Boston Symphony. I know how easy it is for a stranger to miss the true focus of home affairs in matters musical; therefore I can only pu [illegible] rward what follows as first and per [illegible] superficial impressions.

One of the difficulties o [illegible] ng about orchestras is that, strictly [illegible] ng, there is no such thing as an o [illegible] a; or if there is, the listener does not [illegible] me into direct contact with it. He only [illegible] ears performances; and the quality of these depends as much on the conductor as on the personnel. In a broad way, of course, we can say that the material of one orchestra is very good, and that of another very poor; but as regards orchestras of about the same quality as regards material, it is difficult to separate the orchestra and the conductor. A first-rate orchestra can play poorly under a poor conductor, and a second-rate orchestra will sometimes play miles above itself under a man of genius.

I should have liked, then, had it been possible, to hear each orchestra under two or three conductors, for that would have afforded me a better basis for comparison with our London orchestras. There the only orchestra that corresponds to any of the American orchestras in that it always plays under the same conductor, is the Queen's Hall Orchestra, which is conducted by Sir Henry Wood. It is a good orchestra, but I should not call it first-class. Our other orchestras are made up, to some extent, of the same players,—that is to say, the London Symphony Orchestra, for instance, provides many of the men for the London Philharmonic. The general rule in London, apart from the Queen's Hall Orchestra, is to engage several visiting conductors each season. This difference between the English and the American methods of necessity leads to rather different results in performance.

A New York musical friend told me one evening that I would not hear the Philhormanic at its best, as Mengelberg would arrive to take charge only three weeks or so before I left and the orchestra would take rather longer than that to settle down again into his ways and become thoroughly responsive to him. That remark of itself was sufficient to indicate the difference between the American and the English methods. In London, if Mengelberg were engaged to conduct one of the L. S. O. concerts, he would probably get, at the most, a couple of rehearsals, so that he would have to establish a connection with the men, get to understand them and get them to understand him, and be judged by the audience on the night of the concert, on the strength of some six hours' acquaintance with his instrument. Under circumstances such as these, nothing like the precision of the American orchestras is possible, working, as they do, for months or years together under the same conductor. It is this superb precision, the sense of a magnificent, smoothly running machine, that first impresses the visitor from London. In these respects I have never heard anywhere an orchestra that was superior to the Philadelphia; the cleanness of its ensemble playing is always a delight. If the Philharmonic, fine as its work has often been, rarely gave me quite the same thrill, that may be because the men, as I gather, were not working under the ideal American conditions. This perfection of teamwork can come only from constantly playing under the same conductor. It is not everything, of course, in itself, but it is a great deal.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE

That the American orchestras are not so adaptable as the English seems to me to be fairly evident from my short experience of them. In working for that precision and unanimity that is so admirable, I fancy they lose a little in individual initiative. The American players do not seem to me to have the spirit of adventure in them that ours have. Our men are gamblers, and they develop a gambler's virtues and defects. They will take terrifying risks with new and complicated and insufficiently rehearsed works, and frequently the results are disastrous. But being compelled to take such risks, never knowing what they may be called upon to do next, and feeling that, whatever it is, they have to be prepared for it, develops in them an unusual sharpness of apprehension and an unusual quickness of response to a strange conductor—if, of course, he happens to be a man of genius.

Vladimir Golschmann is hardly that, so pehhaps the test was not a fair one; but I cannot imagine the London Symphony Orchestra playing under him for the first time as poorly as the New York Symphony Orchestra did. The latter was obviously as ill at ease under the new conductor as a horse would be under a new rider after being accustomed mainly to the same one for years. Our London players, then, seem to me more quickly adaptable than the American. The London Symphony Orchestra (a co-operative organization, by the way, the players governing and financing themselves and engaging their own conductor) has been in existence now about twenty years. During that time they have played under a large number of the best conductors, no two of them alike in their technique or in their conception of the standard works. Can it be wondered at that under these conditions the players have developed an adaptability that often enables them to do surprisingly well in face of the most paralyzing difficulties?

It is perhaps this sense of adventure that sometimes gives their playing a nervous intensity that I have not often met with in New York. I have just been reading Jim Corbett's reminiscences, and I find that he shook his head before going into one of his later fights and said to his trainer, "I don't like this: I feel too good." The trainer could not quite see his point of view, but Corbett was right; his confidence had one of its roots at least in a subconscious indifference; and an artist does not get the best results out of himself when there is not some touch at least of preliminary—I will not say nervousness, but nerve; if that is absent, it is a sign that the machine is not keyed up to its highest potentiality. In all the finest playing that I have heard in New York, the impression has been one not of nervous adventure but of steady confidence,—a feeling that the magnificent machine could not possibly go wrong.

This precision has been a welcome experience for me, for since 1914 the standard of orchestral performance in England has been gradually declining. This has been due to many causes, but the chief of them, as can be imagined, are economic. Hardly one of our leading orchestras can look forward with perfect confidence any season to even another year of life. The American orchestras are lucky in their endowments and their security of tenure. The best that I have heard is undoubtedly the Philadelphia; but the Philharmonic runs it close. The Boston is evidently in a transition stage. With its American tradition of long-term conducters it is bound to take a little time to give itself up entirely to a new spirit; but if it is fortunate enough to retain Koussevitzky for another year or two, and will make a few obviously necessary changes in its personnel, it will become a marvellous instrument. It is already a remarkable one. The New York Symphony Orchestra I heard only two or three times; it has apparently become so part and parcel of Mr. Damrosch that it is difficult for an outsider to estimate it purely and simply as an orchestra. The State Symphony Orchestra, again, I heard only under Mr. Stransky, and, for one concert under Mr. Waghalter.

In another article I propose to offer some reflections on conductrs, programs and other features of New York musical life in the last five months.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
FEB 25 1925

Symphony Concert At Infantry Hall

Serge Koussevitsky Greeted With Outburst of Applause Last Evening

The entrance on the stage of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening, was greeted with an outburst of applause from the large audience which nearly filled Infantry Hall, to hear the fourth concert of this year's series. It was evident that so popular is this well known group of musicians with local music lovers, and so appreciative of the best are those same music lovers, that Providence has a right to the term "a musical city." It is surely a tribute to any city, when so large a gathering of people will attend and enthuse over so excellent and high class a program as that which the Boston Symphony Orchestra presents. And the enthusiasm of the audience last evening was one of the most impressive things about the evening. They fairly overflowed with appreciation for the conductor, the program and the soloist.

Glinka's Overture to "Russian and Ludmiller" was the opening selection, varied and melodic, with the first violin's predominating at times, and with most wonderful long sustained tones. The opera of which it is a part was taken from Russian folk lore. The overture has been dedicated to H. Berlioz by the sister of the composer.

Then followed the wonderful "Symphony No. 8" in E flat, Op. 83, by Glazounov. It was played in four movements; Allegro with its planissimo ending, very delicately and artistically done, and calling forth another outburst of that applause that seemed on tap at the second's notice throughout the evening. The second movement was "Mesto" with great cresendos, the third "Allegro" and the finale, "Moderato," with great round notes and ending in a thunderous crashing.

After a ten-minute intermission, the program was resumed and Vivaldi's "Concerto" for violin and orchestra in A minor, was played in three movement and the solos were played by Mr. Paul Kochanski. This version is by the violinist, Tivadar Nachez. The concerto was first written by Vivaldi, who was a virtuoso, and has many times been accused of writing for mere display, and ting novel effects only for the ap- use which they might bring him. His mposition on last evening's program rtainly won applause, and if the acusation against him is true, and he might have "listened in" last evening, he would have been very much satisfied.

The solist played with ease and brilliancy, and especially in the large movements was his long drawn bow sure and steady and delightful to hear. He was encored many times.

The program concluded with a "Symphonic Poem" "Tasso; Lamento e Trionio" by Liszt. It was written for a celebration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Goethe, when the composer conducted the work from manuscript. The motif is plaintive, and mournful, but gradually it growns brighter, and one hears the songs of the bondoliers from afar. It is a tone picture of hopeless sorrow, according to the written opinion of great masters of music. It is based on two themes: the first has much wailing diminuendo, great swells, and wild expressions of woe and rage, and the second, a great triumph, growing faster and faster with blare of trumpets and a great festival tumult, which includes the whole orchestra at the end. A splendid ending to a splendid concert.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 22 1925

Boston Symphony to Introduce Glazounov's Latest Composition Here Tuesday

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is hardly customary for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to perform at a concert out of Boston a composition unknown there, yet when the orchestra, in its concert at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening plays the Eighth Symphony of Glazounov, it will introduce to Providence a work that the Boston public as yet has not heard, albeit a work with which that public will speedily make acquaintance. For this Symphony stands also upon the all-Russian programme for the concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday.

But here is no Russian music that need cause foreboding in the minds of those perturbed by reports of Stravinskian modernity. As composer Glazounov, now in his 60th year, embodied in his career the prevailing and, as some hold, the regrettable tendencies of Russian music during the last quarter of a century before the appearance of those present-day "modernists," Stravinsky and Prokofiev. Beginning as a disciple of the group of so-called Nationalists, a pupil in fact of the most accomplished of that coterie, the brilliant and gifted Rimsky-Korsakov, Glazunov has gradually freed himself from specifically Russian influences and has become a zealous upholder of the doctrines of Brahms; in short, a writer of absolute music that is far more Teutonic than Slavic in character.

In this Eighth and, to date, last of his symphonies, Glazunov has at length definitely freed himself, not only of all Russianisms, but also of all romantic and programmatic tendencies. Here is music existing for itself alone, germinating from a few motives in the approved neo-classical fashion, devoid of all racial coloring, true "absolute" music.

The broadly flowing first movement that gathers impulse and energy as it proceeds, might easily have been written by any German composer—granting the requisite skill in constructon—who, imbued with the ideals of Brahms, had then mastered the orchestral technique of Richard Strauss.

In the sombre second movement we find perhaps the nearest approach to Russian mood and feeling, but the harmonic and orchestral idioms here employed are those that are to-day the common heritage of the composers of every nation.

By evidence of the printed page (by no means always a trustworthy guide) the ensuing Scherzo is the most original, most ingenious, and likewise the freshest and most spontaneous movement of the four. Here Glazounov discloses himself as a brilliant and facile manipulator of orchestral resources—a mastery again displayed, though in somewhat different guise, in the Finale, which returns to the expansive utterance of the first movement.

In his fascinating memoirs Rimsky-Korsakov has much to say of Glazunov, whom he greatly admired both as man and as musician. He pays eloquent tribute to the younger composer's technical mastery as it was evinced in early youth and he notes appreciatively Glazunov's extraordinary musical memory. Merely from having heard it played over by the composer, Glazunov was able to write down from memory the Overture to Bordin's "Prince Igor" and certain other portions of the opera, when he and Rimsky took it upon themselves to complete the work that their fellow-composer left unfinished at his death.

Not only Glazunov's Symphony will be played for the first time in Providence at this concert; the numbers which precede and follow it upon the programme, Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Lioudmilla" and the Concerto in A minor of Vivaldi, in which Paul Kochanski will be the solo violinist, are likewise of novel interest. Indeed, on the programme only the final piece, Liszt's romantic and resounding tone-poem "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," last played here by the Boston Orchestra in 1921 under Mr. Monteux, brings the touch of familiarity.

It is difficult for 20th century Americans to realize the reverence in which 19th century Russians held the true founder and father of their national school of music, Michael Ivanovich Glinka (1803-1857). Thus Rimsky-Korsakov writes of one of his early teachers: "Kanille opened my eyes to many things. With what rapture I learned from him that 'Russlan and Lioudmilla' really was the best opera in the world, that Clinka was a supreme genius. Until then I had felt it intuitively—now I heard it from a real musician."

But if we of the present can place Glinka upon no such pedestal, we can at least appreciate the charm and brilliance of his talent as exemplified in this Overture, and for that matter in certain other of his pieces known on this side of the world. And as the fountainhead of one of the richest, most fertile and most significant of modern schools of composition, his importance in music history is not easily overestimated.

As for Vivaldi's Concerto, the music of this great Italian contemporary of Bach stands hardly in need of elucidation or analysis, while Paul Kochanski, one of the ablest of contemporary violinists, may be trusted to bring it to fully revealing performance. Final word, then, should be bestowed upon the concluding piece of the evening, and no better guide can be found to "Tasso," one of the best-liked of Liszt's 12 symphonic poems, than the composer's own statement of his intentions:

"I wished to define the contrast expressed in the title of the work, and it was my object to describe the grand antithesis of the genius, illused and misunderstood in life, but in death surrounded with a halo of glory whose rays were to penetrate the hearts of his persecutors. Tassos loved and suffered in Ferrara, was avenged in Rome, and lives to this day in the popular songs of Venice. The three viewpoints are inseparably connected with his career. To render them musically I invoke his mighty shade as he wanders by the lagoons of Venice proud and sad in countenance, or watching the feasts at Ferrara, where his master works were created. I followed him to Rome, the Eternal City, which bestowed upon him the crown of glory, and in him canonized the martyr and poet."

Globe
Feb 22

SYMPHONY ORGAN GOES ON STRIKE

Refuses to Stop When Rest of Players Are Done

A prolonged finale at the end of the second movement of Copeland's symphony, played last night at Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, furnished a feature never intended by the composer and introduced the large audience to a new angle of the modernistic.

UNEXPECTED FINALE

With its many strange harmonies, its unexpected intervals and its terrific outbursts of cacophony, evidenced in the first and second movements, it had already deeply impressed the gathering which was hearing it for the first time in this city. It was arranged for organ and orchestra

On the heels of what seemed the end of the movement came a strange dissonance with a high-pitched tone from the organ, at which Mademoiselle Nadia Boulanger, to whom the work was dedicated by Copland, was soloist. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, turned in his most dignified manner toward the right of the soloist, with a slight hint for cessation.

The high-pitched tone, never intended by Copeland, continued. Again Koussevitzky turned and hinted to the organist, but still the tone continued.

Director Richard Burgin stepped from his seat at Koussevitzky's left. There was a brief conference at the conductor's stand, there were a few gestures toward the organ, but still the tone went on.

Soloist Leaves Stage

Mademoiselle Boulanger took a hand and herself hinted and gestured toward Koussevitzky. She was plainly disturbed, finally leaving her post and going off the stage.

While director and conductor tried to maintain the highest attitude of dignity, the audience began to appreciate the situation. There was a soft but noticeable chatter, which ceased with expectancy when Mademoiselle Boulanger reappeared.

Stepping to the organ she touched the proper key and the finale became a finale. in reality. The disonnance ceased.

It was one of those cases where the organ took matters into its own hands and refused to respond to the human touch. It balked.

Audience Applauds

Concealing his sigh of relief, Koussevitzky, all the time retaining his dignity, turned to his audience and with a graceful bow of reassurance, signalled the company for the third and final movement. There was a burst of applause and the incident was at an end.

Referring to their programmes, many of the audience found a significant reference to the symphony, which may have explained the attitude of the organ.

In his personal note, added by Copland to the programme of the symphony when it was originally produced, was the following: "The organ is treated as an integral part of the orchestra, rather than as a solo instrument with orchestral accompaniment; yet it always remains very much in the foreground."

On one or two occasions in the past the organ has acted strangely, but not to a degree of furnishing such a feature as on last night.

UTICA, N. Y.
Observer-Dispatch
FEB 24 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Head Has Strong Personality

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Avon Theater Tuesday evening, March 10, will bring here a world-famous organization of musicians under the leadership of Serge Kousservitzky. Of him Penfield Roberts wrote recently in the Boston Globe:

"Serge Koussevitzky will make the Boston Symphony Orchestra once more first in the world, if the deep impression he made on his first Boston audience yesterday afternoon is any test. He is one of the very rare people to whom it is natural and inevitable to take and keep the center of the stage. No ordinary man, is one's first impression. He has to an extraordinary degree, that intangible combination of qualities which one must call 'personality.'"

Herald
Feb 26

The Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening sho not disturb the traditional composure the audiences. Mr. Koussevitzky h prepared a Russian program: Glinka, overture to "Russlan and Lioudmilla"; Glazounov, Symphony No. 8 (first time in Boston); three pieces by Liadov; Kikimora; the Enchanted Lake, and Baba-Yaga; Tchaikovsky, "Romeo and Juliet." No Stravinsky, no Copland, no snorting locomotive engine set to music by our friend Honegger. We hear the ultra-conservative singing fortissimo: "O Let Us Be Joyful." Nevertheless, dearly beloved brethren, "The music world do move."

48

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT

FEB 22 1925

Matters of Moment in Music

By ERNEST NEWMAN

Guest Critic New York Evening Post

I have been asked to give my impressions of American orchestras, but I do so only with the greatest diffidence. On the subject of "American orchestras" in general, indeed, I am in no way qualified to speak, for during my stay here I have only been out of New York once, and that to hear an orchestra—the Philadelphia—that I had already heard here. I should have liked to hear the Chicago, the Detroit, the St. Louis, and the Cleveland orchestras but it has proved impossible. I have very scanty data to go upon even as regards the New York orchestras and the only two visiting organizations I have heard—the Philadelphia and the Boston Symphony. I know how easy it is for a stranger to miss the true focus of home affairs in [illegible]ers musical; therefore I can only pu[illegible]rward what follows as first and per[illegible] superficial impressions.

One of the difficulties o[illegible]ng about orchestras is that, strictly [illegible]g, there is no such thing as an o[illegible]a; or if there is, the listener does not [illegible]me into direct contact with it. He only [illegible]ears performances; and the quality of these depends as much on the conductor as on the personnel. In a broad way, of course, we can say that the material of one orchestra is very good, and that of another very poor; but as regards orchestras of about the same quality as regards material, it is difficult to separate the orchestra and the conductor. A first-rate orchestra can play poorly under a poor conductor, and a second-rate orchestra will sometimes play miles above itself under a man of genius.

I should have liked, then, had it been possible, to hear each orchestra under two or three conductors, for that would have afforded me a better basis for comparison with our London orchestras. There the only orchestra that corresponds to any of the American orchestras in that it always plays under the same conductor, is the Queen's Hall Orchestra, which is conducted by Sir Henry Wood. It is a good orchestra, but I should not call it first-class. Our other orchestras are made up, to some extent, of the same players,—that is to say, the London Symphony Orchestra, for instance, provides many of the men for the London Philharmonic. The general rule in London, apart from the Queen's Hall Orchestra, is to engage several visiting conductors each season. This difference between the English and the American methods of necessity leads to rather different results in performance.

A New York musical friend told me one evening that I would not hear the Philhormanic at its best, as Mengelberg would arrive to take charge only three weeks or so before I left and the orchestra would take rather longer than that to settle down again into his ways and become thoroughly responsive to him. That remark of itself was sufficient to indicate the difference between the American and the English methods. In London, if Mengelberg were engaged to conduct one of the L. S. O. concerts, he would probably get, at the most, a couple of rehearsals, so that he would have to establish a connection with the men, get to understand them and get them to understand him, and be judged by the audience on the night of the concert, on the strength of some six hours' acquaintance with his instrument. Under circumstances such as these, nothing like the precision of the American orchestras is possible, working, as they do, for months or years together under the same conductor. It is this superb precision, the sense of a magnificent, smoothly running machine, that first impresses the visitor from London. In these respects I have never heard anywhere an orchestra that was superior to the Philadelphia; the cleanness of its ensemble playing is always a delight. If the Philharmonic, fine as its work has often been, rarely gave me quite the same thrill, that may be because the men, as I gather, were not working under the ideal American conditions. This perfection of teamwork can come only from constantly playing under the same conductor. It is not everything, of course, in itself, but it is a great deal.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE THREE

That the American orchestras are not so adaptable as the English seems to me to be fairly evident from my short experience of them. In working for that precision and unanimity that is so admirable, I fancy they lose a little in individual initiative. The American players do not seem to me to have the spirit of adventure in them that ours have. Our men are gamblers, and they develop a gambler's virtues and defects. They will take terrifying risks with new and complicated and insufficiently rehearsed works, and frequently the results are disastrous. But being compelled to take such risks, never knowing what they may be called upon to do next, and feeling that, whatever it is, they have to be prepared for it, develops in them an unusual sharpness of apprehension and an unusual quickness of response to a strange conductor—if, of course, he happens to be a man of genius.

Vladimir Golschmann is hardly that, so pehhaps the test was not a fair one; but I cannot imagine the London Symphony Orchestra playing under him for the first time as poorly as the New York Symphony Orchestra did. The latter was obviously as ill at ease under the new conductor as a horse would be under a new rider after being accustomed mainly to the same one for years. Our London players, then, seem to me more quickly adaptable than the American. The London Symphony Orchestra (a co-operative organization, by the way, the players governing and financing themselves and engaging their own conductor) has been in existence now about twenty years. During that time they have played under a large number of the best conductors, no two of them alike in their technique or in their conception of the standard works. Can it be wondered at that under these conditions the players have developed an adaptability that often enables them to do surprisingly well in face of the most paralyzing difficulties?

It is perhaps this sense of adventure that sometimes gives their playing a nervous intensity that I have not often met with in New York. I have just been reading Jim Corbett's reminiscences, and I find that he shook his head before going into one of his later fights and said to his trainer, "I don't like this: I feel too good." The trainer could not quite see his point of view, but Corbett was right; his confidence had one of its roots at least in a subconscious indifference; and an artist does not get the best results out of himself when there is no some touch at least of preliminary—I will not say nervousness, but nerve; if that is absent, it is a sign that the machine is not keyed up to its highest potentiality. In all the finest playing that I have heard in New York, the impression has been one not of nervous adventure but of steady confidence,—a feeling that the magnificent machine could not possibly go wrong.

This precision has been a welcome experience for me, for since 1914 the standard of orchestral performance in England has been gradually declining. This has been due to many causes, but the chief of them, as can be imagined, are economic. Hardly one of our leading orchestras can look forward with perfect confidence any season to even another year of life. The American orchestras are lucky in their endowments and their security of tenure. The best that I have heard is undoubtedly the Philadelphia; but the Philharmonic runs it close. The Boston is evidently in a transition stage. With its American tradition of long-term conductors it is bound to take a little time to give itself up entirely to a new spirit; but if it is fortunate enough to retain Koussevitzky for another year or two, and will make a few obviously necessary changes in its personnel, it will become a marvellous instrument. It is already a remarkable one. The New York Symphony Orchestra I heard only two or three times; it has apparently become so part and parcel of Mr. Damrosch that it is difficult for an outsider to estimate it purely and simply as an orchestra. The State Symphony Orchestra, again, I heard only under Mr. Stransky, and, for one concert under Mr. Waghalter.

In another article I propose to offer some reflections on conductrs, programs, and other features of New York musical life in the last five months.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

FEB 25 1925

Symphony Concert At Infantry Hall

Serge Koussevitsky Greeted With Outburst of Applause Last Evening

The entrance on the stage of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening, was greeted with an outburst of applause from the large audience which nearly filled Infantry Hall, to hear the fourth concert of this year's series. It was evident that so popular is this well known group of musicians with local music lovers, and so appreciative of the best are those same music lovers, that Providence has a right to the term "a musical city." It is surely a tribute to any city, when so large a gathering of people will attend and enthuse over so excellent and high class a program as that which the Boston Symphony Orchestra presents. And the enthusiasm of the audience last evening was one of the most impressive things about the evening. They fairly overflowed with appreciation for the conductor, the program and the soloist.

Glinka's Overture to "Russian and Ledmiller" was the opening selection, varied and melodic, with the first violin's predominating at times, and with most wonderful long sustained tones. The opera of which it is a part was taken from Russian folk lore. The overture has been dedicated to H. Berlioz by the sister of the composer.

Then followed the wonderful "Symphony No. 8" in E flat, Op. 83, by Glazounov. It was played in four movements; Allegro with its planissimo ending, very delicately and artistically done, and calling forth another outburst of that applause that seemed on tap at the second's notice throughout the evening. The second movement was "Mesto" with great cresendos, the third "Allegro" and the finale, "Moderato," with great round notes and ending in a thunderous crashing.

After a ten-minute intermission, the program was resumed and Vivaldi's "Concerto" for violin and orchestra in A minor, was played in three movement and the solos were played by Mr. Paul Kochanski. This version is by the violinist, Tivadar Nachez. The concerto was first written by Vivaldi, who was a virtuoso, and has many times been accused of writing for mere display, and ting novel effects only for the ap- use which they might bring him. His mposition on last evening's program rtainly won applause, and if the accusation against him is true, and he might have "listened in" last evening, he would have been very much satisfied.

The solist played with ease and brilliancy, and especially in the large movements was his long drawn bow sure and steady and delightful to hear. He was encored many times.

The program concluded with a "Symphonic Poem" "Tasso; Lamento e Trionio" by Liszt. It was written for a celebration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Goethe, when the composer conducted the work from manuscript. The motif is plaintive, and mournful, but gradually it growns brighter, and one hears the songs of the bondoliers from afar. It is a tone picture of hopeless sorrow, according to the written opinion of great masters of music. It is based on two themes: the first has much wailing diminuendo, great swells, and wild expressions of woe and rage, and the second, a great triumph, growing faster and faster with blare of trumpets and a great festival tumult, which includes the whole orchestra at the end. A splendid ending to a splendid concert.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 22 1925

Boston Symphony to Introduce Glazounov's Latest Composition Here Tuesday

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is hardly customary for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to perform at a concert out of Boston a composition unknown there, yet when the orchestra, in its concert at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening plays the Eighth Symphony of Glazounov, it will introduce to Providence a work that the Boston public as yet has not heard, albeit a work with which that public will speedily make acquaintance. For this Symphony stands also upon the all-Russian programme for the concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday.

But here is no Russian music that need cause foreboding in the minds of those perturbed by reports of Stravinskian modernity. As composer Glazounov, now in his 60th year, embodied in his career the prevailing and, as some hold, the regrettable tendencies of Russian music during the last quarter of a century before the appearance of those present-day "modernists," Stravinsky and Prokofiev. Beginning as a disciple of the group of so-called Nationalists, a pupil in fact of the most accomplished of that coterie, the brilliant and gifted Rimsky-Korsakov, Glazunov has gradually freed himself from specifically Russian influences and has become a zealous upholder of the doctrines of Brahms; in short, a writer of absolute music that is far more Teutonic than Slavic in character.

In this Eighth and, to date, last of his symphonies, Glazunov has at length definitely freed himself, not only of all Russianisms, but also of all romantic and programmatic tendencies. Here is music existing for itself alone, germinating from a few motives in the approved neo-classical fashion, devoid of all racial coloring, true "absolute" music.

The broadly flowing first movement that gathers impulse and energy as it proceeds, might easily have been written by any German composer—granting the requisite skill in constructon—who, imbued with the ideals of Brahms, had then mastered the orchestral technique of Richard Strauss.

In the sombre second movement we find perhaps the nearest approach to Russian mood and feeling, but the harmonic and orchestral idioms here employed are those that are to-day the common heritage of the composers of every nation.

By evidence of the printed page (by no means always a trustworthy guide) the ensuing Scherzo is the most original, most ingenious, and likewise the freshest and most spontaneous movement of the four. Here Glazunov discloses himself as a brilliant and facile manipulator of orchestral resources—a mastery again displayed, though in somewhat different guise, in the Finale, which returns to the expansive utterance of the first movement.

In his fascinating memoirs Rimsky-Korsakov has much to say of Glazunov, whom he greatly admired both as man and as musician. He pays eloquent tribute to the younger composer's technical mastery as it was evinced in early youth and he notes appreciatively Glazunov's extraordinary musical memory. Merely from having heard it played over by the composer, Glazunov was able to write down from memory the Overture to Bordin's "Prince Igor" and certain other portions of the opera, when he and Rimsky took it upon themselves to complete the work that their fellow-composer left unfinished at his death.

Not only Glazunov's Symphony will be played for the first time in Providence at this concert; the numbers which precede and follow it upon the programme, Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Lioudmilla" and the Concerto in A minor of Vivaldi, in which Paul Kochanski will be the solo violinist, are likewise of novel interest. Indeed, on the programme only the final piece, Liszt's romantic and resounding tone-poem "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," last played here by the Boston Orchestra in 1921 under Mr. Monteux, brings the touch of familiarity.

It is difficult for 20th century Americans to realize the reverence in which 19th century Russians held the true founder and father of their national school of music, Michael Ivanovich Glinka (1803-1857). Thus Rimsky-Korsakov writes of one of his early teachers: "Kanille opened my eyes to many things. With what rapture I learned from him that 'Russlan and Lioudmilla' really was the best opera in the world, that Glinka was a supreme genius. Until then I had felt it intuitively—now I heard it from a real musician."

But if we of the present can place Glinka upon no such pedestal, we can at least appreciate the charm and brilliance of his talent as exemplified in this Overture, and for that matter in certain other of his pieces known on this side of the world. And as the fountainhead of one of the richest, most fertile and most significant of modern schools of composition, his importance in music history is not easily overestimated.

As for Vivaldi's Concerto, the music of this great Italian contemporary of Bach stands hardly in need of elucidation or analysis, while Paul Kochanski, one of the ablest of contemporary violinists, may be trusted to bring it to fully revealing performance. Final word, then, should be bestowed upon the concluding piece of the evening, and no better guide can be found to "Tasso," one of the best-liked of Liszt's 12 symphonic poems, than the composer's own statement of his intentions:

"I wished to define the contrast expressed in the title of the work, and it was my object to describe the grand antithesis of the genius, illused and misunderstood in life, but in death surrounded with a halo of glory whose rays were to penetrate the hearts of his persecutors. Tassos loved and suffered in Ferrara, was avenged in Rome, and lives to this day in the popular songs of Venice. The three viewpoints are inseparably connected with his career. To render them musically I invoke his mighty shade as he wanders by the lagoons of Venice, proud and sad in countenance, or watching the feasts at Ferrara, where his master works were created. I followed him to Rome, the Eternal City, which bestowed upon him the crown of glory, and in him canonized the martyr and poet."

Feb 22

SYMPHONY ORGAN GOES ON STRIKE

Refuses to Stop When Rest of Players Are Done

A prolonged finale at the end of the second movement of Copeland's symphony, played last night at Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, furnished a feature never intended by the composer and introduced the large audience to a new angle of the modernistic.

UNEXPECTED FINALE

With its many strange harmonies, its unexpected intervals and its terrific outbursts of cacophony, evidenced in the first and second movements, it had already deeply impressed the gathering which was hearing it for the first time in this city. It was arranged for organ and orchestra

On the heels of what seemed the end of the movement came a strange dissonance with a high-pitched tone from the organ, at which Mademoiselle Nadia Boulanger, to whom the work was dedicated by Copland, was soloist.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, turned in his most dignified manner toward the right of the soloist, with a slight hint for cessation.

The high-pitched tone, never intended by Copeland, continued. Again Koussevitzky turned and hinted to the organist, but still the tone continued.

Director Richard Burgir stepped from his seat at Koussevitzky's left. There was a brief conference at the conductor's stand, there were a few gestures toward the organ, but still the tone went on.

Soloist Leaves Stage

Mademoiselle Boulanger took a hand and herself hinted and gestured toward Koussevitzky. She was plainly disturbed, finally leaving her post and going off the stage.

While director and conductor tried to maintain the highest attitude of dignity, the audience began to appreciate the situation. There was a soft but noticeable chatter, which ceased with expectancy when Mademoiselle Boulanger reappeared.

Stepping to the organ she touched the proper key and the finale became a finale, in reality. The disonnance ceased.

It was one of those cases where the organ took matters into its own hands and refused to respond to the human touch. It balked.

Audience Applauds

Concealing his sigh of relief, Koussevitzky, all the time retaining his dignity, turned to his audience and with a graceful bow of reassurance, signalled the company for the third and final movement. There was a burst of applause and the incident was at an end.

Referring to their programmes, many of the audience found a significant reference to the symphony, which may have explained the attitude of the organ.

In his personal note, added by Copland to the programme of the symphony when it was originally produced, was the following: "The organ is treated as an integral part of the orchestra, rather than as a solo instrument with orchestral accompaniment; yet it always remains very much in the foreground."

On one or two occasions in the past the organ has acted strangely, but not to a degree of furnishing such a feature as on last night.

UTICA, N. Y.
Observer-Dispatch

FEB 2 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Head Has Strong Personality

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Avon Theater Tuesday evening, March 10, will bring here a world-famous organization of musicians under the leadership of Serge Kousservitzky. Of him Penfield Roberts wrote recently in the Boston Globe:

"Serge Koussevitzky will make the Boston Symphony Orchestra once more first in the world, if the deep impression he made on his first Boston audience yesterday afternoon is any test. He is one of the very rare people to whom it is natural and inevitable to take and keep the center of the stage. No ordinary man, is one's first impression. He has to an extraordinary degree, that intangible combination of qualities which one must call 'personality.'"

The Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening sho[illegible] not disturb the traditional composure the audiences. Mr. Koussevitzky h[illegible] prepared a Russian program: Glinka, overture to "Russlan and Lioudmilla"; Glazounov, Symphony No. 8 (first time in Boston); three pieces by Liadov; Kikimora; the Enchanted Lake, and Baba-Yaga; Tchaikovsky, "Romeo and Juliet." No Stravinsky, no Copland, no snorting locomotive engine set to music by our friend Honegger. We hear the ultra-conservative singing fortissimo: "O Let Us Be Joyful." Nevertheless, dearly beloved brethren, "The music world do move."

49

nd Lioud-minor of ski will be of novel programme mantic and : Lament
re by the
Mr. Mon-
iliarity.
ury Ameri-
in which the true eir national novich Glinsky-Korsakov
achers: "Ka-
many things.
ed from him
a' really was
, that Clinka til then I had eard it from n place Glin-

we can at and brilliance in this Over-certain other s side of the nhead of one and most sig-
composition, story is not

, the music
rary of Bac elucidation o nski, one of violinists, may fully revealing
d, then, should ncluding piece o
ter guide can b
of the best-lik poems, than the ent of his inten-

the contrast ex-
the work, and it
e the grand anti-used and misun-
death surrounded ose rays were t his persecutors in Ferrara, wa lives to this da of Venice. The inseparably con
To render them mighty shadow
lagoons of Venice
enance, or watch-
, where his mas-
. I followed him
City, which b own of glory, and martyr and the

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 25 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzsky, conductor, last evening drew its usual large audience at Infantry Hall. It was a concert made notable by the first presentation by the Boston orchestra of Glazounov's Symphony No. 8. The evening's interest centred in the playing of this new work and in the appearance for the first time here of the violinist, Paul Kochanski.

The programme was played as follows:

Glinka..Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"
Glazounov..Symphony No. 8 in E-flat, Op. 83
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Mesto.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale: Moderato.
Vivaldi....Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A minor
a. Allegro.
b. Largo.
c. Presto.
Liszt..........."Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo," Symphonic Poem No. 2

Alexander Constantinovitsch Glazounov was born in Leningrad in 1865. He is now living in that city where in 1906 he composed the Symphony No. 8, in E-flat Major. The symphony was first played in this country by the Russian Symphony Society, Modeste Altschuler, conductor, in New York, in 1907. Although not a composition of recent date its performance last evening under Serge Koussevitzsky was its first by the Boston orchestra.

The advent of Mr. Koussevitzsky proved an upward step in the life of the Boston Symphony. It also means we shall enjoy more intimate acquaintance with the store of Russian orchestral works. This is a very pleasant outlook for patrons of these concerts. The modern Russians write music that fire one's imagination. There is bigness, richness, in their creations. Melody seems a natural gift to these artistic Slavic minds. Under a conductor fitted by racial relationship and so artistically gifted as Koussevitzsky, Russian music finds an ideal interpreter. So, last evening, the audience with high anticipation awaited the playing of the Glazounov symphony.

It is said that in this work the composer was influenced by Brahms. This perhaps is true in certain characteristics of style. But it is thoroughly Russian in its musical language, its passionate utterance of thoughts that pour forth with unceasing flow. It is restless, at times reckless in powerful expression. Agreeable dissonance pursues its course through the maze of intricate harmony.

The opening movement, Allegro Moderato, moves with intense, vigorous expression, alternating in storms of orchestral violence and the calmness which succeeds titanic force. It is music that thrills through its kaleidoscopic color, its seething, restless spirit; music that tells of strife, of struggle to attain some splendid goal. Nearly attaining this it reaches climaxes of power and brilliance which gradually decline as if to gather strength for greater effort. The movements closes in one of these periods of calmness.

The second movement again reveals the masterful instrumentation which gives life and vitality to the score. Here Mr. Koussevitzsky moulds his men into a responsive unit that answers with seemingly intuitive sense his interpretive will. Bits of melody occasionally shine forth and these, in many voiced combination, are developed in a glittering mass of harmony. This movement, also ends in soft effects.

The brighter of the four movements is heard in the following Allegro, but this gaiety is lost in reappearing agitation of style. A forceful climax brings it to a close.

The finale retains all the power and spirit of the preceding movements, and leaves the hearer with the thought that in this fine imaginative work the composer has left a worthy monument to his genius.

Mr. Kochansky received many recalls after his well played concerto. The Vivaldi composition is written in the fashion of the melodic writers for the violin of the early days, when tone and simplicity were in vogue. Technically, the concerto is not difficult. Its effect lies in the player's ability to sing upon his instrument rather than astonish with intricate double stopping and brilliant tours de force.

Mr. Kochansky showed himself to be well adapted to this style of playing, giving the first movement with breadth and strong, effective use of the bow. The Largo, played with grace and the sweetness required, was an artistic effort and in the lively and sparkling presto he performed brilliantly. A half-dozen recalls showed the audience's appreciation.

The Liszt Symphonic Poem is long and not particularly interesting save in the latter part. Here a big climax is built up, which serves as a triumphal and effective close.

A. F. P.

Transcript
Feb 28

UPON the French and the Russian programs lately devised by Mr. Koussevitzky now follows a sequence of German pieces, to be heard at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. In order they are: An Intermezzo by Mahler written into his adaptation of Weber's comic opera, "The Three Pintos," Brahms's Third Symphony, in F major; the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's Fantasy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; the Introduction to the third act of Wagner's opera, "Die Meistersinger"; the Dance of Salome from Strauss's like-named music-drama.

Transcript
Feb 27

KOCHANSKI PLAYS RAVEL'S "TZIGANE," PARODY OR STUNT?

UNEXPECTED VIOLINIST: NOVEL PIECE

Notable Symphony Concert in Cambridge—The Parisian's Newest Music—Ancient Concerto in Beauty Regained—Mr. Koussevitzky Meets Liszt Half Way—"Tasso" Transfigured

UNEXPECTED compensation awaited, last evening, the public of the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge. In two out of six concerts through the current season, it has missed the pleasure of Mr. Koussevitzky—once when illness disabled him; once when in his stead Mr. Henry Hadley was singularly chosen "guest." For these trials upon forbearance and patience, it now received the reward of Mr. Paul Kochanski as assisting violinist. Within memory, he appeared with the orchestra at Symphony Hall to the interest and admiration of all within earshot. For the while, however, a circumspect management bestows him on Providence and Cambridge only. In the larger city he played, last Tuesday, a Concerto in A minor of Vivaldi; at Sanders Theater, he joined to it "Tzigane," Monsieur Ravel's new Rhapsody for Violin and Orchestra, hitherto unheard in these parts. As its custom is with soloists, the audience heaped Mr. Kochanski with applause. Whether it was as much stirred by Monsieur Ravel à l'Hongroise is another and a superfluous inquiry.

"Tzigane" is a short piece, compressed to ten minutes of performance. In it, moreover, the orchestra bears a minor part, entering belatedly, setting in a pizzicato background for the solo-voice, occasionally assimilated to it, oftener merely affording "tutti" after the manner of an ancient concerto. The violin begins with a lengthy cadenza, whipping from feat to feat, stinging with sonority upon sonority. Practised fiddlers say that some of these feats are inventions or elaborations by Monsieur Ravel, beyond his predecessors in such music. Certainly this or that sonority falls strangely and piquantly upon ears that Paganini, Wieniawski and Sarasate have long tempted in vain. Incidentally, the cadenza also discloses a workable motiv, upon which the violin now proceeds to execute rhapsodic variations and decorations. To and fro, like a juggler's ball, goes the motiv; while around it the violinist, as juggler, fills the air with more feats, sonorities and arabesques. Before long, as well may, Monsieur Ravel's inventio pants; the Rhapsody ends in summar fashion: the composer gains no second wind

Is there more in "Tzigane" than thes obvious externals imply? Some say ther is—to wit, a parody in Monsieur Ravel' keen fashion upon ecstatic show-piece à l' Hongroise in the usual commerce o the concert-hall; upon the habitual exercises of Tzigane orchestras—and the leaders thereof—whatever room may contai them. In this view, the "long and passionate preluding" is nothing less than the gypsy-fiddler goading himself to the expected ecstasy. At last he attains it and spurs into the serenade, say, that shall evoke his mistress. His excitement, however, is now so high-pitched and feverish that it becomes a veritable frenzy of fiddling. Like a kitten in pursuit of its tail he circles variations, feats, sonorities never catches his love-song; finally expires in a rhapsody of exhaustion. Writing such a parody, Monsieur Ravel has bettered the best models, putting to music paper stunts and sounds beyond the most hectic and the most recondite Tzigane imagination. As the signs went last evening at Cambridge, Mr. Kochanski hardly regards the piece as such travesty in tones. Rather, he played it as both cool-headed and hot-blooded quest for a freshened, even a novel, virtuosity—the rarefied sonorities, the up-springing or the tortuous feat. Had he construed "Tzigane" as parody, he would surely have played it with more of the surface-flourishes of Czech or Magyar rhapsody.

In fact, Mr. Kochanski's quality as musician and violinist stood far clearer in the eighteenth-century Concerto of Vivaldi. Again the orchestra set in the merest accompaniment—background to a tone in which the shimmering brightness, the pungent sweetness, the gentle and undulating voice of the violin, were as one. Rare indeed was this union of a unique instrument with the hand and the ear in play upon it; while in such mating the composer both shared and profited. Ancient fashion, he left much to the violinist—and two hundred years after, the violinist failed him no.

The pattern of Vivaldi's first movement is not remarkable in itself. The Italians of those times set down these Allegros as a journalist now writes his daily article. Yet Mr. Kochanski's tone transformed it into a golden web magical to follow; while each arabesque became, under his hand, as new wreath of fancy. In the succeeding slow division, he held grace of unfolding line, sensuous loveliness of tone, and twilight sentiment in triple and even leash. There was no other sensation than the beauty of sound in pattern arrayed, by mood paced and shaded, from an instrument and him that played it receiving the pulse and glow of life. And old and mellow and infinitely fastidious was this beauty. . . . A hushed audience heard; while through a Presto that did but finish the Concerto neatly, the spell persisted. Within it lay Mr. Kochanski hidden like the god of the Pantheists, yet ever present and always felt.

The other merit and interest and exhilaration of the concert was Mr. Koussevitzky's version of Liszt's "Tasso," first made known a week ago at Symphony Hall. It is music after the conductor's own mind and heart; music in which above all other he excels. The composer bids him summon a distinctive image; lead it through transforming circumstance; intensify and cumulate each impression. Out of the orchestra, wailing, tossing, clamant, rises the Venetian poet sorrow-laden. The music releases and upbuilds him into a figure of passion power and pride. A court fêtes him; a people acclaims him. What may not a Koussevitzky do, what did not a Koussevitkzy do with such a piece—and all within the just limits of a romantic tone-poem, as music and as poetry to the end sustained.

The preluding struck deep the note of romantic gloom. The melody of the heart-sick poet soon haunted it. The free and fervid Tasso strode the orchestra into the imagination of the audience. Silken and lustrous was the music of the court; through it veritably moved the melody of the poet, yet not quite unsaddened. For once even the pageantry of the end was no vulgar show. In just sympathy and measure—mind, hand and ear—the conductor kept it stately. Throughout, the music rose from itself; took shape, substance, suggestion, joined as one the tonal progress and the tonal imaging. Here was no episodic, arbitrary, sterile Liszt; but a Liszt who also wrote music; no Liszt of romantic rodomontade; but a poet in tones, imaginatively evoking a presence, a passion and a setting. Under such a performance no stirred spirit need grope itself seventy-five years backward into another day and fashion with the expressive arts. Mr. Koussevitkzy believes in romantical music; renews its very voice and semblance. The shade of Liszt must have stretched out a hand from Paradise.

H. T. P.

RUSSIAN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Glinka, Glazunov, Liadov and Tchaikovsky Played

Globe Feb 28

Mr Koussevitzky arranged a Russian program for yesterday's Symphony concert, and next week there is to be a German program. We have already had a French program. Presumably the other music-making Nations, our own included, are to have their respective programs later in the series. The chosen Russians were Glinka, Glazunov, Liadov, and Tchaikovsky. Glazúnov's Eighth Symphony, composed in 1906, and played in New York in 1907, was the only number new to Boston.

Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture and fantasy, an early but highly characteristic specimen of that composer's alloyed talent, was given a superbly eloquent reading yesterday. The bombast and the false pathos of much of this music were almost transmuted by Koussevitzky into the surging passion and yearning tenderness of Shakspere's tragedy. Tchaikovsky had a real gift of melody, a notable mastery of the noise-making resources of the orchestra, and a strong but not subtle rhythmic sense. He wrote much genuinely admirable light music, unpretentiously pleasing. But in such pieces as this fantasy he strove to attain a dramatic force and a dignity of style beyond his reach.

Glinka's overture to his fairy opera "Russlan and Ludmilla" first performed in 1842, proved that the admiration professed by later Russians for the first notable Russian composer was in many ways deserved. The piece is spirited, gay, yet with a hint of wonder and of the primitive. Glinka's opera deals like Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" with Pagan Russia. It is not wholly fanciful to detect a faint likeness in mood between music which uses the idiom of the 1830's and music of the 20th century like "La Sacre." Glinka's music has one advantage over Stravinsky's. Its eloquence is never forced, never self conscious, always spontaneous.

Glazunov's music has been heard here at intervals for many years. None of it has seemed to be first rate, to be the authentic and spontaneous utterance of an original creative artist. This Eighth Symphony is correctly enough worked out after the approved formulae taught in courses on musical composition. No theme in it is obviously derived from other music. There are even passages with real power to move the listener. But the general impression left by the symphony was of labored dullness.

Glazunov is one of those writers whose style is profoundly but never permanently influenced by the masterpiece he has last been studying. He is not a plagiarist, not even unconsciously. Yet, to cite a striking instance, the last movement of this Eighth Symphony could not have been written if Wagner had not given the world the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The tone of Glazunov's music is the same as Wagner's. Its texture and its imaginative power by comparison insignificant.

Liadov's three pieces for orchestra, "Kikimora," "Baba Yaga" and "Enchanted Lake," played here under Monteux, again seemed more or less pretty trifles, lacking intensity of feeling and only ordinarily well written. One wondered why Koussevitzky put no music by Skriabin, Stravinsky, or Rimsky Korsakov on this program. Surely their work has higher qualities than that played.

Next week's program, as announced, will include an intermezzo from Weber's "Die Drei Pintos" arranged by Mahler; Brahms' Third Symphony, the scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" and the "Dance of the Seven Veils," from Richard Strauss "Salome."

Herald
Feb 28

GLAZOUNOV'S SYMPHONY NO. 8

First Playing Here of Russian's Composition of 1906

"ROMEO AND JULIET" DELIGHTFULLY GIVEN

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Glinka, Overture to "Russian and Lioudmilla"; Glazounov, Symphony No. 8, E flat; Liadov, "Kikomora," "The Enchanted Lake" and "Baba-Yaga"; Tchaikovsky, Overture Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet."

In his earlier years Glazounov dreamed of imaginative fantastical music. His suites and tone-poems told of carnivals, funerals, the gorgeous, voluptuous Orient; the forest with wood-sprites, water nymphs, will-of-the-wisps; the ocean, the Kremlin of Moscow with its holy and dramatic associations. He saw Stenika Rasin, the terror of the Volga, his captive Persian princess, who was sacrificed to the great river unlike any river in the world. The ballet tempted him and for a time he found in it the fullest and freest form of musical expression; not the ballet as it was known to us before the arrival of Diaghilev and his company; not the old ballet, too often stilted, dull, or the "labored intrepidity of indecorum," but the ballet of Russia when Petrograd-Leningrad rejoiced in the name of St. Petersburg.

Little by little, the Russian blood in his musical veins became thin and pale. There was a transfusion of German blood. He grew more and more academic, freeing himself from the influence of Schumann who for a time was dear to him and delivering himself into the bondage of Johannes Brahms. Legend and fairy tales, historical events and Nature's handiwork no longer inspired composition. He determined that music should be created not by outside suggestion, but as the German evolved a camel from his inner consciousness. And so an admirer wrote of him that gradually nearing "his promised land, wherein music is absolutely self-sufficing," he reached his destination with his eighth symphony.

This symphony was played in Boston yesterday for the first time. Written in 1906, it was performed in New York the next year, and it has been heard in Chicago. There can be no dispute over its solid structure, the scholarly workmanship, the technical skill displayed. The thematic development is more significant than the thematic material, except in the chorale-like beginning of the Finale.

There are examples of ingenious orchestration in the Scherzo. There is a more effective employment of contrasts than in the other movements. The second is not without a stately, one might say epic, grandeur in its melancholy mood. One finds, however, in the whole work few pages that make a strong emotional appeal; few pages of haunting beauty; few pages that take one outside the concert hall, outside of one's self. The prevailing impression while the music is playing is similar to that made by the tragedian's performance of Hamlet when Pip replied to his question, What did you think of it? Pip answered, prompted by his friend: It was massive and concrete.

Glinka's overture is pleasant music in a Berliozian manner somewhat Italianized, good music for putting an audience in a cheerful mood at the beginning of a concert. The three pieces by Liadov, ingeniously scored, were delightfully played, for Mr. Koussevitzky

---

[illegible] Feb 28

Russian Music at Symphony

There is an all-Russian program at the Symphony concerts this week, in accordance with Mr. Koussevitzky's new plan. Last week it was French. Next week it will be pan-German.

The only novelty played at yesterday's matinee concert was Glazounov's eighth symphony, which is not all inspired music, but which is none the less likely to prove a popular addition to the Symphony repertoire. Its melodies will commend it to those who are jarred by the new tuneless writings. The performance won an ovation for Koussevitzky and his men.

For music of true fairy-tale atmosphere it would be hard to match the three Liadov pieces on the program, two of them dealing with Russian witches, Kikimora and Baba-Yaga, and one with the story of an enchanted lake. They are delightful little tone pictures and they were marvelously well played.

The program, which will be repeated tonight, opens with Glinka's "Russlan and Lioudmilla" overture, which is of a light, sparkling operetta character, and closes with Tchaikovsky's dramatic overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." The last number was given a thrilling performance.

That was 55 years ago this month. No succeeding performance equalled it until that of yesterday. Some had been led to think in the mean time that Tchaikovsky's music had grossly deceived them years ago; or that in their green and salad days of concert-going they had lacked judgment. Mr. Koussevitzky surely convinced any doubting Thomas that the first opinion was well founded.

For Shakespeare's tragedy was eloquently sounded forth in music. Some have said, and with a certain authority, that the opening section pictures Friar Laurence's cell; others that it symbolizes "the burden of fate." It is enough to say that these measures strike the tragic note, the solemn warning of that which is to come, as the ending is the epitaph on the tomb of the lovers. In the pages depicting the strife of the two families, the feud that worked the woe, there was the furious encounter in the street, the clash of steel. And the great love theme, with the sobbing syncopation for the horns, as sung by this interpreter, was it not the very hymn of triumphant love? love, that is all the earth to lovers—love that mocks time and space,
Love, that is day and night—love, that is sun and moon and stars,
Love that is crimson, sumptuous, sick with perfume."

The program was Russian, yet Tchaikovsky, the musician, was reproached by the "Five" for being a cosmopolite. This being interpreted today means that in "Romeo and Juliet" he wrote for the musical world, not as a "Nationalist."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week will be as follows: Weber-Mahler, Intermezzo from "The Three Pintos"; Brahms, Symphony No. 3, F major; Mendelssohn, Scherzo from music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Wagner, Prelude to act III of "The Mastersingers"; Strauss, Salome's Dance.

---

tur of a title b said t
West war w a ho

LEWISTON, ME. JOURNAL
FEB 28 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY OR. RETURNS TO PORTLAND

Annual Concert Under Auspices Portland Music Commission, Mar. 25

It is good news to the musicians and musically inclined of Lewiston and Auburn that the Boston Symphony ochestra will give its annual concert this year as in the past, the date being March 25. Many of the instrumental students of these cities regard this as a great educational opportunity and each year special cars are required to take the body of young students to the concert.

The plan carried out by the Music Commission this year has been to have the best local talent to assist Mr. Cronham at his organ concerts and the fact that City Hall auditorium has been packed at every concert proves the success of the plan. The Boston Symphony concert is the only outside talent the Commission is bringing to Portland. This concert has become an institution and one that the people of Portland and environs would not willingly miss.

Serge Koussevitzky, the dynamic new conductor, will be heard in Maine for the first time altho glowing reports of his concerts have reached here. Seats for this performance will have to be secured many weeks in advance and may be obtained by writing directly to the Music Commission office, in Portland City Hall.

49 and Lioud-minor of ski will be of novel programme mantic and Lament

ere by the
Mr. Mon-illiarity.
ury Ameri-
in which the true eir national anovich Glin-
sky-Korsakov
achers: "Ka-
many things.
ed from him
a' really was
, that Clinka til then I had heard it from n place Glin-

we can at and brilliance in this Over-certain other is side of the inhead of one and most sig-
composition, story is not

, the music
rary of Bac elucidation o anski, one of violinists, may fully revealing
d, then, should ncluding piece o
ter guide can b
of the best-like poems, than the ent of ois inten-

the contrast ex-
the work, and it
e the grand anti-used and misun-
death surrounded ose rays were t his persecutors in Ferrara, wa lives to this da of Venice. These inseparably con
To render them mighty shadow
lagoons of Venice
enance, or watch-a, where his mas-
I followed him
City, which be-own of glory, and martyr and the

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 25 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzsky, conductor, last evening drew its usual large audience at Infantry Hall. It was a concert made notable by the first presentation by the Boston orchestra of Glazounov's Symphony No. 8. The evening's interest centred in the playing of this new work and in the appearance for the first time here of the violinist, Paul Kochanski.

The programme was played as follows:

Glinka..Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla"
Glazounov..Symphony No. 8 in E-flat, Op. 83
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Mesto.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale: Moderato.
Vivaldi....Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A minor
a. Allegro.
b. Largo.
c. Presto.
Liszt.........."Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo," Symphonic Poem No. 2

Alexander Constantinovitsch Glazounov was born in Leningrad in 1865. He is now living in that city where in 1906 he composed the Symphony No. 8, in E-flat Major. The symphony was first played in this country by the Russian Symphony Society, Modeste Altschuler, conductor, in New York, in 1907. Although not a composition of recent date its performance last evening under Serge Koussevitzsky was its first by the Boston orchestra.

The advent of Mr. Koussevitzsky proved an upward step in the life of the Boston Symphony. It also means we shall enjoy more intimate acquaintance with the store of Russian orchestral works. This is a very pleasant outlook for patrons of these concerts. The modern Russians write music that fire one's imagination. There is bigness, richness, in their creations. Melody seems a natural gift to these artistic Slavic minds. Under a conductor fitted by racial relationship and so artistically gifted as Koussevitzsky, Russian music finds an ideal interpreter. So, last evening, the audience with high anticipation awaited the playing of the Glazounov symphony.

It is said that in this work the composer was influenced by Brahms. This perhaps is true in certain characteristics of style. But it is thoroughly Russian in its musical language, its passionate utterance of thoughts that pour forth with unceasing flow. It is restless, at times reckless in powerful expression. Agreeable dissonance pursues its course through the maze of intricate harmony.

The opening movement, Allegro Moderato, moves with intense, vigorous expression, alternating in storms of orchestral violence and the calmness which succeeds titanic force. It is music that thrills through its kaleidoscopic color, its seething, restless spirit; music that tells of strife, of struggle to attain some splendid goal. Nearly attaining this it reaches climaxes of power and brilliance which gradually decline as if to gather strength for greater effort. The movements closes in one of these periods of calmness.

The second movement again reveals the masterful instrumentation which gives life and vitality to the score. Here Mr. Koussevitzsky moulds his men into a responsive unit that answers with seemingly intuitive sense his interpretive will. Bits of melody occasionally shine forth and these, in many voiced combination, are developed in a glittering mass of harmony. This movement, also ends in soft effects.

The brighter of the four movements is heard in the following Allegro, but this gaiety is lost in reappearing agitation of style. A forceful climax brings it to a close.

The finale retains all the power and spirit of the preceding movements, and leaves the hearer with the thought that in this fine imaginative work the composer has left a worthy monument to his genius.

Mr. Kochansky received many recalls after his well played concerto. The Vivaldi composition is written in the fashion of the melodic writers for the violin of the early days, when tone and simplicity were in vogue. Technically, the concerto is not difficult. Its effect lies in the player's ability to sing upon his instrument rather than astonish with intricate double stopping and brilliant tours de force.

Mr. Kochansky showed himself to be well adapted to this style of playing, giving the first movement with breadth and strong, effective use of the bow. The Largo, played with grace and the sweetness required, was an artistic effort and in the lively and sparkling presto he performed brilliantly. A half-dozen recalls showed the audience's appreciation.

The Liszt Symphonic Poem is long and not particularly interesting save in the latter part. Here a big climax is built up, which serves as a triumphal and effective close.

A. F. P.

Transcript
Feb 28

UPON the French and the Russian programs lately devised by Mr. Koussevitzky now follows a sequence of German pieces, to be heard at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. In order they are: An Intermezzo by Mahler written into his adaptation of Weber's comic opera, "The Three Pintos," Brahms's Third Symphony, in F major; the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's Fantasy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; the Introduction to the third act of Wagner's opera, "Die Meistersinger"; the Dance of Salome from Strauss's like-named music-drama.

Transcript
Feb 27

KOCHANSKI PLAYS RAVEL'S "TZIGANE," PARODY OR STUNT?

UNEXPECTED VIOLINIST: NOVEL PIECE

Notable Symphony Concert in Cambridge—The Parisian's Newest Music—Ancient Concerto in Beauty Regained—Mr. Koussevitzky Meets Liszt Half Way—"Tasso" Transfigured

UNEXPECTED compensation awaited, last evening, the public of the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge. In two out of six concerts through the current season, it has missed the pleasure of Mr. Koussevitzky—once when illness disabled him; once when in his stead Mr. Henry Hadley was singularly chosen "guest." For these trials upon forbearance and patience, it now received the reward of Mr. Paul Kochanski as assisting violinist. Within memory, he appeared with the orchestra at Symphony Hall to the interest and admiration of all within earshot. For the while, however, a circumspect management bestows him on Providence and Cambridge only. In the larger city he played, last Tuesday, a Concerto in A minor of Vivaldi; at Sanders Theater, he joined to it "Tzigane," Monsieur Ravel's new Rhapsody for Violin and Orchestra, hitherto unheard in these parts. As its custom is with soloists, the audience heaped Mr. Kochanski with applause. Whether it was as much stirred by Monsieur Ravel à l'Hongroise is another and a superfluous inquiry.

"Tzigane" is a short piece, compressed to ten minutes of performance. In it, moreover, the orchestra bears a minor part, entering belatedly, setting in a pizzicato background for the solo-voice, occasionally assimilated to it, oftener merely affording "tutti" after the manner of an ancient concerto. The violin begins with a lengthy cadenza, whipping from feat to feat, stinging with sonority upon sonority. Practised fiddlers say that some of these feats are inventions or elaborations by Monsieur Ravel, beyond his predecessors in such music. Certainly this or that sonority falls strangely and piquantly upon ears that Paganini, Wieniawski and Sarasate have long tempted in vain. Incidentally, the cadenza also discloses a workable motiv, upon which the violin now proceeds to execute rhapsodic variations and decorations. To and fro, like a juggler's ball, goes the motiv; while around it the violinist, as juggler, fills the air with more feats, sonorities and arabesques. Before long, as well may, Monsieur Ravel's inventio pants; the Rhapsody ends in summar fashion: the composer gains no second wind.

Is there more in "Tzigane" than thes obvious externals imply? Some say ther is—to wit, a parody in Monsieur Ravel's keen fashion upon ecstatic show-piece à l' Hongroise in the usual commerce o the concert-hall; upon the habitual exercises of Tzigane orchestras—and the leaders thereof—whatever room may contain them. In this view, the "long and passionate preluding" is nothing less than the gypsy-fiddler goading himself to the expected ecstasy. At last he attains it and spurs into the serenade, say, that shall evoke his mistress. His excitement, however, is now so high-pitched and feverish that it becomes a veritable frenzy of fiddling. Like a kitten in pursuit of its tail he circles variations, feats, sonorities never catches his love-song; finally expires in a rhapsody of exhaustion. Writing such a parody, Monsieur Ravel has bettered the best models, putting to music paper stunts and sounds beyond the most hectic and the most recondite Tzigane imagination. As the signs went last evening at Cambridge, Mr. Kochanski hardly regards the piece as such travesty in tones. Rather, he played it as both cool-headed and hot-blooded quest for a freshened, even a novel, virtuosity—the rarefied sonorities, the up-springing or the tortuous feat. Had he construed "Tzigane" as parody, he would surely have played it with more of the surface-flourishes of Czech or Magyar rhapsody.

In fact, Mr. Kochanski's quality as musician and violinist stood far clearer in the eighteenth-century Concerto of Vivaldi. Again the orchestra set in the merest accompaniment—background to a tone in which the shimmering brightness, the pungent sweetness, the gentle and undulating voice of the violin, were as one. Rare indeed was this union of a unique instrument with the hand and the ear in play upon it; while in such mating the composer both shared and profited. Ancient fashion, he left much to the violinist—and two hundred years after, the violinist filled him no

The pattern of Vivaldi's first movement is not remarkable in itself. The Italians of those times set down these Allegros as a journalist now writes his daily article. Yet Mr. Kochanski's tone transformed it into a golden web magical to follow; while each arabesque became, under his hand, as new wreath of fancy. In the succeeding slow division, he held grace of unfolding line, sensuous loveliness of tone, and twilight sentiment in triple and even leash. There was no other sensation than the beauty of sound in pattern arrayed, by mood paced and shaded, from an instrument and him that played it receiving the pulse and glow of life. And old and mellow and infinitely fastidious was this beauty. . . . . A hushed audience heard while through a Presto that did but finish the Concerto neatly, the spell persisted. Within it lay Mr. Kochanski hidden like the god of the Pantheists, yet ever present and always felt.

The other merit and interest and exhilaration of the concert was Mr. Koussevitzky's version of Liszt's "Tasso," first made known a week ago at Symphony Hall. It is music after the conductor's own mind and heart; music in which above all other he excels. The composer bids him summon a distinctive image; lead it through transforming circumstance; intensify and cumulate each impression. Out of the orchestra, wailing, tossing, clamant, rises the Venetian poet sorrow-laden. The music releases and upbuilds him into a figure of passion power and pride. A court fêtes him; a people acclaims him. What may not a Koussevitzky do, what did not a Koussevitkzy do with such a piece—and all within the just limits of a romantic tone-poem, as music and as poetry to the end sustained.

The preluding struck deep the note of romantic gloom. The melody of the heart-sick poet soon haunted it. The free and fervid Tasso strode the orchestra into the imagination of the audience. Silken and lustrous was the music of the court; through it veritably moved the melody of the poet, yet not quite unsaddened. For once even the pageantry of the end was no vulgar show. In just sympathy and measure—mind, hand and ear—the conductor kept it stately. Throughout, the music rose from itself; took shape, substance, suggestion, joined as one the tonal progress and the tonal imaging. Here was no episodic, arbitrary, sterile Liszt; but a Liszt who also wrote music; no Liszt of romantic rodomontade; but a poet in tones, imaginatively evoking a presence, a passion and a setting. Under such a performance no stirred spirit need grope itself seventy-five years backward into another day and fashion with the expressive arts. Mr. Koussevitkzy believes in romantical music; renews its very voice and semblance. The shade of Liszt must have stretched out a hand from Paradise.

H. T. P.

RUSSIAN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Glinka, Glazunov, Liadov and Tchaikovsky Played

Mr Koussevitzky arranged a Russian program for yesterday's Symphony concert, and next week there is to be a German program. We have already had a French program. Presumably the other music-making Nations, our own included, are to have their respective programs later in the series. The chosen Russians were Glinka, Glazunov, Liadov, and Tchaikovsky. Glazúnov's Eighth Symphony, composed in 1906, and played in New York in 1907, was the only number new to Boston.

Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture and fantasy, an early but highly characteristic specimen of that composer's alloyed talent, was given a superbly eloquent reading yesterday. The bombast and the false pathos of much of this music were almost transmuted by Koussevitzky into the surging passion and yearning tenderness of Shakspere's tragedy. Tchaikovsky had a real gift of melody, a notable mastery of the noise-making resources of the orchestra, and a strong but not subtle rhythmic sense. He wrote much genuinely admirable light music, unpretentiously pleasing. But in such pieces as this fantasy he strove to attain a dramatic force and a dignity of style beyond his reach.

Glinka's overture to his fairy opera "Russlan and Ludmilla" first performed in 1842, proved that the admiration professed by later Russians for the first notable Russian composer was in many ways deserved. The piece is spirited, gay, yet with a hint of wonder and of the primitive. Glinka's opera deals like Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" with Pagan Russia. It is not wholly fanciful to detect a faint likeness in mood between music which uses the idiom of the 1830's and music of the 20th century like "La Sacre." Glinka's music has one advantage over Stravinsky's. Its eloquence is never forced, never self conscious, always spontaneous.

Glazunov's music has been heard here at intervals for many years. None of it has seemed to be first rate, to be the authentic and spontaneous utterance of an original creative artist. This Eighth Symphony is correctly enough worked out after the approved formulae taught in courses on musical composition. No theme in it is obviously derived from other music. There are even passages with real power to move the listener. But the general impression left by the symphony was of labored dullness.

Glazunov is one of those writers whose style is profoundly but never permanently influenced by the masterpiece he has last been studying. He is not a plagiarist, not even unconsciously. Yet, to cite a striking instance, the last movement of this Eighth Symphony could not have been written if Wagner had not given the world the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The tone of Glazunov's music is the same as Wagner's. Its texture and its imaginative power by comparison insignificant.

Liadov's three pieces for orchestra, "Kikimora," "Baba Yaga" and "Enchanted Lake," played here under Monteux, again seemed more or less pretty trifles, lacking intensity of feeling and only ordinarily well written. One wondered why Koussevitzky put no music by Skriabin, Stravinsky, or Rimsky Korsakov on this program. Surely their work has higher qualities than that played.

Next week's program, as announced, will include an intermezzo from Weber's "Die Drei Pintos" arranged by Mahler; Brahms' Third Symphony, the scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" and the "Dance of the Seven Veils," from Richard Strauss "Salome."

Herald
Feb 28

GLAZOUNOV'S SYMPHONY NO. 8

First Playing Here of Russian's Composition of 1906

"ROMEO AND JULIET" DELIGHTFULLY GIVEN

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Glinka, Overture to "Russian and Lioudmilla"; Glazounov, Symphony No. 8, E flat; Liadov, "Kikomora," "The Enchanted Lake" and "Baba-Yaga"; Tchaikovsky, Overture Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet."

In his earlier years Glazounov dreamed of imaginative fantastical music. His suites and tone-poems told of carnivals, funerals, the gorgeous, voluptuous Orient; the forest with wood-sprites, water nymphs, will-of-the-wisps; the ocean, the Kremlin of Moscow with its holy and dramatic associations. He saw Stenika Rasin, the terror of the Volga, his captive Persian princess, who was sacrificed to the great river unlike any river in the world. The ballet tempted him and for a time he found in it the fullest and freest form of musical expression; not the ballet as it was known to us before the arrival of Diaghilev and his company; not the old ballet, too often stilted, dull, or the "labored intrepidity of indecorum," but the ballet of Russia when Petrograd-Leningrad rejoiced in the name of St. Petersburg.

Little by little, the Russian blood in his musical veins became thin and pale. There was a transfusion of German blood. He grew more and more academic, freeing himself from the influence of Schumann who for a time was dear to him and delivering himself into the bondage of Johannes Brahms. Legend and fairy tales, historical events and Nature's handiwork no longer inspired composition. He determined that music should be created not by outside suggestion, but as the German evolved a camel from his inner consciousness. And so an admirer wrote of him that gradually nearing "his promised land, wherein music is absolutely self-sufficing," he reached his destination with his eighth symphony.

This symphony was played in Boston yesterday for the first time. Written in 1906, it was performed in New York the next year, and it has been heard in Chicago. There can be no dispute over its solid structure, the scholarly workmanship, the technical skill displayed. The thematic development is more significant than the thematic material, except in the chorale-like beginning of the Finale.

There are examples of ingenious orchestration in the Scherzo. There is a more effective employment of contrasts than in the other movements. The second is not without a stately, one might say epic, grandeur in its melancholy mood. One finds, however, in the whole work few pages that make a strong emotional appeal; few pages of haunting beauty; few pages that take one outside the concert hall, outside of one's self. The prevailing impression while the music is playing is similar to that made by the tragedian's performance of Hamlet when Pip replied to his question, What did you think of it? Pip answered, prompted by his friend: It was massive and concrete.

Glinka's overture is pleasant music in a Berliozian manner somewhat Italianized, good music for putting an audience in a cheerful mood at the beginning of a concert. The three pieces by Liadov, ingeniously scored, were delightfully played, for Mr. Koussevitzky has as fine an appreciation of

---

Russian Music at Symphony

There is an all-Russian program at the Symphony concerts this week, in accordance with Mr. Koussevitzky's new plan. Last week it was French. Next week it will be pan-German.

The only novelty played at yesterday's matinee concert was Glazounov's eighth symphony, which is not all inspired music, but which is none the less likely to prove a popular addition to the Symphony repertoire. Its melodies will commend it to those who are jarred by the new tuneless writings. The performance won an ovation for Koussevitzky and his men.

For music of true fairy-tale atmosphere it would be hard to match the three Liadov pieces on the program, two of them dealing with Russian witches, Kikimora and Baba-Yaga, and one with the story of an enchanted lake. They are delightful little tone pictures and they were marvelously well played.

The program, which will be repeated tonight, opens with Glinka's "Russian and Ludmilla" overture, which is of a light, sparkling operetta character, and closes with Tchaikovsky's dramatic overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." The last number was given a thrilling performance.

That was 35 years ago this month. No succeeding performance equalled it until that of yesterday. Some had been led to think in the mean time that they had grossly deceived them years ago; or that in their green and salad days of concert-going they had lacked judgment. Mr. Koussevitzky surely convinced any doubting Thomas that the first opinion was well founded.

For Shakespeare's tragedy was eloquently sounded forth in music. Some have said, and with a certain authority, that the opening section pictures Friar Laurence's cell; others that it symbolizes "the burden of fate." It is enough to say that these measures strike the tragic note, the solemn warning of that which is to come, as the ending is the epitaph on the tomb of the lovers. In the pages depicting the strife of the two families, the feud that worked the woe, there was the furious encounter in the street, the clash of steel. And the great love theme, with the sobbing syncopation for the horns, as sung by this interpreter, was it not the song of triumphant love?

Love, that is all the earth to lovers—love that mocks time and space,
Love, that is day and night—love, that is sun and moon and stars,
Love that is crimson, sumptuous, sick with perfume.

The program was Russian, yet Tchaikovsky, the musician, was reproached by the "Five" for being a cosmopolite. This being interpreted today means that in "Romeo and Juliet" he wrote for the musical world, not as a "Nationalist."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week will be as follows: Weber-Mahler, Intermezzo from "The Three Pintos"; Brahms, Symphony No. 3, F major; Mendelssohn, Scherzo from music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Wagner, Prelude to act III of "The Mastersingers"; Strauss, Salome's Dance.

LEWISTON,
ME.
JOURNAL
FEB 28 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY OR. RETURNS TO PORTLAND

Annual Concert Under Auspices Portland Music Commission, Mar. 25

It is good news to the musicians and musically inclined of Lewiston and Auburn that the Boston Symphony ochestra will give its annual concert this year as in the past, the date being March 25. Many of the instrumental students of these cities regard this as a great educational opportunity and each year special cars are required to take the body of young students to the concert.

The plan carried out by the Music Commission this year has been to have the best local talent to assist Mr. Cronham at his organ concerts and the fact that City Hall auditorium has been packed at every concert proves the success of the plan. The Boston Symphony concert is the only outside talent the Commission is bringing to Portland. This concert has become an institution and one that the people of Portland and environs would not willingly miss.

Serge Koussevitzky, the dynamic new conductor, will be heard in Maine for the first time altho glowing reports of his concerts have reached here. Seats for this performance will have to be secured many weeks in advance and may be obtained by writing directly to the Music Commission office, in Portland City Hall.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 25 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last evening drew its usual large audience at Infantry Hall. It was a concert made notable by the first presentation by the Boston orchestra of Glazounov's Symphony No. 8. The evening's interest centred in the playing of this new work and in the appearance for the first time here of the violinist, Paul Kochanski.

The programme was played as follows:

Glinka..Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"
Glazounov..Symphony No. 8 in E-flat, Op. 83
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Mesto.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale: Moderato.
Vivaldi....Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A minor
a. Allegro.
b. Largo.
c. Presto.
Liszt..........."Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo," Symphonic Poem No. 2

Alexander Constantinovitsch Glazounov was born in Leningrad in 1865. He is now living in that city where in 1906 he composed the Symphony No. 8, in E-flat Major. The symphony was first played in this country by the Russian Symphony Society, Modeste Altschuler, conductor, in New York, in 1907. Although not a composition of recent date its performance last evening under Serge Koussevitzsky was its first by the Boston orchestra.

The advent of Mr. Koussevitzsky proved an upward step in the life of the Boston Symphony. It also means we shall enjoy more intimate acquaintance with the store of Russian orchestral works. This is a very pleasant outlook for patrons of these concerts. The modern Russians write music that fire one's imagination. There is bigness, richness, in their creations. Melody seems a natural gift to these artistic Slavic minds. Under a conductor fitted by racial relationship and so artistically gifted as Koussevitzky, Russian music finds an ideal interpreter. So, last evening, the audience with high anticipation awaited the playing of the Glazounov symphony.

It is said that in this work the composer was influenced by Brahms. This perhaps is true in certain characteristics of style. But it is thoroughly Russian in its musical language, its passionate utterance of thoughts that pour forth with unceasing flow. It is restless, at times reckless in powerful expression. Agreeable dissonance pursues its course through the maze of intricate harmony.

The opening movement, Allegro Moderato, moves with intense, vigorous expression, alternating in storms of orchestral violence and the calmness which succeeds titanic force. It is music that thrills through its kaleidoscopic color, its seething, restless spirit; music that tells of strife, of struggle to attain some splendid goal. Nearly attaining this it reaches climaxes of power and brilliance which gradually decline as if to gather strength for greater effort. The movements closes in one of these periods of calmness.

The second movement again reveals the masterful instrumentation which gives life and vitality to the score. Here Mr. Koussevitzsky moulds his men into a responsive unit that answers with seemingly intuitive sense his interpretive will. Bits of melody occasionally shine forth and these, in many voiced combination, are developed in a glittering mass of harmony. This movement also ends in soft effects.

The brighter of the four movements is heard in the following Allegro, but this gaiety is lost in reappearing agitation of style. A forceful climax brings it to a close.

The finale retains all the power and spirit of the preceding movements, and leaves the hearer with the thought that in this fine imaginative work the composer has left a worthy monument to his genius.

Mr. Kochansky received many recalls after his well played concerto. The Vivaldi composition is written in the fashion of the melodic writers for the violin of the early days, when tone and simplicity were in vogue. Technically, the concerto is not difficult. Its effect lies in the player's ability to sing upon his instrument rather than astonish with intricate double stopping and brilliant tours de force.

Mr. Kochansky showed himself to be well adapted to this style of playing, giving the first movement with breadth and strong, effective use of the bow. The Largo, played with grace and the sweetness required, was an artistic effort and in the lively and sparkling presto he performed brilliantly. A half-dozen recalls showed the audience's appreciation.

The Liszt Symphonic Poem is long and not particularly interesting save in the latter part. Here a big climax is built up, which serves as a triumphal and effective close.

A. F. P.

Transcript
Feb 28

UPON the French and the Russian programs lately devised by Mr. Koussevitzky now follows a sequence of German pieces, to be heard at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. In order they are: An Intermezzo by Mahler written into his adaptation of Weber's comic opera, "The Three Pintos," Brahms's Third Symphony, in F major; the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's Fantasy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; the Introduction to the third act of Wagner's opera, "Die Meistersinger"; the Dance of Salome from Strauss's like-named music-drama.

Transcript
Feb 27

KOCHANSKI PLAYS RAVEL'S "TZIGANE," PARODY OR STUNT?

UNEXPECTED VIOLINIST: NOVEL PIECE

Notable Symphony Concert in Cambridge—The Parisian's Newest Music—Ancient Concerto in Beauty Regained—Mr. Koussevitzky Meets Liszt Half Way—"Tasso" Transfigured

UNEXPECTED compensation awaited, last evening, the public of the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge. In two out of six concerts through the current season, it has missed the pleasure of Mr. Koussevitzky—once when illness disabled him; once when in his stead Mr. Henry Hadley was singularly chosen "guest." For these trials upon forbearance and patience, it now received the reward of Mr. Paul Kochanski as assisting violinist. Within memory, he appeared with the orchestra at Symphony Hall to the interest and admiration of all within earshot. For the while, however, a circumspect management bestows him on Providence and Cambridge only. In the larger city he played, last Tuesday, a Concerto in A minor of Vivaldi; at Sanders Theater, he joined to it "Tzigane," Monsieur Ravel's new Rhapsody for Violin and Orchestra, hitherto unheard in these parts. As its custom is with soloists, the audience heaped Mr. Kochanski with applause. Whether it was as much stirred by Monsieur Ravel à l'Hongroise is another and a superfluous inquiry.

"Tzigane" is a short piece, compressed to ten minutes of performance. In it, moreover, the orchestra bears a minor part, entering belatedly, setting in a pizzicato background for the solo-voice, occasionally assimilated to it, oftener merely affording "tutti" after the manner of an ancient concerto. The violin begins with a lengthy cadenza, whipping from feat to feat, stinging with sonority upon sonority. Practised fiddlers say that some of these feats are inventions or elaborations by Monsieur Ravel, beyond his predecessors in such music. Certainly this or that sonority falls strangely and piquantly upon ears that Paganini, Wieniawski and Sarasate have long tempted in vain. Incidentally, the cadenza also discloses a workable motiv, upon which the violin now proceeds to execute rhapsodic variations and decorations. To and fro, like a juggler's ball, goes the motiv; while around it the violinist, as juggler, fills the air with more feats, sonorities and arabesques. Before long, as i well may, Monsieur Ravel's inventio pants; the Rhapsody ends in summar fashion: the composer gains no second wind.

Is there more in "Tzigane" than thes obvious externals imply? Some say ther is—to wit, a parody in Monsieur Ravel' keen fashion upon ecstatic show-piece à l' Hongroise in the usual commerce o the concert-hall; upon the habitual exercises of Tzigane orchestras—and the leaders thereof—whatever room may contain them. In this view, the "long and passionate preluding" is nothing less than the gypsy-fiddler goading himself to the expected ecstasy. At last he attains it and spurs into the serenade, say, that shall evoke his mistress. His excitement, however, is now so high-pitched and feverish that it becomes a veritable frenzy of fiddling. Like a kitten in pursuit of its tail he circles variations, feats, sonorities never catches his love-song; finally expires in a rhapsody of exhaustion. Writing such a parody, Monsieur Ravel has bettered the best models, putting to music paper stunts and sounds beyond the most hectic and the most recondite Tzigane imagination. As the signs went last evening at Cambridge, Mr. Kochanski hardly regards the piece as such travesty in tones. Rather, he played it as both cool-headed and hot-blooded quest for a freshened, even a novel, virtuosity—the rarefied sonorities, the up-springing or the tortuous feat. Had he construed "Tzigane" as parody, he would surely have played it with more of the surface-flourishes of Czech or Magyar rhapsody.

In fact, Mr. Kochanski's quality as musician and violinist stood far clearer in the eighteenth-century Concerto of Vivaldi. Again the orchestra set in the merest accompaniment—background to a tone in which the shimmering brightness, the pungent sweetness, the gentle and undulating voice of the violin, were as one. Rare indeed was this union of a unique instrument with the hand and the ear in play upon it; while in such mating the composer both shared and profited. Ancient fashion, he left much to the violinist—and two hundred years after, the violinist filled him no

The pattern of Vivaldi's first movement is not remarkable in itself. The Italians of those times set down these Allegros as a journalist now writes his daily article. Yet Mr. Kochanski's tone transformed it into a golden web magical to follow; while each arabesque became, under his hand, as new wreath of fancy. In the succeeding slow division, he held grace of unfolding line, sensuous loveliness of tone, and twilight sentiment in triple and even leash. There was no other sensation than the beauty of sound in pattern arrayed, by mood paced and shaded, from an instrument and him that played it receiving the pulse and glow of life. And old and mellow and infinitely fastidious was this beauty. . . . A hushed audience heard while through a Presto that did but finish the Concerto neatly, the spell persisted. Within it lay Mr. Kochanski hidden like the god of the Pantheists, yet ever present and always felt.

The other merit and interest and exhilaration of the concert was Mr. Koussevitzky's version of Liszt's "Tasso," first made known a week ago at Symphony Hall. It is music after the conductor's own mind and heart; music in which above all other he excels. The composer bids him summon a distinctive image; lead it through transforming circumstance; intensify and cumulate each impression. Out of the orchestra, wailing, tossing, clamant, rises the Venetian poet sorrow-laden. The music releases and upbuilds him into a figure of passion power and pride. A court fêtes him; a people acclaims him. What may not a Koussevitzky do, what did not a Koussevitkzy do with such a piece—and all within the just limits of a romantic tone-poem, as music and as poetry to the end sustained.

The preluding struck deep the note of romantic gloom. The melody of the heart-sick poet soon haunted it. The free and fervid Tasso strode the orchestra into the imagination of the audience. Silken and lustrous was the music of the court; through it veritably moved the melody of the poet, yet not quite unsaddened. For once even the pageantry of the end was no vulgar show. In just sympathy and measure—mind, hand and ear—the conductor kept it stately. Throughout, the music rose from itself; took shape, substance, suggestion, joined as one the tonal progress and the tonal imaging. Here was no episodic, arbitrary, sterile Liszt; but a Liszt who also wrote music; no Liszt of romantic rodomontade; but a poet in tones, imaginatively evoking a presence, a passion and a setting. Under such a performance no stirred spirit need grope itself seventy-five years backward into another day and fashion with the expressive arts. Mr. Koussevitkzy believes in romantical music; renews its very voice and semblance. The shade of Liszt must have stretched out a hand from Paradise.

H. T. P.

RUSSIAN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Glinka, Glazunov, Liadov and Tchaikovsky Played

Mr Koussevitzky arranged a Russian program for yesterday's Symphony concert, and next week there is to be a German program. We have already had a French program. Presumably the other music-making Nations, our own included, are to have their respective programs later in the series. The chosen Russians were Glinka, Glazunov, Liadov, and Tchaikovsky. Glazúnov's Eighth Symphony, composed in 1906, and played in New York in 1907, was the only number new to Boston.

Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture and fantasy, an early but highly characteristic specimen of that composer's alloyed talent, was given a superbly eloquent reading yesterday. The bombast and the false pathos of much of this music were almost transmuted by Koussevitzky into the surging passion and yearning tenderness of Shakspere's tragedy. Tchaikovsky had a real gift of melody, a notable mastery of the noise-making resources of the orchestra, and a strong but not subtle rhythmic sense. He wrote much genuinely admirable light music, unpretentiously pleasing. But in such pieces as this fantasy he strove to attain a dramatic force and a dignity of style beyond his reach.

Glinka's overture to his fairy opera "Russlan and Ludmilla" first performed in 1842, proved that the admiration professed by later Russians for the first notable Russian composer was in many ways deserved. The piece is spirited, gay, yet with a hint of wonder and of the primitive. Glinka's opera deals like Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" with Pagan Russia. It is not wholly fanciful to detect a faint likeness in mood between music which uses the idiom of the 1830's and music of the 20th century like "La Sacre." Glinka's music has one advantage over Stravinsky's. Its eloquence is never forced, never self conscious, always spontaneous.

Glazunov's music has been heard here at intervals for many years. None of it has seemed to be first rate, to be the authentic and spontaneous utterance of an original creative artist. This Eighth Symphony is correctly enough worked out after the approved formulae taught in courses on musical composition. No theme in it is obviously derived from other music. There are even passages with real power to move the listener. But the general impression left by the symphony was of labored dullness.

Glazunov is one of those writers whose style is profoundly but never permanently influenced by the masterpiece he has last been studying. He is not a plagiarist, not even unconsciously. Yet, to cite a striking instance, the last movement of this Eighth Symphony could not have been written if Wagner had not given the world the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The tone of Glazunov's music is the same as Wagner's. Its texture and its imaginative power by comparison insignificant.

Liadov's three pieces for orchestra, "Kikimora," "Baba Yaga" and "Enchanted Lake," played here under Monteux, again seemed more or less pretty trifles, lacking intensity of feeling and only ordinarily well written. One wondered why Koussevitzky put no music by Skriabin, Stravinsky, or Rimsky Korsakov on this program. Surely their work has higher qualities than that played.

Next week's program, as announced, will include an intermezzo from Weber's "Die Drei Pintos" arranged by Mahler; Brahms' Third Symphony, the scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" and the "Dance of the Seven Veils," from Richard Strauss "Salome."

10:15 P. M.—Hotel Brunswick orchestra.

SATURDAY TIMETABLE
7 to 8 P. M

KYW—Chicago, 536.
WOAW—Omaha, 526.
WWJ—Detroit, 517.
WIP—Philadelphia, 509.
WOC—Davenport, 484.
WRC—Washington, D. C. 469

---

which is not all inspired music, but which is none the less likely to prove a popular addition to the Symphony repertoire. Its melodies will commend it to those who are jarred by the new tuneless writings. The performance won an ovation for Koussevitzky and his men.

For music of true fairy-tale atmosphere it would be hard to match the three Liadov pieces on the program, two of them dealing with Russian witches, Kikimora and Baba-Yaga, and one with the story of an enchanted lake. They are delightful little tone pictures and they were marvelously well played.

The program, which will be repeated tonight, opens with Glinka's "Russlan and Lioudmilla" overture, which is of a light, sparkling operetta character, and closes with Tchaikovsky's dramatic overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." The last

---

Herald
Feb 28

GLAZOUNOV'S SYMPHONY NO. 8

First Playing Here of Russian's Composition of 1906

"ROMEO AND JULIET" DELIGHTFULLY GIVEN

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Glinka, Overture to "Russian and Lioudmilla"; Glazounov, Symphony No. 8, E flat; Liadov, "Kikomora," "The Enchanted Lake" and "Baba-Yaga"; Tchaikovsky, Overture Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet."

In his earlier years Glazounov dreamed of imaginative fantastical music. His suites and tone-poems told of carnivals, funerals, the gorgeous, voluptuous Orient; the forest with wood-sprites, water nymphs, will-of-the-wisps; the ocean, the Kremlin of Moscow with its holy and dramatic associations. He saw Stenika Rasin, the terror of the Volga, his captive Persian princess, who was sacrificed to the great river unlike any river in the world. The ballet tempted him and for a time he found in it the fullest and freest form of musical expression; not the ballet as it was known to us before the arrival of Diaghilev and his company; not the old ballet, too often stilted, dull, or the "labored intrepidity of indecorum," but the ballet of Russia when Petrograd-Leningrad rejoiced in the name of St. Petersburg.

Little by little, the Russian blood in his musical veins became thin and pale. There was a transfusion of German blood. He grew more and more academic, freeing himself from the influence of Schumann who for a time was dear to him and delivering himself into the bondage of Johannes Brahms. Legend and fairy tales, historical events and Nature's handiwork no longer inspired composition. He determined that music should be created not by outside suggestion, but as the German evolved a camel from his inner consciousness. And so an admirer wrote of him that gradually nearing "his promised land, wherein music is absolutely self-sufficing," he reached his destination with his eighth symphony.

This symphony was played in Boston yesterday for the first time. Written in 1906, it was performed in New York the next year, and it has been heard in Chicago. There can be no dispute over its solid structure, the scholarly workmanship, the technical skill displayed. The thematic development is more significant than the thematic material, except in the chorale-like beginning of the Finale.

There are examples of ingenious orchestration in the Scherzo. There is a more effective employment of contrasts than in the other movements. The second is not without a stately, one might say epic, grandeur in its melancholy mood. One finds, however, in the whole work few pages that make a strong emotional appeal; few pages of haunting beauty; few pages that take one outside the concert hall, outside of one's self. The prevailing impression while the music is playing is similar to that made by the tragedian's performance of Hamlet when Pip replied to his question, What did you think of it? Pip answered, prompted by his friend: It was massive and concrete.

Glinka's overture is pleasant music in a Berliozian manner somewhat Italianized, good music for putting an audience in a cheerful mood at the beginning of a concert. The three pieces by Liadov, ingeniously scored, were delightfully played, for Mr. Koussevitzky has as fine an appreciation of the delicately fanciful and of the whimsically humorous as he is master of music that t deeply emotional, stormily imposing, r fiery in its passion. That there was o irresistible appeal to the soul in lazounov's symphony was not the fault f Mr. Koussevitzky, not the fault of he players.

The performance of Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet" was one long to be emembered. When Nikisch brought ut this Fantasia in the old Music Hall, e effect produced was overwhelming. hat was 35 years ago this month. No ucceeding performance equalled it ntil that of yesterday. Some had been ed to think in the mean time that Tchaikovsky's music had grossly deeived them years ago; or that in their reen and salad days of concert-going hey had lacked judgment. Mr. Koussevitzky surely convinced any doubting homas that the first opinion was well ounded.

For Shakespeare's tragedy was elouently sounded forth in music. Some ave said, and with a certain authority, hat the opening section pictures Friar aurence's cell; others that it symbozes "the burden of fate." It is enough o say that these measures strike the agic note, the solemn warning of that hich is to come, as the ending is the pitaph on the tomb of the lovers. In e pages depicting the strife of the vo families, the feud that worked the oe, there was the furious encounter the street, the clash of steel. And e great love theme, with the sobbing ncopation for the horns, as sung by is interpreter, was it not the very mn of triumphant love?

ove, that is all the earth to lovers—
love that mocks time and space,
Love, that is day and night—love, that is sun and moon and stars,
Love that is crimson, sumptuous, sick with perfume."

The program was Russian, yet Tchaikovsky, the musician, was reproached by the "Five" for being a cosmopolite. This being interpreted today means that in "Romeo and Juliet" he wrote for the musical world, not as a "Nationalist."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week will be as follows: Weber-Mahler, Intermezzo from "The Three Pintos"; Brahms, Symphony No. 3, F major; Mendelssohn, Scherzo from music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Wagner, Prelude to act III of "The Mastersingers"; Strauss, Salome's Dance.

LEWISTON, ME. JOURNAL

FEB 28 192

BOSTON SYMPHONY OR. RETURNS TO PORTLAND

Annual Concert Under Auspices Portland Music Commission, Mar. 25

It is good news to the musicians and musically inclined of Lewiston and Auburn that the Boston Symphony ochestra will give its annual concert this year as in the past, the date being March 25. Many of the instrumental students of these cities regard this as a great educational opportunity and each year special cars are required to take the body of young students to the concert.

The plan carried out by the Music Commission this year has been to have the best local talent to assist Mr. Cronham at his organ concerts and the fact that City Hall auditorium has been packed at every concert proves the success of the plan. The Boston Symphony concert is the only outside talent the Commission is bringing to Portland. This concert has become an institution and one that the people of Portland and environs would not willingly miss.

Serge Koussevitzky, the dynamic new conductor, will be heard in Maine for the first time altho glowing reports of his concerts have reached here. Seats for this performance will have to be secured many weeks in advance and may be obtained by writing directly to the Music Commission office, in Portland City Hall.

50

Transcript
Feb 28

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY MARSHALS ANEW HIS MUSCOVITES

RUSSIAN COMPOSERS IN VARIED ARRAY

Programs and Pleasures — Glinka and Lyadov for Entertainment — Glazunov Ponderous, Monotonous and Empty—Chaikovsky and the One and Only Music to "Romeo and Juliet"

TO his heart's content Mr. Koussevitzky may "unify" his programs—"all-French," "all-Russian," "all-German," as inclination prompts him. The public of the Symphony Concerts is little likely to quarrel with him over the principle or the process. Most of it is contentedly unaware of either, asking only that the chosen pieces shall fill agreeably the two hours allotted, on a Friday or a Saturday, to Symphony Hall. By itself, in itself, for itself, each item comes and goes. If it pleases, so much the better for all concerned. If it fails to please, so runs the world away. A fortnight ago, exceeding few listeners thought the better or the worse of Monsieur d'Indy's Second Symphony, because other French music, of Messieurs Dukas, Roussel and Rabaud, happened to companion it. Lyadov's folk-pieces would have been amusing trifles yesterday afternoon, whatever preceded or followed them. The introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" will not be more or less itself when, next week, it has place on an "all-German" program.

So long as the music of the day gives the audience pleasure and diversified pleasure, it cares not a whit for the aggregate nationality or the cross-relations of the composers. The reproach to Dr. Muck's "unified" programs was the dulness and the monotony occasionally haunting them. Thus far, Mr. Koussevitzky's have escaped both pitfalls. If it pleases him to assort composers by race or generation, so be it. Even the most reflective of hearers are not likely to generalize about French music of the day before yesterday, when he drives in one leash d' Indy, Dukas and Rabaud; or to deduce the Russian soul from a collocation of Glinka and Glazunov; or to become Teutonically ruminant over the tie that may—or may not—bind the Mendelssohn of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" to the Strauss of "Salome." Conductors, like the rest of us, are entitled to their pastime. If it happens to be a "unified" program, have not we others our cross-word puzzles?

Besides, two of Mr. Koussevitzky's assembled Russians proved as amusing yesterday as ear could wish. True, the summary in the program-book of Glinka's opera, "Russlan and Ludmilla" failed to woo the imagination. Yet the Overture unmistakably tickled the ear. The music was fresh-voiced and festal. It ran brightly and spiritedly. Rhythm sped it; melody warmed it; unforced contrasts spiced it. Technically, Glinka was doing a good, if simple, job, choosing his ways and means aptly, making the most of them, writing with his eye on the object, still coming eagerly and happily to this business of music-making. If he had not much to say, he was concise and direct in the saying—a state of innocence more desirable than laborious and beclouded "thematic development." Effortless sounded his music. As spontaneous and light-footed was the performance.

In turn Lyadov pleased with his miniature tone-poems out of a background of folk-tale. Plainly he inclined to whistling witches. Baba-Yaga whistles in the clarinets, and straightway rides the air in her mortar, with pestle and broom for aids to journeying. More essentially, Lyadov makes of her ride an ingenious, fanciful, sufficiently uncanny piece of music. Again concision and directness are not the least of its virtues; again rhythm and color are agreeable cloaks to occasional repetition. Kikimora also whistled, when Lyadov had evoked her out of the shadows. Not too readily did she yield to his tonal spells; but once resuscitated, she was a busy, bustling witch. In the Russian way, rhythm kept the music astir, while play of color glamoured it. Only a pedant would inquire too closely into the substance within.

Between the two witches, Lyadov fell to amiable musing. "The Enchanted Lake" he named the piece. It was suave; it was melancholy; it was gently sketched and colored. As a hundred poets write such verse, so the Russian wrote his dreamful music and set into it the dim pleasures of memory. Apt, even artful, were his means: yet the whole impression was one of an innocent simplicity, of a child-like willingness to charm. With Lyadov, Mr. Koussevitzky's fancy is as sensitive as his hand. The light line, the tint and the demi-tint, are his way with these miniatures. He does not stretch or over-fill the canvas.

Much more weighty and far more debatable matter was the Symphony of Glazunov, eighth from his pen, written as long ago as 1906, heard yesterday for the first time in Boston, not a little applauded. Presumably the conductors think well of Glazunov. German, French or Russian, they have given him room and to spare at the Symphony Concerts. At each return, the scholarly have also sung his praises, bidding the young idea in composition read, mark and inwardly digest these instructive pages. Lay listeners not a few applaud him gladly. As likely as not, his persistent sonorities stir them. Yesterday they were not content until they had saluted the standing orchestra. Others may only wish for these engrossed minds, pleasured ears and commending tongues. Listen their hardest, they could not find a fresh, individual, fertile idea in the lengths and breadths of this Eighth Symphony. There were motivs that ear and mind labored to hold and to follow. Sedulously Glazunov made manifold play with them; yet the process seemed a sterile proficiency in the workmanship of music. No flight of imagination, no ardor and depth of reflection, no passion of creation, no flash of invention brought this music to pass. In his study sat Glazunov; willed a symphony; took thought; manipulated ways and means; gradually and methodically made it.

Worse still, monotony haunted the method. Persistently slow-paced was the music—sluggish length upon sluggish length. Thick and opaque was the harmonic and instrumental texture. In masses would Glazunov keep his orchestral voices moving; of the sonorities of the brass choir he never wearied. His matter was barren; but the more insistently he urged it. His sayings were empty; but the louder did they clamor. There were pages little short of platitude and bombast; pages of reiteration and manipulation, on which the music virtually stood still; pages that noted Mahler or Strauss among the best models of the symphonic hour; rare pages in which some fortunate turn, some gleam of individual imagination, a hint of compelling mood, animated the measure. So the first movement hushed to end, or the Scherzo clanged to climax. All else was the manufacture of music by an old hand—not too far from the German border. In forty minutes, few composers have written so much and said so little. Not a few wondered at Mr. Koussevitzky's obvious zeal and endless pains for such a music. pages. Lay listeners not a few applaude Yet by much report he extols it. Clearly, there are ears and ears for Glazunov.

Glinka, Glazunov, Lyadov—yet it was the familiar Chaikovsky that most saved the day and his familiar music to "Romeo and Juliet" that most enriched it—music, besides upon which the conductor could lavish, his ardors and the orchestra pour out its answering passion of song or stress. Above other composers, Chaikovsky found the melody for the lovers; sustained it unabated; imprinted it upon whomsoever hears. It rises out of the music of strife and thrusts away the tumult. It returns heightened and deepened. It sings requiem for the lovers dead. Mystery attends it; passion throbs in it; sensuous beauty clothes it; illusion upsprings from it. With reason, under the test of fifty years, it may pass among the rare and complete exercises of the imagination in music fulfilled

Much else in the overture-fantasia (as Chaikovsky chose to call his tone-poem) fittingly companions it. In a different fashion nowadays would the music of strife be written; but as it is, it maintains this contrast, carries forward the tonal narrative. Seldom has Chaikovsky better devised, conducted and cumulated a design. Fate, though it be called Friar Laurence, haunts the beginning. Out of tonal suspense bursts the music of the unquenchable strife. Twice the melody of the lovers conquers it. Even fate bends to the voice of such passion in such beauty sung. Crushed at last, in lament it yet pierces. For once Chaikovsky prevails unquestioned—and in an objective music. Berlioz wrote his symphony; Gounod and twenty other composers made their operas. Yet here is the one and only music to the lovers and their poetry tuned. The more the pity that Mr. Koussevitzky must now and then drop a tear as he sang.

H. T. P.

RUSSIAN DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Post. Feb 28

Glazunov's Eighth Is Heard for First Time Here

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In a sense the chief item on the all-Russian programme given by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday, was the Eighth Symphony of Glazunov, a piece of large dimensions and of intricate and elaborate content, played for the first time in Boston.

But the greatest, indeed the only truly "great" music of the afternoon, was the final number on this Slavic programme, Tchaikowsky's Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet." Beside it in retrospect all else receded into the background.

IN GERMAN MOULD

Born in 1865 Glazunov completed this eighth of his symphonies in 1906, then abandoned symphonic composition, so the story goes, in superstitious fear lest, like Beethoven and Bruckner before him, he might write nine symphonies and no more. A pretty story, and mayhap a true one, but it is as likely that other considerations have kept Glazunov from attaining the mark set by two of his predecessors. Working gradually toward the goal of absolute music, existing of and for itself alone, Glazunov, at the outset a Russian Romanticist, became in this eighth symphony something not far removed from a German classicist. And further along that path he might hardly travel in symphonic composition.

There is in this symphony no faintest hint of programme and, outside the brooding slow movement, little suggestion that Slavic blood flows in the composer's veins. In the early years of the 20th century Mahler, Strauss and other post-Wagnerians, Teutonic by birth or affiliation, were writing symphonies and symphonic poems to which the German word "kolossal" was altogether applicable. And Glazunov, clearly enamoured of their methods, in this symphony proves himself a rival of no mean importance. Beside that of Mahler's and of the later Strauss his orchestra is comparatively modest in size. Three trumpets, a quartet of horns and woodwinds in threes suffice him. But in complexity of texture and in breadth of design he lags not behind his confreres.

Its Scherzo Breath-Taking

Marvels of contrapuntal ingenuity are to be found in this symphony. Structurally it is a notable achievement. As sheer music it repays the closest study. Nor is it necessary that which the Germans denote as "eye-music." It "sounds," if at times too thickly and with over-insistence in the brass choir. There is sweep and ardor in the broad chief theme of the first Allegro, and this movement and the scintillating, breath-taking Scherzo, a piece of virtuoso-writing, carry the hearer along. Again, there is in the second movement a grave eloquence, and the Finale, though more labored, more obviously contrived than the rest, is not without power.

That Mr. Koussevitzky and other Russians should hold this symphony in high esteem is not surprising. Tech-
y it is a monument to Russian
. It is dignified, serious, often g and impressive. But it lacks nal hall-mark of true genius and,
in the Scherzo, which Glazunov
among modern composers might written, it is devoid of striking duality.

Extract from
DAILY TELEGRAPH
London.

te ....28 FEB 1925........

oussevitzky has certainly fluttered the dove-
of Boston by all accounts by the "modernity" at least parts of his programmes during the od of his office as conductor of the Boston
phony Orchestra, wherein he succeeded Pierre nteux. In the latest concert there of which I e cognisance he played Stravinsky's "Sacre du ntemps," and, oddly enough, he astonished the tives by the comparative sobriety of his reading.
was expected that Monteux's reading would be
y much milder than that of the Slav conductor.
t in the event it appears that Koussevitzky paid much more meticulous attention to detail, hereby revealing new beauties and new subtle-
s in the score, but impairing the overwhelming wer of the climaxes that made the work so esistible at its first hearing." This I find very eresting, because one would naturally regard ussevitzky as more ostensibly "temperantal" than Pierre Monteux, especially when aling with the music of his contemporary com-riots.

Harvard
Crimson
Feb 28

WILL CONDUCT GLEE CLUB AT SYMPHONY HALL CONCERT

MONSIEUR SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

Conductor of Boston Symphony Who Will Lead Brahms "Requiem"

KOUSSEVITSKY TO CONDUCT GLEE CLUB ON APRIL 16

Boston's Greatest Symphonic Leader Accepts Invitation of Dr. Davison—Has Never Been Guest Conductor

EXPRESSES ADMIRATION FOR WORK OF HARVARD MEN

M. Serge Koussevitsky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has recently accepted an invitation to lead the University Glee Club in the Brahms "Requiem", which will be performed at Symphony Hall on April 16. For the first time since his arrival in this country, M. Koussevitsky will act as guest conductor, and the concession is purely complimentary to the Glee Club. When interviewed by a CRIMSON reporter, he stated that he liked the chorus immensely, and admired the work it is doing in the field of choral music. Consequently he was pleased to accept the offer made by the club's regular conductor, Dr. A. T. Davison '06, particularly so because the Requiem, one of Brahms' greatest works, is a favorite with him.

Will Require Large Accompaniment

It is a particularly ambitious undertaking, and will require an accompaniment of 60 members of the Symphony Orchestra, about 125 voices from the Radcliffe Choral Society, and an equal number of Glee Club men. In addition, two professional concert singers have been chartered to do the baritone and soprano solos which occur from time to time. It is on account of the elaborate preparation required in the production, that the "Requiem" is very rarely heard in Boston.

To conduct this array of voices and instruments through a piece certainly not noted for its simplicity, is an undertaking worthy of Boston's greatest Symphonic leader. Born at Tver, in the north of Russia, M. Koussevitsky began the study of music very early in life. At the age of twelve he led the Municipal Orchestra in a brilliant concert, and was considered the prodigy of the age. Later he played the double bass in the Moscow Imperial Orchestra, until he again took up conducting.

During the last 20 years, M. Koussevitsky has acquired much fame at his work in England, Paris, and Leningrad, where he has done much to promote the modern school of music.

50

Transcript
Feb 28

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY MARSHALS ANEW HIS MUSCOVITES

RUSSIAN COMPOSERS IN VARIED ARRAY

Programs and Pleasures — Glinka and Lyadov for Entertainment — Glazunov Ponderous, Monotonous and Empty—Chaikovsky and the One and Only Music to "Romeo and Juliet"

TO his heart's content Mr. Koussevitzky may "unify" his programs—"all-French," "all-Russian," "all-German," as inclination prompts him. The public of the Symphony Concerts is little likely to quarrel with him over the principle or the process. Most of it is contentedly unaware of either, asking only that the chosen pieces shall fill agreeably the two hours allotted, on a Friday or a Saturday, to Symphony Hall. By itself, in itself, for itself, each item comes and goes. If it pleases, so much the better for all concerned. If it fails to please, so runs the world away. A fortnight ago, exceeding few listeners thought the better or the worse of Monsieur d'Indy's Second Symphony, because other French music, of Messieurs Dukas, Roussel and Rabaud, happened to companion it. Lyadov's folk-pieces would have been amusing trifles yesterday afternoon, whatever preceded or followed them. The introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" will not be more or less itself when, next week, it has place on an "all-German" program.

So long as the music of the day gives the audience pleasure and diversified pleasure, it cares not a whit for the aggregate nationality or the cross-relations of the composers. The reproach to Dr. Muck's "unified" programs was the dulness and the monotony occasionally haunting them. Thus far, Mr. Koussevitzky's have escaped both pitfalls. If it pleases him to assort composers by race or generation, so be it. Even the most reflective of hearers are not likely to generalize about French music of the day before yesterday, when he drives in one leash d' Indy, Dukas and Rabaud; or to deduce the Russian soul from a collocation of Glinka and Glazunov; or to become Teutonically ruminant over the tie that may—or may not—bind the Mendelssohn of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" to the Strauss of "Salome." Conductors, like the rest of us, are entitled to their pastime. If it happens to be a "unified" program, have not we others our cross-word puzzles?

Besides, two of Mr. Koussevitzky's assembled Russians proved as amusing yesterday as ear could wish. True, the summary in the program-book of Glinka's opera, "Russlan and Ludmilla" failed ' woo the imagination. Yet the Overture unmistakably tickled the ear. The music was fresh-voiced and festal. It ran brightly and spiritedly. Rhythm sped it; melody warmed it; unforced contrasts spiced it. Technically, Glinka was doing a good, if simple, job, choosing his ways and means aptly, making the most of them, writing with his eye on the object, still coming eagerly and happily to this business of music-making. If he had not much to say, he was concise and direct in the saying—a state of innocence more desirable than laborious and beclouded "thematic develOpment." Effortless sounded his music. As spontaneous and light-footed was the performance.

In turn Lyadov pleased with his miniature tone-poems out of a background of folk-tale. Plainly he inclined to whistling witches. Baba-Yaga whistles in the clarinets, and straightway rides the air in her mortar, with pestle and broom for aids to journeying. More essentially, Lyadov makes of her ride an ingenious, fanciful, sufficiently uncanny piece of music. Again concision and directness are not the least of its virtues; again rhythm and color are agreeable cloaks to occasional repetition. Kikimora also whistled, when Lyadov had evoked her out of the shadows. Not too readily did she yield to his tonal spells; but once resuscitated, she was a busy, bustling witch. In the Russian way, rhythm kept the music astir, while play of color glamoured it. Only a pedant would inquire too closely into the substance within.

Between the two witches, Lyadov fell to amiable musing. "The Enchanted Lake" he named the piece. It was suave; it was melancholy; it was gently sketched and colored. As a hundred poets write such verse, so the Russian wrote his dreamful music and set into it the dim pleasures of memory. Apt, even artful, were his means: yet the whole impression was one of an innocent simplicity, of a child-like willingness to charm. With Lyadov, Mr. Koussevitzky's fancy is as sensitive as his hand. The light line, the tint and the demi-tint, are his way with these miniatures. He does not stretch or over-fill the canvas.

Much more weighty and far more debatable matter was the Symphony of Glazunov, eighth from his pen, written as long ago as 1906, heard yesterday for the first time in Boston, not a little applauded. Presumably the conductors think well of Glazunov. German, French or Russian, they have given him room and to spare at the Symphony Concerts. At each return, the scholarly have also sung his praises, bidding the young idea in composition read, mark and inwardly digest these instructive pages. Lay listeners not a few applaud him gladly. As likely as not, his persistent sonorities stir them. Yesterday they were not content until they had saluted the standing orchestra. Others may only wish for these engrossed minds, pleasured ears and commending tongues. Listen their hardest, they could not find a fresh, individual, fertile idea in the lengths and breadths of this Eighth Symphony. There were motivs that ear and mind labored to hold and to follow. Sedulously Glazunov made manifold play with them; yet the process seemed a sterile proficiency in the workmanship of music. No flight of imagination, no ardor and depth of reflection, no passion of creation, no flash of invention brought this music to pass. In his study sat Glazunov; willed a symphony; took thought; manipulated ways and means; gradually and methodically made it.

Worse still, monotony haunted the method. Persistently slow-paced was the music—sluggish length upon sluggish length. Thick and opaque was the harmonic and instrumental texture. In masses would Glazunov keep his orchestral voices moving; of the sonorities of the brass choir he never wearied. His matter was barren; but the more insistently he urged it. His sayings were empty; but the louder did they clamor. There were pages little short of platitude and bombast; pages of reiteration and manipulation, on which the music virtually stood still; pages that noted Mahler or Strauss among the best models of the symphonic hour; rare pages in which some fortunate turn, some gleam of individual imagination, a hint of compelling mood, animated the measure. So the first movement hushed to end, or the Scherzo clanged to climax. All else was the manufacture of music by an old hand—not too far from the German border. In forty minutes, few composers have written so much and said so little. Not a few wondered at Mr. Koussevitzky's obvious zeal and endless pains for such a music. pages. Lay listeners not a few applaude Yet by much report he extols it. Clearly, there are ears and ears for Glazunov.

Glinka, Glazunov, Lyadov—yet it was the familiar Chaikovsky that most saved the day and his familiar music to "Romeo and Juliet" that most enriched it—music, besides upon which the conductor could lavish, his ardors and the orchestra pour out its answering passion of song or stress. Above other composers, Chaikovsky found the melody for the lovers; sustained it unabated; imprinted it upon whomsoever hears. It rises out of the music of strife and thrusts away the tumult. It returns heightened and deepened. It sings requiem for the lovers dead. Mystery attends it; passion throbs in it; sensuous beauty clothes it; illusion upsprings from it. With reason, under the test of fifty years, it may pass among the rare and complete exercises of the imagination in music fulfilled

Much else in the overture-fantasia (as Chaikovsky chose to call his tone-poem) fittingly companions it. In a different fashion nowadays would the music of strife be written; but as it is, it maintains this contrast, carries forward the tonal narrative. Seldom has Chaikovsky better devised, conducted and cumulated a design. Fate, though it be called Friar Laurence, haunts the beginning. Out of tonal suspense bursts the music of the unquenchable strife. Twice the melody of the lovers conquers it. Even fate bends to the voice of such passion in such beauty sung. Crushed at last, in lament it yet pierces. For once Chaikovsky prevails unquestioned—and in an objective music. Berlioz wrote his symphony; Gounod and twenty other composers made their operas. Yet here is the one and only music to the lovers and their poetry tuned. The more the pity that Mr. Koussevitzky must now and then drop a tear as he sang.

H. T. P.

RUSSIAN DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Glazunov's Eighth Is Heard for First Time Here

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In a sense the chief item on the all-Russian programme given by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday, was the Eighth Symphony of Glazunov, a piece of large dimensions and of intricate and elaborate content, played for the first time in Boston.

But the greatest, indeed the only truly "great" music of the afternoon, was the final number on this Slavic programme, Tchaikowsky's Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet." Beside it in retrospect all else receded into the background.

IN GERMAN MOULD

Born in 1865 Glazunov completed this eighth of his symphonies in 1906, then abandoned symphonic composition, so the story goes, in superstitious fear lest, like Beethoven and Bruckner before him, he might write nine symphonies and no more. A pretty story, and mayhap a true one, but it is as likely that other considerations have kept Glazunov from attaining the mark set by two of his predecessors. Working gradually toward the goal of absolute music, existing of and for itself alone, Glazunov, at the outset a Russian Romanticist, became in this eighth symphony something not far removed from a German classicist. And further along that path he might hardly travel in symphonic composition.

There is in this symphony no faintest hint of programme and, outside the brooding slow movement, little suggestion that Slavic blood flows in the composer's veins. In the early years of the 20th century Mahler, Strauss and other post-Wagnerians, Teutonic by birth or affiliation, were writing symphonies and symphonic poems to which the German word "kolossal" was altogether applicable. And Glazunov, clearly enamoured of their methods, in this symphony proves himself a rival of no mean importance. Beside that of Mahler's and of the later Strauss his orchestra is comparatively modest in size. Three trumpets, a quartet of horns and woodwinds in threes suffice him. But in complexity of texture and in breadth of design he lags not behind his confreres.

Its Scherzo Breath-Taking

Marvels of contrapuntal ingenuity are to be found in this symphony. Structurally it is a notable achievement. As sheer music it repays the closest study. Nor is it necessary that which the Germans denote as "eye-music." It "sounds," if at times too thickly and with over-insistence in the brass choir. There is sweep and ardor in the broad chief theme of the first Allegro, and this movement and the scintillating, breath-taking Scherzo, a piece of virtuoso-writing, carry the hearer along. Again, there is in the second movement a grave eloquence, and the Finale, though more labored, more obviously contrived than the rest, is not without power.

That Mr. Koussevitzky and other Russians should hold this symphony in high esteem is not surprising. Tech-
y it is a monument to Russian
. It is dignified, serious, often ıg and impressive. But it lacks nal hall-mark of true genius and,
in the Scherzo, which Glazunov
among modern composers might written, it is devoid of striking iduality.

Extract from DAILY TELEGRAPH
London.

te ....

oussevitzky has certainly fluttered the dove-
of Boston by all accounts by the "modernity" it least parts of his programmes during the od of his office as conductor of the Boston
phony Orchestra, wherein he succeeded Pierre teux. In the latest concert there of which I e cognisance he played Stravinsky's "Sacre du ntemps," and, oddly enough, he astonished the tives by the comparative sobriety of his reading.
was expected that Monteux's reading would be
y much milder than that of the Slav conductor.
t in the event it appears that Koussevitzky paid
much more meticulous attention to detail, hereby revealing new beauties and new subtle-
s in the score, but impairing the overwhelming wer of the climaxes that made the work so esistible at its first hearing." This I find very eresting, because one would naturally regard oussevitzky as more ostensibly "tempera-ental" than Pierre Monteux, especially when aling with the music of his contemporary com-riots.

Harvard
Crimson
Feb 28

WILL CONDUCT GLEE CLUB AT SYMPHONY HALL CONCERT

MONSIEUR SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

Conductor of Boston Symphony Who Will Lead Brahms "Requiem"

KOUSSEVITSKY TO CONDUCT GLEE CLUB ON APRIL 16

Boston's Greatest Symphonic Leader Accepts Invitation of Dr. Davison—Has Never Been Guest Conductor

EXPRESSES ADMIRATION FOR WORK OF HARVARD MEN

M. Serge Koussevitsky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has recently accepted an invitation to lead the University Glee Club in the Brahms "Requiem", which will be performed at Symphony Hall on April 16. For the first time since his arrival in this country, M. Koussevitsky will act as guest conductor, and the concession is purely complimentary to the Glee Club. When interviewed by a CRIMSON reporter, he stated that he liked the chorus immensely, and admired the work it is doing in the field of choral music. Consequently he was pleased to accept the offer made by the club's regular conductor, Dr. A. T. Davison '06, particularly so because the Requiem, one of Brahms' greatest works, is a favorite with him.

Will Require Large Accompaniment

It is a particularly ambitious undertaking, and will require an accompaniment of 60 members of the Symphony Orchestra, about 125 voices from the Radcliffe Choral Society, and an equal number of Glee Club men. In addition, two professional concert singers have been chartered to do the baritone and soprano solos which occur from time to time. It is on account of the elaborate preparation required in the production, that the "Requiem" is very rarely heard in Boston.

To conduct this array of voices and instruments through a piece certainly not noted for its simplicity, is an undertaking worthy of Boston's greatest Symphonic leader. Born at Tver, in the north of Russia, M. Koussevitsky began the study of music very early in life. At the age of twelve he led the Municipal Orchestra in a brilliant concert, and was considered the prodigy of the age. Later he played the double bass in the Moscow Imperial Orchestra, until he again took up conducting.

During the last 20 years, M. Koussevitsky has acquired much fame at his work in England, Paris, and Leningrad, where he has done much to promote the dern school of music.

50

Transcript
Feb 28

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY MARSHALS ANEW HIS MUSCOVITES

RUSSIAN COMPOSERS IN VARIED ARRAY

Programs and Pleasures — Glinka and Lyadov for Entertainment — Glazunov Ponderous, Monotonous and Empty—Chaikovsky and the One and Only Music to "Romeo and Juliet"

TO his heart's content Mr. Koussevitzky may "unify" his programs—"all-French," "all-Russian," "all-German," as inclinat' n prompts him. The public of the Symphony Concerts is little likely to quarrel with him over the principle or the process. Most of it is contentedly unaware of either, asking only that the chosen pieces shall fill agreeably the two hours allotted, on a Friday or a Saturday, to Symphony Hall. By itself, in itself, for itself, each item comes and goes. If it pleases, so much the better for all concerned. If it fails to please, so runs the world away. A fortnight ago, exceeding few listeners thought the better or the worse of Monsieur d'Indy's Second Symphony, because other French music, of Messieurs Dukas, Roussel and Rabaud, happened to companion it. Lyadov's folk-pieces would have been amusing trifles yesterday afternoon, whatever preceded or followed them. The introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" will not be more or less itself when, next week, it has place on an "all-German" program.

So long as the music of the day gives the audience pleasure and diversified pleasure, it cares not a whit for the aggregate nationality or the cross-relations of the composers. The reproach to Dr. Muck's "unified" programs was the dulness and the monotony occasionally haunting them. Thus far, Mr. Koussevitzky's have escaped both pitfalls. If it pleases him to assort composers by race or generation, so be it. Even the most reflective of hearers are not likely to generalize about French music of the day before yesterday, when he drives in one leash d' Indy, Dukas and Rabaud; or to deduce the Russian soul from a collocation of Glinka and Glazunov; or to become Teutonically ruminant over the tie that may—or may not—bind the Mendelssohn of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" to the Strauss of "Salome." Conductors, like the rest of us, are entitled to their pastime. If it happens to be a "unified" program, have not we others our cross-word puzzles?

Besides, two of Mr. Koussevitzky's assembled Russians proved as amusing yes-zeal and endless pains for such a music. pages. Lay listeners not a few applaude Yet by much report he extols it. Clearly, there are ears and ears for Glazunov.

Glinka, Glazunov, Lyadov—yet it was the familiar Chaikovsky that most saved the day and his familiar music to "Romeo and Juliet" that most enriched it—music, besides upon which the conductor could lavish, his ardors and the orchestra pour out its answering passion of song or stress. Above other composers, Chaikovsky found the melody for the lovers; sustained it unabated; imprinted it upon whomsoever hears. It rises out of the music of strife and thrusts away the tumult. It returns heightened and deepened. It sings requiem for the lovers dead. Mystery attends it; passion throbs in it; sensuous beauty clothes it; illusion upsprings from it. With reason, under the test of fifty years, it may pass among the rare and complete exercises of the imagination in music fulfilled

Much else in the overture-fantasia (as Chaikovsky chose to call his tone-poem) fittingly companions it. In a different fashion nowadays would the music of strife be written; but as it is, it maintains this contrast, carries forward the tonal narrative. Seldom has Chaikovsky better devised, conducted and cumulated a design. Fate, though it be called Friar Laurence, Haunts the beginning. Out of tonal suspense bursts the music of the unquenchable strife. Twice the melody of the lovers conquers it. Even fate bends to the voice of such passion in such beauty sung. Crushed at last, in lament it yet pierces. For once Chaikovsky prevails unquestioned—and in an objective music. Berlioz wrote his symphony; Gounod and twenty other composers made their operas. Yet here is the one and only music to the lovers and their poetry tuned. The more the pity that Mr. Koussevitzky must now and then drop a tear as he sang.

H. T. P.

RUSSIAN DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Glazunov's Eighth Is Heard for First Time Here

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In a sense the chief item on the all-Russian programme given by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday, was the Eighth Symphony of Glazunov, a piece of large dimensions and of intricate and elaborate content, played for the first time in Boston.

But the greatest, indeed the only truly "great" music of the afternoon, was the final number on this Slavic programme, Tchaikowsky's Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet." Beside it in retrospect all else receded into the background.

IN GERMAN MOULD

Born in 1865 Glazunov completed this eighth of his symphonies in 1906, then abandoned symphonic composition, so the story goes, in superstitious fear lest, like Beethoven and Bruckner before him, he might write nine symphonies and no more. A pretty story, and mayhap a true one, but it is as likely that other considerations have kept Glazunov from attaining the mark set by two of his predecessors. Working gradually toward the goal of absolute music, existing of and for itself alone, Glazunov, at the outset a Russian Romanticist, became in this eighth symphony something not far removed from a German classicist. And further along that path he might hardly travel in symphonic composition.

There is in this symphony no faintest hint of programme and, outside the brooding slow movement, little suggestion that Slavic blood flows in the composer's veins. In the early years of the 20th century Mahler, Strauss and other post-Wagnerians, Teutonic by birth or affiliation, were writing symphonies and symphonic poems to which the German word "kolossal" was altogether applicable. And Glazunov, clearly enamoured of their methods, in this symphony proves himself a rival of no mean importance. Beside that of Mahler's and of the later Strauss his orchestra is comparatively modest in size. Three trumpets, a quartet of horns and woodwinds in threes suffice him. But in complexity of texture and in breadth of design he lags not behind his confreres.

Its Scherzo Breath-Taking

Marvels of contrapuntal ingenuity are to be found in this symphony. Structurally it is a notable achievement. As sheer music it repays the closest study. Nor is it necessary that which the Germans denote as "eye-music." It "sounds," if at times too thickly and with over-insistence in the brass choir. There is sweep and ardor in the broad chief theme of the first Allegro, and this movement and the scintillating, breath-taking Scherzo, a piece of virtuoso-writing, carry the hearer along. Again, there is in the second movement a grave eloquence, and the Finale, though more labored, more obviously contrived than the rest, is not without power.

That Mr. Koussevitzky and other Russians should hold this symphony in high esteem is not surprising. Tech-
y it is a monument to Russian
. It is dignified, serious, often ng and impressive. But it lacks nal hall-mark of true genius and,
in the Scherzo, which Glazunov
among modern composers might written, it is devoid of striking iduality.

Harvard
Crimson
Feb 28

WILL CONDUCT GLEE CLUB AT SYMPHONY HALL CONCERT

MONSIEUR SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

Conductor of Boston Symphony Who Will Lead Brahms "Requiem"

KOUSSEVITSKY TO CONDUCT GLEE CLUB ON APRIL 16

Boston's Greatest Symphonic Leader Accepts Invitation of Dr. Davison—Has Never Been Guest Conductor

EXPRESSES ADMIRATION FOR WORK OF HARVARD MEN

M. Serge Koussevitsky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has recently accepted an invitation to lead the University Glee Club in the Brahms "Requiem", which will be performed at Symphony Hall on April 16. For the first time since his arrival in this country, M. Koussevitsky will act as guest conductor, and the concession is purely complimentary to the Glee Club. When interviewed by a CRIMSON reporter, he stated that he liked the chorus immensely, and admired the work it is doing in the field of choral music. Consequently he was pleased to accept the offer made by the club's regular conductor, Dr. A. T. Davison '06, particularly so because the Requiem, one of Brahms' greatest works, is a favorite with him.

Will Require Large Accompaniment

It is a particularly ambitious undertaking, and will require an accompaniment of 60 members of the Symphony Orchestra, about 125 voices from the Radcliffe Choral Society, and an equal number of Glee Club men. In addition, two professional concert singers have been chartered to do the baritone and soprano solos which occur from time to time. It is on account of the elaborate preparation required in the production, that the "Requiem" is very rarely heard in Boston.

To conduct this array of voices and instruments through a piece certainly not noted for its simplicity, is an undertaking worthy of Boston's greatest Symphonic leader. Born at Tver, in the north of Russia, M. Koussevitsky began the study of music very early in life. At the age of twelve he led the Municipal Orchestra in a brilliant concert, and was considered the prodigy of the age. Later he played the double bass in the Moscow Imperial Orchestra, until he again took up conducting.

During the last 20 years, M. Koussevitsky has acquired much fame at his work in England, Paris, and Leningrad, where he has done much to promote the modern school of music.

Extract from
DAILY TELEGRAPH
London.

te ....

Koussevitzky has certainly fluttered the dovecots of Boston by all accounts by the "modernity" of at least parts of his programmes during the period of his office as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wherein he succeeded Pierre Monteux. In the latest concert there of which I have cognisance he played Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," and, oddly enough, he astonished the natives by the comparative sobriety of his reading. It was expected that Monteux's reading would be very much milder than that of the Slav conductor. But in the event it appears that Koussevitzky paid a much more meticulous attention to detail, "thereby revealing new beauties and new subtleties in the score, but impairing the overwhelming power of the climaxes that made the work so irresistible at its first hearing." This I find very interesting, because one would naturally regard Koussevitzky as more ostensibly "temperamental" than Pierre Monteux, especially when dealing with the music of his contemporary compatriots.

xamination of Our Qualities and the Superior Values that are Offered

New ds and Coat
Summer 1925

gs on the Fifth Floor are well wor the best foreign and domestic g the latest weaves in coatings are ls the following weaves are now muc nnels, Kashmir, Charmeen, Poiret a d, we mention these four special valu

54-Inch
Bordered Flann
at $3.85
Graduated Candy Striped F dresses are very fashionable i ors: Rose, Tan, Powder Blue,
Rust. (Also at $5.45).

54-Inch Wool Repp at $ A popular weave for dresses in these colors: Silver, Lanv Sand, Monterey, Rose, and P with fancy silk stripes.

50

Transcript
Feb 28

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY MARSHALS ANEW HIS MUSCOVITES

RUSSIAN COMPOSERS IN VARIED ARRAY

Programs and Pleasures — Glinka and Lyadov for Entertainment — Glazunov Ponderous, Monotonous and Empty— Chaikovsky and the One and Only Music to "Romeo and Juliet"

TO his heart's content Mr. Koussevitzky may "unify" his programs—"all-French," "all-Russian," "all-German," as inclination prompts him. The public of the Symphony Concerts is little likely to quarrel with him over the principle or the process. Most of it is contentedly unaware of either, asking only that the chosen pieces shall fill agreeably the two hours allotted, on a Friday or a Saturday, to Symphony Hall. By itself, in itself, for itself, each item comes and goes. If it pleases, so much the better for all concerned. If it fails to please, so runs the world away. A fortnight ago, exceeding few listeners thought the better or the worse of Monsieur d'Indy's Second Symphony, because other French music, of Messieurs Dukas, Roussel and Rabaud, happened to companion it. Lyadov's folk-pieces would have been amusing trifles yesterday afternoon, whatever preceded or followed them. The introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" will not be more or less itself when, next week, it has place on an "all-German" program.

So long as the music of the day gives the audience pleasure and diversified pleasure, it cares not a whit for the aggregate nationality or the cross-relations of the composers. The reproach to Dr. Muck's "unified" programs was the dulness and the monotony occasionally haunting them. Thus far, Mr. Koussevitzky's have escaped both pitfalls. If it pleases him to assort composers by race or generation, so be it. Even the most reflective of hearers are not likely to generalize about French music of the day before yesterday, when he drives in one leash d' Indy, Dukas and Rabaud; or to deduce the Russian soul from a collocation of Glinka and Glazunov; or to become Teutonically ruminant over the tie that may —or may not—bind the Mendelssohn of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" to the Strauss of "Salome." Conductors, like the rest of us, are entitled to their pastime. If it happens to be a "unified" program, have not we others our cross-word puzzles?

Besides, two of Mr. Koussevitzky's assembled Russians proved as amusing yes[illegible] True, the sum-zeal and endless pains for such a music. pages. Lay listeners not a few applaude Yet by much report he extols it. Clearly, there are ears and ears for Glazunov.

Glinka, Glazunov, Lyadov—yet it was the familiar Chaikovsky that most saved the day and his familiar music to "Romeo and Juliet" that most enriched it—music, besides upon which the conductor could lavish, his ardors and the orchestra pour out its answering passion of song or stress. Above other composers, Chaikovsky found the melody for the lovers; sustained it unabated; imprinted it upon whomsoever hears. It rises out of the music of strife and thrusts away the tumult. It returns heightened and deepened. It sings requiem for the lovers dead. Mystery attends it; passion throbs in it; sensuous beauty clothes it; illusion upsprings from it. With reason, under the test of fifty years, it may pass among the rare and complete exercises of the imagination in music fulfilled

Much else in the overture-fantasia (as Chaikovsky chose to call his tone-poem) fittingly companions it. In a different fashion nowadays would the music of strife be written; but as it is, it maintains this contrast, carries forward the tonal narrative. Seldom has Chaikovsky better devised, conducted and cumulated a design. Fate, though it be called Friar Laurence, Haunts the beginning. Out of tonal suspense bursts the music of the unquenchable strife. Twice the melody of the lovers conquers it. Even fate bends to the voice of such passion in such beauty sung. Crushed at last, in lament it yet pierces. For once Chaikovsky prevails unquestioned—and in an objective music. Berlioz wrote his symphony; Gounod and twenty other composers made their operas. Yet here is the one and only music to the lovers and their poetry tuned. The more the pity that Mr. Koussevitzky must now and then drop a tear as he sang.

H. T. P.

RUSSIAN DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Glazunov's Eighth Is Heard for First Time Here

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In a sense the chief item on the all-Russian programme given by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday, was the Eighth Symphony of Glazunov, a piece of large dimensions and of intricate and elaborate content, played for the first time in Boston.

But the greatest, indeed the only truly "great" music of the afternoon, was the final number on this Slavic programme, Tchaikowsky's Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet." Beside it in retrospect all else receded into the background.

IN GERMAN MOULD

Born in 1865 Glazunov completed this eighth of his symphonies in 1906, then abandoned symphonic composition, so the story goes, in superstitious fear lest, like Beethoven and Bruckner before him, he might write nine symphonies and no more. A pretty story, and mayhap a true one, but it is as likely that other considerations have kept Glazunov from attaining the mark set by two of his predecessors. Working gradually toward the goal of absolute music, existing of and for itself alone, Glazunov, at the outset a Russian Romanticist, became in this eighth symphony something not far removed from a German classicist. And further along that path he might hardly travel in symphonic composition.

There is in this symphony no faintest hint of programme and, outside the brooding slow movement, little suggestion that Slavic blood flows in the composer's veins. In the early years of the 20th century Mahler, Strauss and other post-Wagnerians, Teutonic by birth or affiliation, were writing symphonies and symphonic poems to which the German word "kolossal" was altogether applicable. And Glazunov, clearly enamoured of their methods, in this symphony proves himself a rival of no mean importance. Beside that of Mahler's and of the later Strauss his orchestra is comparatively modest in size. Three trumpets, a quartet of horns and woodwinds in threes suffice him. But in complexity of texture and in breadth of design he lags not behind his confreres.

Its Scherzo Breath-Taking

Marvels of contrapuntal ingenuity are to be found in this symphony. Structurally it is a notable achievement. As sheer music it repays the closest study. Nor is it necessary that which the Germans denote as "eye-music." It "sounds," if at times too thickly and with over-insistence in the brass choir. There is sweep and ardor in the broad chief theme of the first Allegro, and this movement and the scintillating, breath-taking Scherzo, a piece of virtuoso-writing, carry the hearer along. Again, there is in the second movement a grave eloquence, and the Finale, though more labored, more obviously contrived than the rest, is not without power.

That Mr. Koussevitzky and other Russians should hold this symphony in high esteem is not surprising. Technically it is a monument to Russian music. It is dignified, serious, often stirring and impressive. But it lacks the final hall-mark of true genius and, save in the Scherzo, which Glazunov alone among modern composers might have written, it is devoid of striking dividuality.

Extract from DAILY TELEGF
London.

te [illegible]

Koussevitzky has certainly fluttered the dovecots of Boston by all accounts by the "modernity" of at least parts of his programmes during the period of his office as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wherein he succeeded Pierre Monteux. In the latest concert there of which I have cognisance he played Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," and, oddly enough, he astonished the natives by the comparative sobriety of his reading. It was expected that Monteux's reading would be very much milder than that of the Slav conductor. But in the event it appears that Koussevitzky paid a much more meticulous attention to detail, "thereby revealing new beauties and new subtleties in the score, but impairing the overwhelming power of the climaxes that made the work so irresistible at its first hearing." This I find very interesting, because one would naturally regard Koussevitzky as more ostensibly "temperamental" than Pierre Monteux, especially when dealing with the music of his contemporary compatriots.

Harvard
Crimson
Feb 28

WILL CONDUCT GLEE CLUB AT SYMPHONY HALL CONCERT

MONSIEUR SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

Conductor of Boston Symphony Who Will Lead Brahms "Requiem"

KOUSSEVITSKY TO CONDUCT GLEE CLUB ON APRIL 16

Boston's Greatest Symphonic Leader Accepts Invitation of Dr. Davison— Has Never Been Guest Conductor

EXPRESSES ADMIRATION FOR WORK OF HARVARD MEN

M. Serge Koussevitsky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has recently accepted an invitation to lead the University Glee Club in the Brahms "Requiem", which will be performed at Symphony Hall on April 16. For the first time since his arrival in this country, M. Koussevitsky will act as guest conductor, and the concession is purely complimentary to the Glee Club. When interviewed by a CRIMSON reporter, he stated that he liked the chorus immensely, and admired the work it is doing in the field of choral music. Consequently he was pleased to accept the offer made by the club's regular conductor, Dr. A. T. Davison '06, particularly so because the Requiem, one of Brahms' greatest works, is a favorite with him.

Will Require Large Accompaniment

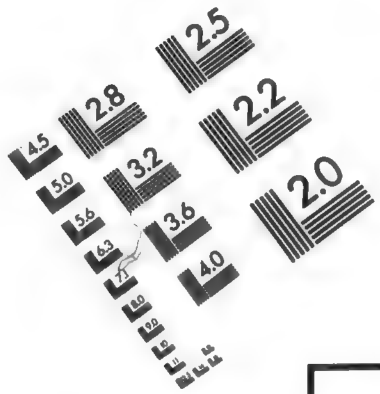
It is a particularly ambitious undertaking, and will require an accompaniment of 60 members of the Symphony Orchestra, about 125 voices from the Radcliffe Choral Society, and an equal number of Glee Club men. In addition, two professional concert singers have been chartered to do the baritone and soprano solos which occur from time to time. It is on account of the elaborate preparation required in the production, that the "Requiem" is very rarely heard in Boston.

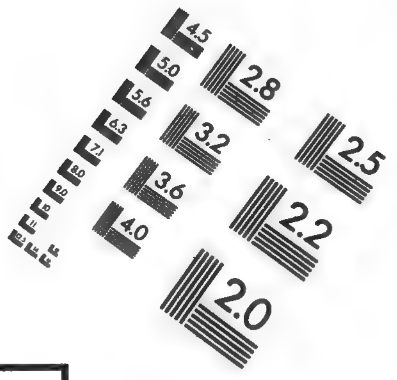
To conduct this array of voices and instruments through a piece certainly not noted for its simplicity, is an undertaking worthy of Boston's greatest Symphonic leader. Born at Tver, in the north of Russia, M. Koussevitsky began the study of music very early in life. At the age of twelve he led the Municipal Orchestra in a brilliant concert, and was considered the prodigy of the age. Later he played the double bass in the Moscow Imperial Orchestra, until he again took up conducting.

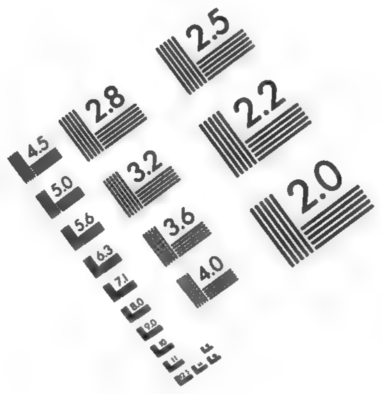
During the last 20 years, M. Koussevitsky has acquired much fame at his work in England, Paris, and Leningrad, where he has done much to promote the modern school of music.

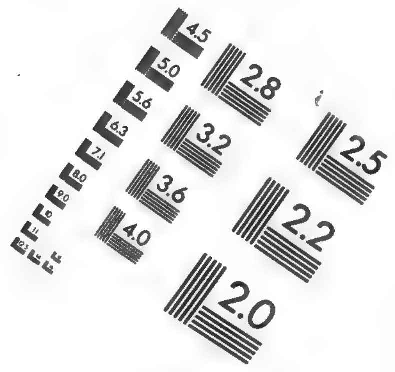
REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





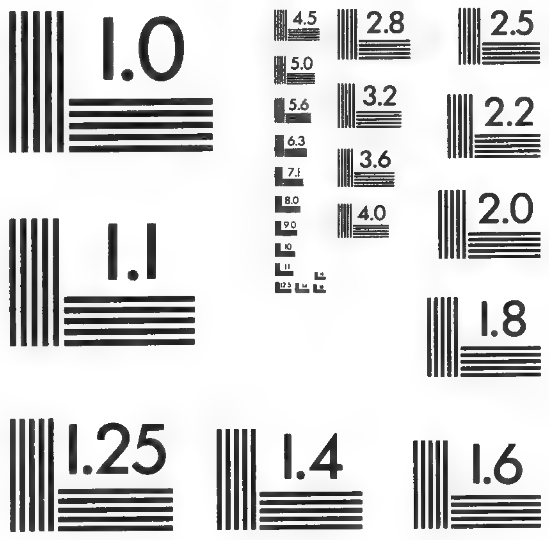




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

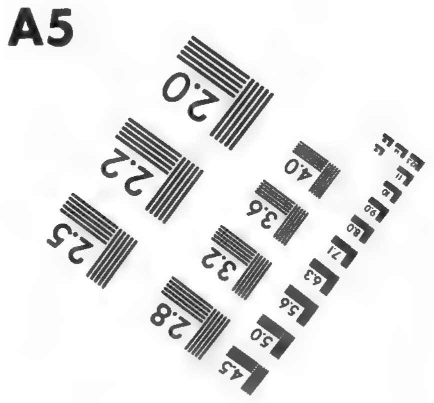
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

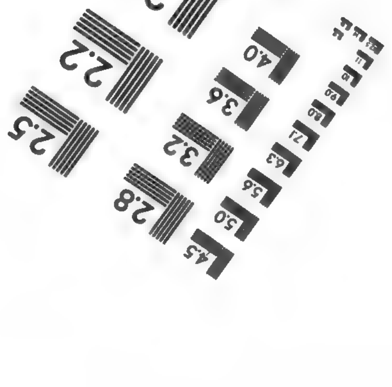
2.5 mm

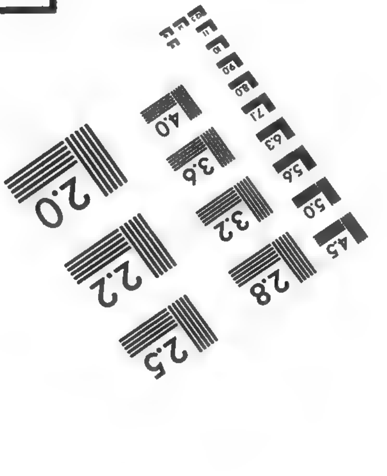
A5



A4

A3





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Issue of

MAR 1925

Third Visit of Boston Symphony

Fortunately for the reviewer of reviews, when Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony paid their third visit of the season to New York in the last days of January, only two of the critics, reporting the event, chose to dwell quotably upon the same feature of a distinctly varied and in large part unusual program.

Mr. Gilman of the Herald Tribune gave us some instructive and penetrating comments on the Concerto for Orchestra by C. P. E. Bach (a son of Johann Sebastian), arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg. Mr. Henderson of the Sun held forth interestingly upon the appearance of Roland Hayes as soloist in Liszt's setting of the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch (accompaniment arranged for orchestra by Busoni), and the Air, "Repose of the Holy Family," from "The Flight into Egypt" by Berlioz; while Mr. Newman of the Evening Post and Mr. Downes of the Times devoted considerable space to a discussion of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, with which the program ended.

"The orchestral concerto of Emanuel Bach was new to New York, though it was performed by the Philadelphia orchestra in 1923 for the first time in America," says Mr. Gilman. "This music is at times amazingly contemporaneous—there are suggestions of 'Parsifal' in the passage for muted strings and at the end of the slow movement. The whole concerto is delightful. Why it should have waited fourteen years for a New York performance (the orchestral arrangement was published in 1911) is just another one of those mysteries of our local concert programs." Mr. Gilman also supplies the information that Maximilian Steinberg, who composed the orchestral arrangement, is a son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Of the appearance of Roland Hayes, Mr. Henderson says that he does not recall any previous appearance of a Negro soloist with any of the great orchestras in their series of concerts, and adds: "We have heard Mr. Hayes sing better than he did in the Liszt number, in which his voice seemed singularly heavy, except in a few ringing high notes, and his style labored. But we never heard him sing anything more beautifully than he sang the Berlioz number. To say that is equivalent to saying that it was sung pretty nearly as well as possible."

Coming down to the Tchaikovsky symphony, Mr. Newman declares "Koussevitzky's reading of Tchaikovsky Number Five is his own, and opinion about it will be divided. . . . If you take a view that in a work like this—a long chapter of highly emotional self-confession—the conductor is an actor as truly as the player of Hamlet or Oedipus is, you must allow the actor of genius to play the part as he feels it. . . . It is futile to turn on him and say that you do not like such a character as he portrays. It is equally irrelevant, aesthetically, to say that you have no sympathy with a character so neurotic as the Tchaikovsky whom Koussevitzky shows us in the first two movements of the symphony. . . . One might or might not agree with or like this reading; but it will be some time before any one who heard it will forget it."

Of Koussevitzky's reading of the mooted Fifth, Olin Downes of the Times remarks that "nothing could better illustrate the variety and contrast of qualities that go to the making of Sergei Koussevitzky than the performance of this symphony." In the opening movements, which Mr. Downes declares "is Tchaikovsky in his most sentimental, despondent, self-pitying vein," this critic thought that Mr. Koussevitzky "did not escape the suspicion of pandering to public taste and craving the opportunity which the work gives the conductor for self-display." In the finale, however, says Mr. Downes, "conductor and composer drew themselves up to an incredible height in the most nobly affirmative music Tchaikovsky ever wrote. . . . In majesty, irresistible power, and in the control retained by the conductor, this was a performance to remember—a performance of heroic and kindling glory.

"It is no ordinary musician, no ordinary man, who does a thing like that—and it has been apparent ere this that Mr. Koussevitzky, in his singular greatness and inequalities, is not an artist to be reckoned with by ordinary measurements."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 1 1925

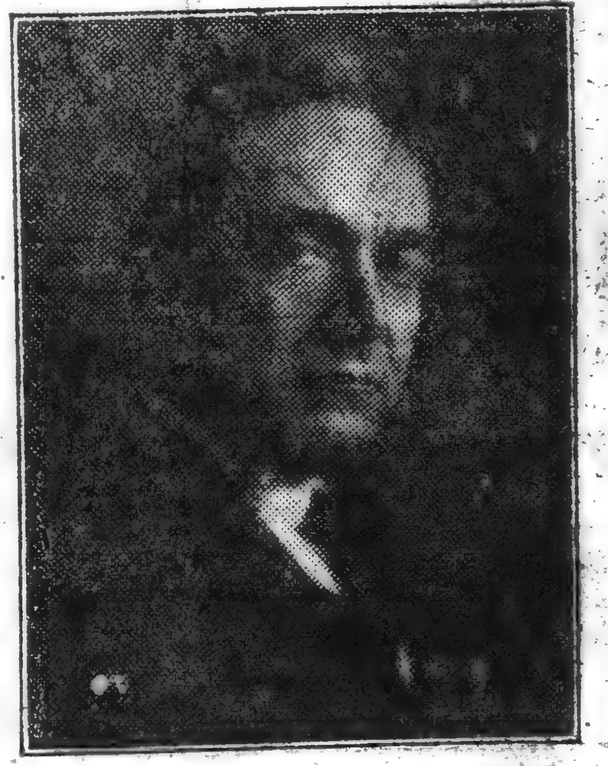
The next Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor, will be given at ~~the~~ Academy on Friday evening, March 13. The soloist will be that admirable American violinist, Albert Spalding, whose are challenges comparison with that of the world's leading masters of the violin.

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

MAR 1 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE ON MARCH 25TH

Serge Koussevitzky, Distinguished Russian Conductor, Will Wield Baton



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

With the seat sale for the Boston Symphony concert in this City March 25 opening tomorrow, it is interesting to learn that the Portland Music Commission's enterprise in bringing this great orchestra to Maine represents the only opportunity Maine people could possibly have had to hear the great orchestra under its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, this year.

So great has been the vogue of the distinguished Russian who is this season for the first time wielding the baton at Boston Symphony concerts that both the New York and Boston series are already completely subscribed, and the visitor to those cities has no chance to hear the orchestra.

Some little indication of how great Koussevitzky's triumphs have been this season is afforded by the following comment of a Boston Globe writer:

"Koussevitzky's New York debut, November 27, and the second New York concert, November 29, were triumphs as great as the Boston debut last October for the new conductor of the Boston Symphony. There was a chorus of praise from the New York reviewers. Only one notice, Pitts Sanborn, in the Telegram—Mail, was unfavorable. Deems Taylor in the World, W. J. Henderson in the Sun, Ernest Newman in the Evening Post, and Olin Downes in the Times, were enthusiastic. Lawrence Gilman in the Herald-Tribune admitted that Koussevitzky is a conductor of the first rank, but objected to his tendency to go to extremes of pianissimo and fortissimo. A more tangible evidence of the unparalleled success of Koussevitzky is the fact that every ticket is now sold for the season for the following series, comprising nearly every concert offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season—24 Friday afternoons, 24 Saturday evenings, 5 Monday evenings in Boston, 9 Thursday evenings in Cambridge, 5 Thursday evenings in New York, and 5 Saturday matinees in New York.

"The only way people without season tickets can now hear the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky hereabouts is to stand in line for one of the 505 rush seats in the second balcony Friday afternoons, for which no tickets are issued, or wait in line for the unreserved balcony over the stage at the Cambridge concerts, or buy single tickets for the extra concert next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall in aid of the Orchestra's Pension Fund. Perhaps the ticket agencies have a few season tickets which they sell singly, but if so the premium is high. Moral, buy your season ticket for next year early. Unless you put your name on a waiting list now you may not get a ticket, and most of them are re-engaged by subscribers from year to year.

"And hearing the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky is nearly always a stirring emotional experience. Never within the past 15 years, to the certain knowledge of the present writer, and probably never in the history of the Orchestra, has the Friday afternoon audience responded so keenly to any and all music played. The new con-

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 1 1925

The next Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given at the Academy on Friday evening March 13. The soloist will be that admirable American violinist, Albert Spalding, whose art challenges comparison with that of the world's leading masters of the violin.

Herald
Mar 1

Mr. Koussevitzky apparently is preparing what are known as "unit" programs. A better term would be "national" programs. We have already had a Russian and a French. Next week we are to have a German program, a strictly orthodox one, including even the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music for "Midsummer Night's Dream." The only contemporary German composer represented is Richard Strauss. It is rumored that there will be an "American program." An "Italian program," comprising works by Italians now living would be interesting, and surely, one in honor of English composers could be easily arranged. A Scandinavian might fall flat, even with a symphony by Sibelius—nationality being stretched a little in his case.

The danger in arranging programs according to nations is that they may be lacking in contrast, and contrast is the life of a program. Some conductors have thought it served an educational purpose to put symphonies by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven in a row to show symphonic development. This has been done in concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, but many in the audience yawned while the music was playing and sought relief by a diligent perusal of the advertisements in the program book.

Program making is a great art. No program pleases everyone, and a conductor may expect to hear from this or that quarter: Why did you perform that symphony (symphonic poem, overture)? Mr. Gericke was in the habit of spending a month of his vacation in preparing programs for the forthcoming season, and for the out-of-town concerts. Theodore Thomas was a skilful program-maker; so was Mr. Henschel while he was trying to learn his trade as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. We have had conductors in the past whose programs were apparently chosen by drawing titles, blindfolded, from a hat.

The Menestrel of Feb. 6 stated that the management of the Concertgebouw at Amsterdam is in correspondence with Mr. Monteux as to his conducting the concerts of 1925-26 during Mr. Mengelberg's sojourn in New York. Dr. Muck, it is said, does not wish to conduct the concerts in Amsterdam next season.

Globe
Mar 1

This week's Symphony concert is to have a German program. Mr Koussevitzky is certainly going the round of the Nations. One observes with regret that German music since 1914 is not represented. "Salome's Dance" from Straus's opera is the latest work in order of composition. Does not Koussevitzky's modernism extend beyond Russia and France? He has yet to give us a modern English or modern Italian piece. If Stravinsky why not Schoenberg? In Chicago the other day Mr Stock put a piece by Bela Bartok on the program of the Chicago Orchestra. Mr Monteux did give us early Schoenberg in "Verklaerte Nacht." Dr Muck's performance of the Five Orchestral Pieces by Schoenberg astonished everybody 10 years ago. Would these pieces if Koussevitzky were to revive them sound as queer today?

◆ ◆ ◆

Also, why does not Koussevitzky play Griffe's "Khubla Khan," up to the present unsurpassed among American compositions for orchestra heard in Boston? It is better worth reviving than half the mediocre European stuff we hear year in year out at these concerts, though nobody would claim it ranked with Mozart or Debussy or any other of the first 10 composers.

◆ ◆ ◆

The above remarks are offered as "constructive criticism." Nobody can make programs to satisfy every one of the numerous conflicting factions among the Symphony audiences. At least no conductor in Boston has yet done so.

BANGOR
ME.
COMMERCIAL
MAR 2 1925

Boston Symphony Visits Portland Late in March

There is keen interest in the coming appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its remarkable new leader, Serge Koussevitzky, at a concert in City hall, Portland, March 25, under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission.

Although this orchestra which has long stood for the very highest achievement in symphonic performance has had a long line of distinguished conductors, not one of them has drawn more general attention nor had more rapturous praise heaped upon him than Serge Koussevitzky. And Koussevitzky has been a success not only from an artistic but from a box office standpont. Both the New York and Boston series of Boston Symphony concerts are subscribed for the entire season, according to W. J. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, which means that had it not been for the enterprise of the Portland Music Commission in securing the line orchestra for Portland even Maine people in Boston or New York would have been unable to hear it.

The very fact that the sympl concert presents such a rare portunity is expected to patrons from all parts of M Koussevitzky is not only a cond of rare genius, not only does he a vivid and compelling person but he has the happy facult building programs that have spread popular appeal. No on instill a more vivid and bea life into the music of the century, but likewise no con scrutinizes more eagerly champions more staunchly understandingly the truly imp music of the day.

Herald
Mar 1

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

A German program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Koussevitzky, at the 18th pair of concerts to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mahler's intermezzo to Weber's "Die Drei Pintos"; Brahms's third symphony, F-major; Mendelssohn's scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; prelude to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner, and the dance of Salome from Strauss's "Salome."

SAN ANTONIO,
TEX.
EXPRESS

MAR 1 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian conductor, on his arrival to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced that he had no intention of attempting to startle his American audiences with sensational ultra-modern music. He praised jazz because "it springs from life itself—the dance instinct."

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 2 1925

the lagging affections of her

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Far and beyond in importance and interest to any other musical event of this season is the concert to be given in the Capitol theatre Wednesday evening, March 11, by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 105 artists, under the brilliant leadership of Serge Koussevitzky and management of Ben Franklin, anouncement of which was recently made by Mr. Franklin. If there is such a thing as a red letter event, surely this is it, for the concert will be one of greatest importance musically, in fact the climax of the season in the Albany radius. This is a concert that cannot be excelled in interest, enthusiasm and enjoyment, and every music lover will gladly acknowledge that fact. The Boston Symphony has been here before—it is the most popular of all orchestral organizations with Albanians—but never under the direction of the great Koussevitzky, and his appearance will be awaited with interest. Efforts are now being made to secure a program that will meet with the satisfaction of all interested. For the concert, seats are already on sale by mail and phone order to Mr. Franklin at 18 Chestnut street, and the interest is so great that in all probability the house will be sold out before the date of the office sale at the theatre, Sat

TIMES-UNION,

Issue of

MAR 1925

Third Visit of Boston Symphony

Fortunately for the reviewer of reviews, when Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony paid their third visit of the season to New York in the last days of January, only two of the critics, reporting the event, chose to dwell quotably upon the same feature of a distinctly varied and in large part unusual program.

Mr. Gilman of the Herald Tribune gave us some instructive and penetrating comments on the Concerto for Orchestra by C. P. E. Bach (a son of Johann Sebastian), arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg. Mr. Henderson of the Sun held forth interestingly upon the appearance of Roland Hayes as soloist in Liszt's setting of the 104th Sonnet of Petrarch (accompaniment arranged for orchestra by Busoni), and the Air, "Repose of the Holy Family," from "The Flight into Egypt" by Berlioz, while Mr. Newman of the Evening Post and Mr. Downes of the Times devoted considerable space to a discussion of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, with which the program ended.

"The orchestral concerto of Emanuel Bach was new to New York, though it was performed by the Philadelphia orchestra in 1923 for the first time in America," says Mr. Gilman. "This music is at times amazingly contemporaneous—there are suggestions of 'Parsifal' in the passage for muted strings and at the end of the slow movement. The whole concerto is delightful. Why it should have waited fourteen years for a New York performance (the orchestral arrangement was published in 1911) is just another one of those mysteries of our local concert programs." Mr. Gilman also supplies the information that Maximilian Steinberg, who composed the orchestral arrangement, is a son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Of the appearance of Roland Hayes, Mr. Henderson says that he does not recall any previous appearance of a Negro soloist with any of the great orchestras in their series of concerts, and adds: "We have heard Mr. Hayes sing better than he did in the Liszt number, in which his voice seemed singularly heavy, except in a few ringing high notes, and his style labored. But we never heard him sing anything more beautifully than he sang the Berlioz number. To say that is equivalent to saying that it was sung pretty nearly as well as possible."

Coming down to the Tchaikovsky symphony, Mr. Newman declares "Koussevitzky's reading of Tchaikovsky Number Five is his own, and opinion about it will be divided. . . . If you take a view that in a work like this—a long chapter of highly emotional self-confession—the conductor is an actor as truly as the player of Hamlet or Oedipus is, you must allow the actor of genius to play the part as he feels it. . . . It is futile to turn on him and say that you do not like such a character as he portrays. It is equally irrelevant, aesthetically, to say that you have no sympathy with a character so neurotic as the Tchaikovsky whom Koussevitzky shows us in the first two movements of the symphony. . . . One might or might not agree with or like this reading; but it will be some time before any one who heard it will forget it."

Of Koussevitzky's reading of the mooted Fifth, Olin Downes of the Times remarks that "nothing could better illustrate the variety and contrast of qualities that go to the making of Sergei Koussevitzky than the performance of this symphony." In the opening movements, which Mr. Downes declares "is Tchaikovsky in his most sentimental, despondent, self-pitying vein," this critic thought that Mr. Koussevitzky "did not escape the suspicion of pandering to public taste and craving the opportunity which the work gives the conductor for self-display." In the finale, however, says Mr. Downes, "conductor and composer drew themselves up to an incredible height in the most nobly affirmative music Tchaikovsky ever wrote. . . . In majesty, irresistible power, and in the control retained by the conductor, this was a performance to remember—a performance of heroic and kindling glory.

"It is no ordinary musician, no ordinary man, who does a thing like that—and it has been apparent ere this that Mr. Koussevitzky, in his singular greatness and inequalities, is not an artist to be reckoned with by ordinary measurements."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 1 1925

The next Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor, will be given at the Academy on Friday evening, March 13. The soloist will be that admirable American violinist, Albert Spalding, whose are challenges comparison with that of the world's leading masters of the violin.

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

MAR 1 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE ON MARCH 25TH

Serge Koussevitzky, Distinguished Russian Conductor, Will Wield Baton

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

With the seat sale for the Boston Symphony concert in this City March 25 opening tomorrow, it is interesting to learn that the Portland Music Commission's enterprise in bringing this great orchestra to Maine represents the only opportunity Maine people could possibly have had to hear the great orchestra under its new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, this year.

So great has been the vogue of the distinguished Russian who is this season for the first time wielding the baton at Boston Symphony concerts that both the New York and Boston series are already completely subscribed, and the visitor to those cities has no chance to hear the orchestra.

Some little indication of how great Koussevitzky's triumphs have been this season is afforded by the following comment of a Boston Globe writer:

"Koussevitzky's New York debut, November 27, and the second New York concert, November 29, were triumphs as great as the Boston debut last October for the new conductor of the Boston Symphony. There was a chorus of praise from the New York reviewers. Only one notice, Pitts Sanborn, in the Telegram—Mail, was unfavorable. Deems Taylor in the World, W. J. Henderson in the Sun, Ernest Newman in the Evening Post, and Olin Downes in the Times, were enthusiastic. Lawrence Gilman in the Herald-Tribune admitted that Koussevitzky is a conductor of the first rank, but objected to his tendency to go to extremes of pianissimo and fortissimo. A more tangible evidence of the unparalleled success of Koussevitzky is the fact that every ticket is now sold for the season for the following series, comprising nearly every concert offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season—24 Friday afternoons, 24 Saturday evenings, 5 Monday evenings in Boston, 9 Thursday evenings in Cambridge, 5 Thursday evenings in New York, and 5 Saturday matinees in New York.

'The only way people without season tickets can now hear the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky hereabouts is to stand in line for one of the 505 rush seats in the second balcony Friday afternoons, for which no tickets are issued, or wait in line for the unreserved balcony over the stage at the Cambridge concerts, or buy single tickets for the extra concert next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall in aid of the Orchestra's Pension Fund. Perhaps the ticket agencies have a few season tickets which they sell singly, but if so the premium is high. Moral, buy your season ticket for next year early. Unless you put your name on a waiting list now you may not get a ticket, and most of them are re-engaged by subscribers from year to year.

"And hearing the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky is nearly always a stirring emotional experience. Never within the past 15 years, to the certain knowledge of the present writer, and probably never in the history of the Orchestra, has the Friday afternoon audience responded so keenly to any and all music played. The new con-

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 1 1925

The next Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given at the Academy on Friday evening March 13. The soloist will be that admirable American violinist, Albert Spalding, whose art challenges comparison with that of the world's leading masters of the violin.

Herald

Mar 1

Mr. Koussevitzky apparently is preparing what are known as "unit" programs. A better term would be "national" programs. We have already had a Russian and a French. Next week we are to have a German program, a strictly orthodox one, including even the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music for "Midsummer Night's Dream." The only contemporary German composer represented is Richard Strauss. It is rumored that there will be an "American program." An "Italian program," comprising works by Italians now living would be interesting, and surely, one in honor of English composers could be easily arranged. A Scandinavian might fall flat, even with a symphony by Sibelius—nationality being stretched a little in his case.

The danger in arranging programs according to nations is that they may be lacking in contrast, and contrast is the life of a program. Some conductors have thought it served an educational purpose to put symphonies by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven in a row to show symphonic development. This has been done in concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, but many in the audience yawned while the music was playing and sought relief by a diligent perusal of the advertisements in the program book.

Program making is a great art. No program pleases everyone, and a conductor may expect to hear from this or that quarter: Why did you perform that symphony (symphonic poem, overture)? Mr. Gericke was in the habit of spending a month of his vacation in preparing programs for the forthcoming season, and for the out-of-town concerts. Theodore Thomas was a skilful program-maker; so was Mr. Henschel while he was trying to learn his trade as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. We have had conductors in the past whose programs were apparently chosen by drawing titles, blindfolded, from a hat.

The Menestrel of Feb. 6 stated that the management of the Concertgebouw at Amsterdam is in correspondence with Mr. Monteux as to his conducting the concerts of 1925-26 during Mr. Mengelberg's sojourn in New York. Dr. Muck, it is said, does not wish to conduct the concerts in Amsterdam next season.

Globe

Mar 1

This week's Symphony concert is to have a German program. Mr Koussevitsky is certainly going the round of the Nations. One observes with regret that German music since 1914 is not represented. "Salome's Dance" from Straus's opera is the latest work in order of composition. Does not Koussevitsky's modernism extend beyond Russia and France? He has yet to give us a modern English or modern Italian piece. If Stravinsky why not Schoenberg? In Chicago the other day Mr Stock put a piece by Bela Bartok on the program of the Chicago Orchestra. Mr Monteux did give us early Schoenberg in "Verklaerte Nacht." Dr Muck's performance of the Five Orchestral Pieces by Schoenberg astonished everybody 10 years ago. Would these pieces if Koussevitsky were to revive them sound as queer today?

◆

Also, why does not Koussevitsky play Griffe's "Khubla Khan," up to the present unsurpassed among American compositions for orchestra heard in Boston? It is better worth reviving than half the mediocre European stuff we hear year in year out at these concerts, though nobody would claim it ranked with Mozart or Debussy or any other of the first 10 composers.

◆

The above remarks are offered as "constructive criticism." Nobody can make programs to satisfy every one of the numerous conflicting factions among the Symphony audiences. At least no conductor in Boston has yet done so.

Herald

Mar 1

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

A German program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Koussevitzky, at the 18th pair of concerts to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mahler's intermezzo to Weber's "Die Drei Pintos"; Brahms's third symphony, F-major Mendelssohn's scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; prelude to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner, and the dance of Salome from Strauss's "Salome."

SAN ANTONIO,
TEX.
EXPRESS

MAR 1 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian conductor, on his arrival to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced that he had no intention of attempting to startle his American audiences with sensational ultra-modern music. He praised jazz because "it springs from life itself—the dance instinct."

BANGOR
ME.
COMMERCIAL
MAR 2 1925

Boston Symphony Visits Portland Late in March

There is keen interest in the coming appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its remarkable new leader, Serge Koussevitzky, at a concert in City hall, Portland, March 25, under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission.

Although this orchestra which has long stood for the very highest achievement in symphonic performance has had a long line of distinguished conductors, not one of them has drawn more general attention nor had more rapturous praise heaped upon him than Serge Koussevitzky. And Koussevitzky has been a success not only from an artistic but from a box office standpont. Both the New York and Boston series of Boston Symphony concerts are subscribed for the entire season, according to W. J. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, which means that had it not been for the enterprise of the Portland Music Commission in securing the line orchestra for Portland even Maine people in Boston or New York would have been unable to hear it.

The very fact that the sympl concert presents such a rare portunity is expected to patrons from all parts of M Koussevitzky is not only a cond of rare genius, not only does he a vivid and compelling person but he has the happy facult building programs that have spread popular appeal. No on instill a more vivid and bea life into the music of the century, but likewise no cond scrutinizes more eagerly champions more staunchly understandingly the truly imp music of the day.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 2 1925

the lagging affections of

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Far and beyond in importance and interest to any other musical event of this season is the concert to be given in the Capitol theatre Wednesday evening, March 11, by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 105 artists, under the brilliant leadership of Serge Koussevitsky and management of Ben Franklin, anouncement of which was recently made by Mr. Franklin. If there is such a thing as a red letter event, surely this is it, for the concert will be one of greatest importance musically, in fact the climax of the season in the Albany radius. This is a concert that cannot be excelled in interest, enthusiasm and enjoyment, and every music lover will gladly acknowledge that fact. The Boston Symphony has been here before—it is the most popular of all orchestral organizations with Albanians—but never under the direction of the great Koussevitsky, and his appearance will be awaited with interest. Efforts are now being made to secure a program that will meet with the satisfaction of all interested. For the concert, seats are already on sale by mail and phone order to Mr. Franklin at 18 Chestnut street, and the interest is so great that in all probability the house will be sold out before the date of the box office sale at the theatre, Sat- March 7.

TIMES-UNION,

52

TIMES
MAR 2 1925

Best Orchestra?

In Manhattan, Ernest Newman, British guest critic for the New York Evening Post, gave his impressions of U. S. orchestras.

Said he:

"I am in no way qualified to speak, for during my stay here I have only been out of New York once, and that to hear an orchestra—the Philadelphia—that I had already heard here. I should have liked to hear the Chicago, the Detroit, the St. Louis and the Cleveland orchestras, but it has proved impossible. I have very scanty data to go upon even as regards the New York orchestras and the only two visiting organizations I have heard—the Philadelphia and the Boston Symphony. . . .

"The best that I have heard is undoubtedly the Philadelphia; but the Philharmonic runs it close. The Boston is evidently in a transition stage. With its American tradition of long-term conductors it is bound to take a little time to give itself up entirely to a new spirit; but if it is fortunate enough to retain Koussevitzky for another year or two, and will make a few obviously necessary changes in its personnel, it will become a marvelous instrument. It is already a remarkable one. The New York Symphony Orchestra I heard only two or three times; it has apparently become so part and parcel of Mr. Damrosch that it is difficult for an outsider to estimate it purely and simply as an orchestra. The State Symphony Orchestra, again, I heard only under Mr. Stransky, and, for one concert, under Mr. Waghalter."

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS
MAR 2 1925

TICKETS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT IN GREAT DEMAND

Portland people flocked to City Hall today to secure tickets for the Boston Symphony concert which will take place March 25 under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission. The magic name of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the orchestra, and the popularity which the Boston Symphony always enjoys in Portland were factors in the interest.

All Winter interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert has mounted as reports have come in from Boston and New York of the tremendous vogue Koussevitzky is having in those cities, and tales of the huge audiences that have endeavored to gain access to his concerts.

Koussevitzky came to the United States with an assured reputation gained in all the great European capitals where a Koussevitzky concert was invariably a furore. This assured reputation has been enhanced by his almost unprecedented success in his initial season in this country. Stories of Koussevitzky have been on the lips of all who are followers of concert and opera, and his has without question been the outstanding personality of the musical year.

Handsome, forceful, compeling, he has been in appearance as in artistry the ideal conductor. Under his baton the Boston Symphony has achieved effects that it has not gained for many seasons, and it may now be fairly claimed to be the greatest orchestra in the United States if not in the world.

AUGUSTA, ME.
JOURNAL
MAR 2 1925

Boston Symphony at Portland

There is keen interest in the coming appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its remarkable new leader, Serge Koussevitzky, at a concert in City Hall, Portland, March 25 under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission.

Although this orchestra, which has long stood for the very highest achievement in symphonic performances has had a long line of distinguished conductors, not one of them has drawn more general attention nor had more rapturous praises heaped upon him than Serge Koussevitzky. And Kousevitzky has been a success not only from an artistic but from a box office standpoint. Both the New York and Boston series of Boston symphony concerts are subscribed for the entire season, according to W. J. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, which means that had it not been for the enterprise of the Portland Music Commission in securing the fine orchestra for Portland even Maine people in Boston or New York would have been unable to hear it.

The very fact that the symphony concert presents such a rare opportunity is expected to draw patrons from all parts of Maine. Koussevitzky is not only a conductor of rare genius, not only does he have a vivid and compelling personality, but he has the happy faculty of building programs that have widespread popular appeal. No one can instill a more vivid and beautiful life into the music of the 18th century, but likewise no conductor scrutinizes more eagerly nor champions more staunchly and understandingly the truly important music of the day.—Adv.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS
MAR 3 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY IS OUT OF ROUTINE

Boston Symphony Conductor Strong For Novelties

"One of the objects of Koussevitzky's career," says Ernest Newman, regarding the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor who comes to Portland on the 25th, "has been to break away from routine. In those great years between 1907 and the outbreak of the war, he introduced a number of novelties, native and foreign, to the Russian public, including yorks by Debussy, Ravel, Fanelli, Florent Schmitt, Paul Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Bruckner, Mahler, Bantook, Tabeiev, Prokoviev and others. He gave Russian audiences their first introduction to Stravinsky's Le Sacre du Printemps and Scriabine's Third and Fifth Symphonies (The Divine Poem and Prometheus.) He was the first to make a popular success of Scriabine's Poem of Ecstacy.'

It was Koussevitzky's championship of coming genius, his departure from the conventional in programs, that invariably lends zest to a Koussevitzky concert, and that will make his appearance here with the Boston Symphony orchestra on March 25 an outstandin

LEWISTON,
ME.
JOURNAL
MAR 3 1925

Eager to Hear New Boston Symphony Conductor

Not for many a year have tickets for Boston Symphony concerts been practically unobtainable, as is the case this season because of the popularity of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Indeed all the series in Boston and New York are sold out completely for the season.

Hence the enterprise of the Portland Music Commission in bringing this dynamic new conductor and his remarkable aggregation of musicians to Maine for a concert at the Portland City Hall on Wednesday, March 25, is especially to be commended. In Boston the only way in which a non-subscriber to the Symphony concerts can hear the orchestra is to stand in line for one of the 505 rush seats in the second balcony Friday afternoons. In Maine, thanks to the Portland Music Commission, an opportunity is offered to the public in general to procure tickets at prices lower than were ever offered before at a Boston Symphony concert in this State, and to hear the great conductor whose name has been on all lips this winter, and who has brought the Boston Symphony back to a place where it is second to no orchestra in the world.

Koussevitzky came to America this past Fall with the highest of European laurels assured to him. He at once took a foremost place in American life. He is an artist of imagination, fire and dramatic intensity; he is likewise a leader of the greatest exaction and the most absolute control. He has a picturesque personality, andmay justly be termed one of the outsanding figures the American concert world has known.

Seats for the Boston Symphony concert are now on sale in Portland.

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 3 1925

Seat Sale Open For Symphony Concert

The seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of March 25 will, without question, attract an unprecedented number of people, for the surprisingly low price at which the concert is offered would indicate that those who desire to secure choice seats should be on the ground early.

While the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always a tremendous attraction the concert will have superlative interest this year because of the brilliant achievements of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. This will be Koussevitzky's first appearance in Portland.

Koussevitzky's career is as interesting and unusual as its denouement in the phenomenal success of the orchestra he has led this Winter would indicate that it might be. He was born in Tver, Russia, in 1874 and received his first musical education at home. At the mature age of 12 he became chef d'orchestra in his natal town, his duties being to compose whatever music might be required for the plays put on at the theater, and to conduct the entr-actes.

At 14 he went to Moscow to continue his studies, and became a pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec, playing the double bass. He soon became double bass soloist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera at Moscow, and later succeeded his teacher as professor of the instrument at the Conservatoire. For 10 years he toured Russia and western Europe as a contra-bass virtuoso.

In 1907 in Berlin he formed an orchestra with which he worked for two years studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. Upon his return to Russia in 1909 he organized the Koussevitzky orchestra, which afterwards became so famous, and with it journeyed to the remote parts of Russia. He also gave annual festivals in Moscow and Petrograd. This continued for a number of years, and then in 1921 he founded the Paris concerts which have become so famous. He has also conducted in London and in other English and Scotch cities, in Barcelona, Madrid, Berlin and Warsaw. Universally the verdict about Koussevitzky is the same—that he is one of the greatest, possibly the greatest conductor of his age.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS
MAR 3 1925

auditor.

FRANKLIN BOOKS BOSTON SYMPHONY

There is a keen interest in the coming appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra under its remarkable new leader, Serge Koussevitzky, for an appearance in the Capitol theatre on Wednesday evening, March 11, at 8:15 o'clock. Although this orchestra, which has so long stood for the very highest achievement in symphonic performance, has had a most distinguished line of conductors, certainly not one of them has drawn more general attention nor had more rapturous praise heaped upon him by all hands. Indeed, the Boston Symphony concerts have attained an additional country-wide prominence through the genius of its new leader.

As an artist of imagination, fire and in dramatic intensity, and as a leader of the greatest exaction and the most absolute control, he has given many truly remarkable performances. As a result of this, the several series in Boston, and those in New York as well, afe entirely sold out by the season, and no outsider can purchase a ticket for any concert in these cities.

For th Albany concert, mail and phone orders for tickets are now being accepted by the local manager, Ben Franklin, and these orders will all be filled before the opening of the box office sale announced for Saturday morning at the box office of the Capitol theatre. Mr. Franklin may be addressed at 18 Chestnut street, and phoned at Main 3337.

LEWISTON,
ME.
JOURNAL
MAR 3 192

Eager to Hear New Boston Symphony Conductor

Not for many a year have tickets for Boston Symphony concerts been practically unobtainable, as is the case this season because of the popularity of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Indeed all the series in Boston and New York are sold out completely for the season.

Hence the enterprise of the Portland Music Commission in bringing this dynamic new conductor and his remarkable aggregation of musicians to Maine for a concert at the Portland City Hall on Wednesday, March 25, is especially to be commended. In Boston the only way in which a non-subscriber to the Symphony concerts can hear the orchestra is to stand in line for one of the 505 rush seats in the second balcony Friday afternoons. In Maine, thanks to the Portland Music Commission, an opportunity is offered to the public in general to procure tickets at prices lower than were ever offered before at a Boston Symphony concert in this State, and to hear the great conductor whose name has been on all lips this winter, and who has brought the Boston Symphony back to a place where it is second to no orchestra in the world.

Koussevitzky came to America this past Fall with the highest of European laurels assured to him. He at once took a foremost place in American life. He is an artist of imagination, fire and dramatic intensity; he is likewise a leader of the greatest exaction and the most absolute control. He has a picturesque personality, andmay justly be termed one of the outsanding figures the American concert world has known.

Seats for the Boston Symphony concert are now on sale in Portland.

* * *

UTICA, N. Y.
Observer-Dispatch
MAR 4 1925

Children of Utica Would Fill Avon on the Night Of the Boston Symphony

If the children of Utica had their way the Avon Theater would be filled on the night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, Tuesday, March 10, with boys and girls from the public schools. So keen has been their interest and response, since the plan of selling a certain number of tickets for the concert at especially low prices to a certain number of pupils from each school, that had there been three times as many tickets for sale the youngsters would have bought them all and still clamored for more. Not for nothing are the young people in the public schools of Utica being taught what good music is and what it means as a beautiful and necessary part of life.

Many music lovers from out of town are planning to attend the concert, among them 100 students from Colgate University. These are largely made up of young men in Dr. Hoerrner's classes in music. They have chartered a special car. The Knox School in Cooperstown will send 40 of its pupils. Almost every village and town in the vicinity of Utica will be represented on the night of March 10.

Miss Curran, who is bringing the Boston Symphony to Utica, will have as her guest that evening Tina Leiner, who is the wife of Shavitch, conductor of the Syracuse Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Shavitch has been soloist with the London Symphony Orchestra and last year conducted a class in music appreciation in Syracuse University. She is noted, not only in this country, but in European capitals as an artist of real genius. As Miss Curran's guest she will occupy the center box at the theater and with her will be several persons fro Syracuse, who are coming here specially for the concert.

ALBANY,
N. Y.
TELEGRAM
MAR 4 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

In the coming concent of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 artists at the Capitol theatre, Wednesday evening, March 11, Albanians will have their first opportunity to see Serge Koussevitzky conduct, and then will have the realization of just why he is claimed to be the finest of all orchestral conductors. Preceded to America by glowing reports from Europe, Koussevitzky has made another conquest both sudden and complete, the conquest of America.

Seats for the Albany concert may be ordered of Ben Franklin at 18 Chestnut street now, and these orders will be filled before the opening of the box office sale at the theatre Saturday morning.

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 4 1925

A truly enjoyable feature awaits the music lover who tunes to WEAF's program this evening. Magdeline Braard, the charming young French pianiste, who at the age of fifteen toured the United States and Canada with the Paris Orchestra and the year later made appearances with the Boston Symphony, the New York Symphony, Cleveland and the Baltimore Symphony Orchestras, will be heard in a piano recital.

52

TIMES
MAR 2 1925

Best Orchestra?

In Manhattan, Ernest Newman, British guest critic for the New York Evening Post, gave his impressions of U. S. orchestras.

Said he:

"I am in no way qualified to speak, for during my stay here I have only been out of New York once, and that to hear an orchestra—the Philadelphia—that I had already heard here. I should have liked to hear the Chicago, the Detroit, the St. Louis and the Cleveland orchestras, but it has proved impossible. I have very scanty data to go upon even as regards the New York orchestras and the only two visiting organizations I have heard—the Philadelphia and the Boston Symphony. . . .

"The best that I have heard is undoubtedly the Philadelphia; but the Philharmonic runs it close. The Boston is evidently in a transition stage. With its American tradition of long-term conductors it is bound to take a little time to give itself up entirely to a new spirit; but if it is fortunate enough to retain Koussevitzky for another year or two, and will make a few obviously necessary changes in its personnel, it will become a marvelous instrument. It is already a remarkable one. The New York Symphony Orchestra I heard only two or three times; it has apparently become so part and parcel of Mr. Damrosch that it is difficult for an outsider to estimate it purely and simply as an orchestra. The State Symphony Orchestra, again, I heard only under Mr. Stransky, and, for one concert, under Mr. Waghalter."

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS
1925

TICKETS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT IN GREAT DEMAND

Portland people flocked to City Hall today to secure tickets for the Boston Symphony concert which will take place March 25 under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission. The magic name of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the orchestra, and the popularity which the Boston Symphony always enjoys in Portland were factors in the interest.

All Winter interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert has mounted as reports have come in from Boston and New York of the tremendous vogue Koussevitzky is having in those cities, and tales of the huge audiences that have endeavored to gain access to his concerts.

Koussevitzky came to the United States with an assured reputation gained in all the great European capitals where a Koussevitzky concert was invariably a furore. This assured reputation has been enhanced by his almost unprecedented success in his initial season in this country. Stories of Koussevitzky have been on the lips of all who are followers of concert and opera, and his has without question been the outstanding personality of the musical year.

Handsome, forceful, compeling, he has been in appearance as in artistry the ideal conductor. Under his baton the Boston Symphony has achieved effects that it has not gained for many seasons, and it may now be fairly claimed to be the greatest orchestra in the United States if not in the world.

AUGUSTA, ME.
JOURNAL
MAR 2 1925

Boston Symphony at Portland

There is keen interest in the coming appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its remarkable new leader, Serge Koussevitzky, at a concert in City Hall, Portland, March 25 under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission.

Although this orchestra, which has long stood for the very highest achievement in symphonic performances has had a long line of distinguished conductors, not one of them has drawn more general attention nor had more rapturous praises heaped upon him than Serge Koussevitsky. And Kousevitzky has been a success not only from an artistic but from a box office standpoint. Both the New York and Boston series of Boston symphony concerts are subscribed for the entire season, according to W. J. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, which means that had it not been for the enterprise of the Portland Music Commission in securing the fine orchestra for Portland even Maine people in Boston or New York would have been unable to hear it.

The very fact that the symphony concert presents such a rare opportunity is expected to draw patrons from all parts of Maine. Koussevitzky is not only a conductor of rare genius, not only does he have a vivid and compelling personality, but he has the happy faculty of building programs that have widespread popular appeal. No one can instill a more vivid and beautiful life into the music of the 18th century, but likewise no conductor scrutinizes more eagerly nor champions more staunchly and understandingly the truly important music of the day.—Adv.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS
MAR 3 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY IS OUT OF ROUTINE

Boston Symphony Conductor Strong For Novelties

"One of the objects of Koussevitzky's career," says Ernest Newman, regarding the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor who comes to Portland on the 25th, "has been to break away from routine. In those great years between 1907 and the outbreak of the war, he introduced a number of novelties, native and foreign, to the Russian public, including yorks by Debussy, Ravel, Fanelli, Florent Schmitt, Paul Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Bruckner, Mahler, Bantook, Tabeiev, Prokoviev and others. He gave Russian audiences their first introduction to Stravinsky's Le Sacre du Printemps and Scriabine's Third and Fifth Symphonies (The Divine Poem and Prometheus.) He was the first to make a popular success of Scriabine's Poem of Ecstacy.'

It was Koussevitzky's championship of coming genius, his departure from the conventional in programs, that invariably lends zest to a Koussevitzky concert, and that will make his appearance here with the Boston Symphony orchestra on March 25 an outstandi

---

LEWISTON,
ME.
JOURNAL
MAR 3 1925

Eager to Hear New Boston Symphony Conductor

Not for many a year have tickets for Boston Symphony concerts been practically unobtainable, as is the case this season because of the popularity of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Indeed all the series in Boston and New York are sold out completely for the season.

Hence the enterprise of the Portland Music Commission in bringing this dynamic new conductor and his remarkable aggregation of musicians to Maine for a concert at the Portland City Hall on Wednesday, March 25, is especially to be commended. In Boston the only way in which a non-subscriber to the Symphony concerts can hear the orchestra is to stand in line for one of the 505 rush seats in the second balcony Friday afternoons. In Maine, thanks to the Portland Music Commission, an opportunity is offered to the public in general to procure tickets at prices lower than were ever offered before at a Boston Symphony concert in this State, and to hear the great conductor whose name has been on all lips this winter, and who has brought the Boston Symphony back to a place where it is second to no orchestra in the world.

Koussevitzky came to America this past Fall with the highest of European laurels assured to him. He at once took a foremost place in American life. He is an artist of imagination, fire and dramatic intensity; he is likewise a leader of the greatest exaction and the most absolute control. He has a picturesque personality, andmay justly be termed one of the outsanding figures the American concert world has known.

Seats for the Boston Symphony concert are now on sale in Portland.

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 3 1925

Seat Sale Open For Symphony Concert

The seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of March 25 will, without question, attract an unprecedented number of people, for the surprisingly low price at which the concert is offered would indicate that those who desire to secure choice seats should be on the ground early.

While the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always a tremendous attraction the concert will have superlative interest this year because of the brilliant achievements of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. This will be Koussevitzky's first appearance in Portland.

Koussevitzky's career is as interesting and unusual as its denouement in the phenomenal success of the orchestra he has led this Winter would indicate that it might be. He was born in Tver, Russia, in 1874 and received his first musical education at home. At the mature age of 12 he became chef d'orchestra in his natal town, his duties being to compose whatever music might be required for the plays put on at the theater, and to conduct the entr-actes.

At 14 he went to Moscow to continue his studies, and became a pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec, playing the double bass. He soon became double bass soloist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera at Moscow, and later succeeded his teacher as professor of the instrument at the Conservatoire. For 10 years he toured Russia and western Europe as a contra-bass virtuoso.

In 1907 in Berlin he formed an orchestra with which he worked for two years studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. Upon his return to Russia in 1909 he organized the Koussevitzky orchestra, which afterwards became so famous, and with it journeyed to the remote parts of Russia. He also gave annual festivals in Moscow and Petrograd. This continued for a number of years, and then in 1921 he founded the Paris concerts which have become so famous. He has also conducted in London and in other English and Scotch cities, in Barcelona, Madrid, Berlin and Warsaw. Universally the verdict about Koussevitzky is the same—that he is one of the greatest, possibly the greatest conductor of his age.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS
MAR 3 1925

auditor.

FRANKLIN BOOKS BOSTON SYMPHONY

There is a keen interest in the coming appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra under its remarkable new leader, Serge Koussevitzky, for an appearance in the Capitol theatre on Wednesday evening, March 11, at 8:15 o'clock. Although this orchestra, which has so long stood for the very highest achievement in symphonic performance, has had a most distinguished line of conductors, certainly not one of them has drawn more general attention nor had more rapturous praise heaped upon him by all hands. Indeed, the Boston Symphony concerts have attained an additional country-wide prominence through the genius of its new leader.

As an artist of imagination, fire and in dramatic intensity, and as a leader of the greatest exaction and the most absolute control, he has given many truly remarkable performances. As a result of this, the several series in Boston, and those in New York as well, afe entirely sold out by the season, and no outsider can purchase a ticket for any concert in these cities.

For th Albany concert, mail and phone orders for tickets are now being accepted by the local manager, Ben Franklin, and these orders will all be filled before the opening of the box office sale announced for Saturday morning at the box office of the Capitol theatre. Mr. Franklin may be addressed at 18 Chestnut street, and phoned at Main 3337.

LEWISTON,
ME.
JOURNAL
MAR 3 192

Eager to Hear New Boston Symphony Conductor

Not for many a year have tickets for Boston Symphony concerts been practically unobtainable, as is the case this season because of the popularity of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Indeed all the series in Boston and New York are sold out completely for the season.

Hence the enterprise of the Portland Music Commission in bringing this dynamic new conductor and his remarkable aggregation of musicians to Maine for a concert at the Portland City Hall on Wednesday, March 25, is especially to be commended. In Boston the only way in which a non-subscriber to the Symphony concerts can hear the orchestra is to stand in line for one of the 505 rush seats in the second balcony Friday afternoons. In Maine, thanks to the Portland Music Commission, an opportunity is offered to the public in general to procure tickets at prices lower than were ever offered before at a Boston Symphony concert in this State, and to hear the great conductor whose name has been on all lips this winter, and who has brought the Boston Symphony back to a place where it is second to no orchestra in the world.

Koussevitzky came to America this past Fall with the highest of European laurels assured to him. He at once took a foremost place in American life. He is an artist of imagination, fire and dramatic intensity; he is likewise a leader of the greatest exaction and the most absolute control. He has a picturesque personality, andmay justly be termed one of the outsanding figures the American concert world has known.

Seats for the Boston Symphony concert are now on sale in Portland.

UTICA, N. Y.
Observer-Dispatch
MAR 4 1925

Children of Utica Would Fill Avon on the Night Of the Boston Symphony

If the children of Utica had their way the Avon Theater would be filled on the night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, Tuesday, March 10, with boys and girls from the public schools. So keen has been their interest and response, since the plan of selling a certain number of tickets for the concert at especially low prices to a certain number of pupils from each school, that had there been three times as many tickets for sale the youngsters would have bought them all and still clamored for more. Not for nothing are the young people in the public schools of Utica being taught what good music is and what it means as a beautiful and necessary part of life.

Many music lovers from out of town are planning to attend the concert, among them 100 students from Colgate University. These are largely made up of young men in Dr. Hoerrner's classes in music. They have chartered a special car. The Knox School in Cooperstown will send 40 of its pupils. Almost every village and town in the vicinity of Utica will be represented on the night of March 10.

Miss Curran, who is bringing the Boston Symphony to Utica, will have as her guest [illegible] Tina Leiner, who is the wife of Shavitch, conductor of the Syracuse Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Sh[illegible] has been soloist with the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra and [illegible] conducted a class in [illegible] ciation in Syracuse Un[illegible] is noted, not only in [illegible] but in European [illegible] as an artist of real genius. [illegible] Curran's guest she wi[illegible] th[illegible] center box at the [illegible] and with her will be several [illegible] from Syracuse, who are [illegible] here specially for the con[illegible]

ALBANY,
N. Y.
TELEGRAM
MAR 4 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

In the coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 artists at the Capitol theatre, Wednesday evening, March 11, Albanians will have their first opportunity to see Serge Koussevitzky conduct, and then will have the realization of just why he is claimed to be the finest of all orchestral conductors. Preceded to America by glowing reports from Europe, Koussevitzky has made another conquest both sudden and complete, the conquest of America.

Seats for the Albany concert may be ordered of Ben Franklin at 18 Chestnut street now, and these orders will be filled before the opening of the box office sale at the theatre Saturday morning.

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

A truly enjoyable feature awaits the music lover who tunes to WEAF's program this evening. Magdeline Braard, the charming young French pianiste, who at the age of fifteen toured the United States and Canada with the Paris Orchestra and the year later made appearances with the Boston Symphony, the New York Symphony, Cleveland and the Baltimore Symphony Orchestras, will be heard in a piano recital.

53

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 4 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S PROGRAM

On Wednesday, March 11th, the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra with that wizard of the baton, Sergei Koussewitsky, conductor, will make its first visit to Albany in several years, and will appear at the Capitol theatre, under the local management of Ben Franklin. For this outstanding event of the musical season a program of unique novelty and beauty has been prepared by the conductor.

The first number will be Boccherini's "Symphony in A," one of twenty written by that old master, who was the contemporary of Haydn, Mozart, Sarti and Gluck.

Luigi Boccherini, (1743-1805), was a great composer of his time. He wrote 476 compositions and all but 74 were published during his lifetime. He was popular for many years and visited many countries, but his life was clouded with many adversities and he died, neglected, forgotten, in abject poverty, one hundred and twenty years ago. Until recent times his only composition that was popular was his celebrated minuet, arranged from one of his string quartets, which was constantly used as an encore by the Theodore Thomas' orchestra many years ago. In recent years the great conductors have by investigation, resurrected many of the important works by forgotten composers, hence, Boccherini's "Symphony in A" as the initial number.

The second important number is "Pictures at an Exposition," by Modeste Moussorgsty, (1835-1881), a great Russian composer. His intimate friend, Victor Hertmanor, exhibited in St. Petersburg a series of ten remarkably striking drawings, and Moussorgsky set down his impressions by a number of musical sketches, which are of entrancing beauty. These were originally written for piano solos, but a few years ago Koussewitsky, when in Paris, persuaded that gifted modernist, Maurice Ravel, to score these sketches for symphony orchestra, which were played at one of the Russian conductor's concerts in Paris with great effect.

Harold Bauer, that versatile pianist, composer and editor, brought out a revised edition of these eketches for piano solo which was published by the G. Schermer, Inc., of New York. The third number will be "La Peri," a ballet by Paul Dukas, (1865—), one of the leading French composers of the present day, and also music critic of the Gazette des Beaux-Arts, of Paris. It is a work of ravishing beauty. It is highly colored, rich in Kaleidoscopictional tints and melodic richness.

The final number will be the immortal prelude to "Die Meistersinger," by Richard Wagner, one of the greatest orchestral works ever written by that man, who was one of the foremost figures in musical history. This is a program that will surely interest all lovers of music, and with the exception of the Wagner numbers, all of the other selections will be given in Albany for the first time.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 5 1925

ORDERS COMING IN FOR SEATS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

On the first day that mail orders were received for the Boston Symphony concert an order for a block of 100 seats came in from an upState town. From another and much smaller town came a request for 30 seats. Similar requests for seats in varying numbers at all points from Kittery to Fort Kent augur that the hopes of the Portland Music Commission will be realized, and that this concert on March 25 will indeed be an event of Statewide importance.

The very fact that concerts of the Boston Symphony in New York and Boston are subscribed in advance for the entire season largely because of the fame of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, gives tremendous zest to the concert in Maine.

Maine counts itself the possessor of a novel privilege in hearing the temperamental conductor whose concerts have been the talk of the musical world all Winter.

America is finding that Koussevitzky's musicianship and orchestral technique are equal to any demands made on them. He has a volcanic temperament, but it never runs away with him. The more an artist is on fire, the cooler will have to be the hand and head that direct that fire, paradoxical as that sounds. Koussevitzky proves the paradox. It would be hardly possible to raise some works to a higher pitch of nervous incandescence than Koussevitzky does, but the nervousness never gets out of hand. It is Koussevitzky's servant, not his master.

Herald
Mar 5

The motto of the Boston Symphony orchestra's program this week is "Made in Germany." Weber began an opera, "The Three Pirates," but he never finished it. His widow insisted that he did; that Weber took the complete work to London when he brought out there his "Oberon"; that the score was lost in the confusion attending his death; but this story is hardly credible. Meyerbeer was asked to complete the work. He promised to do so, but finally said he was too busy. Jules Benedict, a pupil of Weber's, refused. Finally Weber's grandson persuaded Gustav Mahler to put the opera in shape, and it was produced at Leipsic in 1888. Mr. Kousevitzky has put the Intermezzo from the opera on the program, but this piece is wholly Mahler's. When Antone Seidl brought it out in New York late in 1888 Mr. Krehbiel then declared that it could not be by Weber, and German critics have been of the same opinion.

The symphony will be the third by our old friend Johannes Brahms. The Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" will be followed by the Prelude to the third act of "The Mastersingers." The concert will end with the Dance of Salome from Strauss's opera. It might be a pleasure to hear the music Glazounov wrote for this dance in the play. It would surely be interesting if during the performance of Strauss's music this week room would be made on the stage for an intrepid dancer—with the permission of the censor—or there might be a portrayal of the dance on the screen.

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 5 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

"The most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris" they called Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, before he came to this country to lead the American musicians. "The most dominant music figure in the world" is a phrase that may now be aptly applied to him, for he conquered this continent as he conquered Europe. At the end of a long and strenuous program Koussevitzky has the same enthusiasm for his work and the same charm of manner as if he were just ready for work instead of just finishing it, says a critic of the Boston Transcript. There can be no question of his giving to the utmost of his ability. He is of the type that finds it impossible to give anything else. It is this faculty of giving his best always that has so emphatically endeared him to American audiences, and that has resulted in capacity audiences at all hos concerts on his first season in America.—Adv.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 5 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

"Boston Symphony seats are now almost as scarce in New York as they used to be in those fabulous pre-war days when the concerts of the Boston organization were the chief and shining events of our orchestral season" says Lawrence Gilman, critic of the New York Herald Tribune,, in recounting the phenomenal success which Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has made in New York this season. Boston Symphony seats have been at a premium all Winter, and Portland people who wish to attend the concert March 25 would de well to make their reservations in advance.—Advertisement.

CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
POST

MAR 7 1925

The Boston Symphony makes its fourth visit and last but one of the season Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon to Carnegie Hall. In the first concert the program will consist of Boccherini's symphony in C major, Dukas' dance poem, "La Peri"; Moussorgsky's "Pictures at Our Exhibition" and Respighi's Gregorian violin concerto with Albert Spalding as soloist.

Saturday afternoon Albert Spalding will be the soloist in Bach's concerto in E major and Koussevitzky will direct the orchestra in Glazounov's eighth symphony in E flat, Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," and Strauss' "Dance of Salome."

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 6 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

"If the directorate of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were at any time anxious as to the outcome of the change from Monteux to Koussevitzky, they must long since have flung away their doubts on the joyful wings of certitude," comments a New York critic regarding the great musical organization which will give a concert in this city March 25 under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission.

Acute interest locally hinges about Koussevitzky's style of conducting. As a conductor Koussevitzky is said to be acutely the master of himself when he leads the orchestra. His blood seems to run hot and cold at once. He will stir the men to a frenzy of enthusiasm, and keep them at a white heat for hours. It is said that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has never tried more whole-heartedly than it has tried with Koussevitzky. —Adv.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 6 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR WAS BORN TO LEAD

"Mr. Koussevitzky seems born to lead an orchestra as Pavlowa was born to dance or Melba to sing."

So speaks Warren Storey-Smith of the Boston Post of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor who has been making musical history this year, and whose coming to Portland with his great orchestra March 25 is an outstanding event of the Winter.

And with equal warmth other critics picture Serge Koussevitzky as a man whom people will remember, and whose conducting of the Boston Symphony will constitute an epoch in the musical history of this City.

"He is one of those very rare people to whom it is natural and inevitable to take and keep the center of the stage," says Penfield Roberts of the Boston Globe. "A man of 50, carefully dressed, of medium height, erect, solidly built, with dark hair with a tinge of gray, one decides on cool second thought. No ordinary man is one's first impression."

"Mr. Koussevitzky has a commanding figure and that indefinable quality known as magnetism which works its spell on orchestra and audience," says Philip Hale of the Boston Herald.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 6 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The seat sale will open to-morrow morning at the box office of the Capitol theatre for the superb concert to be given by the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 men, under the distinguished leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, next Wednesday evening under the management of Ben Franklin. It will be very interesting to Albanians, particularly to those of an earlier generation, to know that the analytical notes for this concert were prepared by Philip Hale, a former organist of St. Peter's church in this city, and now known as one of the ablest musical critics of the country. He writes for the Boston Transcript and his columns each Sunday are things of real worth, being interesting and enlightening. Mr. Hale's criticisms are always just, he readily recognizes real worth, is always helpful to young aspirants for musical honor, but no hesitancy to condemn mediocrity, woe to those who try to put any over without the ability that justify it.

COLONIAL THEATRE

Herald
Mar 7

18TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Remarkable Interpretation of Symphony by Brahms Is Given

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Weber-Mahler, Intermezzo from "The Three Pintos"; Brahms, Symphony No. 3, F major; Mendelssohn, Scherzo from the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Wagner, Prelude to Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Strauss, Salome's Dance from "Salome."

Weber, dying in 1826, left his opera, "The Three Pintos," unfinished. He had stopped working on it some years before, apparently having lost interest, but two years before his death he spoke of completing the score. At the wish of his grandson, who wrote a new libretto based on the old one, Gustav Mahler utilized and revised Weber's sketches and without doubt wrote original music for the opera, which was produced at Leipsic in 1888.

The Intermezzo was written by Mahler. Weber left no sketch that even suggested it. In the latter part of the Intermezzo Mahler wrote measures in the manner of Weber's bravura flourishes, but the prevailing harmonic and melodic schemes and the instrumentation are not in Weber's vein. The music is light and pretty, well suited to a comic opera; to put an audience in good humor at the beginning of a concert. (Glinka's overture last week served the same purpose.) It was played in a graceful and sparkling manner, with effective finesse.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave a remarkable interpretation of the symphony by Brahms. Some might argue against it by reason of certain "liberties" taken, but if Brahms had not intended his music to be so imposing, so poetic with its "respectable melancholy" in the third movement, so charged with wealth of interesting details, he should have so intended. We have heard many performances of this symphony. We were present in Berlin when Brahms conducted, and the performance was the dullest of them all. He simply beat time, but his facial expression was beatific.

It was a pleasure yesterday to hear the opening, fiery measures thundered forth. For in this symphony Brahms storms and rages as well as sings. The purely lyric passages were treated lovingly, and the transitions from force to tenderness were shrewly managed. Mr. Koussevitzky believes in giving the players freedom of expression in romantically lyrical measures; liberties in tempo, breathing (as if they were singing), punctuation of phrases. His scheme of contrasts, of preparing changes of mood, of building climaxes is carefully thought out, but in performance there is the effect of spontaneity. And so in the interplay of wood-wind instruments, where in this symphony there is too often hurried and jumbled complexity, there was for once delightful clarity. Brahms has been accused, and in many instances justly, of over-elaboration in the development of his thematic material; of treading water, as it were, until he could swim boldly to the next thematic recurrence. Yesterday his technical padding was made interesting; it had color and life. In a word, the interpretation of the whole symphony was emotional. If it did not follow in all respects the Brahmsian "tradition," so much the worse for the tradition. It may be questioned whether Brahms himself had any fixed ideas, any Draconian laws as to the performance of any one of his works. Traditions are born after the composer is dead so he cannot protest against them. It should also be remembered that the disciples of a master seldom agree as to his precise words even when he is alive. Take, for example, Wagnerian "traditions" concerning the tempi of pages in "The Ring," "Tristan," "Lohengrin." Were Richter, Levy and Mottl ever in agreement? Mr. Koussevitzky interpreted Brahms's symphony as it appealed to him. The great audience rejoiced in his interpretation.

We cannot applaud the incredibly slow pace at which the prelude to the third act of "The Mastersingers" was taken. The performance dragged. No body of singers could have sung with any effect the choral greeting to Hans Sachs. It is barely possible that Mr. Koussevitzky took this extraordinarily slow tempo to emphasize the brilliance and dash of the opening measures of Salome's dance, which followed, but if Strauss gained thereby, Wagner suffered.

There was a dazzingly virtuoso performance of the Scherzo by Mendelssohn, who is now treated with almost reverential respect by some of the French ultra-moderns. Mr. Laurent, the excellent flutist, distinguished himself so greatly that he was obliged to rise twice from his seat in acknowledgment of applause.

The curious thing about Salome's dance as conceived by Strauss, is that the music is never sensuous, never voluptuous, never sensual. It is glittering and exotic enough, possibly oriental in its languorous first theme, but there is no irresistible quickening of the senses. This music, not thematically conspicuous, but ingeniously orchestrated as a tour de force, as far as seductiveness is concerned, might accompany Salome as represented in old windows of stained glass and in ancient illuminated manuscript, walking on her hands, clad decorously and without thought of the seven veils to be thrown off to excite the neurotic Herod and thus cost John his head. The magnificence of the performance could not conceal the inherent poverty of the music.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week, for the orchestra will be out of town. The program for March 20 and 21 will be as follows: Roland-Manuel, Symphony from (or overture to) "Isabella et Pantalon" and "Tempo di Ballo"; Borchard, "L'Elan"; Caplet, "Epiphanie," for 'cello solo and orchestra (Mr. Bedetti, violoncellist); Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5.

Transcript
Mar. 7

Vaughan

Friday afternoon, March 20, in Symphony Hall, the nineteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting. On the program stand an Ovrture to "Isabella and Pantalon," and a piece labelled "Tempo di Ballo," from Roland-Manuel; "L'Elan," by Borchard; "Epiphany, Poem for Violoncello and Orchestra," by Caplet—all rising or established Parisian composers. Chaikotablished Parisian composers. Chaikosky's Fifth Symphony rounds out the list. With it, at a concert for the Pension Fun of the orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky excelled. In Caplet's "Poem," Mr. Bedetti the first violoncellist, will play the solo part.

Advertiser
Mar 7

German Music Finely Played At Symphony

Sergt. Koussevitzky's all-German program, first played at yesterday's Symphony matinee, proved much more entertaining on the whole than the all-Russian menu offered last week.

Four of the five numbers inspired a very fine performance. These are the third act of "The Mastering dubbed the "Heroic;" the scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Mid-Summer Night's Dream" suite, the prelude to the third act of "The Mastersingers," which is one of Wagner's most poetic utterances, and the "Dance of the Seven Veils" from Strauss' "Salome," which Mary Garden would have danced in Boston at one time if the censor had not yelled.

Koussevitzky's masterly interpretations and the equally virtuoso playing of the Symphony men, made the performance of these four works one of the memorable events of the season.

Conductor and orchestra received a well merited ovation after the Brahms symphony and they deserved a similar tribute after the other three numbers. The first piece on the program, the Weber-Mahler intermezzo from "The Three Pintos," an old-time comic opera, would be good music for the Pops.

Mr. Laurent, the first flute, gave a brilliant exhibition in both the Mendelssohn and Strauss numbers. He was applauded until he stood up and bowed.

53

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 4 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S PROGRAM

On Wednesday, March 11th, the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra with that wizard of the baton, Sergei Koussewitsky, conductor, will make its first visit to Albany in several years, and will appear at the Capitol theatre, under the local management of Ben Franklin. For this outstanding event of the musical season a program of unique novelty and beauty has been prepared by the conductor.

The first number will be Boccherini's "Symphony in A," one of twenty written by that old master, who was the contemporary of Haydn, Mozart, Sarti and Gluck.

Luigi Boccherini, (1743-1805), was a great composer of his time. He wrote 476 compositions and all but 74 were published during his lifetime. He was popular for many years and visited many countries, but his life was clouded with many adversities and he died, neglected, forgotten, in abject poverty, one hundred and twenty years ago. Until recent times his only composition that was popular was his celebrated minuet, arranged from one of his string quartets, which was constantly used as an encore by the Theodore Thomas' orchestra many years ago. In recent years the great conductors have by investigation, resurrected many of the important works by forgotten composers, hence, Boccherini's "Symphony in A" as the initial number.

The second important number is "Pictures at an Exposition," by Modeste Moussorgsty, (1835-1881), a great Russian composer. His intimate friend, Victor Hertmanor, exhibited in St. Petersburg a series of ten remarkably striking drawings, and Moussorgsky set down his impressions by a number of musical sketches, which are of entrancing beauty. These were originally written for piano solos, but a few years ago Koussewitsky, when in Paris, persuaded that gifted modernist, Maurice Ravel, to score these sketches for symphony orchestra, which were played at one of the Russian conductor's concerts in Paris with great effect.

Harold Bauer, that versatile pianist, composer and editor, brought out a revised edition of these eketches for piano solo which was published by the G. Schermer, Inc., of New York. The third number will be "La Peri," a ballet by Paul Dukas, (1865—), one of the leading French composers of the present day, and also music critic of the Gazette des Beaux-Arts, of Paris. It is a work of ravishing beauty. It is highly colored, rich in Kaleidoscopictional tints and melodie richness.

The final number will be the immortal prelude to "Die Meistersinger," by Richard Wagner, one of the greatest orchestral works ever written by that man, who was one of the foremost figures in musical history. This is a program that will surely interest all lovers of music, and with the exception of the Wagner numbers, all of the other selections will be given in Albany for the first time.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 5 1925

ORDERS COMING IN FOR SEATS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

On the first day that mail orders were received for the Boston Symphony concert an order for a block of 100 seats came in from an up-State town. From another and much smaller town came a request for 30 seats. Similar requests for seats in varying numbers at all points from Kittery to Fort Kent augur that the hopes of the Portland Music Commission will be realized, and that this concert on March 25 will indeed be an event of Statewide importance.

The very fact that concerts of the Boston Symphony in New York and Boston are subscribed in advance for the entire season largely because of the fame of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, gives tremendous zest to the concert in Maine.

Maine counts itself the possessor of a novel privilege in hearing the temperamental conductor whose concerts have been the talk of the musical world all Winter.

America is finding that Koussevitzky's musicianship and orchestral technique are equal to any demands made on them. He has a volcanic temperament, but it never runs away with him. The more an artist is on fire, the cooler will have to be the hand and head that direct that fire, paradoxical as that sounds. Koussevitzky proves the paradox. It would be hardly possible to raise some works to a higher pitch of nervous incandescence than Koussevitzky does, but the nervousness never gets out of hand. It is Koussevitzky's servant, not his master.

Herald
Mar

The motto of the Boston Symphony orchestra's program this week is "Made in Germany." Weber began an opera, "The Three Pirates," but he never finished it. His widow insisted trat he did; that Weber took the complete work to London when he brought out there his "Oberon"; that the score was lost in the confusion attending his death; but this story is hardly credible. Meyerbeer was asked to complete the work. He promised to do so, but finally said he was too busy. Jules Benedict, a pupil of Weber's, refused. Finally Weber's grandson persuaded Gustav Mahler to put the opera in shape, and it was produced at Leipsic in 1888. Mr. Kousseitzky has put the Intermezzo from the opera on the program, but this piece is wholly Mahler's. When Antone Seidl brought it out in New York late in 1888 Mr. Krehbiel then declared that it could not be by Weber, and German critics have been of the same opinion.

The symphony will be the third by our old friend Johannes Brahms. The Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" will be followed by the Prelude to the third act of "The Mastersingers." The concert will end with the Dance of Salome from Strauss's opera. It might be a pleasure to hear the music Glazounov wrote for this dance in the play. It would surely be interesting if during the performance of Strauss's music this week room would be made on the stage for an intrepid dancer—with the permission of the censor—or there might be a portrayal of the dance on the screen.

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 5 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

"The most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris" they called Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, before he came to this country to lead the American musicians. "The most dominant music figure in the world" is a phrase that may now be aptly applied to him, for he conquered this continent as he conquered Europe. At the end of a long and strenuous program Koussevitzky has the same enthusiasm for his work and the same charm of manner as if he were just ready for work instead of just finishing it, says a critic of the Boston Transcript. There can be no question of his giving to the utmost of his ability. He is of the type that finds it impossible to give anything else. It is this faculty of giving his best always that has so emphatically endeared him to American audiences, and that has resulted in capacity audiences at all hos concerts on his first season in America.—Adv.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 5 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

"Boston Symphony seats are now almost as scarce in New York as they used to be in those fabulous pre-war days when the concerts of the Boston organization were the chief and shining events of our orchestral season" says Lawrence Gilman, critic of the New York Herald Tribune,, in recounting the phenomenal success which Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has made in New York this season. Boston Symphony seats have been at a premium all Winter, and Portland people who wish to attend the concert March 25 would de well to make their reservations in advance.—Advertisement.

CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
POST

MAR 7 1925

The Boston Symphony makes its fourth visit and last but one of the season Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon to Carnegie Hall. In the first concert the program will consist of Boccherini's symphony in C major, Dukas' dance poem, "La Peri"; Moussorgsky's "Pictures at Our Exhibition" and Respighi's Gregorian violin concerto with Albert Spalding as soloist.

Saturday afternoon Albert Spalding will be the soloist in Bach's concerto in E major and Koussevitzky will direct the orchestra in Glazounov's eighth symphony in E flat, Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," and Strauss' "Dance of Salome."

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 6 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

"If the directorate of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were at any time anxious as to the outcome of the change from Monteux to Koussevitzky, they must long since have flung away their doubts on the joyful wings of certitude," comments a New York critic regarding the great musical organization which will give a concert in this city March 25 under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission.

Acute interest locally hinges about Koussevitzky's style of conducting. As a conductor Koussevitzky is said to be acutely the master of himself when he leads the orchestra. His blood seems to run hot and cold at once. He will stir the men to a frenzy of enthusiasm, and keep them at a white heat for hours. It is said that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has never tried more whole-heartedly than it has tried with Koussevitzky.—Adv.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 6 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR WAS BORN TO LEAD

"Mr. Koussevitzky seems born to lead an orchestra as Pavlowa was born to dance or Melba to sing."

So speaks Warren Storey-Smith of the Boston Post of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor who has been making musical history this year, and whose coming to Portland with his great orchestra March 25 is an outstanding event of the Winter.

And with equal warmth other critics picture Serge Koussevitzky as a man whom people will remember, and whose conducting of the Boston Symphony will constitute an epoch in the musical history of this City.

"He is one of those very rare people to whom it is natural and inevitable to take and keep the center of the stage," says Penfield Roberts of the Boston Globe. "A man of 50, carefully dressed, of medium height, erect, solidly built, with dark hair with a tinge of gray, one decides on cool second thought. No ordinary man is one's first impression."

"Mr. Koussevitzky has a commanding figure and that indefinable quality known as magnetism which works its spell on orchestra and audience," says Philip Hale of the Boston Herald.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 6 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The seat sale will open to-morrow morning at the box office of the Capitol theatre for the superb concert to be given by the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 men, under the distinguished leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, next Wednesday evening under the management of Ben Franklin. It will be very interesting to Albanians, particularly to those of an earlier generation, to know that the analytical notes for this concert were prepared by Philip Hale, a former organist of St. Peter's church in this city, and now known as one of the ablest musical critics of the country. He writes for the Boston Transcript and his columns each Sunday are things of real worth, being interesting and enlightening. Mr. Hale's criticisms are always just, he readily recognizes real worth, is always helpful to young aspirants for musical honor, but no hesitancy to condemn mediocrity, woe to those who try to put any over without the ability that justs it.

COLONIAL THEATRE

Herald
Mar 7

18TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Remarkable Interpretation of Symphony by Brahms Is Given

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Weber-Mahler, Intermezzo from "The Three Pintos"; Brahms, Symphony No. 3, F major; Mendelssohn, Scherzo from the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Wagner, Prelude to Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Strauss, Salome's Dance from "Salome."

Weber, dying in 1826, left his opera, "The Three Pintos," unfinished. He had stopped working on it some years before, apparently having lost interest, but two years before his death he spoke of completing the score. At the wish of his grandson, who wrote a new libretto based on the old one, Gustav Mahler utilized and revised Weber's sketches and without doubt wrote original music for the opera, which was produced at Leipsic in 1888.

The Intermezzo was written by Mahler. Weber left no sketch that even suggested it. In the latter part of the Intermezzo Mahler wrote measures in the manner of Weber's bravura flourishes, but the prevailing harmonic and melodic schemes and the instrumentation are not in Weber's vein. The music is light and pretty, well suited to a comic opera; to put an audience in good humor at the beginning of a concert. (Glinka's overture last week served the same purpose.) It was played in a graceful and sparkling manner, with effective finesse.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave a remarkable interpretation of the symphony by Brahms. Some might argue against it by reason of certain "liberties" taken, but if Brahms had not intended his music to be so imposing, so poetic with its "respectable melancholy" in the third movement, so charged with wealth of interesting details, he should have so intended. We have heard many performances of this symphony. We were present in Berlin when Brahms conducted, and the performance was the dullest of them all. He simply beat time, but his facial expression was beatific.

It was a pleasure yesterday to hear the opening, fiery measures thundered forth. For in this symphony Brahms storms and rages as well as sings. The purely lyric passages were treated lovingly, and the transitions from force to tenderness were shrewly managed. Mr. Koussevitzky believes in giving the players freedom of expression in romantically lyrical measures; liberties in tempo, breathing (as if they were singing), punctuation of phrases. His scheme of contrasts, of preparing changes of mood, of building climaxes is carefully thought out, but in performance there is the effect of spontaneity. And so in the interplay of wood-wind instruments, where in this symphony there is too often hurried and jumbled complexity, there was for once delightful clarity. Brahms has been accused, and in many instances justly, of over-elaboration in the development of his thematic material; of treading water, as it were, until he could swim boldly to the next thematic recurrence. Yesterday his technical padding was made interesting; it had color and life. In a word, the interpretation of the whole symphony was emotional. If it did not follow in all respects the Brahmsian "tradition," so much the worse for the tradition. It may be questioned whether Brahms himself had any fixed ideas, any Draconian laws as to the performance of any one of his works. Traditions are born after the composer is dead so he cannot protest against them. It should also be remembered that the disciples of a master seldom agree as to his precise words even when he is alive. Take, for example, Wagnerian "traditions" concerning the tempi of pages in "The Ring," "Tristan," "Lohengrin." Were Richter, Levy and Motil ever in agreement? Mr. Koussevitzky interpreted Brahms's symphony as it appealed to him. The great audience rejoiced in his interpretation.

We cannot applaud the incredibly slow pace at which the prelude to the third act of "The Mastersingers" was taken. The performance dragged. No body of singers could have sung with any effect the choral greeting to Hans Sachs. It is barely possible that Mr. Koussevitzky took this extraordinarily slow tempo to emphasize the brilliance and dash of the opening measures of Salome's dance, which followed, but if Strauss gained thereby, Wagner suffered.

There was a dazzingly virtuoso performance of the Scherzo by Mendelssohn, who is now treated with almost reverential respect by some of the French ultra-moderns. Mr. Laurent, the excellent flutist, distinguished himself so greatly that he was obliged to rise twice from his seat in acknowledgment of applause.

The curious thing about Salome's dance as conceived by Strauss, is that the music is never sensuous, never voluptuous, never sensual. It is glittering and exotic enough, possibly oriental in its languorous first theme, but there is no irresistible quickening of the senses. This music, not thematically conspicuous, but ingeniously orchestrated as a tour de force, as far as seductiveness is concerned, might accompany Salome as represented in old windows of stained glass and in ancient illuminated manuscript, walking on her hands, clad decorously and without thought of the seven veils to be thrown off to excite the neurotic Herod and thus cost John his head. The magnificence of the performance could not conceal the inherent poverty of the music.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week, for the orchestra will be out of town. The program for March 20 and 21 will be as follows: Roland-Manuel, Symphony from (or overture to) "Isabella et Pantalon" and "Tempo di Ballo"; Borchard, "L'Elan"; Caplet, "Epiphanie," for 'cello solo and orchestra (Mr. Bedetti, violoncellist); Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5.

Transcript
Mar 7

Friday afternoon, March 20, in Symphony Hall, the nineteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting. On the program stand an Ovrture to "Isabella and Pantalon," and a piece labelled "Tempo di Ballo," from Roland-Manuel; "L'Elan," by Borchard; "Epiphany, Poem for Violoncello and Orchestra," by Caplet—all rising or established Parisian composers. Chaikotablished Parisian composers. Chaikosky's Fifth Symphony rounds out the list. With it, at a concert for the Pension Fun of the orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky excelled. In Caplet's "Poem," Mr. Bedetti the first violoncellist, will play the solo part.

Mar 7

German Music Finely Played At Symphony

Sergt. Koussevitsky's all-German program, first played at yesterday's Symphony matinee, proved much more entertaining on the whole than the all-Russian menu offered last week.

Four of the five numbers inspired a very fine performance. These are the third act of "The Mastering-dubbed the "Heroic;" the scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Mid-Summer Night's Dream" suite, the prelude to the third act of "The Mastersingers," which is one of Wagner's most poetic utterances, and the "Dance of the Seven Veils" from Strauss' "Salome," which Mary Garden would have danced in Boston at one time if the censor had not yelled.

Koussevitzky's masterly interpretations and the equally virtuoso playing of the Symphony men, made the performance of these four works one of the memorable events of the season.

Conductor and orchestra received a well merited ovation after the Brahms symphony and they deserved a similar tribute after the other three numbers. The first piece on the program, the Weber-Mahler intermezzo from "The Three Pintos," an old-time comic opera, would be good music for the Pops.

Mr. Laurent, the first flute, gave a brilliant exhibition in both the Mendelssohn and Strauss numbers. He was applauded until he stood up and bowed.

LD

925 ure await to WEAF's Magdeline ung French fifteen nd Canada and the ances with

New York
the Balti-ras, will be

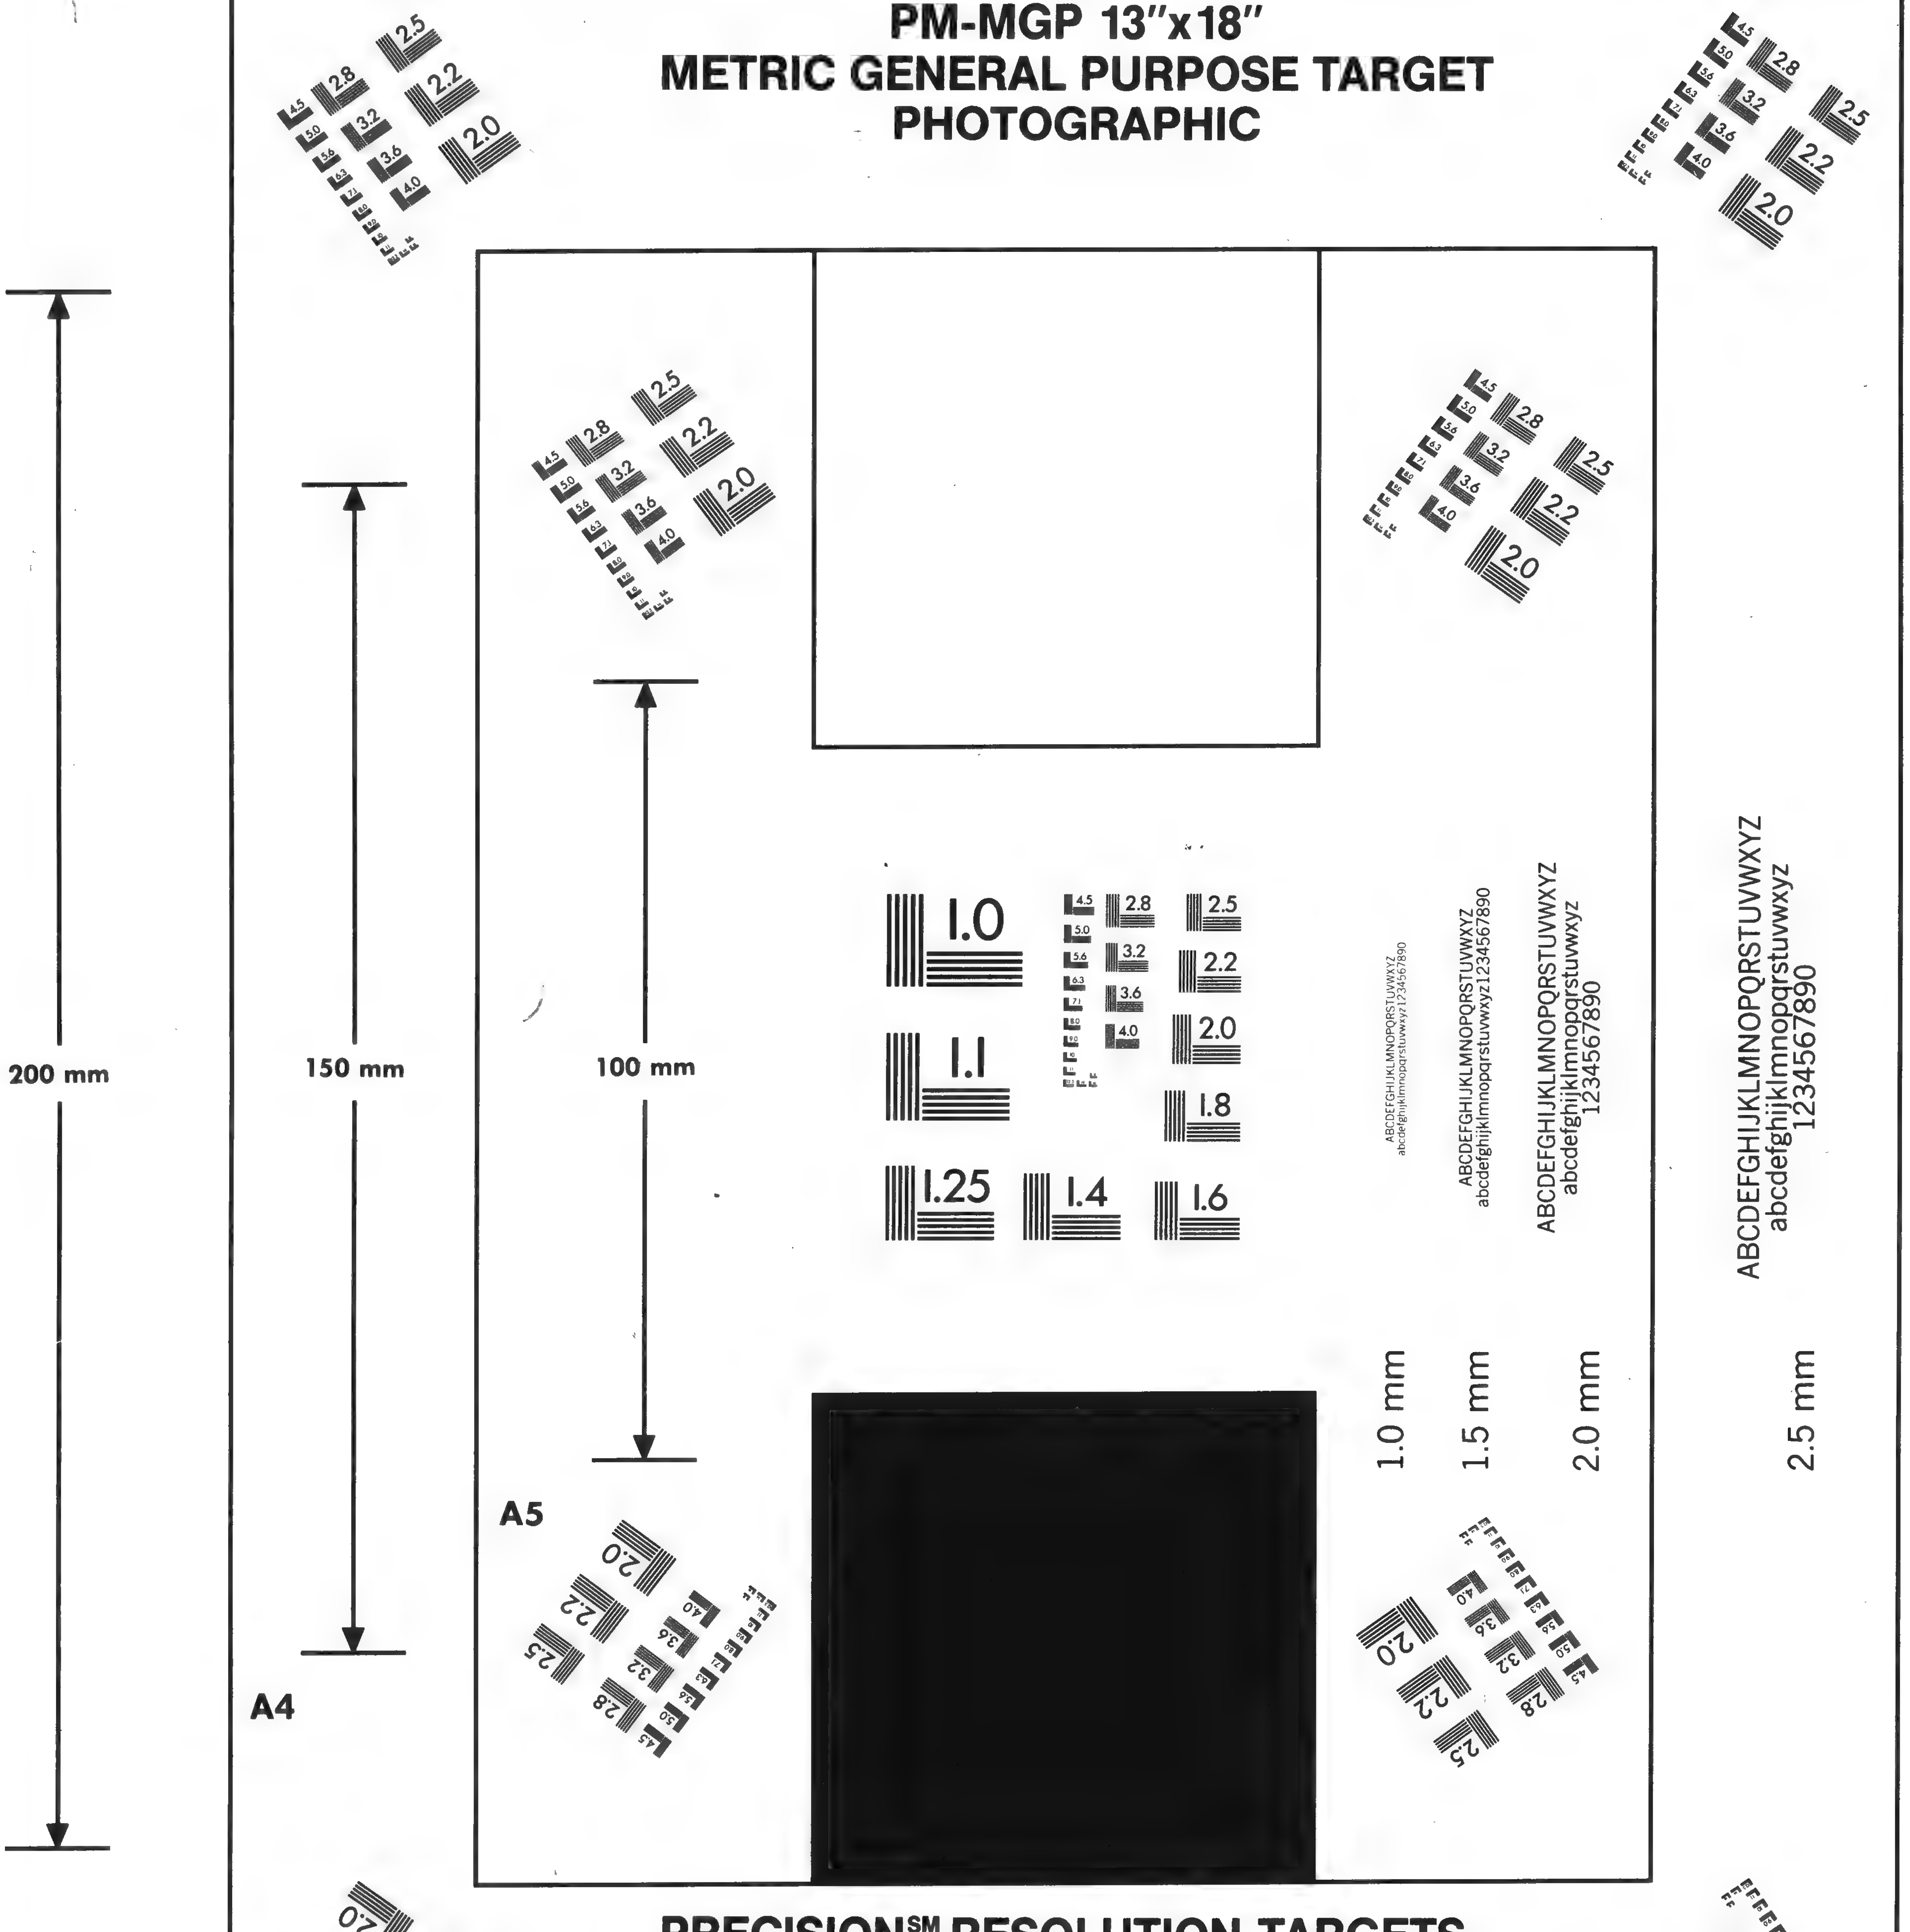
REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0
7.1
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
3.2
3.6
4.0
A5
A4
A3
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

54

Transcript
Mar 7

Symphony

VIVID CONDUCTING, MANIFOLD CONCERT, FERVENT AUDIENCE

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY AND GERMAN COMPOSERS

Once More Applause Misplaced—A Curiosity from Mahler, Masterpieces in Little from Mendelssohn and Wagner, Strauss by Performance Transfigured — Two-Faced and Two-Voiced Brahms

ILL-TIMED applause is again disturbing the pleasure of Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall. From last autumn onward, Mr. Koussevitzky has made it plain that he dislikes clapping between the divisions of a symphony or a suite; that he tolerates it between the movements of a concerto only out of courtesy to the assisting virtuoso. By an arm upflung while he still faced the orchestra, the conductor sought to restrain and enjoin these superfluous, interrupting plaudits. Gradually the audience understood until case-hardened disturbers of the musical peace began to practise gentle manners. By mid-December, it was almost safe to say that ancient habit was finally broken. Of late, however, signs of indecision have multiplied; while yesterday there was no mistaking the lapse from recent virtue. With reason, the mood of the afternoon was applausive. No sooner had Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra ended the first movement of Brahms's Symphony in F major than clappers clapped as restlessly and almost as loudly as in Mr. Monteux's day. Too late the conductor upswung the chiding arm; then seemed to resign himself to the unescapable. Another rattle of applause followed the Andante; only after the Allegretto came a pause of relative silence. In proper time and place—at the close of the whole Symphony—a stirred audience justly billowed with plaudits.

The offenders in these interruptions are less wilful and dull-witted than careless and inconsiderate. Such clapping plainly vexes Mr. Koussevitzky, who either makes impatiently his gesture of remonstrance or waits stoically until calm returns. Yet the most persistent disturbers profess for him a deep regard and an immeasurable admiration. They are like the followers, in a theater, of an actor or a playwright, who must chatter their devotion, while the object of it would prefer them still and voiceless. They are also a restless, excitable, simple-minded, folk, who cannot receive warm pleasure or experience responsive emotion without an immediate and irresistible desire to translate the sensation into some sort of noise. In nearly every capital of music, applause between the divisions of a virtually continuous music has "gone out," seemingly beyond return. Mr. Stokowski in New York or Philadelphia; Sir Henry Wood in London; Mr. Furtwängler in Berlin; Mr. Walter in Vienna, have no need in these days to restrain hearers or endure interruption. Out of good will to the conductor, respect for the composer, regard for the voice of music, consideration for three-fourths (at lowest) of the audience, this misplaced clapping should pass from the Symphony Concerts—not only on Saturday evenings, when it seldom stirs, but also on Friday afternoons. At the least, it should not wax and wane, as it did yesterday, through a symphony. In the good name of common sense and mutual consideration, either agree to it or put it by. Present laxity and submission go neither forward nor backward. And Mr. Koussevitzky has the reputation of a stout will.

Four brief and detachable pieces, all but one irresistibly played, swelled and varied the pleasure of the day. The prim and pedantic, pining for length, breadth and thickness, may hardly dismiss as "mere miscellany" the Intermezzo that Mahler wrote into Weber's light opera, "The Three Pintos," since it piques curiosity and falls agreeably upon the ear. No more may they wave into the category of "scraps" such masterpieces in little as the Scherzo that Mendelssohn set into his music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" or the Introduction with which Wagner leads ears and spirits into the Third Act of "Die Meistersinger." There is room for debate over The Dance of Salome from Strauss's like-named music-drama. Vehement are the detractors that would have it no more than astutely manipulated commonplace. With Mr. Koussevitzky added, the manipulation happened yesterday to be transcendent; while—let us not forget—the pieties and purities in this town abounding, permit no more than these few pages to sound within our gates. Even in freer New York, Mr. Gatti shakes a doubting head over Mme. Jeritza's ambition to repeat a part in which she excels. Overseas a wiser world long since, and smilingly, put "Salome" into becoming place, which is occasional performance.

Besides, this "miscellany" was music in which Mr. Koussevitzky excels—and is not he quite sufficient reason for any and all things at the Symphony Concerts? True, the listener could plausibly demur to his version of the fragment from "Die Meistersinger." At the pace to which he stayed the pages of Sachs meditative, a performance of the whole comedy would be lengthened by an hour; while at the end he contrived curious inflections. For offset the pages that extol and amplify Sachs gained a depth and loftiness of grave emotion beyond remembrance. No less rarely were they embedded in the serener splendors of musical sound. Evidently and reasonably Mr. Koussevitzky would have Mendelssohn's Scherzo a music of fairies and fantasy. Quick was the pace; tripping the rhythm; light the hand; changeful the shading; while the wood-winds twined arabesque within arabesque. Deservedly the audience saluted Master Laurent of the flute with long and hearty applause.

Adept, too, was the conductor with Mahler Weberian—in transition and final flourish; with Mahler Mahleresque—in many an intervening measure; while final glow upon a vivid afternoon was the version of Salome's Dance. Read in the study, strummed upon the piano—both sorry places for such music—it may be this, that or the other. Played by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra in its present powers, it was goading and fateful; lustful and biting; languorous and tempting; bitter and aflame; spent at last by its own excesses. Work of imagination as well as of technical mastery were the whipping rhythms, the trills and tremors of erotic excitement, the acrid note in the Oriental melody, the incessant modulation, like the brushing upon the haunted Herod of wings that fanned and flailed the heavy air. Upon the theater of tones and the imagination, Mr. Koussevitzky outdid the Strauss of seven veils, twenty dances and twice twenty opera houses.

Nor were the other "scraps" lightly to be passed over in themselves. Weber left behind him unrelated and unfinished pages of a comic opera, "Die Drei Pintos." It pleased Mahler as conductor at Leipzig in the eighties to thread them together with connecting and additional pages of his own. Often he used not a motiv, took not a hint, from the actual staves before him. Out of his own head he composed—as nearly as might be in the Weberian manner. How shrewdly he could counterfeit it stood clear in the introduction and the transition into the first songful measures; in the lively [illegible] and flourish of the climax. Else[illegible] and the voice seem Mahler's only, writing a music of precision and characterization, coloring it from a harmonic and instrumental palette beyond Weber's means—or methods. . . . And no wonder that many a modernist admires or professes to admire Mendelssohn. They are ambitious of a self-contained, exact music, in itself and without association all-sufficient. Had Mendelssohn never known Shakespeare's comedy, had he labelled the piece of yesterday Scherzo for Orchestra in G Minor, it would give equal pleasure of precision and invention, skill and economy, fanciful idea and felicitous voice. It needs no gloss of færie, since of itself it is elfin-footed; no spur of Shakespeare since the creating zest never falters. Always, too, it is choice and critical and exacting with itself. . . . And upon this music of fantasy and wit, the Introduction of Wagner—matchless pages from a matchless opera. They muse upon the secrets of a generous, gentle, understanding heart. They set a halo around the head of him who wears it. Out of the deep, still springs of music, divining and releasing, rise the measures of the secrets. Into music full-throated, golden-voiced, spacious and enskyed, mount the measures of the crown. Mr Koussevitzky chooses "miscellany" with imagination.

Not to be gainsaid—in these days—was the conductor through the first and the last movements of the Third Symphony of Brahms. Playing or hearing it, an elder generation of the nineties was all for lucid exposition. Set forth the design; unfold the musical thought; lay bare the progress and interplay of the purely musical elements; along the way sound inner voices, sharpen details of workmanship—and the task was done. In those days audiences, conductors and orchestras "read" Brahms. With the turn of the century all three began to penetrate him, to imagine as well as to "expose." Forthwith to this March of 1925 they discovered in him a composer who also sought beauty; whose "thought" was also vision; whose spirit stirred; whose hand at will loosed power and mastery. Occasionally, he spun in the study, until impulse and imagination caught up the thread. Now and again in workmanship he took breath and waited. Shortcomings, indeed, but no more than shadows upon the rim of the glories. Then arose the songful, puissant, poetized and dramatized Brahms of symphony concerts the world over. Ever since his symphonies have upborne and justified him.

For such a Brahms Mr. Koussevitzky is willing priest and practised prophet. Hear him yesterday stressing by every possible device the contrasts and conflicts of the first movement; keeping it in changeful and ardent motion; zealous for every animating accent, graphic modulation, enriching color; striking high and striking deep the heroic note. A Brahms of passion and power comes at the conductor's call; recedes into a Brahms romantically poetizing in the middle movements; returns in the Finale. Again Mr. Koussevitzky deepens the heroic note; pridefully he would have the music swirl its way upward out of shadows into light. The stress and the stride stir the listening ear and heart; songfully the major mode mounts and prevails; glamorous is the end. No doubt the conductor has been lucid with all the unities of the symphony, luminous with the pattern. Yet who heeds in the flood of responsive emotion by him and by the music evoked? Behold Brahms of old tongue-tied and shackled "in the tradition," now loosed and speaking. Thrilled, transported, an audience—of Friday afternoon—outpours its applause.

The other Brahms also inhabits this Janus-faced Symphony. He is romantical and poetizing. In him is some infusion of Schumann prone to melancholy, of Mendelssohn prone to sentiment. He dwells in the two middle movements; out of them sings—by will of Mr. Koussevitzky—in too closely assimilated voice. True, Andante and Allegretto are strangely, wilfully, alike in mood and expression. No other symphony within casual memory contains two divisions so near akin. Brahms left no foot-note to this kinship, no hint of his purpose in creation, his desire in performance. It has been the custom of conductors to differentiate as much as might be, contrasting pace, re-pointing accents. Mr. Koussevitzky, as mute as Brahms about the prompting intent, chooses to enforce the resemblance. He takes both movements exceeding slow. Out of each he wrings the last drop of sentimental melancholy. With either he refines upon delicate and [illegible] softening the strings, staying the wood-winds, mellowing horns and trumpets. The listener hears a Brahms as sentimental and adroit as Mendelssohn, as moody and dusky as Schumann. Two-fold in this Symphony in F major is the Brahms of Mr. Koussevitzky's ear and imagination—a Brahms of stress and ardors wellnigh tumultuous; a Brahms musing and musical in the twilight. Like Hamlet in his mother's chamber, the conductor points to this picture and to that. To both answer an enraptured audience.

H. T. P.

Traveler
Mar 7

y Afternoon at Symphony Hall, Boston. The Rush Line of Real Lovers of Music Waiting for the Doors of Symphony n.
(Photograph by Waldron)

Traveler
Mar. 7

Third Symphony of Brahms Played

Yesterday afternoon's symphony program was distinguished by a highly impressive performance of Brahms F-major symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky had set it in a program of German music, contrastingly light. Preceding it was an intermezzo from Weber's comic opera, "The Three Pintos," supposedly written by Gustav Mahler when he pieced together the Weber fragments. Following, after the intermission, was a charming Scherzo taken from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger," and "Salome's Dance."

The great, overwhelming opening, with the three arresting chords that do not foreshadow so much as plunge the listener right into the midst of great things, are indicative of the heroic scale on which this symphony is built. Brahms planned in terms of lofty granduer. Mr. Koussevitzky knows this, for he gave it whole-souled ardor that was thrilling to hear. The majestic passages were presented with their full force, the lyric moments sang. Although undoubtedly the conductor gave the symphony an individual interpretation that did not always gibe with tradition, it was a performance for Brahms lovers to rhapsodize over, and one to create new enthusiasts for the master. The Friday afternoon audience applauded long and loud.

The Wagner music was played too slowly for full effectiveness. But it served to lead up to a brilliant performance of "Salome's Dance." In Strauss's music Mr. Koussevitzky has already shown himself at his best. In this dance he displayed his feeling for the sensuous and colorful, giving it a performance such as it rarely has.

The concert will be repeated at Symphony hall this evening.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The next regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 20 and 21, since the orchestra will be away next week. This program will include the following modern French numbers: Roland-Manuel's overture, "Isabelle and Pantalon" and his "Tempo di Ballo," Borchard's "L'Elan" and Caplet's "Poem for Violoncello and Orchestra." Jean Bedetti will be soloist in this number. Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor will close the program.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF

MAR 7 1925

9 ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS ON NEXT WEEK

Phila. and Boston Symphonies and Local Bands to Be Heard—The Recitals.

The lover of orchestral concerts will have no trouble getting his fill next week. Both the periodically visiting symphonic bands and all three of the local organizations will be heard, the sum of these totalling no less than nine concerts.

Leopold Stokowski brings his Philadelphia Orchestra to Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening with considerable music that will strike the audience as novelty. He opens his programme with a trumpet prelude by Purcell, which he discovered in the British Museum last Summer. This is to be followed by Bach's B minor suite for strings and flute and a suite made by Mr. Stokowski from three of Gluck's operas. The final number is Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherrazade."

The Boston Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, plays in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The first programme consists of the little Boccherini symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which the the conductor gave here before to the Saturday subscribers, and Paul Dukas's dance suite, "La peri." Albert Spalding will be the soloist in Ottorino Respighi's "Gregorian" violin concerto.

Mr. Spalding will also be the soloist at the Saturday matinee, playing Bach's E major concerto. Otherwise, at this concert, there will be Alexander Glazounov's Eighth Symphony, Henri Rabaud's "La procession nocturne" and the Dance of Salome from Richard Strauss's opera.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 7 192!

HUMMEL RECITAL.

Albany is proud to possess such a splendid young artist as Stanley Hummel, concert pianist, who gave a delightful piano recital last evening in the Albany Historical and Art Society building. The demands of the program last evening might well tax the powers of a world celebrity. Very pleasing indeed was the ease with which this boy tossed off the most difficult passages. His tone was delightfully mature and his interpretation shows fine intelligence. The balance of this finely chosen program carried the enthusiasm of an appreciative audience at a high level through the entire evening.

Special mention should be made of the excellent reading of the Bach "Toccata and Fugue in D Minor", one of the strong feats of the program.

Stanley Hummel has been playing during the winter season with the celebrated American pianist, Edward Morris, who was heard one season in Albany as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Morris is so delighted with Stanley's work that he came from New York last night to be present at the recital.

The program was as follows: "Pastore Variee," Mozart; "Ecossaises," Beethoven; "Carnival," Schumann; a group of Chopin numbers; "Valse in A flat Major"; "Nocturne in B flat Minor" and "Scherzo in C Sharp Minor." The remainder of the program included :"Etude, in F. Minor," Dohnanyi, "May Night," Palmgren, and "La Campanella" (The Bell), Paganini-Liszt.

NEW YORK
EVENING SUN

MAR 7 1925

The fourth and last pair of concerts but one in New York this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Albert Spalding, as soloist, will be heard on Thursday in Respighi's Gregorian concerto for violin, and, on Saturday, in Bach's concerto in E. At the Thursday concert a symphony by Boccherini in C, opus 16, No. 3; Dukas's "Danced Poem," "La Peri," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by Ravel, will be given. At the Saturday concert Glazounov's symphony No. 8 in E, Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," and Strauss's Dance of Salome complete the list.

54

Transcript
Mar 7

Symphony

VIVID CONDUCTING, MANIFOLD CONCERT, FERVENT AUDIENCE

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY AND GERMAN COMPOSERS

Once More Applause Misplaced—A Curiosity from Mahler, Masterpieces in Little from Mendelssohn and Wagner, Strauss by Performance Transfigured — Two-Faced and Two-Voiced Brahms

ILL-TIMED applause is again disturbing the pleasure of Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall. From last autumn onward, Mr. Koussevitzky has made it plain that he dislikes clapping between the divisions of a symphony or a suite; that he tolerates it between the movements of a concerto only out of courtesy to the assisting virtuoso. By an arm upflung while he still faced the orchestra, the conductor sought to restrain and enjoin these superfluous, interrupting plaudits. Gradually the audience understood until case-hardened disturbers of the musical peace began to practise gentle manners. By mid-December, it was almost safe to say that ancient habit was finally broken. Of late, however, signs of indecision have multiplied; while yesterday there was no mistaking the lapse from recent virtue. With reason, the mood of the afternoon was applausive. No sooner had Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra ended the first movement of Brahms's Symphony in F major than clappers clapped as restlessly and almost as loudly as in Mr. Monteux's day. Too late the conductor upswung the chiding arm; then seemed to resign himself to the unescapable. Another rattle of applause followed the Andante; only after the Allegretto came a pause of relative silence. In proper time and place—at the close of the whole Symphony—a stirred audience justly billowed with plaudits.

The offenders in these interruptions are less wilful and dull-witted than careless and inconsiderate. Such clapping plainly vexes Mr. Koussevitzky, who either makes impatiently his gesture of remonstrance or waits stoically until calm returns. Yet the most persistent disturbers profess for him a deep regard and an immeasurable admiration. They are like the followers, in a theater, of an actor or a playwright, who must chatter their devotion, while the object of it would prefer them still and voiceless. They are also a restless, excitable, simple-minded, folk, who cannot receive warm pleasure or experience responsive emotion without an immediate and irresistible desire to translate the sensation into some sort of noise. In nearly every capital of music, applause between the divisions of a virtually continuous music has "gone out," seemingly beyond return. Mr. Stokowski in New York or Philadelphia; Sir Henry Wood in London; Mr. Furtwängler in Berlin; Mr. Walter in Vienna, have no need in these days to restrain hearers or endure interruption. Out of good will to the conductor, respect for the composer, regard for the voice of music, consideration for three-fourths (at lowest) of the audience, this misplaced clapping should pass from the Symphony Concerts—not only on Saturday evenings, when it seldom stirs, but also on Friday afternoons. At the least, it should not wax and wane, as it did yesterday, through a symphony. In the good name of common sense and mutual consideration, either agree to it or put it by. Present laxity and submission go neither forward nor backward. And Mr. Koussevitzky has the reputation of a stout will.

Four brief and detachable pieces, all but one irresistibly played, swelled and varied the pleasure of the day. The prim and pedantic, pining for length, breadth and thickness, may hardly dismiss as "mere miscellany" the Intermezzo that Mahler wrote into Weber's light opera, "The Three Pintos," since it piques curiosity and falls agreeably upon the ear. No more may they wave into the category of "scraps" such masterpieces in little as the Scherzo that Mendelssohn set into his music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" or the Introduction with which Wagner leads ears and spirits into the Third Act of "Die Meistersinger." There is room for debate over The Dance of Salome from Strauss's like-named music-drama. Vehement are the detractors that would have it no more than astutely manipulated commonplace. With Mr. Koussevitzky added, the manipulation happened yesterday to be transcendent; while—let us not forget—the pieties and purities in this town abounding, permit no more than these few pages to sound within our gates. Even in freer New York, Mr. Gatti shakes a doubting head over Mme. Jeritza's ambition to repeat a part in which she excels. Overseas a wiser world long since, and smilingly, put "Salome" into becoming place, which is occasional performance.

Besides, this "miscellany" was music in which Mr. Koussevitzky excels—and is not he quite sufficient reason for any and all things at the Symphony Concerts? True, the listener could plausibly demur to his version of the fragment from "Die Meistersinger." At the pace to which he stayed the pages of Sachs meditative, a performance of the whole comedy would be lengthened by an hour; while at the end he contrived curious inflections. For offset the pages that extol and amplify Sachs gained a depth and loftiness of grave emotion beyond remembrance. No less rarely were they embedded in the serener splendors of musical sound. Evidently and reasonably Mr. Koussevitzky would have Mendelssohn's Scherzo a music of fairies and fantasy. Quick was the pace; tripping the rhythm; light the hand; changeful the shading; while the wood-winds twined arabesque within arabesque. Deservedly the audience saluted Master Laurent of the flute with long and hearty applause.

Adept, too, was the conductor with Mahler Weberian—in transition and final flourish; with Mahler Mahleresque—in many an intervening measure; while final glow upon a vivid afternoon was the version of Salome's Dance. Read in the study, strummed upon the piano—both sorry places for such music—it may be this, that or the other. Played by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra in its present powers, it was goading and fateful; lustful and biting; languorous and tempting; bitter and aflame; spent at last by its own excesses. Work of imagination as well as of technical mastery were the whipping rhythms, the trills and tremors of erotic excitement, the acrid note in the Oriental melody, the incessant modulation, like the brushing upon the haunted Herod of wings that fanned and flailed the heavy air. Upon the theater of tones and the imagination, Mr. Koussevitzky outdid the Strauss of seven veils, twenty dances and twice twenty opera houses.

Nor were the other "scraps" lightly to be passed over in themselves. Weber left behind him unrelated and unfinished pages of a comic opera, "Die Drei Pintos." It [illegible] Mahler as conductor at Leipzig in e eighties to thread them together with nnecting and additional pages of his own. ften he used not a motiv, took not a hint, om the actual staves before him. Out of s own head he composed—as nearly as ight be in the Weberian manner. How shrewdly he could counterfeit it stood clear in the introduction and the transition into first songful measures; in the lively [illegible] flourish of the climax. Elsewhere [illegible] and the voice seem Mahler's only, writing a music of precision and characterization, coloring it from a harmonic and instrumental palette beyond Weber's means—or methods. . . . And no wonder that many a modernist admires or professes to admire Mendelssohn. They are ambitious of a self-contained, exact music, in itself and without association all-sufficient. Had Mendelssohn never known Shakespeare's comedy, had he labelled the piece of yesterday Scherzo for Orchestra in G Minor, it would give equal pleasure of precision and invention, skill and economy, fanciful idea and felicitous voice. It needs no gloss of færie, since of itself it is elfin-footed; no spur of Shakespeare since the creating zest never falters. Always, too, it is choice and critical and exacting with itself. . . . And upon this music of fantasy and wit, the Introduction of Wagner—matchless pages from a matchless opera. They muse upon the secrets of a generous, gentle, understanding heart. They set a halo around the head of him who wears it. Out of the deep, still springs of music, divining and releasing, rise the measures of the secrets. Into music full-throated, golden-voiced, spacious and enskyed, mount the measures of the crown. Mr Koussevitzky chooses "miscellany" with imagination.

Not to be gainsaid—in these days—was the conductor through the first and the last movements of the Third Symphony of Brahms. Playing or hearing it, an elder generation of the nineties was all for lucid exposition. Set forth the design; unfold the musical thought; lay bare the progress and interplay of the purely musical elements; along the way sound inner voices, sharpen details of workmanship—and the task was done. In those days audiences, conductors and orchestras "read" Brahms. With the turn of the century all three began to penetrate him, to imagine as well as to "expose." Forthwith to this March of 1925 they discovered in him a composer who also sought beauty; whose "thought" was also vision; whose spirit stirred; whose hand at will loosed power and mastery. Occasionally, he spun in the study, until impulse and imagination caught up the thread. Now and again in workmanship he took breath and waited. Shortcomings, indeed, but no more than shadows upon the rim of the glories. Then arose the songful, puissant, poetized and dramatized Brahms of symphony concerts the world over. Ever since his symphonies have upborne and justified him.

For such a Brahms Mr. Koussevitzky is willing priest and practised prophet. Hear him yesterday stressing by every possible device the contrasts and conflicts of the first movement; keeping it in changeful and ardent motion; zealous for every animating accent, graphic modulation, enriching color; striking high and striking deep the heroic note. A Brahms of passion and power comes at the conductor's call; recedes into a Brahms romantically poetizing in the middle movements; returns in the Finale. Again Mr. Koussevitzky deepens the heroic note; pridefully he would have the music swirl its way upward out of shadows into light. The stress and the stride stir the listening ear and heart; songfully the major mode mounts and prevails; glamorous is the end. No doubt the conductor has been lucid with all the unities of the symphony, luminous with the pattern. Yet who heeds in the flood of responsive emotion by him and by the music evoked? Behold Brahms of old tongue-tied and shackled "in the tradition," now loosed and speaking. Thrilled, transported, an audience—of Friday afternoon—outpours its applause.

The other Brahms also inhabits this Janus-faced Symphony. He is romantical and poetizing. In him is some infusion of Schumann prone to melancholy, of Mendelssohn prone to sentiment. He dwells in the two middle movements; out of them sings—by will of Mr. Koussevitzky—in too closely assimilated voice. True, Andante and Allegretto are strangely, wilfully, alike in mood and expression. No other symphony within casual memory contains two divisions so near akin. Brahms left no foot-note to this kinship, no hint of his purpose in creation, his desire in performance. It has been the custom of conductors to differentiate as much as might be; contrasting pace, re-pointing accents. Mr. Koussevitzky, as mute as Brahms about the prompting intent, chooses to enforce the resemblance. He takes both movements exceeding slow. Out of each he wrings the last drop of sentimental melancholy. With either he refines up[illegible] delicate and [illegible] softening the strings, staying the wood-winds, mellowing horns and trumpets. The listener hears a Brahms as sentimental and adroit as Mendelssohn, as moody and dusky as Schumann. Two-fold in this Symphony in F major is the Brahms of Mr. Koussevitzky's ear and imagination—a Brahms of stress and ardors wellnigh tumultuous; a Brahms musing and musical in the twilight. Like Hamlet in his mother's chamber, the conductor points to this picture and to that. To both answer an enraptured audience.

H. T. P.

Traveler
Mar 7

y Afternoon at Symphony Hall, Boston. The Rush Line of Real Lovers of Music Waiting for the Doors of Symphony n.
(Photograph by Waldron)

---

hird Symphony of Brahms Played

Yesterday afternoon's symphony program was distinguished by a highly impressive performance of Brahms F-major symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky had set it in a program of German music, contrastingly light. Preceding it was an intermezzo from Weber's comic opera, "The Three Pintos," supposedly written by Gustav Mahler when he pieced together the Weber fragments. Following, after the intermission, was a charming Scherzo taken from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger," and "Salome's Dance."

The great, overwhelming opening, with the three arresting chords that do not foreshadow so much as plunge the listener right into the midst of great things, are indicative of the heroic scale on which this symphony is built. Brahms planned in terms of lofty granduer. Mr. Koussevitzky knows this, for he gave it whole-souled ardor that was thrilling to hear. The majestic passages were presented with their full force, the lyric moments sang. Although undoubtedly the conductor gave the symphony an individual interpretation that did not always gibe with tradition, it was a performance for Brahms lovers to rhapsodize over, and one to create new enthusiasts for the master. The Friday afternoon audience applauded long and loud.

The Wagner music was played too slowly for full effectiveness. But it served to lead up to a brilliant performance of "Salome's Dance." In Strauss's music Mr. Koussevitzky has already shown himself at his best. In this dance he displayed his feeling for the sensuous and colorful, giving it a performance such as it rarely has.

The concert will be repeated at Symphony hall this evening.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The next regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 20 and 21, since the orchestra will be away next week. This program will include the following modern French numbers: Roland-Manuel's overture, "Isabelle and Pantalon" and his "Tempo di Ballo," Borchard's "L'Elan" and Caplet's "Poem for Violoncello and Orchestra." Jean Bedetti will be soloist in this number. Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor will close the program.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF

MAR 7 1925

9 ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS ON NEXT WEEK

Phila. and Boston Symphonies and Local Bands to Be Heard—The Recitals.

The lover of orchestral concerts will have no trouble getting his fill next week. Both the periodically visiting symphonic bands and all three of the local organizations will be heard, the sum of these totalling no less than nine concerts.

Leopold Stokowski brings his Philadelphia Orchestra to Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening with considerable music that will strike the audience as novelty. He opens his programme with a trumpet prelude by Purcell, which he discovered in the British Museum last Summer. This is to be followed by Bach's B minor suite for strings and flute and a suite made by Mr. Stokowski from three of Gluck's operas. The final number is Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherrazade."

The Boston Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, plays in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The first programme consists of the little Boccherini symphony and Mousorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which the the conductor gave here before to the Saturday subscribers, and Paul Dukas's dance suite, "La peri." Albert Spalding will be the soloist in Ottorino Respighi's "Gregorian" violin concerto.

Mr. Spalding will also be the soloist at the Saturday matinee, playing Bach's E major concerto. Otherwise, at this concert, there will be Alexander Glazounov's Eighth Symohony, Henri Rabaud's "La procession nocturne" and the Dance of Salome from Richard Strauss's opera.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 7 1925

HUMMEL RECITAL.

Albany is proud to possess such a splendid young artist as Stanley Hummel, concert pianist, who gave a delightful piano recital last evening in the Albany Historical and Art Society building. The demands of the program last evening might well tax the powers of a world celebrity. Very pleasing indeed was the ease with which this boy tossed off the most difficult passages. His tone was delightfully mature and his interpretation shows fine intelligence. The balance of this finely chosen program carried the enthusiasm of an appreciative audience at a high level through the entire evening.

Special mention should be made of the excellent reading of the Bach "Toccata and Fugue in D Minor", one of the strong feats of the program.

Stanley Hummel has been playing during the winter season with the celebrated American pianist, Edward Morris, who was heard one season in Albany as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Morris is so delighted with Stanley's work that he came from New York last night to be present at the recital.

The program was as follows: "Pastore Variee," Mozart; "Ecossaises," Beethoven; "Carnival," Schumann; a group of Chopin numbers; "Valse in A flat Major"; "Nocturne in B flat Minor" and "Scherzo in C Sharp Minor." The remainder of the program included :"Etude, in F. Minor," Dohnanyi, "May Night," Palmgren, and "La Campanella" (The Bell), Paganini-Liszt.

NEW YORK
EVENING SUN

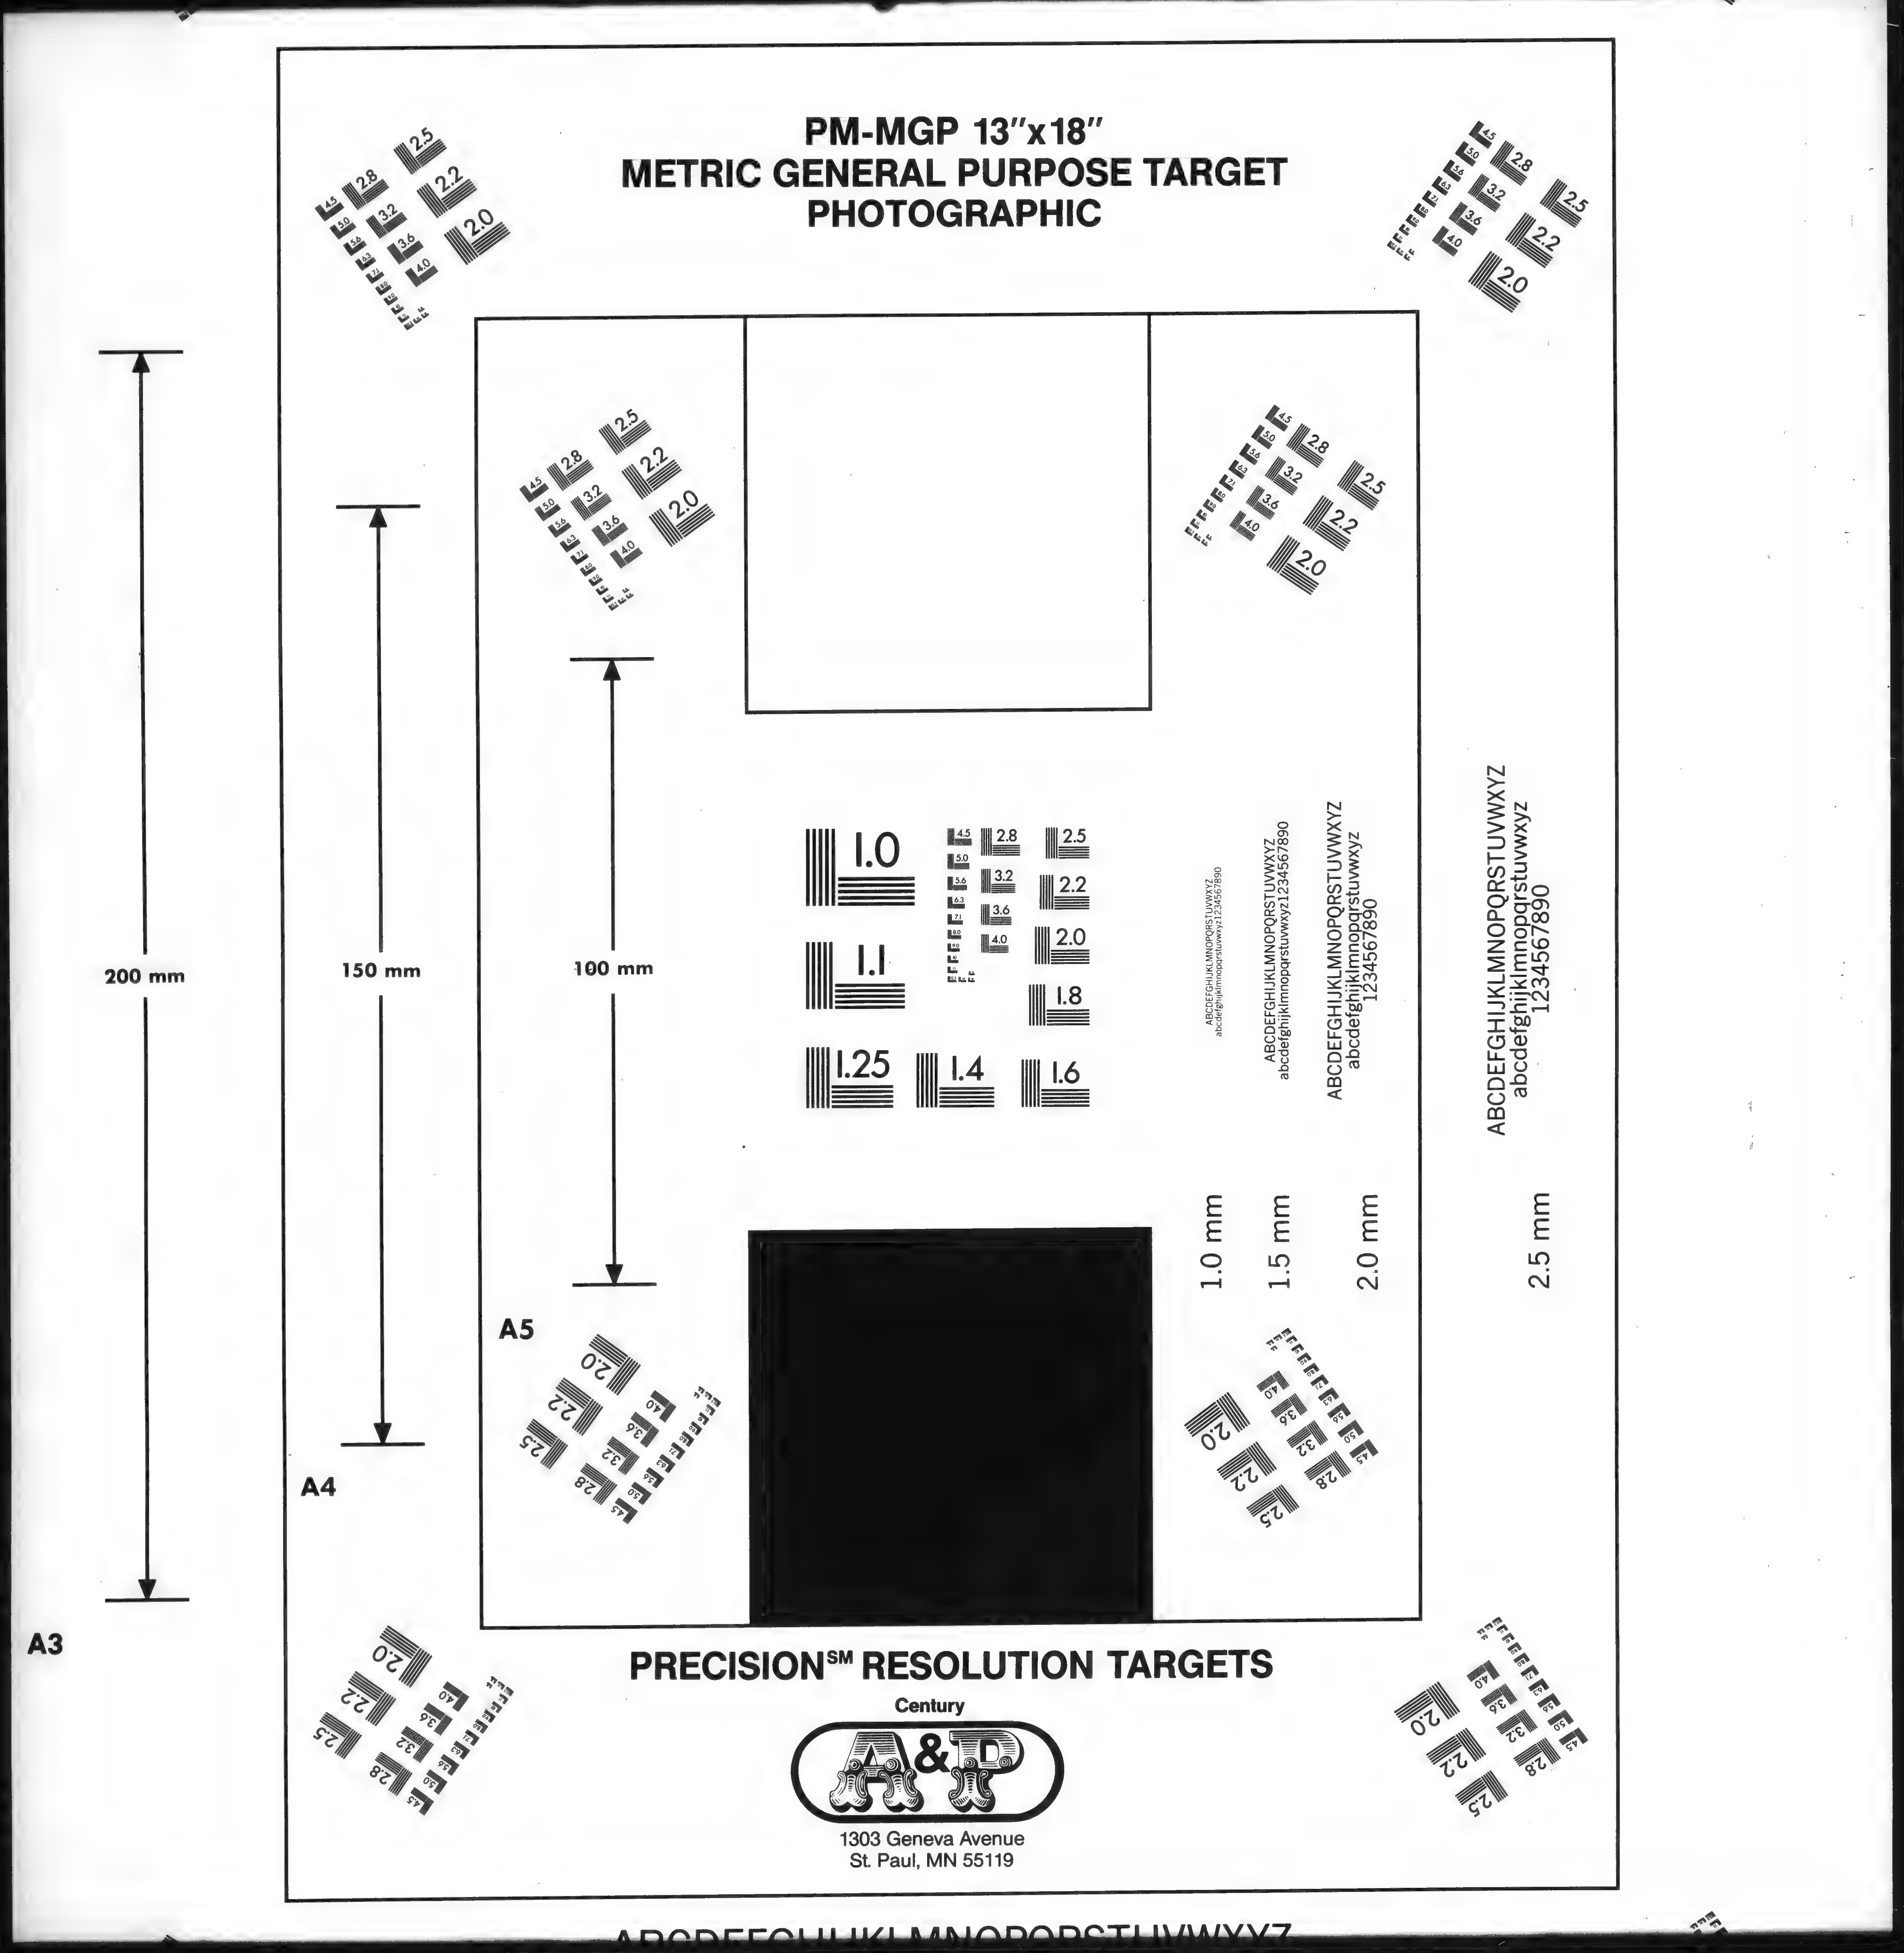
MAR 7 1925

The fourth and last pair of concerts but one in New York this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Albert Spalding, as soloist, will be heard on Thursday in Respighi's Gregorian concerto for violin, and, on Saturday, in Bach's concerto in E. At the Thursday concert a symphony by Boccherini in C, opus 16, No. 3; Dukas's "Danced Poem," "La Peri," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by Ravel, will be given. At the Saturday concert Glazounov's symphony No. 8 in E, Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," and Strauss's Dance of Salome complete the list.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0
7.1
8.0
9.0
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

55

SYMPHONY PUTS LOVE IN BRAHMS

His Third Made a Rich Tonal Drama of Power

Post Mar 7

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky performed notable service for two pieces so dissimilar that they may be said to stand at opposite poles of the tonal art: Brahms' Third Symphony and the Dance of the Seven Veils from Strauss' "Salome."

Thus did Mr. Koussevitzky once more give convincing proof of his remarkable versatility as conductor and as interpreter.

MAKES BRAHMS EMOTIONAL

When John F. Runciman, contrasting the symphonies of Tchaikowsky and of Brahms, declared that whereas the former were charged with an intense inner life, the latter were "dead as a doormat," he spoke, of course, with absurd exaggeration. Yet in partial justification of such a point of view, it may be said that the old, pedantic, sober-sided, cut-and-dried manner of interpreting the symphonies of Brahms did much to create in certain quarters a prejudice against them that was in reality quite unwarranted.

Fortunately, today there is increasingly evidenced a new attitude toward Brahms, one that seeks to place the emotional above the formal qualities of his music, and of this refreshing and altogether enlightened attitude Mr. Koussevitzky is an ardent apostle.

Superb Tonal Drama

Yesterday the Third Symphony was heard not only as music of plastic beauty but as tonal drama, although there was in Mr. Koussevitzky's reading no hint of theatricality. To unusual degree had the first movement a splendid and compelling vigor, with the conflict between the opposing motives vividly brought out. The Andante, that has so often seemed perfunctory, was imbued with romantic warmth; the charm of the Poco Allegretto, though never to be doubted, was none the less heightened; and the finale had for once a significance that made it, not anti-climax, but fitting conclusion. Nor was the audience unaware of these marvels. The applause was of heartiness that this or other symphonies of Brahms have seldom enough provoked hereabouts.

Yet if this Third Symphony has not always fared so supremely well in this city, there have, nevertheless, been admirable performances of it here before that of yesterday.

Salome's Sensual Dance

Salome's Dance, on the other hand, on this occasion came for the first time into its own. Not that Mr. Koussevitzky might convince us that this fragment is to be placed among Strauss' most inspired, most important pages. That would be impossibility. But at least he made his public seem, not weakly inappropriate to scene and situation of the drama, but altogether suitable for it. Gone was the clumsiness, the commonplace, the sense of striving, that has heretofore marked this music. Instead we heard yesterday a music voluptuous and sensual, gorgeously colored and subtly rhymed. Scarcely the ideal music for the dance of Salome, yet something closer to it than we of Boston had previously known.

A Teutonic programme was that of yesterday, to balance the French and the Russian programmes that had gone before. In the remaining pieces were an ingeniously counterfeited intermezzo made by Mahler's for Weber's unfinished opera, "The Three Pintos"; the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; and the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger."

Slow Pace for Prelude

Played with virtuoso speed, lightness, delicacy and finish, the Scherzo was warmly applauded, and Mr. Laurent, as first flute and hence the hero of the occasion, had twice to bow his personal acknowledgements.

So far as its tonal richness and grave beauty were concerned, the Prelude likewise received admirable performance. Nevertheless it was possible to question the judiciousness of Mr. Koussevitzky's uncommonly slow pace. As music per se, perhaps, the effect was excellent. But had it the true flayon of the Wagner opera? Surely the "Sachs theme" had overmuch of brooding tenderness, too little of manly strength. And the sturdy choral in which the good folk of Nuremberg hail their idol, savored truth to tell, a little of sentimentality.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 7 1925

Boston Symphony at Capitol Wednesday.

The feature of the coming concert of the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians at the Capitol theatre, Wednesday evening, March 11 will be the appearance of Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the organization, who will make his debut in Albany at this concert. His fame is immense both in this country and abroad and his engagement with the Boston orchestra has been successful beyond the most optimistic expectation.

There are manifold sides to the genius of Koussevitzky. Not a little of his fame is due to his readings of the classical masters. No one can intill a more vivid and beautiful life into the music of the eighteenth century. Koussevitzky, the romanticist, is also irrestible. The fervors of Wagner, Berlioz or Tchaikovsky flame gloriously under his baton. Koussevitzky appears both as classicist and romanticist in the coming concert here.

Then there is a third angle to his striking achievements—his championship of music of the modern schools. No conductor scrutinizes more eagerly and sets forth more staunchly and understandingly the most important music of our own day. Seats for the concert are now on sale at the Capitol theatre.

Her... Mar 8

IS THIS TRUE?

"The Boston Symphony orchestra has asked permission of Mana-Zucca, Miami composer, to play one of her works and has invited her to be present when it is produced in Boston this spring. No other woman composer has been given this recognition by this noted musical organization.

"'Piepa' is the composition selected by Mana-Zucca for a place in the repertoire of the Boston Symphony orchestra and she is planning to go North, probably in May, to hear it given.

"Miami has the distinction of being the home of Mana-Zucca, who is in private life Mrs. Irwin M. Cassel. Mazica Hall is the name of the charming villa that is her home. In the great music room with softly toned walls hung with blue draperies this interesting and gifted young artist is working out themes that will add to her fame in the musical world.

"Mana-Zucca is a girlish young woman with a wealth of bronzed hair and sparkling eyes. She is a radiant type unspoiled by success and brimming with happiness. Since her childhood she has devoted herself to her art beginning her career at six or seven years. Her compositions have been widely recognized and her texts are in very general use. Her songs are in high favor with Miami audiences and are in constant use in the repertoire of local singers. Mana-Zucca's husband, Mr. Cassell, is also a musician and has written many of the lyrics for which she has written the musical scores and has been a sympathetic and understanding aid in her work."

Orchestral music by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Ethel Leginska, Lili Boulanger has been played at concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and has not Miss Lang been represented?

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Following the Boston Symphony orchestra's trip to New York, which will occupy this week, the 19th pair of Symphony concerts will take place in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 20 and 21. Mr. Koussevitzky will devote the first part of the program to the following modern French numbers: Roland Manuel's overture to "Isabelle and Pantalon," and his "Tempo di Ballo"; Borchard's "L'Elan"; Caplet's "Poem," for violoncello and orchestra, Jean Bedetti, [illegible] Tchaikov[illegible] minor.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 7 1925

MANY OF MAINE'S MUSIC LOVERS TO HEAR THE SYMPHONY

Tickets Sold in Several Places Outside City for Big Orchestra

Indications that out of town attendance at the Boston Symphony Concert on March ~~25 will be larger~~ than ever before in the history of symphony concerts in this City are afforded by the advance seat sale. Business from all sections of Maine is unusually brisk, and there is every reason to believe that when Serge Koussevitzky, the world famous conductor, raises his baton at City Hall Maine people will show their appreciation of the importance of the concert by giving him the capacity house that has greeted him wherever the orchestra has played this season.

Many musical organizations from out of town are reserving seats in considerable blocks which indicates that young musicians are anxious to hear the world-famous orchestra under the man who promises to prove the greatest of its conductors.

Globe Mar 7

GERMAN PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Koussevitzky's Readings Bear Personal Stamp

Globe Mar 7

If we are to have national programs at the Symphony concerts yesterday's German program was as successful a choice of numbers as any conductor is likely to make. Koussevitzky's readings of familiar music by Brahms, Wagner, Mendelssohn, and Strauss bear as always his personal stamp. His pronounced individuality is at once his greatest asset and his greatest liability as a conductor. Those who like him like him very much. The minority which dislikes him dislikes him very much.

Nobody else has conducted Brahms Third Symphony here with so much energy and so much grace. These adjectives apply both to Mr Koussevitzky's way of leading the orchestra and to the way the music was played. He gloried in the pulsing rhythms of the first movement, emphasized every dramatic outburst from the brass without breaking the line of the composition.

For once he took a slow movement more rapidly than one is accustomed to hear it, instead of more slowly. This time "andante" became almost "allegretto." In the finale, and in the end of the first movement one felt a striving to make the music more significant, more emotional than Brahms succeeded in making it. This is the least admirable of his four symphonies.

The introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger," romantically interpreted in the mood associated rather with "Tristan and Isolde" than with the comedy of Beckmesser and the apprentices, was another Koussevitzky "tour de force." The music does suggest Sachs' melancholy, but one had not hitherto linked it imaginatively with the "Liebestod."

The only relatively unfamiliar music on the program was the entr'acte from Mahler's completion of Weber's unfinished comic opera "Die Drei Pintos," sprightly yet suave light music in wholly agreeable vein. Some have said that Mahler is solely responsible for this entr'acte. Yet it is not unlike Weber's music in style, though the orchestration must be at least in part Mahler's. However that may be, the piece is heard gladly, and forgotten readily. It was smoothly played.

With the scherzo from Mendelssohn's music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Koussevitzky was not wholly successful. As with Mozart he bore on too heavily, over emphasized strong accents. This is elfin music, not of the theatre but of moonlit woods in June. It was too efficiently played yesterday, with little of the magic Koussevitzky brings to Weber's "Oberon" overture.

The "Dance of the Seven Veils" from Strauss' opera "Salome" stirred Mr Koussevitzky's imagination. The performance was almost unpleasantly vivid. One felt the morbid pathological emotion the dramatic situation demands. This opera has not been given in Boston because the local dramatic censorship objects to it. Fortunately, music is not censored as immoral. Nor would Strauss' dance heard without knowledge of the opera or of Wilde's play or Flaubert's story on which it is largely based, seem morbid, pathological music. Strauss has been diabolically clever in the scoring of this music. Has anyone yet shown more easy mastery of an orchestra of a hundred players?

The important thing about this program was not its German origin but its musical value. It is relatively unimportant that so many great composers have been German born. They belong now not to Germany but to the whole world, just as the great composers of any Nation do.

P. R.

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
MAR 8 1925

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at City Hall the last of the month will of course be the musical event of the season. The Music Commission, while thinking it advisable to abandon the usual winter concert course, long ago engaged the Symphony for a concert in Portland this year realizing that this would be one big attraction that everyone would attend. The orchestra has always been reputed one of the most superb organizations in the world and under its various conductors from the musical centers of Europe has assumed great prestige. Now under Koussevitzky, the brilliant, handsome young Russian leader, the players have been given a great impetus. Koussevitzky will direct the orchestra in Portland and there will be about as much curiosity to see him as to hear the famous organization.

Koussevitzky believes in new music and his programs are not entirely made up of Beethoven, Mozart and Liszt.

"It is curious, this world-wide distaste for hearing new music," Mr Koussevitzky said to a interviewer. "But it is not a new phenomenon. Those who applaurd Brahms now would not listen to him 25 years ago.

"So it was with Wagner, and so it has been with many another of whom all the world now applauds. It is not merely a question of the ago of the concertgoers—some persons are able to grow old and still stay young in spirit and still keep in sympathy with the development of the world's culture."

"I have already included music by American composers on my programs," he said, "and I hope to do so again."

Paris, he said, is the one great exception to the general rule of dislike for new compositions.

"When I arrange concerts at the opera in Paris," said Mr. Koussevitzky in his suite at the Ritz-Carlton. "I know that the opera will be filled to the last seat with an audience d'elite such as one can find in no other country and no other city in the world.

"That audience d'eite in the opera in Paris doesn't want to hear Beethoven or Brahms, or Tschaikowsky. It wants to hear programs consisting entirely of new music. Particularly, it wants to hear music that no one ever has heard before. It wants to know what is being created in that moment."

It is this modern trend that appeals to a general audience, as well as to the progressive musician, and, one is sure in Koussevitzky's programs to find everything that stimulates and appeals.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS

Our Orchestras As Others See Them

Players in America's great symphony orchestras are less adventurous than those of staid London, so testified the famous English music critic, Ernest Newman, who has been serving as guest critic for The New York Evening Post. Mr. Newman was asked to give his impressions of American orchestras. These are based upon hearings only of the New York Philharmonic, New York Symphony, the Philadelphia orchestra and the Boston Symphony. Of these four organizations Mr. Newman considers the Philadelphia the best—which recalls a similar statement from Richard Strauss during his last visit to America. However, Mr. Newman considers the Philharmonic a close second.

In giving his reasons for the more adventurous quality of the London playing, Mr. Newman instances first the initial advantage of the American orchestras in being economically secure, whereas the London orchestras are not sure of their existence from year to year. As a result the London orchestras engage a number of visiting conductors during a season—the Queen's Hall orchestra being the only one that always plays under the same conductor. As a consequence the London players seem to Mr. Newman more quickly adaptable than the American. The Londoners are gamblers, says he, and they develop a gambler's virtues and defects. Among the former are an unusual sharpness of apprehension and quickness of response. It is that sense of adventure that gives their playing a nervous intensity that Mr. Newman has not often met with in New York. In all the finest playing that he has heard in New York, the impression has been one not of nervous adventure, the magnificent machine could not posbut of steady confidence—a feeling that sibly go wrong.

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

MAR 8 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY IS NEW PERSONALITY AMERICAN MUSIC

Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Most Magnetic

The name Koussevitzky seems to have a species of magic all by itself.

Even before the great conductor who bears it had lifted his baton for his first concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, New York City, which had been more or less lukewarm towards the orchestra with Monteux as its head, had completely subscribed one full series of Boston Symphony concerts.

This was done on the strength of Koussevitzky's European reputation, partly because of a sort of glamour that hangs about his name as a result of his conductorial achievements, and partially because of curiosity. Koussevitzky was a new personality in American musci. Everybody was anxious to see him for the first time.

The remarkable thing is, however, that the same thing happened to all subsequent concerts. Much heralded as he was in New York, Koussevitzky exceeded even New York's expectations. He became at once the sensation of the New York season, and a strong contender for the supremacy which Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony, has maintained in that city for many seasons.

Koussevitzky has many traits that recommend him to the musical public. He is a man of boiling enthusiasm, of much sensibility and of generous and buoyant disposition. He can whip an orchestra and an audience to the top pitch of excitement, but always with the background of a rich, impulsive and genuinely musical nature. He is imaginative. But while he can be sensuous in gainng effects of color ths sensuousness is controlled by a cool head. He is not given to sentimentalism. He realizes the value of tonal proportion. He is dramatic, but not theatrical.

These are the qualities that appeal to the musician, and that insure a concert of rare interest when he appears here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the 25th of March for a concert at City Hall under Music Commission auspices.

But there are other qualities that will appeal, also. He is a man of singular magnetism and commanding personality. He is tall, broadshouldered, of fine figure. He wears his clothes as a man of the world who can take his place in any society. His appearance is satisfying to the eye, as the effects which he gains from his orchestra are satsfying to the ear, and the dual appeal should make his concert on the 25th crowd City Hall to the very doors and put even standing room at a premium.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 8 1925

Fourth Brooklyn Concert Of the Boston Orchestra

The ourth and last visit but one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will tak eplace at the Academy of Music next Friday evening, March 13. The soloist for the evening will be Albert Spalding, the celebrated American violinist, who will appear with the orchestra in Bach's Concerto in E major. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will open the evening with the Symphony in C major, op. 16, No. 3, by Boccherini, the early Italian composer. The other numbers will be Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," a pageant in tones based on the poem of Lenau; Dukas' "La Peri," which the French composer calls a dance poem, and in which he describes a fairy tale of the Orient. The closing number will be "Salome," Dance of the Seven Veils, from the music-drama of Richard Strauss.

The quality of Albert Spalding's genius as a virtuoso and artist has long held the highest admiration of his own country. In the last few seasons he has made many notable appearances in European cities and justly extended his fame in the Old World.

SYMPHONY PUTS LOVE IN BRAHMS

His Third Made a Rich Tonal Drama of Power

Mar 7

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky performed notable service for two pieces so dissimilar that they may be said to stand at opposite poles of the tonal art: Brahms' Third Symphony and the Dance of the Seven Veils from Strauss' "Salome."

Thus did Mr. Koussevitzky once more give convincing proof of his remarkable versatility as conductor and as interpreter.

MAKES BRAHMS EMOTIONAL

When John F. Runciman, contrasting the symphonies of Tchaikowsky and of Brahms, declared that whereas the former were charged with an intense inner life, the latter were "dead as a doormat," he spoke, of course, with absurd exaggeration. Yet in partial justification of such a point of view, it may be said that the old, pedantic, sober-sided, cut-and-dried manner of interpreting the symphonies of Brahms did much to create in certain quarters a prejudice against them that was in reality quite unwarranted.

Fortunately, today there is increasingly evidenced a new attitude toward Brahms, one that seeks to place the emotional above the formal qualities of his music, and of this refreshing and altogether enlightened attitude Mr. Koussevitzky is an ardent apostle.

Superb Tonal Drama

Yesterday the Third Symphony was heard not only as music of plastic beauty but as tonal drama, although there was in Mr. Koussevitzky's reading no hint of theatricality. To unusual degree had the first movement a splendid and compelling vigor, with the conflict between the opposing motives vividly brought out. The Andante, that has so often seemed perfunctory, was imbued with romantic warmth; the charm of the Poco Allegretto, though never to be doubted, was none the less heightened; and the finale had for once a significance that made it, not anti-climax, but fitting conclusion. Nor was the audience unaware of these marvels. The applause was of heartiness that this or other symphonies of Brahms have seldom enough provoked hereabouts.

Yet if this Third Symphony has not always fared so supremely well in this city, there have, nevertheless, been admirable performances of it here before that of yesterday.

Salome's Sensual Dance

Salome's Dance, on the other hand, on this occasion came for the first time into its own. Not that Mr. Koussevitzky might convince us that this fragment is to be placed among Strauss' most inspired, most important pages. That would be impossibility. But at least he made his public seem, not weakly inappropriate to scene and situation of the drama, but altogether suitable for it. Gone was the clumsiness, the commonplace, the sense of striving, that has heretofore marked this music. Instead we heard yesterday a music voluptuous and sensual, gorgeously colored and subtly rhymed. Scarcely the ideal music for the dance of Salome, yet something closer to it than we of Boston had previously known.

A Teutonic programme was that of yesterday, to balance the French and the Russian programmes that had gone before. In the remaining pieces were an ingeniously counterfeited intermezzo made by Mahler's for Weber's unfinished opera, "The Three Pintos"; the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; and the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger."

Slow Pace for Prelude

Played with virtuoso speed, lightness, delicacy and finish, the Scherzo was warmly applauded, and Mr. Laurent, as first flute and hence the hero of the occasion, had twice to bow his personal acknowledgements.

So far as its tonal richness and grave beauty were concerned, the Prelude likewise received admirable performance. Nevertheless it was possible to question the judiciousness of Mr. Koussevitzky's uncommonly slow pace. As music per se, perhaps, the effect was excellent. But had it the true flavor of the Wagner opera? Surely the "Sachs theme" had overmuch of brooding tenderness, too little of manly strength. And the sturdy choral in which the good folk of Nuremberg hail their idol, savored truth to tell, a little of sentimentality.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 7 1925

Boston Symphony at Capitol Wednesday.

The feature of the coming concert of the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians at the Capitol theatre, Wednesday evening, March 11 will be the appearance of Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the organization, who will make his debut in Albany at this concert. His fame is immense both in this country and abroad and his engagement with the Boston orchestra has been successful beyond the most optimistic expectation.

There are manifold sides to the genius of Koussevitzky. Not a little of his fame is due to his readings of the classical masters. No one can intill a more vivid and beautiful life into the music of the eighteenth century. Koussevitzky, the romanticist, is also irrestible. The fervors of Wagner, Berlioz or Tchaikovsky flame gloriously under his baton. Koussevitzky appears both as classicist and romanticist in the coming concert here.

Then there is a third angle to his striking achievements—his championship of music of the modern schools. No conductor scrutinizes more eagerly and sets forth more staunchly and understandingly the most important music of our own day. Seats for the concert are now on sale at the Capitol theatre.

IS THIS TRUE?

"The Boston Symphony orchestra has asked permission of Mana-Zucca, Miami composer, to play one of her works and has invited her to be present when it is produced in Boston this spring. No other woman composer has been given this recognition by this noted musical organization.

"'Piepa' is the composition selected by Mana-Zucca for a place in the repertoire of the Boston Symphony orchestra and she is planning to go North, probably in May, to hear it given.

"Miami has the distinction of being the home of Mana-Zucca, who is in private life Mrs. Irwin M. Cassel. Mazica Hall is the name of the charming villa that is her home. In the great music room with softly toned walls hung with blue draperies this interesting and gifted young artist is working out themes that will add to her fame in the musical world.

"Mana-Zucca is a girlish young woman with a wealth of bronzed hair and sparkling eyes. She is a radiant type unspoiled by success and brimming with happiness. Since her childhood she has devoted herself to her art beginning her career at six or seven years. Her compositions have been widely recognized and her texts are in very general use. Her songs are in high favor with Miami audiences and are in constant use in the repertoire of vocal singers. Mana-Zucca's husband, Mr. Cassell, is also a musician and has written many of the lyrics for which she has written the musical scores and has been a sympathetic and understanding aid in her work."

Orchestral music by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Ethel Leginska, Lili Boulanger has been played at concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and has not Miss Lang been represented?

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Following the Boston Symphony orchestra's trip to New York, which will occupy this week, the 19th pair of Symphony concerts will take place in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 20 and 21. Mr. Koussevitzky will devote the first part of the program to the following modern French numbers: Roland Manuel's overture to "Isabelle and Pantalon," and his "Tempo di Ballo"; Borchard's "L'Elan"; Caplet's "Poem," for violoncello and orchestra, Jean Bedetti, [illegible] The concert will end with Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, [illegible] minor.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 7 1925

MANY OF MAINE'S MUSIC LOVERS TO HEAR THE SYMPHONY

Tickets Sold in Several Places Outside City for Big Orchestra

Indications that out of town attendance at the Boston Symphony Concert on March ~~25 will be larger~~ than ever before in the history of symphony concerts in this City are afforded by the advance seat sale. Business from all sections of Maine is unusually brisk, and there is every reason to believe that when Serge Koussevitzky, the world famous conductor, raises his baton at City Hall Maine people will show their appreciation of the importance of the concert by giving him the capacity house that has greeted him wherever the orchestra has played this season.

Many musical organizations from out of town are reserving seats in considerable blocks which indicates that young musicians are anxious to hear the world-famous orchestra under the man who promises to prove the greatest of its conductors.

GERMAN PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Koussevitzky's Readings Bear Personal Stamp

Globe Mar 7

If we are to have national programs at the Symphony concerts yesterday's German program was as successful a choice of numbers as any conductor is likely to make. Koussevitzky's readings of familiar music by Brahms, Wagner, Mendelssohn, and Strauss bear as always his personal stamp. His pronounced individuality is at once his greatest asset and his greatest liability as a conductor. Those who like him like him very much. The minority which dislikes him dislikes him very much.

Nobody else has conducted Brahms Third Symphony here with so much energy and so much grace. These adjectives apply both to Mr Koussevitzky's way of leading the orchestra and to the way the music was played. He gloried in the pulsing rhythms of the first movement, emphasized every dramatic outburst from the brass without breaking the line of the composition.

For once he took a slow movement more rapidly than one is accustomed to hear it, instead of more slowly. This time "andante" became almost "allegretto." In the finale, and in the end of the first movement one felt a striving to make the music more significant, more emotional than Brahms succeeded in making it. This is the least admirable of his four symphonies.

The introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger," romantically interpreted in the mood associated rather with "Tristan and Isolde" than with the comedy of Beckmesser and the apprentices, was another Koussevitzky "tour de force." The music does suggest Sachs' melancholy, but one had not hitherto linked it imaginatively with the "Liebestod."

The only relatively unfamiliar music on the program was the entr'acte from Mahler's completion of Weber's unfinished comic opera "Die Drei Pintos," sprightly yet suave light music in wholly agreeable vein. Some have said that Mahler is solely responsible for this entr'acte. Yet it is not unlike Weber's music in style, though the orchestration must be at least in part Mahler's. However that may be, the piece is heard gladly, and forgotten readily. It was smoothly played.

With the scherzo from Mendelssohn's music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Koussevitzky was not wholly successful. As with Mozart he bore on too heavily, over emphasized strong accents. This is elfin music, not of the theatre but of moonlit woods in June. It was too efficiently played yesterday, with little of the magic Koussevitzky brings to Weber's "Oberon" overture.

The "Dance of the Seven Veils" from Strauss' opera "Salome" stirred Mr Koussevitzky's imagination. The performance was almost unpleasantly vivid. One felt the morbid pathological emotion the dramatic situation demands. This opera has not been given in Boston because the local dramatic censorship objects to it. Fortunately, music is not censored as immoral. Nor would Strauss' dance heard without knowledge of the opera or of Wilde's play or Flaubert's story on which it is largely based, seem morbid, pathological music. Strauss has been diabolically clever in the scoring of this music. Has anyone yet shown more easy mastery of an orchestra of a hundred players?

The important thing about this program was not its German origin but its musical value. It is relatively unimportant that so many great composers have been German born. They belong now not to Germany but to the whole world, just as the great composers of any Nation do.

P. R.

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
MAR 8

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at City Hall the last of the month will of course be the musical event of the season. The Music Commission, while thinking it advisable to abandon the usual winter concert course, long ago engaged the Symphony for a concert in Portland this year realizing that this would be one big attraction that everyone would attend. The orchestra has always been reputed one of the most superb organizations in the world and under its various conductors from the musical centers of Europe has assumed great prestige. Now under Koussevitzky, the brilliant, handsome young Russian leader, the players have been given a great impetus. Koussevitzky will direct the orchestra in Portland and there will be about as much curiosity to see him as to hear the famous organization.

Koussevitzky believes in new music and his programs are not entirely made up of Beethoven, Mozart and Liszt.

"It is curious, this world-wide distaste for hearing new music," Mr Koussevitzky said to a interviewer "But it is not a new phenomenon Those who applaurd Brahms now would not listen to him 25 years ago

"So it was with Wagner, and so it has been with many another one whom all the world now applauds. It is not merely a question of the ago of the concertgoers—some persons are able to grow old and still stay young in spirit and still keep in sympathy with the development of the world's culture."

"I have already included music by American composers on my programs," he said, "and I hope to do so again."

Paris, he said, is the one great exception to the general rule of dislike for new compositions.

"When I arrange concerts at the opera in Paris," said Mr. Koussevitzky in his suite at the Ritz-Carlton. "I know that the opera will be filled to the last seat with an audience d'elite such as one can find in no other country and no other city in the world.

"That audience d'eite in the opera in Paris doesn't want to hear Beethoven or Brahms, or Tschaikowsky. It wants to hear programs consisting entirely of new music. Particularly, it wants to hear music that no one ever has heard before. It wants to know what is being created in that moment."

It is this modern trend that appeals to a general audience, as well as to the progressive musician, and, one is sure in Koussevitzky's programs to find everything that stimulates and appeals.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS

Our Orchestras As Others See Them

Players in America's great symphony orchestras are less adventurous than those of staid London, so testified the famous English music critic, Ernest Newman, who has been serving as guest critic for The New York Evening Post. Mr. Newman was asked to give his impressions of American orchestras. These are based upon hearings only of the New York Philharmonic, New York Symphony, the Philadelphia orchestra and the Boston Symphony. Of these four organizations Mr. Newman considers the Philadelphia the best—which recalls a similar statement from Richard Strauss during his last visit to America. However, Mr. Newman considers the Philharmonic a close second.

In giving his reasons for the more adventurous quality of the London playing, Mr. Newman instances first the initial advantage of the American orchestras in being economically secure, whereas the London orchestras are not sure of their existence from year to year. As a result the London orchestras engage a number of visiting conductors during a season—the Queen's Hall orchestra being the only one that always plays under the same conductor. As a consequence the London players seem to Mr. Newman more quickly adaptable than the American. The Londoners are gamblers, says he, and they develop a gambler's virtues and defects. Among the former are an unusual sharpness of apprehension and quickness of response. It is that sense of adventure that gives their playing a nervous intensity that Mr. Newman has not often met with in New York. In all the finest playing that he has heard in New York, the impression has been one not of nervous adventure, but of steady confidence—a feeling that the magnificent machine could not possibly go wrong.

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
MAR 8 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY IS NEW PERSONALITY AMERICAN MUSIC

Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Most Magnetic

The name Koussevitzky seems to have a species of magic all by itself.

Even before the great conductor who bears it had lifted his baton for his first concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, New York City, which had been more or less lukewarm towards the orchestra with Monteux as its head, had completely subscribed one full series of Boston Symphony concerts.

This was done on the strength of Koussevitzky's European reputation, partly because of a sort of glamour that hangs about his name as a result of his conductorial achievements, and partially because of curiosity. Koussevitzky was a new personality in American musci. Everybody was anxious to see him for the first time.

The remarkable thing is, however, that the same thing happened to all subsequent concerts. Much heralded as he was in New York, Koussevitzky exceeded even New York's expectations. He became at once the sensation of the New York season, and a strong contender for the supremacy which Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony, has maintained in that city for many seasons.

Koussevitzky has many traits that recommend him to the musical public. He is a man of boiling enthusiasm, of much sensibility and of generous and buoyant disposition. He can whip an orchestra and an audience to the top pitch of excitement, but always with the background of a rich, impulsive and genuinely musical nature. He is imaginative. But while he can be sensuous in gainng effects of color ths sensuousness is controlled by a cool head. He is not given to sentimentalism. He realizes the value of tonal proportion. He is dramatic, but not theatrical.

These are the qualities that appeal to the musician, and that insure a concert of rare interest when he appears here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the 25th of March for a concert at City Hall under Music Commission auspices.

But there are other qualities that will appeal, also. He is a man of singular magnetism and commanding personality. He is tall, broad-shouldered, of fine figure. He wears his clothes as a man of the world who can take his place in any society. His appearance is satisfying to the eye, as the effects which he gains from his orchestra are satsfying to the ear, and the dual appeal should make his concert on the 25th crowd City Hall to the very doors and put even standing room at a premium.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 8 1925

Fourth Brooklyn Concert Of the Boston Orchestra

The ourth and last visit but one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will tak eplace at the Academy of Music next Friday evening, March 13. The soloist for the evening will be Albert Spalding, the celebrated American violinist, who will appear with the orchestra in Bach's Concerto in E major. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will open the evening with the Symphony in C major, op. 16, No. 3, by Boccherini, the early Italian composer. The other numbers will be Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," a pageant in tones based on the poem of Lenau; Dukas' "La Peri," which the French composer calls a dance poem, and in which he describes a fairy tale of the Orient. The closing number will be "Salome," Dance of the Seven Veils, from the music-drama of Richard Strauss.

The quality of Albert Spalding's genius as a virtuoso and artist has long held the highest admiration of his own country. In the last few seasons he has made many notable appearances in European cities and justly extended his fame in the Old World.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

56

NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune

MAR 8 1925

With the th local organizations and the two regular visitors, five orche be heard here this week. at delphia Orchestra will give the of its ten Carnegie Hall concerts Tuesday night, beginning its program with a Trumpet Prelude by Henry Purcell, discovered by Leopold Stokowski last summer in the British Museum and first played in America by him at the Philadelphia concerts of December 26-27. Suites by Bach and Gluck complete the first half of the program, with "Scheherazade" for the second.

For the Boston Symphony's fourth pair of Carnegie Hall concerts, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Albert Spalding will be the soloist. On Thursday evening, he will play Respighi's "Gregorian" concerto for violin, introduced here last month by Rudolph Polk, while Mr. Koussevitzky will play an eighteenth-century symphony, Boccherini's C major, and give Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which he conducted here at his last afternoon concert, its first evening performance in New York.

On Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky will give Glazounoff's latest symphony, the Eighth, in E flat, Op. 83, and Mr. Spalding will play Bach's E major concerto.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 10 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Tomorrow night at the Capitol theatre, Ben Franklin will present the celebrated Boston Symphony of 104 instrumentalists in their much anticipated concert, and the event will take on special significance because it will serve to introduce to Albanians, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the organization who makes his first appearance in this city. This concert has aroused tremendous interest, it will be attended by a capacity audience and it will be the greatest musical treat of the year in the Albany radius. The seat sale for the Albany concert is being held at the box office of the Capitol theatre, and Manager Ben Franklin has given instruction that careful and prompt attention be given mail and phone requests, and to have the tickets held until called for.

BANGOR
ME.
NEWS
MAR 9 1925

Boston Symphony Is At Portland March 25

With Serge Koussevitzky's name on every lip, and with the Boston Symphony re-established as the world's greatest orchestra, there is the keenest interest in the Boston Symphony's coming to Maine for a concert in City Hall, Portland, March 25.

The enterprise of the Portland music commission, which is responsible for Koussevitzky's coming to Portland, is applauded on every hand, for in a year when the Boston Symphony season in both New York and Boston is completely subscribed in advance and even standing room is a premium at Koussevitzky concerts, the commission may well pride itself upon its foresight in booking the orchestra far in advance of the arrival of the distinguished new conductor from Russia.

Koussevitzky is the first Russian who has ever wielded a baton over the Boston Symphony. He is the successor of a long line of distinguished conductors, but if vogue is any indication of merit he promises to surpass these in standing. He is the only man for many seasons who has threatened Stokowski's supremacy as the greatest conductor in America.

New
at

This evening, in the fifth concert of the Smith college concert course at John M. Greene hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear under its new leader, Serge Koussevitzky.

Mr. Koussevitzky is the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra. He is named as the only great conductor, who, up to this season, has not been heard in America. Recognition by the Musical Savants of America has been immediate, unqualified by hint of adverse criticism.

The earlier career of Mr. Koussevitzky in Russia has been, perhaps, the most conspicuous in the famous orchestras which he organized in Moscow. There, and in Petrograd, Beethoven and Bach festivals figured among his contests. He, likewise, championed music of the modern men of genius. He has acted as a sort of musical missionary, travelling all over Russia, bearing symphonic music to parts where it never had been heard. He even sailed the length of the Volga river after chartering a steamer, and gave concerts in town after town.

The Russian revolution finally put an end to his musical activities in that country, and in 1920, he went to Paris, where he organized and carried on for four years before coming to this country, what were broadly known as the "Koussevitzky Concerts."

With the London Symphony and with numerous European Symphony orchestras, he has appeared as guest conductor, and has conducted grand opera in various places, in Paris and Barcelona.

Mr. Koussevitzky has reiterated that he is not out for propaganda of any school of composers or for any other cause whatsoever. He considers that the classics are the established basis of musical beauty, yet that music cannot stand still. The modernists, who have something to say and say it worthily, he believes, must be heard, for they may be the classics of tomorrow.

Knowing his standpoint, one can appreciate the program of this evening even more, beginning, as it does, with a symphony of Boccherini, an Italian contemporary of Haydn and Mozart in the latter half of the 18th century. This is followed by pieces by the Russians, Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakow. One of the latter celebrates the bee with

---

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

MAR 8 19

At its fourth concert in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in C major symphony, by Boccherini; "Le Peri," by Dukas; Gregorian concerto by Respigi, Albert Spalding, solo violinist; "Pictures at an Exhibition," by Moussorgsky-Ravel. The programme for Saturday afternoon consists of symphony, by Glazounoff; concerto, by Bach, Albert Spalding, soloist; "La Procession Nocturne," by Rabaud; Dance of Salome, by Strauss. Sergei Koussevitsky will conduct at both events.

NEW YORK
TIMES

MAR 8 1925

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

The Brooklyn Orchestral Society gives its second and last concert at the Academy tomorrow evening, when Herbert Braham conducts Dvorak's "New World" symphony and works of Bach, Albert, Svendsen and Johann Strauss.

Albert Spalding will be violin soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy, in a program yet to be announced, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK
TIMES

MAR 8 192

Georges Longy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will resign his position at the end of the present season.

He will retire, says The Boston Transcript, at his own request, and Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor not a little regrets the decision. Not only will Mr. Longy leave the orchestra. He will also depart from Boston, returning for the remainder of his days to France, whence he came. He is passing middle age. His work as oboist taxes him. The direction of a music school leaves him little leisure. He is disposed to sit in the sun and be idle.

The public of the symphony concerts, which has listened to Mr. Longy for a quarter of a century and weekly recognized both his presence and his voice, will keep him in remembrance and companion him with good wishes. In Europe and in America no oboist of his time has surpassed him in quality and finesse of tone; while few have equaled him in evenness and felicity of performance.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNI

MAR 8 19

Fourth Boston Symphony Concert Next Friday Night.

Serge Koussevitzky will make his fourth visit to Brooklyn for the last concert but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music next Friday evening. The soloist will be Albert Spalding, celebrated American violinist. This artist is ranked with the greatest living masters of his instrument. He will appear with the Boston Orchestra on this occasion in Bach's Concerto in E major.

Mr. Koussevitzky will open his concert with a Symphony in C major, by Boccherini, the early Italian composer. The remaining numbers will be Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," based on the verses of Lenau; Dukas' dance poem, "La Peri," fairy music of much charm, and the "Dance of the Seven Veils" from Richard Strauss' music drama, "Salome."

The concert is under Institute auspices.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 8 1925

At the Academy on Friday evening the Boston Symphony Orches-

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 9 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER PRAISED

Probably no better conception can be gained of Serge Koussevitzky's powers as a conductor, and no better indication of the rare pleasure in store for the people of Portland, when he comes here with the Boston Symphony orchestra on March 25, than will be afforded in excerpts from Warren Storey Smith's critique regarding last week's concert in Boston.

"Once again," says Mr. Smith, "did Koussevitzky give convincing proof of his remarkable versatility as conductor and as interpreter."

What most impressed Mr. Smith, as indeed it did the other Boston critics, was his directing of Brahms' Third Symphony, which is frequently considered a rather uninteresting composition.

"Yesterday the Third Symphony was heard not only as music of plastic beauty, but as tonal drama," he says, "although there was in Mr. Koussevitzky's reading no hint of theatricality. To unusual degree had the first movement a splendid and compelling vigor, with the conflict between the opposing motives vividly brought out. The Andante, that has so often seemed perfunctory, was imbued with romantic warmth; the charm of the Poco Allegretto, though never to be doubted, was none the less heightened, and the finale had for once a significance that made it not anti-climax, but fitting conclusion. Nor was the audience unaware of these marvels. The applause was of heartiness that this or other symphonies of Brahms have seldom enough provoked hereabouts."

NEW YORK
TIMES

MAR 8 192

Albert Spalding assists the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night, when the orchestra opens its fourth visit and last but one this season:

Symphony in C……………………Boccherini
"La Peri"……………………………Dukas
Concerto "Gregoriano"……………Respighi
"Pictures at an Exhibition"……Moussorgsky

Mr. Koussevitzky's program next Saturday afternoon presents the Bostonians, again with Spalding as soloist, in the following music:

Eighth symphony, E flat…………Glazounov
Violin concerto in E…………………Bach
"La Procession Nocturne"…………Rabaud
Dance from "Salome"……Richard Strauss

MIAMI, FLA.
~~METROPOLIS~~
Herald

MAR 8 1925

DELAYS SYMPHONY WHEN NOTE STICKS

BOSTON, March 7.—One note of the organ did its best to break up the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening. It failed but not until it had delayed the performance 10 minutes and given the audience some moments of laughter.

The incident occurred at the end the second movement of the Symphony for Organ and Orchestra. Nadia Boulanger, the Parisian soloist was at the organ. The author of the symphony, Aaron Copland, was i the audience.

The symphony is described by m sic-followers as "very modern." the end of the second movement the audience heard a series of tear squeaks.

"Very modern music, indeed," they thought, without much surprise.

Then they saw the organist gesticulating to Koussevitzky, orchestra leader. They saw Richard Burgin, concertmaster, walk over and whisper to Koussevitzky. Then they saw him fold his arms. Then they saw the organist rise from her seat and walk out behind the organ.

About this time the audience realized what had happened. An organ note had become stuck.

A few minutes later the organi walked onto the stage again, trie the offending note, found that worked all right, and went on with the symphony.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 10 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The New York debut of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is coming to Portland on the 25th, was a universal paean of praise from the New York critics. Deems Taylor in the World, W. J. Henderson in the Sun, Ernest Newman in the Evening Post and Olin Downes in the Times were enthusiastic. The New York series was subscribed for the entire season. Directors of the Boston Symphony are naturally pleased, for Koussevitzky promises to bring back the financial success of the days of Dr. Muck.—Advertisement.

ALBANY,
N. Y.
TELEGRAM

MAR 10 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Tomorrow night at the Capitol theatre will take place the much anticipated concert of the Boston Symphony of 104 instrumentalists, and the event will be the first opportunity to welcome Serge Koussevitzky and to see this much talked about conductor lead the famous orchestra. The program for the concert comes in for special attention, for the numbers include the Moussorgsky composition, "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for orchestra by Ravel, which has caused a sensation both in New York city and Boston musical circles. Another number that excites comment is the Poeme Danse, "LaPeri," by Dukas. These numbers, with the Boccherini Symphony, have never been presented in Albany. The program will close with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner. The seat sale is on at the Capitol theatre box office. Mail and phone orders for seats will promptly be filled. The concert is given under the management of

---

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 12 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

One of the first questions that was asked of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he came to this Country was what he thought of American jazz. The distinguished Russian wailed "Why do you ask about jazz? Why is it that America seems to want my opinion on jazz more than on anything else?"

However he did commit himself to saying that he thought jazz was interesting. "Jazz has been a great influence on the young composers," he said. "Therefore it is important. I do not think, however, that it will endure. It is like a fashion. One year you have a new hat; the next year you discard it for another style. Jazz will soon be discarded, but while it lasts it is of importance because of its influence on the modern composers.—Advertisement.

Globe
Mar 8

There are no Boston Symphony concerts here this week, as the orchestra will be in New York. The program announced for the following week includes Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and a group of modern French pieces by such comparatively little known living composers as Roland Manuel and Andre Caplet. M. Caplet was former a conductor with the Boston Opera.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 12 1925

By profession Mrs. Craven is a nurse and her hobby is swimming. During the last two winters she has been bathing in Weymouth Bay nearly every day, swimming to the pierhead and back, about 800 yards, and defying every sort of weather, sometimes remaining in the icy water more than two hours.

Mrs. Craven first of all will attempt to swim from Weymouth to Lulworth, a distance of about ten mi za was fo the orches widened and in

BANK

The great war con rupted the orchestra, for the conductor, Dr. Muck, who was found aiding the enemy, was placed in a detention camp and all the sympathizers of Germany were discharged. That master conductor, musician and drill master, Piere oMnteux, was placed in charge six years ago and the imprecible work of the orchestra at the present time is largely due to the artistic labors of this gifted man.

When Koussenstaken, after a dazzling career, came to oBston last fall, he found an organization in perfect condition, plaster to a degree, upon which he could express every musical emotion and nuance.

The initial number last night was the Boccherini Symphony in C Opus 16 No. 3, which after a sleep of nearly one hundred and fifty years, was ressurected and played in Paris under the direction of Kousseladaky in 1923.

It is a work full of pellucid melody and tonal charm, simply scored as was the custom of those days, and its lovely rendition by this wizard of the baton and his men was one of ineffable beauty. Bocoherini did many past things in the line of composition and this is surely one of his master works.

If some of the prima donnas of the baton (as Von ulow called them) would emulate Sarge Koussevitaky and revive some of the forgotten works of the tone poets of the olden times, instead of foistinly upon the weary public a lot of musical junk and scientific din of the ultra-modern school, the public would be better satisfied.

The second number was Moussorgroky's "Pictures At An Exhibition," as scored for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. This is a work of melodic variety and Kaleidoscopic tonal coloring. There are so many varieties of musical moods in this wonderful instrumentation of Maurice Ravel that the auditor is inthralled with its applause and gorgeous coloring. The rendition of the oxrious sections was as tour de force and a telling display of virtuosity.

After the intermission "La Peri" a Poeme Danse, by Paul A. Dukas, was given. Dukas is one of the ablest musicians of France of the present time and this work (first given in Paris as a ballet in 1912) is such an effective number that it is found in the repertoire of all the great orchestras of the present day.

This master work received a perfect rendition and under Koussevitzky's guidance all the ineffable beauties of this marvelous score were fully disclosed. The concert was brought to a glorious close with the playing of that immortal number, Prelude to "Die Miestersinger", by Richard Wagner. In the entire range of musical literature there is not a greater work. A score surcharged with tonal beauty and gorgeous coloring, such a flood of glorious melody, such a masterpiece of instrumention that it is certain of immortality. The star of the evening was Koussevitzky, whose conducting was electrifying in its power, its rhythmic and dynamic flexibility, its pervasive mastery, and nerve and authority.

Some might think, as he came upon the podium, that he was cold, reserved and austere, but all was changed as the concert began for then every movement of his baton was pregnant with emotion and musical intensity.

Kousseostsky has an unique and intrigueing personality, and as a conductor he stands out among the directors of the present day. His methods and the results obtained may be likened unto those of the late Anton Seidel and Arthur Nikisch. He is an artist of such commanding authority and convincing ability that he is in the same class with Arturo Poscanini and Leopold Stokowski. Paens of praise must be accorded Ben Franklin in making this memorable concert possible, and he is to be felecitated on its success.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

56

NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune

MAR 8 1925

With the thi local organizations and the two regular visitors, five orche be heard here this week. Th at adelphia Orchestra will give the g th of its ten Carnegie Hall concerts Tuesday night, beginning its program with a Trumpet Prelude by Henry Purcell, discovered by Leopold Stokowski last summer in the British Museum and first played in America by him at the Philadelphia concerts of December 26-27. Suites by Bach and Gluck complete the first half of the program, with "Scheherazade" for the second.

For the Boston Symphony's fourth pair of Carnegie Hall concerts, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Albert Spalding will be the soloist. On Thursday evening, he will play Respighi's "Gregorian" concerto for violin, introduced here last month by Rudolph Polk, while Mr. Koussevitzky will play an eighteenth-century symphony, Boccherini's C major, and give Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which he conducted here at his last afternoon concert, its first evening performance in New York.

On Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky will give Glazounoff's latest symphony, the Eighth, in E flat, Op. 83, and Mr. Spalding will play Bach's E major concerto.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 1 0 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Tomorrow night at the Capitol theatre, Ben Franklin will present the celebrated Boston Symphony of 104 instrumentalists in their much anticipated concert, and the event will take on special significance because it will serve to introduce to Albanians, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the organization who makes his first appearance in this city. This concert has aroused tremendous interest, it will be attended by a capacity audience and it will be the greatest musical treat of the year in the Albany radius. The seat sale for the Albany concert is being held at the box office of the Capitol theatre, and Manager Ben Franklin has given instruction that careful and prompt attention be given mail and phone requests, and to have the tickets held until called for.

BANGOR
ME.
NEWS

MAR 9 1925

Boston Symphony Is At Portland March 25

With Serge Koussevitzky's name on every lip, and with the Boston Symphony re-established as the world's greatest orchestra, there is the keenest interest in the Boston Symphony's coming to Maine for a concert in City Hall, Portland, March 25.

The enterprise of the Portland music commission, which is responsible for Koussevitzky's coming to Portland, is applauded on every hand, for in a year when the Boston Symphony season in both New York and Boston is completely subscribed in advance and even standing room is a premium at Koussevitzky concerts, the commission may well pride itself upon its foresight in booking the orchestra far in advance of the arrival of the distinguished new conductor from Russia.

Koussevitzky is the first Russian who has ever wielded a baton over the Boston Symphony. He is the successor of a long line of distinguished conductors, but if vogue is any indication of merit he promises to surpass these in standing. He is the only man for many seasons who has threatened Stokowski's supremacy as the greatest conductor in America.

New at Jo

This evening, in the fifth concert of the Smith college concert course at John M. Greene hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear under its new leader, Serge Koussevitzky.

Mr. Koussevitzky is the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra. He is named as the only great conductor, who, up to this season, has not been heard in America. Recognition by the Musical Savants of America has been immediate, unqualified by hint of adverse criticism.

The earlier career of Mr. Koussevitzky in Russia has been, perhaps, the most conspicuous in the famous orchestras which he organized in Moscow. There, and in Petrograd, Beethoven and Bach festivals figured among his contests. He, likewise, championed music of the modern men of genius. He has acted as a sort of musical missionary, travelling all over Russia, bearing symphonic music to parts where it never had been heard. He even sailed the length of the Volga river after chartering a steamer, and gave concerts in town after town.

The Russian revolution finally put an end to his musical activities in that country, and in 1920, he went to Paris, where he organized and carried on for four years before coming to this country, what were broadly known as the "Koussevitzky Concerts."

With the London Symphony and with numerous European Symphony orchestras, he has appeared as guest conductor, and has conducted grand opera in various places, in Paris and Barcelona.

Mr. Koussevitzky has reiterated that he is not out for propaganda of any school of composers or for any other cause whatsoever. He considers that the classics are the established basis of musical beauty, yet that music cannot stand still. The modernists, who have something to say and say it worthily, he believes, must be heard, for they may be the classics of tomorrow.

Knowing his standpoint, one can appreciate the program of this evening even more, beginning, as it does, with a symphony of Boccherini, an Italian contemporary of Haydn and Mozart in the latter half of the 18th century. This is followed by pieces by the Russians,. Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakow. One of the latter celebrates the bee with

---

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

MAR 8 1

AT ITS fourth concert in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in C major symphony, by Boccherini; "Le Peri," by Dukas; Gregorian concerto by Respigi, Albert Spalding, solo violinist; "Pictures at an Exhibition," by Moussorgsky-Ravel. The programme for Saturday afternoon consists of symphony, by Glazounoff; concerto, by Bach, Albert Spalding, soloist; "La Procession Nocturne," by Rabaud; Dance of Salome, by Strauss. Sergei Koussevitsky will conduct at both events.

NEW YORK
TIMES

MAR 8 1925

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

The Brooklyn Orchestral Society gives its second and last concert at the Academy tomorrow evening, when Herbert Braham conducts Dvorak's "New World" symphony and works of Bach-Albert, Svendsen and Johann Strauss.

Albert Spalding will be violin soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy, in a program yet to be announced, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK
TIMES

MAR 8 192

Georges Longy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will resign his position at the end of the present season.

He will retire, says The Boston Transcript, at his own request, and Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor not a little regrets the decision. Not only will Mr. Longy leave the orchestra. He will also depart from Boston, returning for the remainder of his days to France, whence he came. He is passing middle age. His work as oboist taxes him. The direction of a music school leaves him little leisure. He is disposed to sit in the sun and be idle.

The public of the symphony concerts, which has listened to Mr. Longy for a quarter of a century and weekly recognized both his presence and his voice, will keep him in remembrance and companion him with good wishes. In Europe and in America no oboist of his time has surpassed him in quality and finesse of tone; while few have equaled him in evenness and felicity of performance.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNI

MAR 8 1

Fourth Boston Symphony Concert Next Friday Night.

Serge Koussevitzky will make his fourth visit to Brooklyn for the last concert but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music next Friday evening. The soloist will be Albert Spalding, celebrated American violinist. This artist is ranked with the greatest living masters of his instrument. He will appear with the Boston Orchestra on this occasion in Bach's Concerto in E major.

Mr. Koussevitzky will open his concert with a Symphony in C major, by Boccherini, the early Italian composer. The remaining numbers will be Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," based on the verses of Lenau; Dukas' dance poem, "La Peri," fairy music of much charm, and the "Dance of the Seven Veils" from Richard Strauss' music drama, "Salome."

The concert is under Institute auspices.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 8 192

At the Academy on Friday evening the Boston Symphony Orches-

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER PRAISED

Probably no better conception can be gained of Serge Koussevitzky's powers as a conductor, and no better indication of the rare pleasure in store for the people of Portland, when he comes here with the Boston Symphony orchestra on March 25, than will be afforded in excerpts from Warren Storey Smith's critique regarding last week's concert in Boston.

"Once again," says Mr. Smith, "did Koussevitzky give convincing proof of his remarkable versatility as conductor and as interpreter."

What most impressed Mr. Smith, as indeed it did the other Boston critics ,was his directing of Brahms' Third Symphony, which is frequently considered a rather uninteresting composition.

"Yesterday the Third Symphony was heard not only as music of plastic beauty, but as tonal drama," he says, "although there was in Mr. Koussevitzky's reading no hint of theatricality. To unusual degree had the first movement a splendid and compelling vigor, with the conflict between the opposing motives vividly brought out. The Andante, that has so often seemed perfunctory, was imbued with romantic warmth; the charm of the Poco Alleggretto, though never to be doubted, was none the less heightened, and the finale had for once a significance that made it not anti-climax, but fitting conclusion. Nor was the audience unaware of these marvels. The applause was cf heartiness that this or other symphonies of Brahms have seldom enough provoked hereabouts."

NEW YORK
TIMES

MAR 8 192

Albert Spalding assists the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night, when the orchestra opens its fourth visit and last but one, this season:

Symphony in C....................Boccherini
"La Peri"....................Dukas
Concerto "Gregoriano"....................Respighi
"Pictures at an Exhibition"....Moussorgsky

Mr. Koussevitzky's program next Saturday afternoon presents the Bostonians, again with Spalding as soloist, in the following music:

Eighth symphony, E flat..........Glazounov
Violin concerto in E....................Bach
"La Procession Nocturne"..........Rabaud
Dance from "Salome"......Richard Strauss

MIAMI, FLA.
~~METROPOLIS~~

MAR 8 1925

DELAYS SYMPHONY WHEN NOTE STICKS

BOSTON, March 7.—One note of the organ did its best to break up the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening. It failed but not until it had delayed the performance 10 minutes and given the audience some moments of laughter.

The incident occurred at the end the second movement of the Symphony for Organ and Orchestra. Nadia Boulanger, the Parisian solois was at the organ. The author of th mphony, Aaron Copland, was i he audience.

The symphony is described by m sic-followers as "very modern." the end of the second movement t audience heard a series of tearin squeaks.

"Very modern music, indeed," they thought, without much surprise.

Then they saw the organist gesticulating to Koussevitsky, orchestra leader. They saw Richard Burgin, concertmaster, walk over and whisper to Koussevitzky. Then they saw him fold his arms. Then they saw the organist rise from her seat and walk out behind the organ.

About this time the audience realized what had happened. An organ note had become stuck.

A few minutes later the organi walked onto the stage again, trie the offending note, found that worked all right, and went on wit the symphony.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 1 0 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The New York debut of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is coming to Portland on the 25th, was a universal paean of praise from the New York critics. Deems Taylor in the World, W. J. Henderson in the Sun, Ernest Newman in the Evening Post and Olin Downes in the Times were enthusiastic. The New York series was subscribed for the entire season. Directors of the Boston Symphony are naturally pleased, for Koussevitzky promises to bring back the financial success of the days of Dr. Muck.—Advertisement.

ALBANY,
N. Y.
TELEGRAM

MAR 1 0 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Tomorrow night at the Capitol theatre will take place the much anticipated concert of the Boston Symphony of 104 instrumentalists, and the event will be the first opportunity to welcome Serge Koussevitzky and to see this much talked about conductor lead the famous orchestra. The program for the concert comes in for special attention, for the numbers include the Moussorgsky composition, "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for orchestra by Ravel, which has caused a sensation both in New York city and Boston musical circles. Another number that excites comment is the Poeme Danse, "La Peri," by Dukas. These numbers, with the Boccherini Symphony, have never been presented in Albany. The program will close with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner. The seat sale is on at the Capitol theatre box office. Mail and phone orders for seats will promptly be filled. The concert is given under the management

---

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 1 2 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

One of the first questions that was asked of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he came to this Country was what he thought of American jazz. The distinguished Russian wailed "Why do you ask about jazz? Why is it that America seems to want my opinion on jazz more than on anything else?"

However he did commit himself to saying that he thought jazz was interesting. "Jazz has been a great influence on the young composers," he said. "Therefore it is important. I do not think, however, that it will endure. It is like a fashion. One year you have a new hat; the next year you discard it for another style. Jazz will soon be discarded, but while it lasts it is of importance because of its influence on the modern composers.—Advertisement.

AT FRYE HALL

Globe
Mar 8

There are no Boston Symphony concerts here this week, as the orchestra will be in New York. The program announced for the following week includes Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and a group of modern French pieces by such comparatively little known living composers as Roland Manuel and Andre Caplet. M. Caplet was former a conductor with the Boston Opera.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 1 2 1925

By profession Mrs. Craven is a nurse and her hobby is swimming. During the last two winters she has been bathing in Weymouth Bay nearly every day, swimming to the pierhead and back, about 800 yards, and defying every sort of weather, sometimes remaining in the icy water mor than two hours.

Mrs. Craven first of all will attempt to swim from Weymouth to Lulworth, a distance of about ten mi

Y BANK
LOST

zat was fo the orchest widened and int

The great war con rupted the orchestra, for the conductor, Dr. Muck, who was found aiding the enemy, was placed in a detention camp and all the sympathizers of Germany were discharged. That master conductor, musician and drill master, Piere oMnteux, was placed in charge six years ago and the imprecible work of the orchestra at the present time is largely due to the artistic labors of this gifted man.

When Koussenstaken, after a dazzling career, came to oBston last fall, he found an organization in perfect condition, plaster to a degree, upon which he could express every musical emotion and nuance.

The initial number last night was the Boccherini Symphony in C Opus 16 No. 3, which after a sleep of nearly one hundred and fifty years, was ressurected and played in Paris under the direction of Kousseladaky in 1923.

It is a work full of pellucid melody and tonal charm, simply scored as was the custom of those days, and its lovely rendition by this wizard of the baton and his men was one of ineffable beauty. Boccherini did many past things in the line of composition and this is surely one of his master works.

If some of the prima donnas of the baton (as Von ulow called them) would emulate Sarge Koussevitaky and revive some of the forgotten works of the tone poets of the olden times, instead of foistinly upon the weary public a lot of musical junk and scientific din of the ultra-modern school, the public would be better satisfied.

The second number was Moussorgroky's "Pictures At An Exhibition," as scored for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. This is a work of melodic variety and kaleidoscopic tonal coloring. There are so many varieties of musical moods in this wonderful instrumentation of Maurice Ravel that the auditor is inthralled with its applause and gorgeous coloring. The rendition of the oxrious sections was as tour de force and a telling display of virtuosity.

After the intermission "La Peri" a Poeme Danse, by Paul A. Dukas, was given. Dukas is one of the ablest musicians of France of the present time and this work (first given in Paris as a ballet in 1912) is such an effective number that it is found in the repertoire of all the great orchestras of the present day.

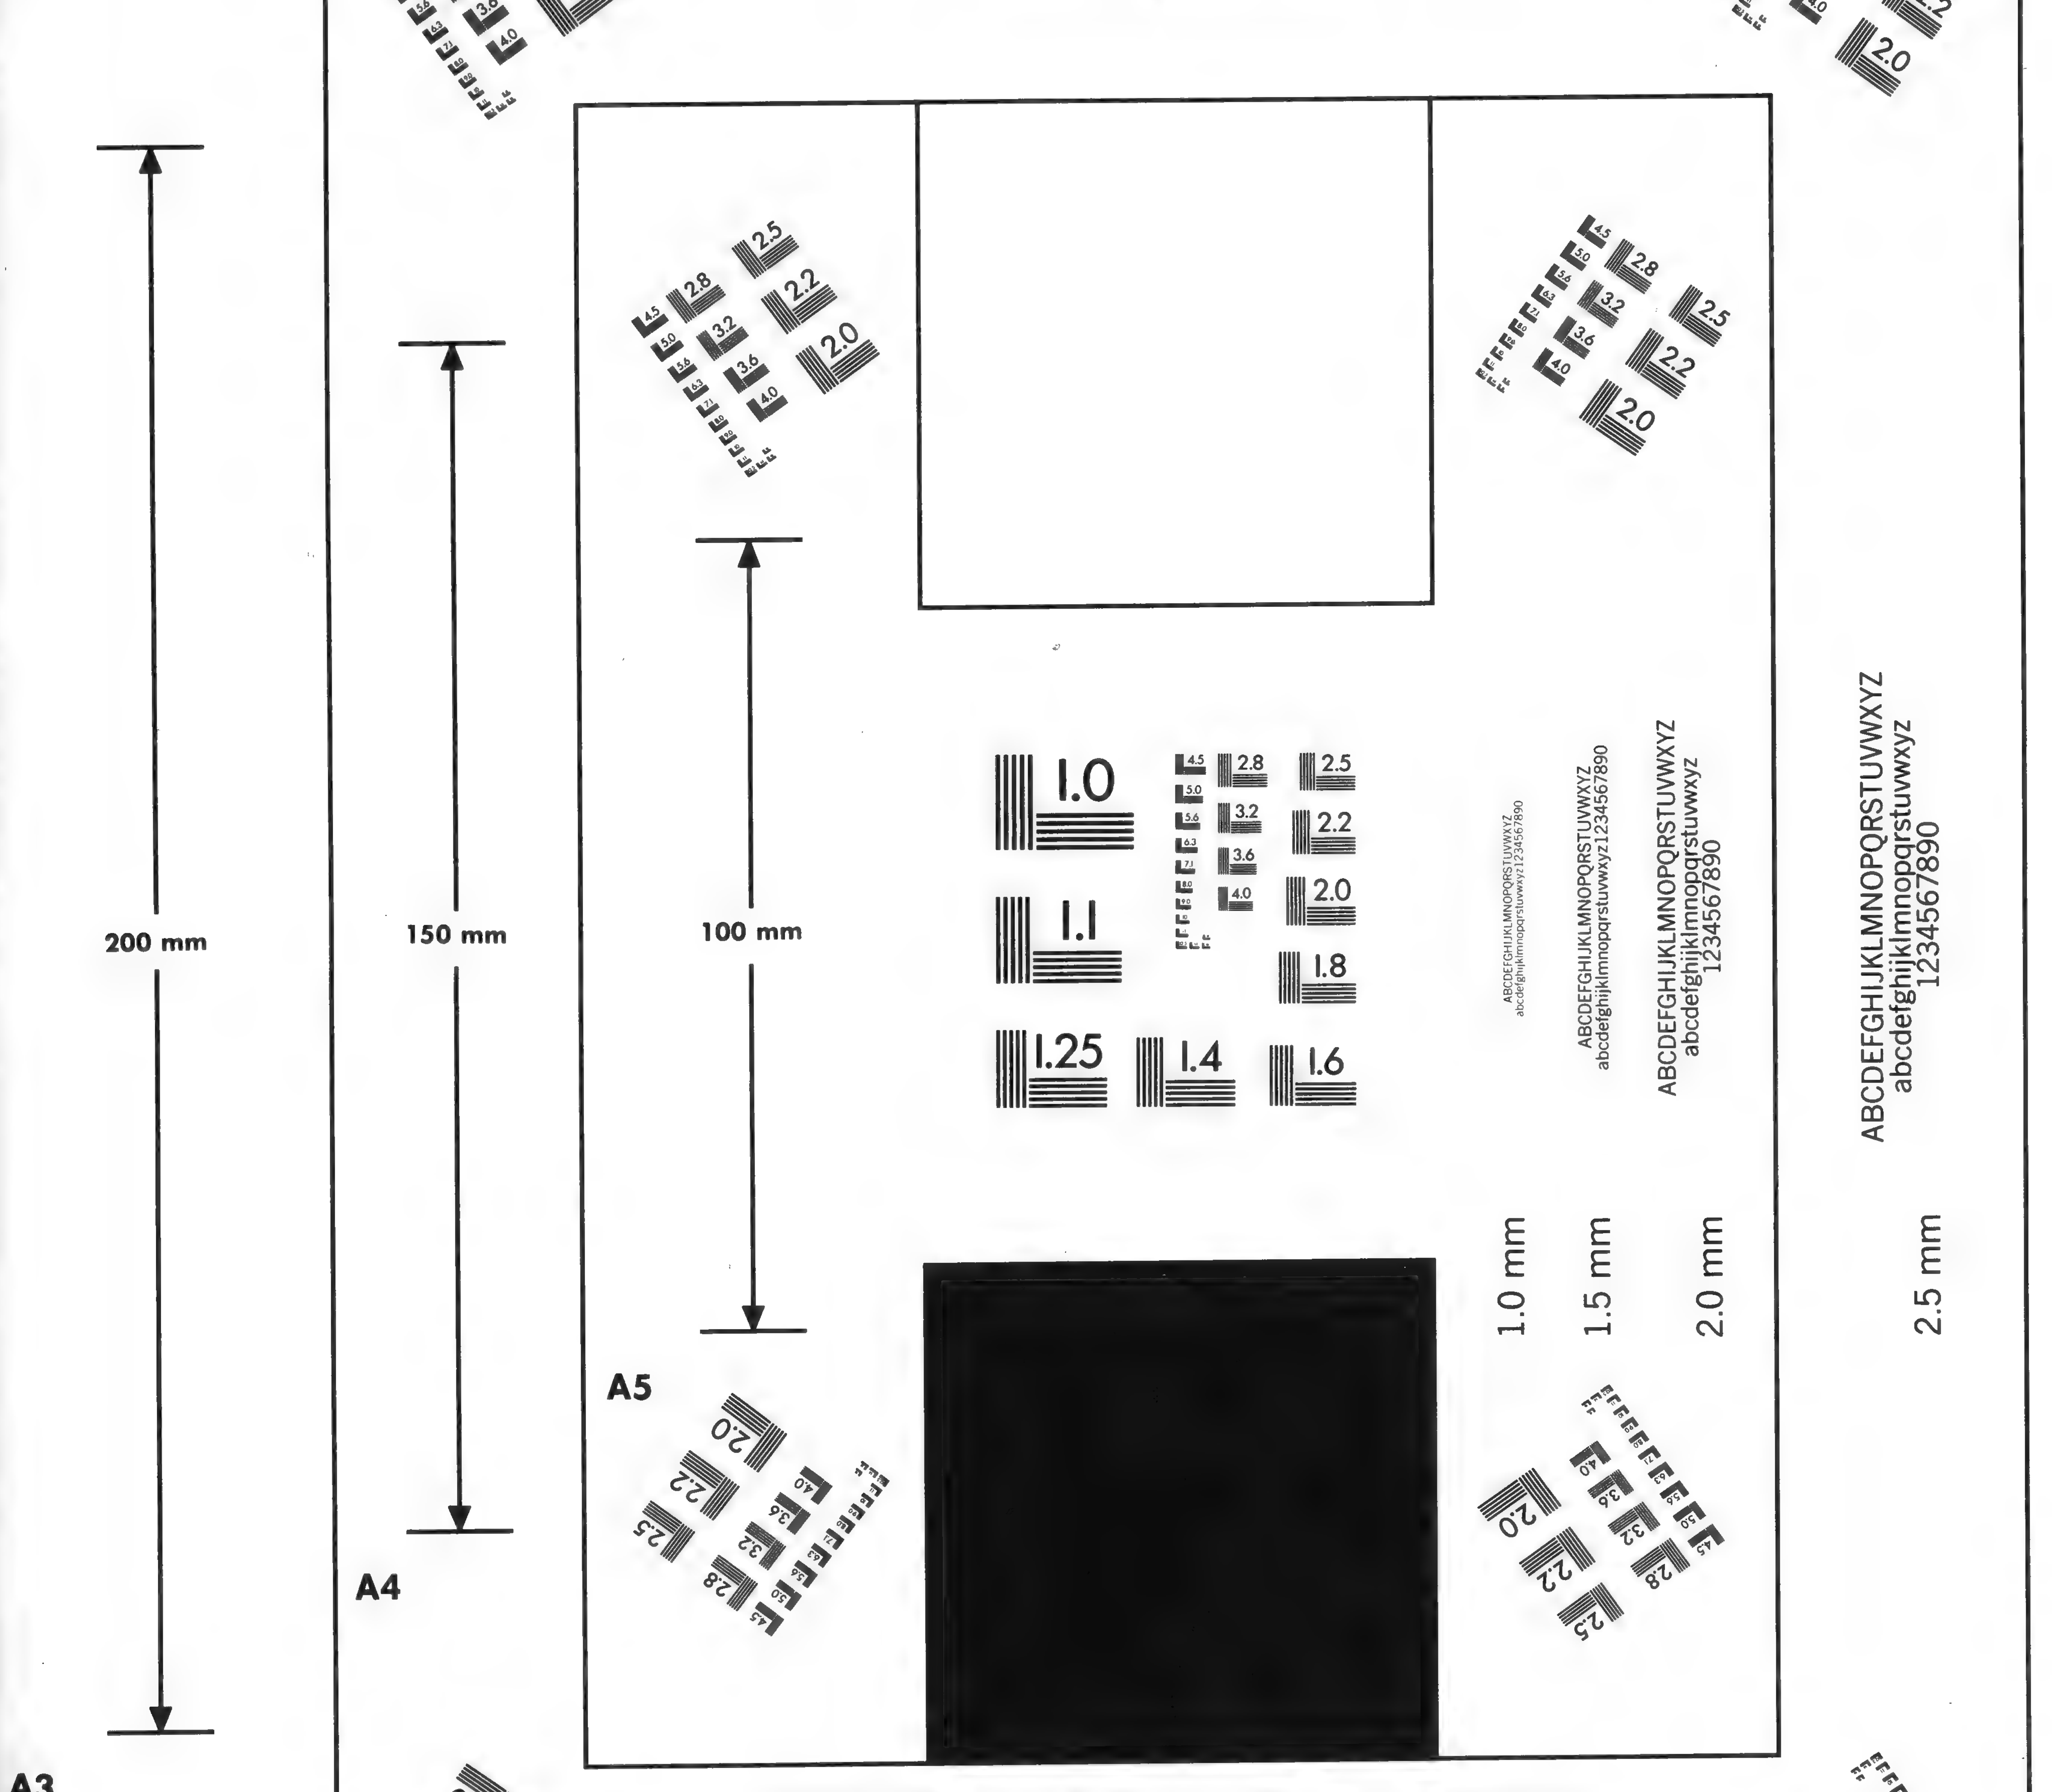
This master work received a perfect rendition and under Koussevitzky's guidance all the ineffable beauties of this marvelous score were fully disclosed. The concert was brought to a glorious close with the playing of that immortal number, Prelude to "Die Miestersinger", by Richard Wagner. In the entire range of musical literature there is not a greater work. A score surcharged with tonal beauty and gorgeous coloring, such a flood of glorious melody, such a masterpiece of instrumention that it is certain of immortality. The star of the evening was Koussevitsky, whose conducting was electrifying in its power, its rhythmic and dynamic flexibility, its pervasive mastery, and nerve and authority.

Some might think, as he came upon the podium, that he was cold, reserved and austere, but all was changed as the concert began for then every movement of his baton was pregnant with emotion and musical intensity.

Kousseostsky has an unique and intrigueing personality, and as a conductor he stands out among the directors of the present day. His methods and the results obtained may be likened unto those of the late Anton Seidel and Arthur Nikisch. He is an artist of such commanding authority and convincing ability that he is in the same class with Arturo Poscanini and Leopold Stokowski. Paens of praise must be accorded Ben Franklin in making this memorable concert possible, and he is to be felecitated on its success.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY,
N. Y.
NEWS
MAR 12 1925

SYMPHONY HAS GREAT NEW LEADER

Koussevitzky Directs Brilliant Concert of Boston Orchestra at Capitol.

A crowded house at the Capitol theatre last night greeted a great old orchestra and a great new leader when it heard the Boston Symphony orchestra and saw Serge Koussevitzky wave his baton magically over his more than one hundred musicians. If Karl Muck made the Bostonians heavily Teutonic in his readings, Koussevitzky has electrified them into a Slavic flame of expression. He is a marvelous director of such a modern radical as Ravel; a poet in interpreting the fancies of Dukas, and at least a competent translator of the majesties of Wagner. But, as far as Albany knows him, he is thoroughly modern in his musical tendencies. They gave him such an ovation last night as Albany seldom unleashes.

Koussevitzky is a tall, slender young man, conservative in appearance, but a veritable dynamo of energy in directing. There were times when, as his fingers moved through the air over his men, the latter semed a keyboard that gave forth orchestral sounds at his touch. There have been times in the past when the Boston Symphony seemed settled in a groove quite musically respectable and sedate. But Koussevitzky knows no groove. He sends his men off at tangents; he electrifies them to do strange things. In one number last night they went on a musical charivari that was startling for an organization founded so near Plymouth Rock.

This number, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by the ultra-modern Ravel, was the peak of the concert. It described in tonal words the impression a wide variety of pictures had on one man. It was hybrid, musically. It stuck to no form or theme, yet we doubt if ever an orchestra in Albany made anything so perversely enchanting to an audience. Every agency of a big orchestra was employed in combinations that were startlingly original and yet entirely descriptive.

You got nearly every emotion that music can conjure in its rendition. You heard little chickens hopping out of their shells; listened to the rumble of a big cart over a rough road; heard the odd walk of a misshapen gnome, and the hammer-strokes of a huge iron gate being built. Koussevitzky and his men made you see these things. They were printed on the retina of your mind.

To get the measure of the man you also had to hear the smooth grace of his reading of Boccherini's symphony in C major, with velvet violin passages; the exotic charm of Dukas' "La Peri" (as if some Maxfield Parrish painting turned into music) and then the comparative usualness of Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude. He is a magician at a music stand. He can walk with gods of melody or struggle with modern demons of dissonance. Up to last night the directing of Arturo Toscanini and Leopold Stowkowski were the abiding memories of Abany. Today Koussevitzky is suprenely eminent. Ben Franklin brought the orchestra to Albany.

NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 13 1925

There is little in common between ordinary violin work and church music, but Otterino Respighi, one of the most daring of the younger Italian composers, has written a violin concerto based upon old Gregorian chants. It was played last night by Albert Spalding in Carnegie Hall at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Concerto Gregoriano, as Respighi calls it, is an admirable work, one of the best things for violin and orchestra that has appeared in the last decade. But there is something monotonous about a chant, and Respighi has confined his themes to chant-like music. The treatment is modern, though not complex or discordant. Still the sameness of themes grows tiresome before the concerto comes to a close. The first movement and the first half of the second are effective in the extreme. But after that interest lags, in spite of some brilliantly conceived passages.

The Respighi concerto was superbly played both by the soloist and by the orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Spalding unquestionably is in the first rank of violinists. He made his playing comply with the underlying religious spirit of the themes. There is nothing showy about this music, and Mr. Spalding's playing was always artistically restrained, dignified and all but perfect in a technical sense.

Koussevitzky has furnished the conductorial sensation of the season. He is a modernist who varies orchestral colors as skilfully as the Russian scenic artists do paints. He was at his best last night in Paul Dukas's "La Peri." Other orchestral numbers were an old symphony of Boccherini and the Ravel arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS
MAR 13 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY, PAVLOWA OF THE BATON

"In his conducting the embodiment of grace and of physical expressiveness, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, seems born to lead an orchestra as Pavlowa was born to dance or Melba to sing," says Warren Storey-Smith of the Boston Post. "His feeling for musical values is remarkable. To a rare degree he is the divining interpreter sensing to the last detail the tonal and spiritual content of the score before him; and as unmistakably can he transmit to his orchestra all that he discerns and feels."—Advertisement.

NEW YORK
WORLD
MAR 13 19

MUSIC

By Deems Taylor

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave us an entire program of unhackneyed music last night in Carnegie Hall, and some of it was good. To dispose of the purely orchestral part of the concert, be it known that the evening began with a Boccherini symphony in C major (Opus 16, No. 3), continued with Paul Dukas's "La Peri," programmed as a "danced poem," and ended with Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel.

The Boccherini symphony, one of six written about 1775 and dedicated to Don Louis of Spain, is a brief and amiable work, sounding about as important as a symphony would sound if written by a composer who was not Mozart and who could grind out six in a year. Music that one can take or leave alone, without the slightest discomfort. Mr. Koussevitzky gave it a spirited and delicate reading.

The Dukas piece, written as a ballet and first produced at the Chatelet, Paris, in 1912, is not what the French would call grande chose. It is attractive, melodious music, that goes on its tuneful way in a straightforward fashion, but that would need the comparative distraction of a stage action to give it any illusion of importance. The only thing about it that is first class is the scoring, which is superb.

The Moussorgsky pieces, originally written for the piano and first played here, I believe, by Harold Bauer, have been transcribed for orchestra by no less than four musicians. Toushmaloff scored some of them in 1891, Sir Henry Wood scored others for his London concerts, and Leonidas Leonardi later made another transcription for Paris. The present version, by Ravel, was made for Mr. Koussevitzky, and was first performed by him in Paris a year ago last May. Notwithstanding that the program notes of last night's concert intimated that no one but Mr. Koussevitzky has ever had the Ravel scoring, I have a distinct impression that the New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch, played it here some time last fall.

Ravel's orchestral treatment is a marvelously clever approximation of the scoring of "Boris"—indeed, as the program explained, he tried to "keep the size of the orchestra of Rimsky-Korsakoff * * * and added some more instruments only in a few movements of the suite." Inasmuch as that means an orchestra only slightly smaller than that of "Goetterdaemmerung," one wonders just what M. Ravel would have done if he had let himself go.

I cannot muster the superlatives that some enthusiasts hurl about when discussing this Ravelized Moussorgsky. The suite is good, but I think Moussorgsky was right when he wrote it as a set of piano pieces. Scored for a chamber orchestra, it might be vastly effective, but its present version, while undoubtedly lots of fun for conductor and players, merely inflates the composer's modest ideas to the bursting point—past it, in several instances.

But what of the music that, as we intimated above, was good? That came just after the Dukas ballet. It was a "Concerto Gregoriano" by Ottorino Respighi, for violin and orchestra, with Albert Spalding playing the solo part. The new concerto (Mr. Spalding introduced it to Boston on Jan. 9) is written, as the title indicates, in the spirit—if not the letter—of the Gregorian chants. It is music of the greatest purity and seriousness, always interesting and containing many passages of grave and haunting beauty.

The orchestration, while unobtrusive, is exquisitely wrought, and the solo instrument, while assigned most of the thematic material, is never allowed to speak solely for the sake of display. The one serious defect in the work—the only one, in fact, that might make its inclusion in the permanent violin repertoire something less than a certainty—is its too close adherence to a generally sombre mood throughout three rather lengthy movements. The piece lacks emotional relief, and would hold an audience much better if it could be shortened. Mr. Spalding played it with deep sincerity, and with such tenderness and beauty of tone, such fine authority and spaciousness of style as I have seldom heard him or any other violinist display. It was a performance thrillingly worthy of the music, and one that fully deserves the adjective, "masterly."

NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
MAR 13 1925

Spalding Plays With Orchestra

Violinist and Boston Symphony Delight Hearers in 'Gregorian Concerto.'

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening was one of musical variety and general disconnection. Mr. Koussevitzky's programs usually puzzle the old fashioned music lover, who wonders how the cards were shuffled, but that is a matter of little moment. The concert began with Boccherini's symphony in B flat, a short, simple and ingenious composition by a respectable contemporary of Haydn. The music was pleasing and the solo passages, excellently performed, added to its charm.

Paul Dukas's "The Peri, a Danced Poem" followed. This work is one of the few that seem to justify the terpsichorean interpretation of music verging on the symphonic style. It was written to be danced and its music has all the seductions of changing rhythms and opulent instrumental color needed for such a business. It gave Mr. Koussevitzky opportunity to display his warmth of feeling and his poetic imagination and the orchestra scope for all the splendors of its tone and its technical finish.

The soloist of the evening was Albert Spalding, who played the principal part in Respighi's "Gregorian Concerto" for violin and orchestra. This concerto was recently produced here at a concert of Rudolph Polk. It is well worthy of early repetition, albeit it is longer than its matter or its development warrants, and if not performed with great judgment would become tiresome. But Mr. Spalding played it with so much beauty of tone and such exaltation of feeling that he vitalized it from beginning to end.

Travels Far Afield.

The Gregorianism of the composition consists in its employment of some plain song themes and its general adherence to scales, tonalities and harmonic modulations consistent with the traditions of a capella church music. Otherwise it travels far afield and since there is a close affiliation, sometimes identity, between certain ecclesiatic scales and the historic or pure minor which figures so frequently in the slave songs, one finds in the broken rhythms of some of Respighi's melody echoes of the negro spiritual.

However, this does not prevent the music from being grateful to the listener. The violin solo is one long and emotional song with a modicum of the virtuoso flourishing that occupies so many pages of less artistic compositions. The cadenza which forms the bridge passage between the first and second movements is particularly effective in its use of the low register of the violin. Mr. Spalding's tone here was especially beautiful, though it was excellent always. The concert was completed with Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which is in itself picturesque music and rich in character.

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 13 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

In Serge Koussevitsky lie—in the words of an eminent critic—"those four-fold powers which define and consumate a conductor of the first order. The ability to discover, unfold, curve and modulate the intrinsic and essential line of the music; to weave it into pattern; by pace and rythym to give it motion; by accent to impart to it character. The ability to distribute over the surface of this pattern; the harmonic and instrumenntal colors which are light and shade, heat and cold upon it. The ability to give to each piece and each composer his particular voice, quality, life. Last, the ability to draw from the orchestra the tone htat shall beat these powers and beauties in a manifold eloquence; the accent that shapes and marks; the color that is glamour and relief."—Adv.

NEW YORK
AMERICAN
MAR 13 1925

KOUSSETVITSKY LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Fourth Evening Concert at Carnegie Hall—Andrea Chenier Repeated at Metropolitan—Other Music Notes

By GRENA BENNETT.

SERGE KOUSSETVITSKY escorted the Boston Symphony Orchestra here for its fourth evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night. Incidentally, his traveling bag was crammed with interesting manuscripts.

With a muchly reduced band he presented Boccherini's C major symphony—a work that was 150 years old before it received its first American performance, two seasons ago. Its smooth, fluent mellifluous measures, so typical of its period, were revealed with faultless musicianship, tone and proportion.

Following Dukas's picturesque "The Peri—A Danced Poem," the place of honor on the platform was allotted to Albert Spalding, distinguished American violinist, who played the solo part in Respighi's Concerto Gregoriano. It was interesting to note the adroit manner in which the ultra-modern composer utilized the simple, straightforward sequences invented by the ancient Gregory. Mr. Spalding's reading was marked by his usual sincerity and polish Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" (which has had several performances recently) was the last number on the list.

* * *

NEW YORK
Herald & Tribun
MAR 13 1925

n and N.Y. estras Top s Programs

Walter and Koussevitzky Offer Wide Range of Dates and Places in Choice of Selections

Giannini in Good Voice

Albert Spalding Sings at Night With Technical Smoothness and Finish

By F. D. Perkins

The symphonies of New York and Boston occupied Carnegie Hall yesterday under the respective batons of Bruno Walter and Serge Koussevitzky, offering between them music of a variety of dates and places. The only common factor of the performances was that both orchestras were in excellent form.

On his afternoon program Mr. Walter introduced a quasi-novelty: the "Fantastic Apparitions on a Theme by Berlioz," by Walter Braunfels, which has been heard here from the enterprising Leopold Stokowski and his Philadelphians on October 18, 1921. The composer, one learned through the informative program notes of Mr. La Prade, is a Münchner of twenty-two years' standing, and this work, of the vintage of 1919, has as its theme the Song of the Flea from "La Damnation de Faust." It is also suggested that these apparitions are such as might result from a nocturnal Welsh rarebit on top of an intensive hearing of the theme—and some of the variations were indeed of a type to haunt uneasy slumber.

Brilliant Composition

It appeared a brilliantly written work—one of the most skillfully wrought post-Straussian German works we have heard so far. The second and third apparitions, which most suggested the nightmare, seemed the most effective, with an atmosphere that would have served Weber well for the Wolf's Glen in "Der Freischutz." Later, however, there seemed a lack of variety, an effect of repetitiousness in spite of the wealth of color on Braunfels's orchestral palette. It finished in a cheerful mood, with a somewhat Stravinskyesque flourish, though on the whole the music recalled, if anyone, Richard Strauss.

Dusolina Giannini was the soloist in "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon" (sung in German), and "Plus Grand Dans Son Obscurite," from Gounod's "Reine de Saba." Her remarkable volume of tone, her smooth, soaring high notes were thoroughly in evidence, and the sustained altitudes at the end of the Weber aria rang out with a notably full, ear-filling quality. At times there seemed a certain effect of strain, with an interval or two of harder tone and vibration in some lower notes, but the impression remaining was not of these, but of a voice of unusual quality.

Mr. Walter opened his program with the "Oberon" overture, played with pleasing briskness and zest, and closed it with Smetana's melodiously fluent symphonic poem, "Vltava." Throughout, orchestra and conductor seemed very happy.

The Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky, who offered his ourth Thursday concert in the evening, as proved that he is no devotee of exlusively twentieth-century music, but also has a high regard for that of the ighteenth. Last night's opening numer was a symphony in C major, Op. 6, No. 3, by Luigi Boccherini, who is nown mainly to fame as the writer of minuet. The program note at one f Mr. Koussevitzky's Paris concerts ad this work and its five companions omposed and played in Paris in 1775, ut Mr. Philip Hale observes that this annot be, as Boccherini was then livg in Madrid. Wherever its origin ay have been, the symphony was pical well-written music of its period, the grade below Haydn and Mozart, d scored a good performance last ght.

The soloist was Albert Spalding, who s been serving as the herald of torino Respighi's Concerto Gregoriano, which had its second hearing here last night. On a second hearing, Gregorianism seemed more apparent, manifested in the themes themselves rather than in their working-out, with unusual dignity and much grave beauty and a dash of romanticism, or post-romanticism, in the last movement. The Concerto is a work to be reckoned with. It has consequence, playability, and, despite an absence of flourish, gives the soloist ample chance to display technical virtuosity. At length, however, it lacks variety, with too little change of mood, an effect that might be described as too much of a good thing.

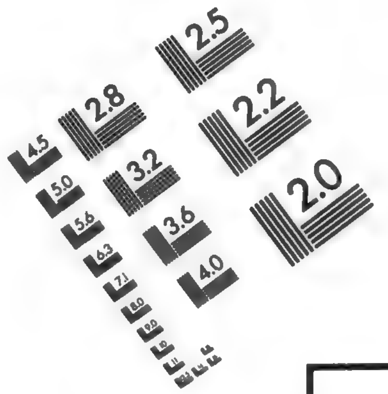
Spalding Sings Well

Mr. Spalding gave an excellent performance, with his usual technical finish and beauty of tone, and Mr. Koussevitzky, with whom he has played it more than once before this, furnished thorough co-operation. The resulting ovation was prolonged.

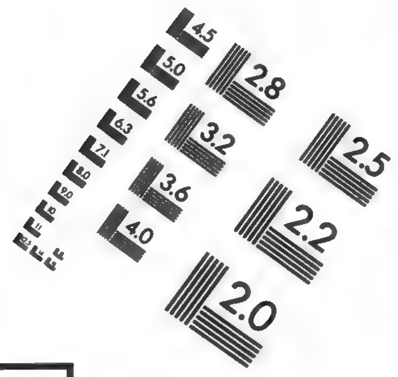
Between the symphony and the concerto came "Le Peri, Poeme Dance," by Paul Dukas, which has been heard here before. Now fifteen years old, it was distinctly conservative, giving an impression of melody and periods of marked charm, but on the whole some-

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

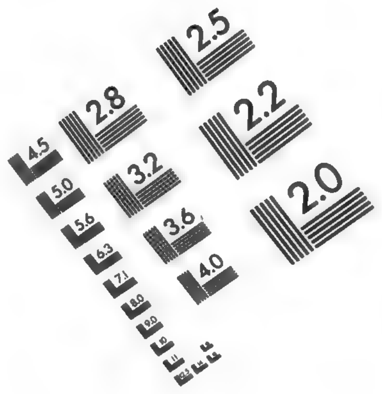
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



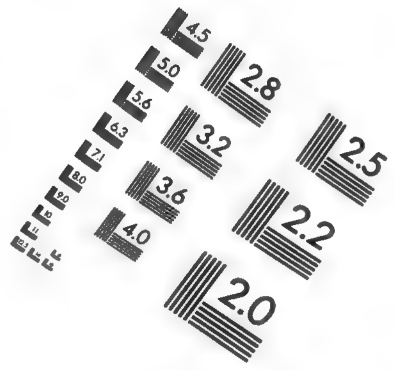
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0



4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0

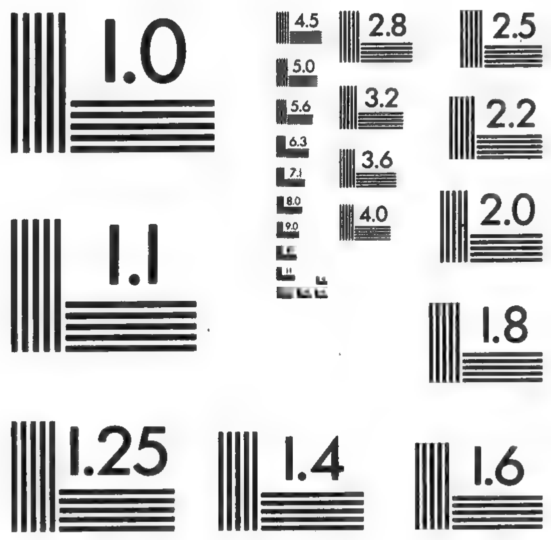


4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
4.0
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

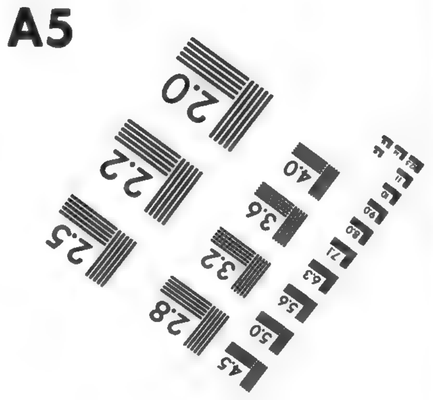
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

A5

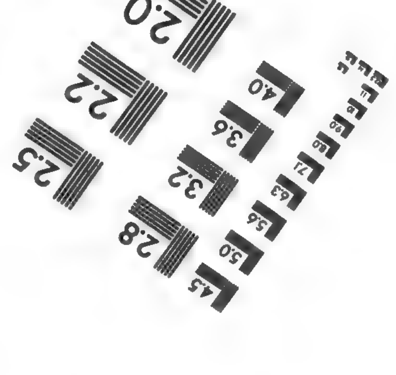


2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
5.0
2.8
4.5

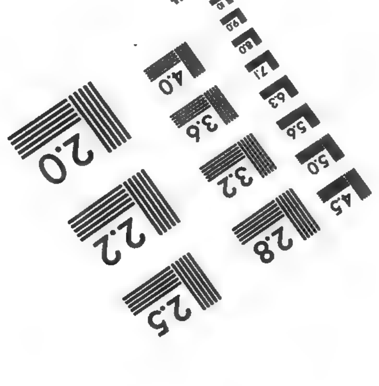
4.0
3.6
2.0
5.0
3.2
4.5
2.2
2.8
2.5

A4

A3



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
5.0
2.8
4.5



4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
2.2
4.5
2.8
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

INFORMATION OBSCURED

NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF

MAR 13 1925

NEW RESPIGHI VIOLIN MUSIC PLAYED

Albert Spalding Introduces "Gregorian" Concerto at Koussevitzky's Concert.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall, under the direction of the now firmly popular Serge Koussevitzky, ranged from the sleepily dull to the weightily interesting. Comment on the unprofitable part of the evening can get along with a line or two later. The thing that brought us to life was Ottorino Respighi's new "Gregorian" concerto for violin and orchestra, with Albert Spalding as the authoritative and virile soloist.

Respighi, one of the most talented of the Italian composers of the day, had an idea, and a thoroughly original one, when he wrote this concerto—which is about 100 per cent more than most composers of violin concerti have had. And the idea would have reached something like the quality of the superb and probably have burst effulgently upon a world bored to death with mere fiddlesticks had not Respighi almost done it to death through sheer overwriting. If the thing were half, or even two-thirds as long as it is, it would be a new gem for the violin repertoire.

As it is, it is just another good thing gone wrong. But, perhaps, Respighi will see the lengthy terror of his ways and determinedly get out his blue pencil. If he does, there is still hope of a real violin concerto to set into the desperately meagre repertoire.

Bumping Into the "Spiritual."

Respighi's idea is implicit in the music's title—"Concerto Gregoriano." It is written largely in the modes of the Gregorian chants, the religious plainsong of the Middle Ages. But this isn't done as a stunt. The thing is the basis for music that has, in Respighi's words, "the purity and the sobriety of the religious musical style" of this ancient time. The composer imagines the solo instrument to act the role of the cantor of the old church services and the orchestra that of the congregation. And he succeeds admirably in carrying out his scheme, except that, at least to the people of to-day, he may be accused of making his matter so lengthy as to become prosy.

The piece is in the accustomed three movements of the concerto, the first leading continuously into the second through the medium of a cadenza for the solo violin. And his cadenza was the only incongruous affair in the whole work. Whether Respighi himself wrote it, perhaps Arrigo Serrato, to om it is dedicated, we don't w. But it is altogether out of racter with the intent of the t of the music.

he Gregorian modes, derived m the Greek scales, seem to have elightful and unexpected cousin- p to the melodic quality of Rus- n folksong; but quite the most onishing and intriguing aspect this matter of resemblances oc- rs in the final movement of the ncerto, called "Alleluia." Here principal theme, a stirringly autiful and effective melody, rsts upon you as a full-fledged d apparently pedigreed American gro spiritual! Of course, it isn't. t it is blood-brother to several of em. Things like this will happen, owever, when a composer gets to abbling in ancientry. Neverthe- ss, Respighi's concerto, with some tting, and a revision of the first ovement cadenza, would be the inest matter of its kind since Brahms.

Spalding's Superb Fiddling.

The chief factor in the success and effectiveness of the performance of the piece was Mr. Spalding, although Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were also on their toes about it. There was a splendid dash about the way the violinist played his part of the music, and a thoroughly well grasped knowledge of what the fiddle was expected to say. His tone was rich and alive. Except for a few slips in intonation, this was an arresting piece of violin playing.

The earlier part of the evening was not engrossing. It consisted of a Boccherini symphony that was as flat and trivial music as we have listened to in a long time, and it was done with a listlessness that was rather startling in Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. Thereupon followed Paul Dukas's highly labored "dance poem," "La Peri," that never got you farther than first base. The evening ended with Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," as orchestrated by Maurice Ravel, and repeated from one of the Saturday concerts earlier in the season.

L. W.

Carreno-Like Pianist to Be Heard Here

YOLANDA MERO.

Mme. Mero comes nearer than any other pianist of the day to the grand style of the late Teresa Carreno. She is truly one of the valkyrs of the keyboard. She is to be heard for the last time this season in a recital at Aeolian Hall next Monday afternoon.

NEW YORK
POST

MAR 13 1925

Music

Boston Symphony Plays Superbly

WHEN AN ORCHESTRA provides such a feast as the Boston Sym- ony set forth last evening at Carnegie all under the superb conducting of Serge ussevitzky, it is invidious to single out any one item for particular praise. The soloist was Albert Spalding, whose playing of Respighi's concerto "Gregoriano" was on a level with that of the rest of the program. Mr. Spalding gave a characteristically finished interpretation of a composition which supplied ample opportunity for a display of his mastery of the violin.

The first number on the program was not worthy of that honor. Its sole interest was in showing what fine conducting and hat excellent orchestral response can be hrown away on an inferior production. If t had to be played, it was just as well to ome first so as to be forgotten in the orgeousness of the rest of the selections. was followed by Dukas' lovely "La Peri." hen came the concerto, and the program as concluded with Moussorgsky's delight- l and impressive "Pictures at an Exhibi- on" as arranged for orchestra by M. avel.

Koussevitzky, coaxing and commanding turns, brought out every shade of the ried harmonies in the works he had osen for the evening's delectation. The hestra responded as if by instinct to wonderful leadership. It was as if man were somehow playing a hun- instruments at once, so perfect was understanding between conductor and ducted.

oth in perfection of detail and in total ctiveness, last evening's performance one of the most brilliant of the sea- of several seasons. It sent the au- away in a glow of artistic pleasure can be created only by a masterly of inspired music.

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 13 1925

***

A Great Musical Treat

The Portland Music Commission has arranged for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to come here on March 25. The price of tickets for this concert run from $1 to $2. Nowhere in the country has such a low price been made for a concert by this premier musical organization. It could not be done by the Portland Music Commission if its purpose was to make a profit from its undertaking.

Bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra here will wind up in a blaze of glory the Music Commission's year of activities, so far as concerts of this character are concerned. That it is appreciated by the lovers of music in Portland and this portion of Maine goes without saying. "Standing room only" should be the sign displayed at the entrance to the City Hall Auditorium on March 25.

The purpose of the Music Commission is to provide educational opportunities for the music lovers in this city. So far it has met with remarkable success in this work. Never before has there been such patronage of the Sunday afternoon concerts in City Hall. They are growing in popularity and show that there is an ever increasing demand for this sort of thing. They afford better musical treats for Portland people than are offered in cities of much larger population. The Music Commission is helping make possible the realization of the dream of those who originally created it and who believed that the cultivation of a desire for good music among the people would result in making this city one of the leading musical centers in this part of the country. Bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra here and fixing the price of tickets within the reach of everyone is one of the progressive steps towards the goal which the Music Commission is striving to attain.

***

TIMES

MAR 13 1925

OUR ORCHESTRAS AS OTHERS SEE THEM

Players in America's great symphony orchestras are less adventurous than those of staid London, so testified the famous English music critic, Ernest Newman, who has been serving as guest critic for the New York Evening Post. Mr. Newman was asked to give his impressions of American orchestras. These are based upon hearings only of the New York Philharmonic, New York Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony. Of these four organizations Mr. Newman considers the Philadelphia the best—which recalls a similar statement from Richard Strauss during his last visit to America. However, Mr. Newman considers the Philharmonic a close second.

In giving his reasons for the more adventurous quality of the London playing, Mr. Newman instances first the initial advantage of the American orchestras in being economically secure, whereas the London orchestras are not sure of their existence from year to year. As a result the London orchestras engage a number of visiting conductors during a season—the Queen's Hall Orchestra being the only one that always plays under the same conductor. As a consequence, the London players seem to Mr. Newman more quickly adaptable than the American. The Londoners are gamblers, says he, and they develope a gambler's virtues and defects. Among the former are an unusual sharpness of apprehension and quickness of response. It is that sense of adventure that gives their playing a nervous intensity that Mr. Newman has not often met with in New York. In all the finest playing that he has heard in New York the impression has been one not of nervous adventure, but of steady confidence—a feeling that the magnificent machine could not possibly go wrong.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 14 1925

BACH and Albert Spalding easily walked off with the honors of last evening's Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music. The Concerto in E major is among the finest things that Bach wrote for the violin—the Adagio is a page of most extraordinary loveliness; a mood of meditative serenity, over which floated the long rhapsody of the violin. And Mr. Spalding played as we have seldom heard him play before. Among violinists of the day he seems specially fitted by temperament to such music. His fine, sonorous tone—a tone smooth as silk yet of great depth—in combination with the Adagio of the Concerto, went to make one of those memorable moments that cannot be forgotten even in the face of 40 concerts a week.

Mr. Koussewitsky, besides the admirable ~~accompaniment~~ to the Concerto, contributed to the evening the Boccherini Symphony in C major, Dukas' "La Peri," the "La Procession Nocturne" of Rabaud and Salome's Dance from the Strauss opera. The premiere of "Petruschka" at the opera house delayed us so that we reached the Academy just as Mr. Spalding played the first bars of the concerto, and as a result we failed to hear the Boccherini and the Dukas. Both of these works, however, were performed at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and fully commented upon in yesterday's Eagle.

The Rabaud poem, built on a Lenau text, is in many respects impressive music. It has all the manner if not the matter of greatness. But when one has listened to it carefully the impression of a very tiny voice speaking through a very large megaphone is bound to rise in one's mind. It is what the Germans would call Kappelmeistermusik — no better, no worse.

Mr. Koussewitsky gave a good account of himself and his orchestra, both in this poem and in the Strauss dance, from which he extracted what sensualism Strauss managed to distill into his music. But it was in the concerto that Mr. Koussewitsky, like Mr. Spalding, outdid himself. If the conductor had not changed his style over night, we may hazard the performance of the Symphony and Dukas' dance poem were as illuminating and effective as they were on Thursday in the Manhattan hall.

EDWARD CUSHING.

DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD

MAR 14 1925

ALBERT SPALDING SCORES IN BOSTON

Albert Spalding, who has many admirers in Duluth, was soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra last week when he received an ovation from a critical Boston audience. The critic of the Boston Globe said of his performance:

"Albert Spalding, an American violinist deservedly much admired, was cordially applauded by yesterday's symphony audience both before and after he played the solo part in Respighi's new "Gregorian Concerto." Mr. Spalding, a fine musician and therefore bored by mere show pieces has sought diligently and successfully on more than one occasion for new pieces. The performance was a beautiful example of controlled and intense emotion from Mr. Spalding and the orchestra.

HERALD

MAR 14 192

George Longy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will resign ~~his position~~ at the end of the present season.

He will retire, says The Boston Transcript, at his own request, and Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor not a little regrets the decision. Not only will Mr. Longy leave the orchestra. He will also depart from Boston, returning for the remainder of his days to France, whence he came. He passing middle age. His work oboist taxes him. The direction music school leaves him little leisu He is disposed to sit in the sun a be idle.

The public of the symphony concerts, which has listened to Mr. Longy for a quarter of a century and weekly recognized his presence and his voice, will keep him in remembrance and companion him with good wishes. In Europe and in America no oboist of his time has surpassed him in quality and finesse of tone: while few have equaled him in evenness and felicity of performance.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 14 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

With Albert Spalding, violinist, as the soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert in a series of five, last night, at the Academy of Music. Under the skillful baton of Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra rendered a program of fine music.

Mr. Spalding played Bach's Concerto for violin in E Major, a delightful piece, and to which he gave real feeling. The violinist has great beauty of tone, peculiarly suited to ~~the Bach concerto~~. The orchestra opened the program with Boccherini's Symphony in C Major, rather heavy music, but perfectly played.

Duke's "La Peri," a poeme danse, and a familiar number on Boston Symphony programs, was gracefully rendered. This bit of French music, originally written for a ballet, was a favorite of Pierre Monteux, the little Frenchman who conducted the orchestra before Koussevitzky.

"La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem by Rabaud, and Straus' Dance of Salome, by the orchestra, completed the program.

59

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNI

MAR 14 192

MUSIC

Bach Concerto Dominates Boston Symphony Program

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music, under Institute auspices, was interesting for a number of reasons, not the least of which was the presence of an ample supply of Philip Hale's programme notes. In the past Brooklyn concerteers have had to go after these helpful and scholarly pamphlets as stealthily as after a copy of "Ulysses," but last night they were there in all their New England solidity —there for the asking. One elects to regard this as a triumph for Brooklyn, in view of the protests voiced in these columns following the previous concerts of this season.

Serge Koussevitzky was conductor and Albert Spalding violin soloist at last night's concert. Mr. Koussevitzky's choice of music for the occasion offered unusual contrast between what may be chronologically termed the music of yesteryear, and more than chronologically, perhaps, the music of to-day. Boccherini's Symphony in C, a rather drab antique, opened the programme, followed by Paul Dukas' "The Peri: A Danced Poem." The Dukas number had a significance greater than itself, for it served to demolish the effect of Richard Strauss' "Dance of the Seven Veils" from the opera "Salome," nearly an hour later.

Dukas has a lavish palette, no doubt, but he chooses to subtly spray his canvas with a brush of soft greens and crimson. It is orchestrally modern music, as compared with the bitter steadiness of Bach's E major violin concerto, which it preceded. Dukas plays with a mood and a hue; Bach has essayed to fiddle. Bach drives with unrelenting fervor at a clearly visioned goal, using his solo instrument as well as the associate strings, all in a carefully schemed manner. He is writing masterly music. Dukas toys and pirouettes; he is dancing, exquisitely, too exquisitely.

Henri Rabaud's "The Nocturnal Procession," a symphonic poem after Lenau, is heavily programmed and almost, so it seems, a monotone of harmonies. Rabaud, like Dukas, is after a sensuous rather than a spiritual effect—and he achieves it. And thus the programme came to Strauss' "Salome's Dance." Strauss is also burdened with programme; he, too, achieves his effect. But by this time an audience, sated with musical paint, can no longer respond, even to a brilliant performance. The fine conducting of Koussevitzky and the superb playing of the Boston orchestra were awarded perfunctory applause. So, too, the music of Strauss.

The abiding memory of last night's concert was Mr. Spalding's rendition of Bach, a clear, sharp jewel of composition that glows steadily down the corridor of the centuries, filtering with the miraculous beauty of genius through the artificial spectrums of mere talent.

Transcript
Mar 14

Monday evening, March 30, in Symphony Hall, the fourth of the supplementary concerts of the Symphony Orchestra to a public overflowing from the regular series or preferring a shorter shrift and programs seldom disturbed by novel or exacting pieces. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct, and Miss Hess of the fine hand and the finer spirit will be the assisting pianist. Never before in Boston has she played with orchestra.

Friday afternoon, March 27, in Symphony Hall, the twentieth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting, and Skriabin's "Prometheus: the Poem of Fire," for the chief item of the program. Never before has it been played in Boston.

Orchestral

OUT of the youngest and the middle generation, Parisian composers, little known hereabouts, have an inning at the Symphony Concerts of next week: Roland-Manuel with an Overture to the operetta, "Isabelle and Pantalon"; Borchard with a piece labelled "L'Elan"; Caplet, once of the Boston Opera House, with "Epiphany," a "Fresco" for violoncello and orchestra drawn from Ethiopian legend. Between these newcomers, Mr. Koussevitzky has sandwiched Ravel transcribing for orchestra a Dance of Debussy. Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony rounds out the list. With it, at a concert for the Pension Fund of the orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky excelled. In Caplet's "Poem," Mr. Bedetti, the first violoncellist, will play the solo-part.

On Thursday evening, Mr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra will make a seventh expedition to Sanders Theater at Cambridge, where they will be heard in Mahler's Intermezzo to Weber's operetta, "The Three Pintos; Brahms's Symphony in F Major; Ravel's transcription for full orchestra of Musorgsky's graphic piano-pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 14 1925

Music Events

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

With Albert Spalding, violinist, as the soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert in a series of five, last night, at the Academy of Music. Under the skillful baton of Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra rendered a program of fine music.

Mr. Spalding played Bach's Concerto for violin in E Major, a delightful piece, and to which he gave real feeling. The violinist has great beauty of tone, peculiarly suited to the Bach concerto. The orchestra opened the program with Boccherini's Symphony in C Major, rather heavy music, but perfectly played.

Duke's "La Peri," a poeme danse, and a familiar number on Boston Symphony programs, was gracefully rendered. This bit of French music, originally written for a ballet, was a favorite of Pierre Monteux, the little Frenchman who conducted the orchestra before Koussevitzky.

"La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem by Rabaud, and Straus' Dance of Salome, by the orchestra, completed the program.

NEW YORK
TIMES

MAR 15 1925

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is not easy to understand why Mr. Koussevitsky elected to play Glazounof's Eighth Symphony at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. This is one of the longest and dullest of Glazounof's efforts in the symphonic form. Well played, it could have been turned out by any German kapellmeister who had lived a few years in Petrograd. Glazounof is not always so academic. In the work heard yesterday there is little or no saving grace, even though the structure is elaborate, the instrumentation sonorous, and the finale written, according to the composer's words, with thoughts of "heathen feats" and "the triumph of Christianity in opposition to the faith of the heathens." Other things than piety are required to produce a symphony. On this occasion a gifted heathen would have been welcomed.

The soloist was Albert Spalding, who had given a stirring performance of Respihi's "Concerto Gregoriano" with the same orchestra two days previous. On this occasion Mr. Spalding played Bach's E major concerto. He performed with due breadth of style, with a beautiful singing tone and ample technical resource; he did not, however, appear to be able to do complete justice to himself. This must largely be laid to the door of Mr. Koussevitsky. The slow movement of the concerto lost much of its character and gained little save a certain fuzziness of tone by the subordination of the persistent figure in the lower strings which gives the movement its physiognomy. Yesterday the figure merged in a kind of impressionistic blur with the sustained tone of the other instruments. Sense of line was lost; and, anyhow, there were too many strings employed. Bach's orchestra for the E major concerto required not more than ten players.

If the strings of the modern orchestra are not reduced in number for such a composition there is thickness of tone which it is difficult to avoid. Even when the desired subordination of the ensemble is secured it is accomplished at the expense of the spontaneity and brilliancy of style which Bach's music asks of the orchestra as well as the solo player. The orchestral players are walking on eggs and they know it. They cannot forget themselves or let loose for an instant. Consequently there was nothing red-blooded, nothing lusty and vigorous as Bach's music in the allegross as heard yesterday, and the whole work was given a tame performance.

The remainder of the program consisted of Henri Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession," after an episode of the "Faust" of Nicholas Lenau, and the Dance of Salome from Strauss's opera of that name. Although it is, perhaps, "dated," and a kind of poetic sublimation of Gounod, Rabaud's tone poem has atmosphere, a fine line and poetic feeling. It is a little long and there is not an overwhelming amount of contrast in the music, although Mr. Koussevitsky's reading was very sensitive and sympathetic. But it is sincere and emotional art.

The orchestra played the Dance of Salome with sufficient energy and plasticity of phrase, but it must be admitted that this piece, at least when separated from the stage, has aged greatly in a few years. There was a large audience at this concert, as at the Boston Symphony concerts of the season; there was warm applause for the conductor and for the soloist.

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

MAR 15 1925

Koussevitzky, the famous Rus- ian conductor, head of the Boston ymphony Orchestra, will receive a reat hand when he advances on the age of City Hall on March 25 to onduct the orchestra at its Port- nd concert.

Koussevitzky was born in Tver, in e northern part of Russia, in 1874. e was leading a theater orches- a in his home town at the age of elve, keeping at the post for two ears. Part of his duties were to ompose whatever music might be eeded.

When he was fourteen Kousse- itzky went to Moscow to continue is studies. He practised upon the ouble-bass, soon acquiring such traordinary facility that he was ppointed soloist in the Imperial pera orchestra and succeeded his acher, the celebrated Rambaussec, professor of the Conservatoire.

Then, for ten years, Koussevitzky ured Europe as a virtuoso. He mposed a number of works for his strument, including a concerto, at have been much played. He turned to Russia in 1909 and or- nized the Koussevitzky Orchestra at soon became so famous; it as made up of the best players om the other Russian orchestras. e men were engaged by the year d were barred from giving their services to any other organization.

The formal Moscow and Perograd seasons ending at Easter, Koussevitzky in the spring gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tchaikovsky festivals, Rimsky-Korsakoff festivals, etc., in the two capital towns.

Appointed director of Russian State orchestras after the Revolution of 1917, Koussevitzky remained at home until 1920. His famous Paris concerts were begun the next year and have been continued until his American engagement.

If anyone thinks that the members of an orchestra such as the Boston Symphony tuck their instruments under their arm and take the train for a destination like the Portland concert, that person is very much mistaken. The business of transporting an orchestra like the Boston organization is a big, scheduled undertaking. Niel Patterson has been baggage man for the orchestra 37 years.

About 100 players travel for concerts and approximately 100 trunks go along too, each containing the musician's instrument, his evening suit and his music. Enormous trunks are built especially for the harp and other big instruments. On arriving at the place of the concert, these trunks are found awaiting the orchestral members, each with the owner's name attached. Everything is in care of Mr. Patterson and his assistant. Their names are not in the program but they do a substantial share of the concert's business.

These officials do not leave until long after the orchestra takes the return train for the Hub. About 4 A. M., the packing of the big instruments is all accomplished and by 10 o'clock next morning (perhaps for a rehearsal) everything must once more be unpacked and placed in readiness for the players to commence the opening work.

Ordinarily Mr. Koussevitzky, with his manager Mr. Brennan, goes ahead, in order that he may have time for a leisurely dinner before the event in the city visited, or perhaps he dines at home and departs (for some nearby place) in a private compartment of an express train.

Mr. Koussevitzky lives in Jamaica Plain.

The concert in Portland is anticipated as the most distinguished musical event of the season.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT

MAR 15 1925

The Music Parade.

New York surely does not stint the public in its supply of music. What a quantity, and how infinite the variety! The Philharmonic, New York, Philadelphia, and Boston Symphony orchestras have been playing away during recent days with almost no cessation. And mostly it has been music worth hearing, and superlatively played. Mengelberg, Walter, and Stokowski are sterling musicians and conductors; I cannot enthuse so much over Koussevitzky.

Then Wanda Landowska gave us a harpsichord program of aristocratic beauty and elegance; tinkly music interpreted with flawless technique and equally flawless taste. Cecilia Hansen's violin recital left pleasurable recollections, for this young artiste is maturing

---

Mar. 15

This week's Symphony program includes Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, of which Mr Koussevitzky has already given a notable interpretation here this season, at a pension fund concert. The soloist is Jean Bedetti, who will take the solo part in a piece called "Epiphanie," by Andre Caplet, once one of the conductors of the old Boston Opera. A number from an opera bouffe, "Isabelle et Pantalon," by Roland-Manuel, a young French composer, pupil of Roussel and Ravel and musical critic in "La Revue Musicale" and "L'Eclair"; a piece by Borchard, a composer so far unknown to this department of the Globe and not to be found in available reference books, will be included in the miscellany, according to the advance announcement. But Mr Koussevitzky may change his mind.

The hyphen in M Roland-Manuel's name may be due to the fact that his name was once Levy. He has apparently gotten his nom de plume as Joseph Conrad did his by abandoning an unsatisfactory last name. Conrad's was several syllables of Polish beginning with a "K," which one will not attempt to spell offhand.

mood.

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

MAR 15 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS POPULAR PROGRAM HERE

Music For All Classes Says Director Koussevitzky

Those who, awed by the musical repute of the Boston Symphony Orchestra might expect from it when it appears here on March 25 a program of such ambitious character that the element of popular appeal is almost forgotten, will find their expectations agreeably shattered.

Serge Koussevitzky, the brilliant new conductor, is a master of program building. He believes in presenting music for all the people: not merely for a few highly culturel, musicians. While every selection that his great orchestra plays under the magic of his baton is directed with a perfection of technical skill and resource and is an exquisite delight to the musical ear, Kussevitzky's music appeals to the unlearned as to the learned. In the more pretentious numbers there is life and color and rhythm. In the lesser numbers there is novelty and charm.

One of the daintiest and most attractive selections on the program he is promising for Portland will be the suite The Flight of the Bumble Bee, from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, Tsar Saltan. In this opera the prince transforms himself into a bumble bee to suit purposes of his own, and then rising from the seas buzzes about the Swan-Maiden. So skilfully is the music written that even to the unimaginative man the flight of the bee is suggested, and the tiny piece exacts an aerial lightness and fleetness from the wood wind which is a marvel of virtuosity.

Koussevitzky invariably includes on his program something from modern or comparatively modern composers, and there is practically no Koussevitzky concert that does not have at lease one Russian number in it. None of these Russian selections have been more cordially received in the current season's concerts than the scherzo, Flight of the Bumble Bee.

"Best by attest"
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MA 15 1925

BOSTON

The Boston Symphony is deservedly world famous and is perhaps best known to those in Hartford closely following music. This orchestra's quite recent appearance in Hartford was an occasion that will be long remembered. To some, hearing the Boston Symphony for the first time was a revelation of what symphonic music can be; to those who heard it on previous occasions it served to increase the already well founded appreciation.

Henry L. Higginson of Boston brought together the first Boston Symphony in 1881 and during his lifetime it was a beneficiary of his particular interest. It grew to be practically self-supporting and is now aided through an endowment provided by the generosity of Mr. Higginson.

The Boston Symphony has for a motive the establishment of a pension for its members—in fact it was with this symphony that the idea of pensions for members originated. Surely those devoting themselves constantly to preparation for public concerts deserve such encouragement for their sacrifices.

Hartford has the distinction of having organized the first symphonic orchestra in Connecticut, according to the best recollections of those most conversant with music throughout the state. The Capital city of Connecticut, has a place for such an organization and the new Hartford Symphony can inherit fine traditions from the Philharmonic and develop into a body, rightfully representative of Hartford.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

MAR 15 1925

Farewell of Georges Longy

There are many persons in this city who recall with pleasure and satisfaction the visits many years ago of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and who feel that a large part of their present enjoyment of orchestral music wa awakened by the concerts given by that organization when Colonel Higginson was its guiding patron. Word has come Boston that Georges Longy who played first oboe all these years, will retire at the end of the present season from his professional activities and return to France from whence he came, and there pass the remainder of his days.

The visits of M. Longy have been infrequent of recent years, but there are doubtless many who will readily recall his fine quality of tone and the finesse of his phrasing upon one of the most difficult instruments in the entire orchestra. No doubt there will arise some one to occupy his chair in the oboe section of the orchestra, as there is always some one ready to take up work laid down by another.

BIRMINGHAM ALA.
News
ISSUE OF
MAR 15 1925

* * *

Music Parade

New York surely does not stint the public in its supply of music. What a quantity, and how infinite the variety! The Philharmonic, New York, Philadelphia, and Boston symphony orchestra have been playing away during recent days with almost no cessation. And mostly it has been music worth hearing, and superlatively played. Mengelberg, Walter and Stokowski are sterling musicians and conductors; I cannot enthuse so much over Koussevitzky.

Then Wanda Landowska gave us a harpsichord program of aristocratic beauty and elegance; tinkly music interpreted with flawless technique and equally flawless taste. Cecilia Han- 's violin recital left pleasurable rec- ctions, for this young artiste is ma- ng steadily and must be pronounced of the foremost in her art.

PITTSBURG, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES

925

The Music Parade.

New York surely does not stint the public in its supply of music. What a quantity, and how infinite the variety! The Philharmonic, New York, Philadelphia and Boston Symphony orchestras have been playing away during recent days with almost no cessation. And mostly it has been music worth hearing, and superlatively played. Mengelberg, Walter

---

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MAR 15 1925

The Music Parade

New York surely does not stint the public in its supply of music. What a quantity, and how infinite the variety! The Philharmonic, New York, Philadelphia and Boston symphony orchestras have been playing away during recent days with almost no cessation. And mostly it has been music worth hearing, and supe tively played. Mengelberg, and Stokowski are sterling mu and conductors; I cannot thuse over fighter

60

NEW YORK
POST

MAR 16 1925

Spalding Soloist With the Boston

THE feature of the Boston Symphony's concert in Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, was the appearance of Albert Spalding as solist in Bach's "E Major Concerto." Again, as in the Respighi "Concerto Gregoriano," played by the Boston orchestra on last Thursday evening, Mr. Spalding demonstrated a technical mastery of his instrument that was only equaled by the spirit of his playing. His tone was nothing short of ravishingly beautiful.

His great opportunity came, of course, in the Adagio, and he took full advantage of it. Mr. Spalding has grown steadily and surely in artistic stature for a number of years; he can no longer be denied a place among the great violinists of the day. He has never played better here than in his last two performances. Mr. Koussevitzky's good strings gave him splendid, full-bodied support in the Bach work.

The afternoon's symphony was the Eighth of Glazounov in E flat major, a long and highly complex composition in which the inspiration seemed thinly spread. It is without a program, and as well as it was played, did not seem in any sense a candidate for the permanent society of great symphonies.

The orchestra also played the Rabaud symphonic poem, "Le Procession Nocturne," based upon the "Faust" of Nicholas Lenau, an atmospheric study in an almost continuous mood of still, rather somber beauty, lacking in color and contrast, but impressive withal, and given a good performance.

Strauss' "Salome's Dance," from the opera "Salome," followed the Rabaud work, and formed a striking contrast to its melancholy monotonies. It was stirringly played, but one does not grow to love it somehow with repeated hearings. Perhaps it is aging.

Carnegie Hall was filled for the concert, and there was the greatest enthusiasm for Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Spalding and the orchestra.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 16 1925

CITY FAVORED BY CHANCE TO HEAR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Great Demand For Services of Hub Musical Organization

That Portland is rarely favored in being able to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, and particularly at prices lower than ever have been offered before when this attraction visited Maine, is the consensus of opinion of concert-goers.

In a year when the Boston Symphony is tremendously sought after, and when concerts in all cities where it plays are subscribed far in advance, this is a most unusual policy to pursue. The Portland Music Commission is pursuing it, however, because it desires to put really fine music within the reach of all the people. The rush to secure desirable seats for the concert, and the enthusiasm with which it is spoken of in the musical clubs and in various local organizations as well as in individual homes indicates that this altrustic attitude on the part of the commission is by no means unappreciated, and Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished conductor, and his unrivalled aggregation of players should be greeted by a tremendous audience on the 25th.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
~~GAZETTE~~
Union

MAR 16 1925

Boston Symphony with Albert Spalding as soloist plays "Concerto Gregoriano" in New York.

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

MAR 16 19

SPALDING MAKES BIGGEST HIT OF HIS CAREER

American Violinist, Fresh from an Enthusiastic Reception in California, Is Heard Here with Boston Symphony Orchestra

By LEONARD LIEBLING

FRESH from an enthusiastic recent reception in California, Albert Spalding, U. S. A., returned to his home town and won one of the big successes of his career, at the Carnegie Hall matinee of the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Spalding's vehicle was the Bach concerto in E major, a work which exposes mercilessly any lack of musical authority or interpretative ability in th eplayer. It calls for the highest degree of art, for the most serene and sincere conception, for the utter abscence of self-display and self-exploitation.

The American violinist possesses the Bach spirit in a marked measure, for his musical ideals always have been exceptionally lofty, and almost his entire life has been spent in the devoted study of the classics. His playing of Bach was fine, rounded, elevated, mature. In mentality, musicianship, temperament, he was controlled and commanding. Nothing more musically thorough and magnificent has been done here by a violinist this season. It was a performance to be proud of, both on the part of the artist and of his compatriots in the audience, who applauded him unreservedly.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, was ~~not~~ overlooked in the plaudits. He and his orchestra and Spalding all were one unified force in the ensemble of the Bach presentation.

Koussevitzky gave a notable reading also of the Glazounow symphony in E flat, an interesting, fluently written work, with strong resemblances to Tchaikowsky.

Other items on the programme were Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne" (based on an episode in Lenau's "Faust"), an atmospheric and artful piece of orchestral writing, and the dance from Strauss' "Salome."

NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune

MAR 16 1925

Saturday's Boston Symphony matinee raised one ~~of those~~ questions of program making the answer to which no feller can find out: namely, Why do conductors, normally of dependable taste, play the symphonies of Glazounoff? Montague-Nathan once called Glazounoff "the Mendelssohn of Russian music," which causes one to weep for the outraged shade of Mendelssohn. We have no cankering passion for the music of Mendelssohn, but by the side of Glazounoff he seems as rare and exquisite as Debussy by the side of Gounod. Glazounoff is no Mendelssohn. He is merely a salon composer with an incurable case of megalomania. He has written eight symphonies, and all of those that we know are insufferably long-winded, pretentious and blatantly commonplace. The Eighth (in E flat, Op. 83), which Mr. Koussevitzky gave us on Saturday, is no exception. Mr. Koussevitzky played it superbly, but why he played it at all we are unable to guess. It cannot have been merely because Glazounoff is a Russian. There are symphonies by the younger men of contemporary Russia, unknown in America, which Mr. Koussevitzky might well introduce to us. Miaskovsky, for instance, has written seven, and not one of them has been heard here. They can scarcely be worse than Glazounoff's.

* * *

TEMPERED ADMIRATION

Transcript Mar 17

The Reviewers in New York and the Latest Visit of the Boston Orchestra—Mr. Koussevitzky's Programs Questioned—Contempt for Glazunov's Symphony—Musorgsky via Raval Variously Viewed

IN time past and time present, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has enjoyed a lengthier and more laudatory "press" than was its lot when it revisited New York last week. The obstacle appears to have been Mr. Koussevitzky's programs—as sometimes befalls at home. Either they failed, as on Thursday, to lure this and that reviewer into the concert-hall, or, as on Saturday, the choice of pieces displeased those who heard Thus in the Herald-Tribune, Mr. Gilman exclaims against the inclusion in the latter concert of Glazunov's Eighth Symphony, already inflicted upon Boston:

> Why do conductors, normally of dependable taste, play the symphonies of Glazunov? He has written eight symphonies, and all of those that we know are insufferably long-winded, pretentious and blatantly commonplace. The Eighth is no exception. Mr. Koussevitzky played it superbly; but why he played it at all we are unable to guess. It cannot have been merely because Glazunov is a Russian. There are symphonies by the younger men of contemporary Russia, unknown in America, which Mr. Koussevitzky might well introduce to us. Miaskovsky, for instance, has written seven, and not one of them has been heard here. They can scarcely be worse than Glazunov's.

Mr. Taylor of The World declined even to listen to the boresome stuff; while The Times declared the Symphony to be "one of the longest and dullest of Glazunov's efforts. Well played, it could have been turned out by any German kapellmeister who had lived a few years in Leningrad. Glazunov is not always so academic. In the music heard yesterday there is little or no saving grace, though the structure is elaborate; the instrumentation sonorous. The finale written, according to the composer, with thought of 'heathen feats,' and 'the triumph of Christianity in opposition to the faith of the heathen.' Other things than piety are required to produce a symphony."

Continued on Following Page

The concert of Thursday evening fared better. It began with the little Symphony of Boccherini long since played in Boston. In Mr. Taylor's ears, "Mr. Koussevitzky gave it a spirited and delicate reading." Next followed Dukas's ballet, "The Peri," as tone-poem. According to Mr. Henderson of The Sun, "it gave Mr. Koussevitzky opportunity to display his warmth of feeling and his poetic imagination; while the orchestra had scope for all the splendors of its tone and its technical finish." Thereafter, Mr. Spalding, the violinist, joined the orchestra in Respighi's "Concerto Gregoriano," and both gained no little applause in the concert-hall by night and in the newspapers by day. Finally, conductor and band played Ravel's version for orchestra of Musorgsky's piano-pieces "Pictures at an Exhibition." Of the arrangement and of the orchestra, Mr. Taylor writes sagely:

> Ravel's orchestral treatment is a marvelously clever approximation of the scoring of "Boris." Indeed, as the program-book explained, he tried to "keep the size of the orchestra of Rimsky-Korsakov . . . and added some more instruments only in a few movements of the suite." Inasmuch as that means an orchestra only slightly smaller than that of "Götterdämmerung," one wonder just what Ravel would have done if he had let himself go. I cannot muster the superlatives that some enthusiasts hurl about when discussing this "Ravelized" Musorgsky. The suite is good, but I think Musorgsky was right when he wrote it as a set of piano-pieces. Scored for a chamber orchestra, it might be vastly effective, but the present version, while undoubtedly lots of fun for conductor and players, merely inflates the composer's modest ideas to the bursting point—past it in several instances.

The Times, however, received the transcription with joyous shouts and gyrations, even to "utterlys" and like superlatives: "Ravel has wrought with a skill and intuition which place him at the right hand of Musorgsky himself. For once, pieces originally written for piano appear to have been mis-conceived; it was as if Musorgsky had only given Ravel a rough preliminary sketch for the appearance in orchestral guise of his curious inventions. On the piano the pieces are seldom more than suggestive, and sometimes ludicrously inadequate. Ravel, with the most economical means, fills in the rough outlines and glorifies the originals, with the most expressive colors. Moreover, his orchestration is utterly Muscovite in character. The modern Frenchman is no longer heard; but a musician with the stride, the accent, the evocative power, of the greatest of the Russian 'Five.' The performance was a triumph for the composer, the transcriber and the conductor. It shed glory divided equally between the three."

BANGOR
ME.
COMMERCIAL

MAR 17 1925

SYMPHONY ENCORE IS DEMANDED

Boston Organization in Portland, March 25, Breaks Old Rule

Serge Koussevitzky, the popular conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has made a tremendous name for himself in the music world in his first season in America, has set an entirely new record for Boston Symphony concerts.

For 40 years the Boston Symphony has not granted an encore. Applause has been enthusiastic many, many times, but never so enthusiastic that the rule forbidding encores has been broken.

A week or two ago Mr. Koussevitzky was obliged to set aside this precedent. Enthusiasm reached such heights after the performance of The Flight of the Bumble Bee, a little Scherzo from Rimsky-Koreakov's fairy opera, Tsar Saltan, that an encore had to be given to satisfy concert-goers and bring the storm of handclapping at an end.

The Flight of the Bumble Bee describes how a prince transforms himself into a bee for his own purposes, and rising from the ocean buzzes about the Swan Maiden. It exacts an aerial lightness and fleetness from the wood wind which is a marvel of virtuosity.

The Flight of the Bumble Bee will be one of the selections given when Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony visit Portland on March 25 for a concert at City Hall under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission.

BANGOR
ME.
NEWS

MAR 17 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN PORTLAND

Serge Koussevitzky, the popular conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has made a tremendous name for himself in the music world in his first season in America, has set an entirely new record for Boston Symphony concerts.

For 40 years the Boston Symphony has not granted an encore. Applause has been enthusiastic many, many times, but never so enthusiastic that the rule forbidding encores has been broken.

A week or two ago Mr. Koussevitzky was obliged to set aside this precedent. Enthusiasm reached such heights after the performance of The Flight of the Bumble Bee, a little Scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakox's fairy opera, Tsar Saytan, that an encore had to be given to satisfy concert-goers and bring the storm of handclapping to an end.

The Flight of the Bumble Bee describes how a prince transforms himself into a bee for his own purposes, and rising from the ocean buzzes about the Swan Maiden. It enacts an aerial lightness and fleetness from the wood wind which is a marvel of virtuosity.

The Flight of the Bumble Bee will be one of the selections given when Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony visit Portland on March 25 for a concert at City Hall under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission.—advt.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 17 1925

REAL TREAT IN STORE FOR LOCAL MUSIC LOVERS

Koussevitzky Has Risen To World Heights as A Conductor

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has come suddenly into the position of almost world dominance in music which he holds at the present time. Before the war he was known as a conductor only in eastern Europe. He was held in highest esteem by the Russian people because of his efforts to give really fine music to them at prices within the means of all.

In western Europe he was known only as a remarkable virtuoso of the double bass, which was his chosen instrument before he began his career of orchestral leadership.

From 1921 on he conducted a yearly series of concerts in London and Paris, and by virtue of these and his splendid performances as leader at the Grand Opera in Paris he rose in the estimation of France and England as head and shoulders above any other conductor of the day. With this fame to herald him, America was keenly curious about the new conductor of the Boston Symphony when he first came to the United States last Autumn. Expectations have been most eloquently realized in the Boston Symphony concerts this season, and Portland has a rare treat in store when Koussevitzky and his musicians visit this City on the 25th.

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 17 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

There is no phase of the conducting of Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony ~~Orchestra~~ which is more interesting to concert-goers than his interpretation of modern Russian music. Every musician is at his best in directing the music of his own country, and much stimulus has been lent to the vogue for Russian music in the United States this year through Koussevitzky's presentation of many Russian compositions hitherto unfamiliar on this side of the ocean.

Two of these little known Russian numbers will be features of his program in this City March 25. These will be The Flight of the Bumble Bee from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, Tsar Salten, which is light and dainty and a charming exposition of Russian composition, and the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera Khovantchina, which depicts the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow. This is descriptive Russian music in one of its most interesting phases, and presents sharp contrast to the Bumble Bee number. Koussevitzky is practically responsible for introducing these two selections to the western world.—Adv.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 17 1925

Unique Concert by The Boston Orchestra

The program selected by Serge Kousevitsky as the Boston Symphony fourth of a series of five concerts at the Academy of Music, arnd played before a capacity audience, departed somewhat from the conventional program in its numbers and diversity.

First was Boccherini's new and quaint Symphony in C major, which called for the strings alone. Koussevitzky read it with a full appreciation of its other-day idiom.

"La Peri," by Dukas, a Boeme dance, followed with its wealth of rhythmic intricacies. But by far the most satisfying number was Bach's concerto for violin in B major, for which Albert Spaulding was the soloist. It brings with it a peace and rest sensation, an at-homeness that few of the masters, even, can induce. Spaulding's playing was superb, containing the proper amount of feeling balanced with a fine aloofness.

Completing the program were Raban's "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem, and Strauss' dance of Salome, from "Salome."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAR 18 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE SUNDAY

Koussevitzky to Lead Famous Orchestra in Concert at Albee Theatre.

ENDS MUSIC LEAGUE SERIES

Famous Russian Expected to Add to Unqualifiedly High Approval Accorded Him in Other American Cities

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 pieces under its new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will appear at the E. F. Albee Theatre next Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in the last of the notable series of concerts which which the Music League has provided Providence this season.

Interest centred in this concert, is twofold; interest in the famous orchestra and interest in its brilliant leader. For, although the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has so long stood for the very highest achievement in symphonic performance, has had a most distinguished line of conductors, certainly not one of them has drawn more general attention nor had more rapturous praise heaped upon him at all hands. Indeed, it is recorded that the orchestra concerts have attained an additional country-wide prominence through the genius of its new leader.

Naturally, then, interest on the part of Providence lovers of music who have never encountered the personality and musicianship of Koussevitzky is at high pitch. He is easily one of the outstanding figures in the musical world, and as such warrants such interest in any community so fortunate as to be favored with a visit from him. Preceded to America by the most glowing reports from Europe, it will not be denied that Koussevitzky's latest conquest, the conquest of America, has been both sudden and complete. He is talked about the country over, every one of his concert series is subscribed and seats for the Boston Symphony concerts are at a premium.

America expected much of Koussevitzky, but it is not too much to say that he has surpassed those expectations. In Boston, in New York, in every city he has visited, the verdict has been unanimously complimentary to him. There is but one opinion of his personal magnetism, his fresh sincerity and vividness as an interpretive artist, and his rare and absolute control, all of which are manifest in the perfect response of the famous orchestra which he now commands.

America has heard many of the great conductors—all of them, perhaps—in the past few seasons, and probably concerning no other one of them has the opinion been so high and so unqualified.

Koussevitzky enjoys a triple fame in the scope of his international interpretations. Some praise him most highly for his readings of the classical masters, which are fresh and engrossing. No one can instil a more vivid and beautiful life in the music of the 18th century. Koussevitzky the romanticist is also irresistible. The fervors of Wagner or Tchaikovsky flame gloriously under his baton. Then there is the third angle to his striking achievements—his flair for the music of the modern schools. No conductor scrutinizes more eagerly and champions more staunchly and understandingly the truly important music of to-day and to-morrow.

Koussevitzky's programme for next Sunday holds brilliant and engrossing promise. It will include Weber's Overture to "Oberon;" Moussorgsky's Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina;" Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee;" Grieg's Suite No. I from the incidental music to "Peer Gynt," and three Wagnerian excerpts—"The Ride of the Valkyries," Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Rienzi."

Those holding tickets for Sunday's concert which they will be unable to use are requested to return them as early as possible that they may become available for others.

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
MAR 18 192

At the Boston Symphony concerts this week the programs will include an overture to the operetta "Isabella and Pantalon," by Roland-Manuel; "L'Elan," Bourchard; "Epiphany," a musical fresco for violoncello and orchestra drawn from an Ethiopian legend, by Caplet, formerly one of the conductors of the Boston opera, and a Dance of Debussy arranged for orchestra by Ravel. Mr. Bedetti will play the solo part in the Caplet number. The symphony will be Tschaikowski's Fifth.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 18 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE HEARD HERE FOR 13 1-3 CENT FEE

Rare Treat Offered Next Sunday When Famous Organization Appears at the Albee Theatre in Final Concert of Music League Series.

To be able to hear a musical organization like the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 13 1-3 cents should prove one of the rarest treats ever offered a music-loving public. It is through the Providence Music League that such an event is made possible. The orchestra, under its new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will appear in the E. F. Albee Theatre Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in the final concert of the Music League series.

Interest centred in this concert, is twofold; interest in the famous orchestra and interest in its brilliant leader. For, although the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has so long stood for the very highest achievement in symphonic performance, has had a most distinguished line of conductors, certainly not one of them has drawn more general attention nor had more rapturous praise heaped upon him at all hands. Indeed, it is recorded that the orchestra concerts have attained an additional country-wide prominence through the genius of its new leader.

Naturally, then, interest on the part of Providence lovers of music who have never encountered the personality and musicianship of Koussevitzky is at high pitch. He is easily one of the outstanding figures in the musical world, and as such warrants such interest in any community so fortunate as to be favored with a visit from him. Preceded to America by the most glowing reports from Europe, it will not be denied that Koussevitzky's latest conquest, the conquest of America, has been both sudden and complete. He is talked about the country over, every one of his concert series is subscribed and seats for the Boston Symphony concerts are at a premium.

America expected much of Koussevitzky, but it is not too much to say that he has surpassed those expectations. In Boston, in New York, in every city he has visited, the verdict has been unanimously complimentary to him. There is but one opinion of his personal magnetism, his fresh sincerity and vividness as an interpretive artist, and his rare and absolute control, all of which are manifest in the perfect response of the famous orchestra which he now commands.

America has heard many of the great conductors—all of them, perhaps—in the past few seasons, and probably concerning no other one of them has the opinion been so high and so unqualified.

Koussevitzky enjoys a triple fame in the scope of his international interpretations. Some praise him most highly for his readings of the classical masters, which are fresh and engrossing. No one can instil a more vivid and beautiful life in the music of the 18th century. Koussevitzky the romanticist is also irresistible. The fervors of Wagner or Tchaikovsky flame gloriously under his baton. Then there is the third angle to his striking achievements—his flair for the music of the modern schools. No conductor scrutinizes more eagerly and champions more staunchly and understandingly the truly important music of to-day and to-morrow.

Koussevitzky's programme for next Sunday holds brilliant and engrossing promise. It will include Weber's Overture to "Oberon;" Moussorgsky's Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina;" Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee;" Grieg's Suite No. I from the incidental music to "Peer Gynt," and three Wagnerian excerpts—"The Ride of the Valkyries," Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Rienzi."

Those holding tickets for Sunday's concert which they will be unable to use are requested to return them as early as possible that they may become available for others.

---

ception which probably few noticed, was eloquent and brilliant.

Bach's Suite was played delightfully. The overture is stirring and at times grand music. Mr. Koussevitzky did not sentimentalize the lovely and familiar Air. The Gavottes, Bourree and Gigue, except for those who believe in the plenary inspiration of a composer, are hardly worth playing, much less hearing.

The concerts next week will be on Thursday (not Friday) afternoon and Saturday evening. Purcell-Wood, trumpet voluntary; Block, Concerto Grosso for strings and piano obligator; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saens, Symphony, C minor, with organ.

ALLOTS $967,852,000 TO

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, WHO WILL CONDUCT MUSIC LEAGUE CONCERT

Providence Music Lovers Will be Given the Opportunity Sunday Afternoon of Hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra Under the Leadership of Its New Russian Conductor in the E. F. Albee Theatre, When the Last of the Popular Series is Given.—Hundreds Will Take Advantage of the Opportunity to Hear This Famous Organization for 13 1-3 Cents.

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 18 1925

Boston Symphony To Play A Novel Russian Number Here

For the first time in 40 years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has departed from precedent and encored a number.

To Serge Koussevitsky, the briliant new conductor of the orchestra, belongs the credit for having chosen such a well liked number and directed it so skilfully that the insistent applause of the audience could not be quieted until the satisfying encore had been given.

The selection that occasioned this furore was "The Flight of the Bumble Bee", the dainty little scherzo which has already been announced for the Portland program, and which is taken from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." This tiny piece excites an aerial lightness and fleetness from the wood wind which is a marvel of virtuosity, and which is invariably attractive to concert-goers.

This and another Russian number will constitute an exceedingly interesting portion of the local program, while two Wagner selections will also recommend themselves strongly to a Maine audience. These selections are the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" and the Prelude to "The Meistersingers."

BANGOR
ME.
NEWS
MAR 18 1925

RUSSIAN MUSIC ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is credited with having introduced to he western world the compositions f Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korakov, two of the most noted of Russian composers.

The two were little known outide Russia until Koussevitzky bean to feature their music at his oncerts in the various European apitals. Excerpts from the music f these two composers will make p a part of the program for his ortland concert at City Hall, March 5.

The principal monuments of the enius of Moussorgsky are the peras Boris Godunov and Khovanthina.

The prelude to the latter will be layed in Portland. This depicts the oming of dawn over the Red Square n the Kremlin at Moscow, and has s distinct color and mood suggesive of the subject. It is an interestng sample of Russian music. As a ative Russian Koussevitzky is perhaps at his best in the interpretaon of Russian music, and there will be much interest in his interpretation of this prelude and The Flight of the Bumble Bee, a scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, Tsar Salton, which is quite as different in mood from the other selection as may be imagined, and shows he Russian composer in lighter mood.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 1 7 1925

REAL TREAT IN STORE FOR LOCAL MUSIC LOVERS

Koussevitzky Has Risen To World Heights as A Conductor

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has come suddenly into the position of almost world dominance in music which he holds at the present time. Before the war he was known as a conductor only in eastern Europe. He was held in highest esteem by the Russian people because of his efforts to give really fine music to them at prices within the means of all.

In western Europe he was known only as a remarkable virtuoso of the double bass, which was his chosen instrument before he began his career of orchestral leadership.

From 1921 on he conducted a yearly series of concerts in London and Paris, and by virtue of these and his splendid performances as leader at the Grand Opera in Paris he rose in the estimation of France and England as head and shoulders above any other conductor of the day. With this fame to herald him, America was keenly curious about the new conductor of the Boston Symphony when he first came to the United States last Autumn. Expectations have been most eloquently realized in the Boston Symphony concerts this season, and Portland has a rare treat in store when Koussevitzky and his musicians visit this City on the 25th.

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 1 7 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

There is no phase of the conducting of Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symph~~ony Orchestra~~ which is more interesting to concert-goers than his interpretation of modern Russian music. Every musician is at his best in directing the music of his own country, and much stimulus has been lent to the vogue for Russian music in the United States this year through Koussevitzky's presentation of many Russian compositions hitherto unfamiliar on this side of the ocean.

Two of these little known Russian numbers will be features of his program in this City March 25. These will be The Flight of the Bumble Bee from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, Tsar Salten, which is light and dainty and a charming exposition of Russian composition, and the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera Khovantchina, which depicts the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow. This is descriptive Russian music in one of its most interesting phases, and presents sharp contrast to the Bumble Bee number. Koussevitzky is practically responsible for introducing these two selections to the western world.—Adv.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 1 7 1925

Unique Concert by The Boston Orchestra

The program selected by Serge Koussevitsky as the Boston Symphony' fourth of a series of five concerts at the Academy of Music, arnd played before a capacity audience, departed somewhat from the conventional program in its numbers and diversity.

First was Boccherini's new and quaint Symphony in C major, which called for the strings alone. Koussevitzky read it with a full appreciation of its other-day idiom.

"La Peri," by Dukas, a Boeme dance, followed with its wealth of rhythmic intricacies. But by far the most satisfying number was Bach's concerto for violin in B major, for which Albert Spaulding was the soloist. It brings with it a peace and rest sensation, an at-homeness that few of the masters, even, can induce. Spaulding's playing was superb, containing the proper amount of feeling balanced with a fine aloofness.

Completing the program were Raban's "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem, and Strauss' dance of Salome, from "Salome."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAR 1 8 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE SUNDAY

Koussevitzky to Lead Famous Orchestra in Concert at Albee Theatre.

ENDS MUSIC LEAGUE SERIES

Famous Russian Expected to Add to Unqualifiedly High Approval Accorded Him in Other American Cities

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 pieces under its new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will appear at the E. F. ~~Albee Theatre~~ next Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in the last of the notable series of concerts which which the Music League has provided Providence this season.

Interest centred in this concert, is twofold; interest in the famous orchestra and interest in its brilliant leader. For, although the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has so long stood for the very highest achievement in symphonic performance, has had a most distinguished line of conductors, certainly not one of them has drawn more general attention nor had more rapturous praise heaped upon him at all hands. Indeed, it is recorded that the orchestra concerts have attained an additional country-wide prominence through the genius of its new leader.

Naturally, then, interest on the part of Providence lovers of music who have never encountered the personality and musicianship of Koussevitzky is at high pitch. He is easily one of the outstanding figures in the musical world, and as such warrants such interest in any community so fortunate as to be favored with a visit from him. Preceded to America by the most glowing reports from Europe, it will not be denied that Koussevitzky's latest conquest, the conquest of America, has been both sudden and complete. He is talked about the country over, every one of his concert series is subscribed and seats for the Boston Symphony concerts are at a premium.

America expected much of Koussevitzky, but it is not too much to say that he has surpassed those expectations. In Boston, in New York, in every city he has visited, the verdict has been unanimously complimentary to him. There is but one opinion of his personal magnetism, his fresh sincerity and vividness as an interpretive artist, and his rare and absolute control, all of which are manifest in the perfect response of the famous orchestra which he now commands.

America has heard many of the great conductors—all of them, perhaps—in the past few seasons, and probably concerning no other one of them has the opinion been so high and so unqualified.

Koussevitzky enjoys a triple fame in the scope of his international interpretations. Some praise him most highly for his readings of the classical masters, which are fresh and engrossing. No one can instil a more vivid and beautiful life in the music of the 18th century. Koussevitzky the romanticist is also irresistible. The fervors of Wagner or Tchaikovsky flame gloriously under his baton. Then there is the third angle to his striking achievements—his flair for the music of the modern schools. No conductor scrutinizes more eagerly and champions more staunchly and understandingly the truly important music of to-day and to-morrow.

Koussevitzky's programme for next Sunday holds brilliant and engrossing promise. It will include Weber's Overture to "Oberon;" Moussorgsky's Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina;" Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee;" Grieg's Suite No. I from the incidental music to "Peer Gynt," and three Wagnerian excerpts—"The Ride of the Valkyries," Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Rienzi."

Those holding tickets for Sunday's concert which they will be unable to use are requested to return them as early as possible that they may become available for others.

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

MAR 1 8 1

At the Boston Symphony concerts this week the programs will include an overture to the operetta "Isabella and Pantalon," by Roland-Manuel; "L'Elan," Bourchard; "Epiphany," a musical fresco for violoncello and orchestra drawn from an Ethiopian legend, by Caplet, formerly one of the conductors of the Boston opera, and a Dance of Debussy arranged for orchestra by Ravel. Mr. Bedetti will play the solo part in the Caplet number. The symphony will be Tschaikowski's Fifth.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 1 8 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE HEARD HERE FOR 13 1-3 CENT FEE

Rare Treat Offered Next Sunday When Famous Organization Appears at the Albee Theatre in Final Concert of Music League Series.

To be able to hear a musical organization like the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 13 1-3 cents should prove one of the rarest treats ever offered a music-loving public. It is through the Providence Music League that such an event is made possible. The orchestra, under its new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will appear in the E. F. Albee Theatre Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in the final concert of the Music League series.

Interest centred in this concert, is twofold; interest in the famous orchestra and interest in its brilliant leader. For, although the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has so long stood for the very highest achievement in symphonic performance, has had a most distinguished line of conductors, certainly not one of them has drawn more general attention nor had more rapturous praise heaped upon him at all hands. Indeed, it is recorded that the orchestra concerts have attained an additional country-wide prominence through the genius of its new leader.

Naturally, then, interest on the part of Providence lovers of music who have never encountered the personality and musicianship of Koussevitzky is at high pitch. He is easily one of the outstanding figures in the musical world, and as such warrants such interest in any community so fortunate as to be favored with a visit from him. Preceded to America by the most glowing reports from Europe, it will not be denied that Koussevitzky's latest conquest, the conquest of America, has been both sudden and complete. He is talked about the country over, every one of his concert series is subscribed and seats for the Boston Symphony concerts are at a premium.

America expected much of Koussevitzky, but it is not too much to say that he has surpassed those expectations. In Boston, in New York, in every city he has visited, the verdict has been unanimously complimentary to him. There is but one opinion of his personal magnetism, his fresh sincerity and vividness as an interpretive artist, and his rare and absolute control, all of which are manifest in the perfect response of the famous orchestra which he now commands.

America has heard many of the great conductors—all of them, perhaps—in the past few seasons, and probably concerning no other one of them has the opinion been so high and so unqualified.

Koussevitzky enjoys a triple fame in the scope of his international interpretations. Some praise him most highly for his readings of the classical masters, which are fresh and engrossing. No one can instil a more vivid and beautiful life in the music of the 18th century. Koussevitzky the romanticist is also irresistible. The fervors of Wagner or Tchaikovsky flame gloriously under his baton. Then there is the third angle to his striking achievements—his flair for the music of the modern schools. No conductor scrutinizes more eagerly and champions more staunchly and understandingly the truly important music of to-day and to-morrow.

Koussevitzky's programme for next Sunday holds brilliant and engrossing promise. It will include Weber's Overture to "Oberon;" Moussorgsky's Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina;" Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee;" Grieg's Suite No. I from the incidental music to "Peer Gynt," and three Wagnerian excerpts—"The Ride of the Valkyries," Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Rienzi."

Those holding tickets for Sunday's concert which they will be unable to use are requested to return them as early as possible that they may become available for others.

---

ception which probably few noticed, was eloquent and brilliant.

Bach's Suite was played delightfully. The overture is stirring and at times grand music. Mr. Koussevitzky did not sentimentalize the lovely and familiar Air. The Gavottes, Bourree and Gigue, except for those who believe in the plenary inspiration of a composer, are hardly worth playing, much less hearing.

The concerts next week will be on Thursday (not Friday) afternoon and Saturday evening. Purcell-Wood, trumpet voluntary; Block, Concerto Grosso for strings and piano obligator; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saens, Symphony, C minor, with organ.

ALLOTS $867 852 000 TO

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, WHO WILL CONDUCT MUSIC LEAGUE CONCERT

Providence Music Lovers Will be Given the Opportunity Sunday Afternoon of Hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra Under the Leadership of Its New Russian Conductor in the E. F. Albee Theatre, When the Last of the Popular Series is Given.—Hundreds Will Take Advantage of the Opportunity to Hear This Famous Organization for 13 1-3 Cents.

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 1 8 1925

Boston Symphony To Play A Novel Russian Number Here

For the first time in 40 years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has departed from precedent and encored a number.

To Serge Koussevitsky, the brilliant new conductor of the orchestra, belongs the credit for having chosen such a well liked number and directed it so skilfully that the insistent applause of the audience could not be quieted until the satisfying encore had been given.

The selection that occasioned this furore was "The Flight of the Bumble Bee", the dainty little scherzo which has already been announced for the Portland program, and which is taken from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." This tiny piece excites an aerial lightness and fleetness from the wood wind which is a marvel of virtuosity, and which is invariably attractive to concert-goers.

This and another Russian number will constitute an exceedingly interesting portion of the local program, while two Wagner selections will also recommend themselves strongly to a Maine audience. These selections are the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" and the Prelude to "The Meistersingers."

BANGOR
ME.
NEWS

1 8 1925

RUSSIAN MUSIC ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is credited with having introduced to he western world the compositions of Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, two of the most noted of Russian composers.

The two were little known outside Russia until Koussevitzky began to feature their music at his concerts in the various European capitals. Excerpts from the music of these two composers will make up a part of the program for his Portland concert at City Hall, March 5.

The principal monuments of the enius of Moussorgsky are the peras Boris Godunov and Khovanthina.

The prelude to the latter will be played in Portland. This depicts the oming of dawn over the Red Square n the Kremlin at Moscow, and has s distinct color and mood suggesive of the subject. It is an interestng sample of Russian music. As a ative Russian Koussevitzky is peraps at his best in the interpretaon of Russian music, and there will be much interest in his interpretation of this prelude and The Flight of the Bumble Bee, a scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, Tsar Salton, which is quite as different in mood from the other selection as may be imagined, and shows he Russian composer in lighter mood.

620

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

MAR 1 8 1925

Symphony Here Sunday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the Albee Theatre, Sunday afternoon, in the third and last of the series of concerts given this winter under the Providence Music League.

This opportunity which gives a large portion of those who cannot and do not attend the regular Symphony Concerts, a chance to hear this magnificent musical organization, under the direction of one of the most magnetic, and forceful of leaders of large groups of musicians, is one which should be very much appreciated by those who benefit by it, and it is most creditable to the Music League to provide this opportunity in Providence.

The Sunday evening program will include Weber's Overture to "Oberon"; Moussorgsky's Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina;" Rimsky - Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee"; Grieg's Suite No. 1 from the incidental music to "Peer Gynt," and three Wagnerian excerpts—"The Ride of the Valkyries," prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Rienzi."

Those holding tickets for Sunday's concert which they will be unable to use are requested to return them as early as possible that they may become available for others.

Transcript Mar 18

Koussevitzkiana

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the Eighth Symphony of Glazunov at the fourth Boston Orchestra matinée in Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, as if his reputation depended on his interpretation of the music. It did not. Neither did Glazunov's. If the composer had to earn his spurs with this Eighth Symphony, they would be small ones made of tin. It is prolix, dull and heavy. [The New York Sun

For the first time in Boston, Mr. Koussevitzky will set his hand to choral music when he leads the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choir, the Symphony Orchestra and sundry solo-singers through Brahms's German Requiem. The concert befalls at Symphony Hall on Thursday evening, April 16. Dr. Davison has been schooling the chorus for nearly two years past. By his invitation, Mr. Koussevitzky conducts.

Says the Lndon Telegraph: "By all accounts Mr. Koussevitzky has certainly fluttered the dovecots of Boston by the 'modernity' of at least parts of his programs during the period of his office as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wherein he succeeded Pierre Monteux." Yet, scrutinized and compared, his programs seem hardly a whit more "modern" than Mr. Monteux's; while they are far less catholic and ranging. H. T. P.

MAIL

MAR 19 1925

Orchestral Concerts

Five symphony orchestras provided concerts during the week, the resident Philharmonic, the New York Symphony and the State Symphony, with the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra as visitors. Strangely enough, in all this diversified crowd there was not a single "first time" on any of the programs, though there were several numbers that were sufficiently unfamiliar as to be almost novelties.

Ignatz Waghalter closed the State Symphony's season with an only fair-to-middlin' concert, the program including the Leonore Overture No. 3, the Lalo Symphonie Espagnole with Ilse Niemack as soloist, and as a closing piece, Brahms' C Minor Symphony. The State Symphony, contrary to expectations, has announced that it will continue next season, and Mr. Waghalter will again be its conductor.

Mr. Koussevitzky in his two programs, both of which were beautifully played, be it said, gave some curious and interesting music, though none of it was really arresting in content. The Boccherini Symphony, composed in 1775, had a certain interest, though it is a journeyman work of a composer who ground out six in a year, and hence could hardly be expected to grind out six masterpieces. Dukas' "Danced Poem" "La Peri" was also given, and though the orchestration provoked admiration, the melodic content of the piece was not startling.

NEWCOMERS TO BOSTON

Mar. 19— Trans.

Three Parisian Composers Enter the Lists at the Symphony Concerts of the Week—Fresco in Tones—Intoxication of Movement—Orchestral Merriment

THERE ARE new names on the program for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday—Roland-Manuel, Borchard, André Caplet. True, Monsieur Caplet knew his passing Bostonian hour when this town nurtured an opera company wherein he was a conductor. As composer, however, he has flourished only of recent years in Paris; while "Epiphany," the piece in which he will return to these parts, is no older than Christmas of 1923. It was then played at the Colonne Concerts as "Fresco for Violoncello and Orchestra after Ethiopian Legend." The program also quoted a note by the composer as clew to the music:

> Melchior, the black and gold king, made his way in gorgeous procession to Bethlehem. There, greatly affected, he was enraptured, and to honor the King of the World, he bade his little negroes dance.

By these signs, Monsieur Caplet has painted his tonal "Fresco" out of the legends of the three Kings of Orient who did homage to Jesus in the manger at Bethlehem. By report in Paris, the composer has become in middle years a pietist and a mystic. He would draw inspiration from the Gospels, from the legends festooned about them, from the deeds, words and visions of the fathers of Holy Church. Furthermore: he would have his music suggest the line and color, the simple realism and naive emotion, of altar-pieces by primitive painters. Elsewhere than in "Epiphany" he has found voice for these new faiths and impulses. More particularly, that piece falls into three divisions: "The Procession," wherein we hear the progress of the Ethiopian King and his train and know their splendor; "The Ecstasy," wherein the saintly monarch kneels in pious rapture before the Holy Manger; "The Dance"—of the little black boys. The cadenza, which releases "The Ecstasy," is played by the solo-violoncello, improvising, as it were, while a tambourine insistently and monotonously marks the rhythm.

In turn, Monsieur Adolphe Borchard is composer and pianist of the newer Parisian generation. If memory runs true, he once visited the United States as virtuoso—coming and going almost unheeded. The Parisians lend him more attentive ear. Did he not descend upon them loaded with first prizes from the Conservatory—in counterpoint, in fugue, upon the piano? Has he not also written for them a tone-poem, "On the Margins of Shakespeare"; an Ode for Piano, Orchestra and a Singing Voice within its ranks; another tone-poem, "Eseual Herria," for Piano and Orchestra; songs and other trifles? Here in Boston Monsieur Borchard will emerge in a piece named "L'Elan" and bearing upon the fly-leaf these lines from the poet, Henri de Regnier—the translation is free:

> I have seen you surging before me; you were > beautiful.
> The setting sun reddened you, from your head > to your sabots
> With a savage splendor.
> Ardent was your speed and upright your course
> You threw back upon the bloody sky behind you
> Man and horse, the double effort of your trans> port!

As a Parisian program-book further explains: "These verses are but a sort of illustration for the musical text which stays independent of any literary fiction. In "L'Elan" the composer endeavors to express the drunkenness of movement, by that gesture in which man stretches his hands toward the infinite."

From all sides in Paris come good words for Monsieur Roland-Manuel. He is a composer of the youngest generation. For the most part, he has busied himself, thus far, with music for the theater—for the lighter stage, indeed, of operetta and the dance. Two months ago this department described a piece that he had written for the Swedish Ballet; while on Saturday next it will reprint an article from him about Ravel in the eyes and ears of his juniors. (For Monsieur Roland-Manuel is also writer upon music and musicians.) The Sinfonia or Overture which will introduce him to Bostonian ears is prelude to an opéra-bouffe, "Isabelle et Pantalon," originally produced at the Trianon-Lyrique in Paris two seasons ago.

Continued on Page Twelve

Amusements
LOEW'S ORPHEU
Continuous 9.15 A. M. to 10.30 P. M.
METRO-GOLDWYN offers | VAUDEVILLE

NEWCOMERS TO BOSTON

Continued from Page Ten

was there scored for the small orchestra a theater. Even then, however, e foresighted composer had rewrit a it for the full orchestra of the ncert-hall, and in this version it vill be played tomorrow. The "book" of Monsieur Roland-Manuel's operetta assembles the personages of old Italian folk-comedy. Each has a motiv, and these motivs pursue each other through the Sinfonia. When it was played at the Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris, the composer wrote in the program:

> Without departing from the classical plan of the overture, the Sinfonia to "Isabelle et Pantalon" anticipates the situations of the farce. After a lively introduction, the motiv of Doctor Pantalon, the old gallant, is announced by the trumpet. To this motiv is opposed the sentimental motiv of the languorous Isabelle, the impatient captive of a crafty old dotard. These two primordial elements contend with each other according to the traditional rites of the sonata-form; while the short motif of Harlequin, the beloved one, seeks to insinuate itself into the "symphony." It does not succeed until a peroration of majestic character proclaims the triumph of the lovers at last united.

Pieces in Prospect

In Symphony Hall on Sunday evening next, Mr. Carlos Salzedo, the imaginative and innovating harpist, above any other in these days and regions, will play from the ancients a Saraband of Couperin; a Gigue of Corelli; a Solfeggietto of Emanuel Bach; and, with an ensemble of six other harps, a French Suite of the paternal Johann Sebastian. From the moderns, with the same ensemble, he will be heard in transcriptions of Debussy's "Danseuses de Delphes," "La Danse de Puck," "La Cathédrale Engloutie"; and in two pieces of his own. Finally, as pianist, and with his pupil, Miss Miller, as harpist, he will try an experiment which of late has engaged him—chamber-music for harp and piano. Not in his own Sonata for the two instruments, but in a Chorale and Variations by the Parisian, Widor, will they be heard.

For the time, Mr. Arthur Whiting will end his "Expositions of Chamber Music" to the youth of Harvard with a concert next Wednesday evening in Paine Hall. With him will come the Lenox String Quartet of New York to play Ravel's Quartet; Schumann's Quintet in E-flat for Piano and Strings; two movements of a Divertimento of Mozart for the same instruments.

At his concert in Jordan Hall next Wednesday evening Mr. Julius Risman, the violinist, will play three pieces by Ernest Bloch, hitherto unheard in Boston. They are titled in Hebrew, which, being interpreted, signifies "Three Pictures of Religious Life; Contrition; Improvisation; Rejoicing." From the heart as well as the mind the composer writes such music.

Trans Mar 19

een

Pleasures at Hand

Skriabin's "Prometheus" and the Polovtsian Dances, with Chorus, in Near Prospect

FOR THE Symphony Concerts of next week, on Friday afternoon, March 27, and Saturday evening, March 28, Mr. Koussevitzky proposes a program to waken anticipation. It contains "Prometheus: The Poem of Fire"—the piece with which Skriabin believed he had sounded and capped his symphonic music. Seldom is it heard anywhere; never before has it been announced for performance in Boston; while Skriabin sounds at Mr. Koussevitzky's will. On the list also stand the Polovtsian Dances out of Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." Alike from the Diaghylev Ballet and the Symphony Orchestra, they have hitherto been heard in Boston without the interspersed choruses. Next week at Symphony Hall, The Cecilia will sing them. Only dancers—the more the pity—will be lacking. The Cecilia will also join the orchestra through sundry pages of "Prometheus," and Mr. Alexander Steinert will take a passing place in the band to play the piano part. A Concerto Grosso of Handel—number Five in D major—will begin the concerts, with solo-parts for the leaders of the string choir. Into the midst of all this promise, Mr. Koussevitzky strangely thrusts a repetition of Monsieur Rabaud's tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne." Why this tepid tedium of sugary Gounod and watery Wagner should be imposed on the public twice within a few weeks is past finding out. H. T. P.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS
MAR 1 9 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Interest in the approaching concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this City mounts with the passing of the days, and indications are that attendance at this event will be phenomenally large. Increasing numbers of reservations from out-of-town will take up large portions of City Hall Auditorium, where the concert is to be held. Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, will lead the Boston Symphony in Portland. Koussevitzky is offering a program that shows his remarkable orchestra at its best, and that runs the gamut

---

BANGOR
ME.
COMMERCIAL
MAR 1 9 1925

Koussevitzky Responsible For Introducing Famous Composers to America

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is credited with having introduced to the western world the compositions of Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, two of the most noted of Russian composers.

The two were little known outside Russia until Koussevitsky began to feature their music at his concerts in the various European capitals. Excerpts frfom the music of these two composers will make up a part of the program for his Portland concert at City Hall March 25.

The principal monuments of the genius of Moussorgsky are the operas Boris Godunov and Khovantchina.

The prelude to the latter will be played in Portland. This depicts the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow, and has its distinct color and mood suggestive of the subject. It is an interesting sample of Russian music. As a native Russian Koussevitsky is perhaps at his best in the interpretation of Russian music, and there will be much interest in his interpretation of this prelude and The Flight of the Bumble Bee, a scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, Tsar Saltan, which is quite as different in mood from the other selection as may be imagined, and shows the Russian composer in lighter mood.

Herald

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening announces the performance of some unfamiliar works. The "Sinfonia" from Roland Manuel's opera-bouffe "Isabelle and Pantalon" is really an overture, for in going back to the old Italian comedy the composer remembered that the word "symphony" was applied to any instrumental movement in lyric composition. Adolphe Borchard's symphonic poem, "L'Elan," was suggested by some lines of Henri de Regnier. The "Dance" of Debussy, written for the piano, was orchestrated with a "Sarabande" by Ravel for one of Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris. Andre Caplet is a name well known here, for he conducted performances at the Boston Opera House in the years 1910-14 and disported himself in other ways. He has busied himself in Paris as conductor and composer. As a composer he has written much sacred music. His "Epiphany" for the violoncello and orchestra (the excellent Mr. Bedetti will be the soloist) was inspired—if "inspired" will turn out to be the fitting word—by an Ethiopian legend in which Melchior, one of the three royal wise men at the cradle in Bethlehem, makes his little negroes dance to amuse the Divine Child. The piece is in three movements; the procession, the ecstasy (of Melchior seeing the Infant Jesus) and the dance. The "ecstasy" is in the form of a cadenza. Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony is also included. It has not been played at a subscription concert of this orchestra in Boston since December, 1910.

The program of the concerts of next week, as now arranged, will comprise a Concerto Grosso by Locatelli, Scriabin's "Prometheus," the dances with chorus from Barodin's "Prince Igor" and Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession," which was performed earlier in the season. The Cecilia Society will furnish the singers.

---

made his way in gorgeous procession to Bethlehem. There, greatly affected, he was enraptured, and to honor the King of the world, he bade his little Negroes dance." A suggestive programme, indeed, yet all that Mr. Caplet has achieved is labored contrivance. There is fine command of musical means; the part for the solo violoncello, admirably played yesterday by Jean Bedetti, is expertly written. But save in the opening measures and in the ingenious form of the middle section—a lengthy cadenza for the sole instrument accompanied by a tambourine and a sustained tone in the double basses—the music seems devoid of true intensiveness. Its entire rformance was, however, excellent, d a triumph for Mr. Bedetti, who was plauded loud and long.

COURIER

MAR 19 1

day, March

GEORGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Noted Boston Symphony Conductor To Be In Portland Concert.

George Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is credited with having introduced to the western world the compositions of Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, two of the most noted of Russian composers.

The two were little known outside Russia until Koussevitsky began to feature their music at his concerts in the various European capitals. Excerpts from the music of these two composers will make up a part of the program for his Portland concert at City Hall, March 25.

The principal monuments of the genius of Moussorgsky are the operas Boris Godunov and Khovantchina.

The prelude to the latter will be played in Portland. This depicts the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow, and has its distinct color and mood suggestive of the subject. It is an interesting sample of Russian music. As a native Russian Koussevitsky is perhaps at his best in the interpretation of Russian music, and there will be much interest in his interpretation of this prelude and The Flight of the Bumble Bee, a scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera Tsar Saltan, which is quite as different in mood from the other selection as may be imagined, and shows the Russian composer in lighter mood.

620

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

MAR 18 1925

Symphony Here Sunday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the Albee Theatre, Sunday afternoon, in the third and last of the series of concerts given this winter under the Providence Music League.

This opportunity which gives a large portion of those who cannot and do not attend the regular Symphony Concerts, a chance to hear this magnificent musical organization, under the direction of one of the most magnetic, and forceful of leaders of large groups of musicians, is one which should be very much appreciated by those who benefit by it, and it is most creditable to the Music League to provide this opportunity in Providence.

The Sunday evening program will include Weber's Overture to "Oberon"; Moussorgsky's Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina;" Rimsky - Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee"; Grieg's Suite No. 1 from the incidental music to "Peer Gynt," and three Wagnerian excerpts—"The Ride of the Valkyries," prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Rienzi."

Those holding tickets for Sunday's concert which they will be unable to use are requested to return them as early as possible that they may become available for others.

Koussevitzkiana

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the Eighth Symphony of Glazunov at the fourth Boston Orchestra matinée in Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, as if his reputation depended on his interpretation of the music. It did not. Neither did Glazunov's. If the composer had to earn his spurs with this Eighth Symphony, they would be small ones made of tin. It is prolix, dull and heavy. [The New York Sun

For the first time in Boston, Mr. Koussevitzky will set his hand to choral music when he leads the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choir, the Symphony Orchestra and sundry solo-singers through Brahms's German Requiem. The concert befalls at Symphony Hall on Thursday evening, April 16. Dr. Davison has been schooling the chorus for nearly two years past. By his invitation, Mr. Koussevitzky conducts.

Says the Lndon Telegraph: "By all accounts Mr. Koussevitzky has certainly fluttered the dovecots of Boston by the 'modernity' of at least parts of his programs during the period of his office as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wherein he succeeded Pierre Monteux." Yet, scrutinized and compared, his programs seem hardly a whit more "modern" than Mr. Monteux's; while they are far less catholic and ranging. H. T. P.

MAIL

MAR 19 1925

Orchestral Concerts

Five symphony orchestras provided concerts during the week, the resident Philharmonic, the New York Symphony and the State Symphony, with the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra as visitors. Strangely enough, in all this diversified crowd there was not a single "first time" on any of the programs, though there were several numbers that were sufficiently unfamiliar as to be almost novelties.

Ignatz Waghalter closed the State Symphony's season with an only fair-to-middlin' concert, the program including the Leonore Overture No. 3, the Lalo Symphonie Espagnole with Ilse Niemack as soloist, and as a closing piece, Brahms' C Minor Symphony. The State Symphony, contrary to expectations, has announced that it will continue next season, and Mr. Waghalter will again be its conductor.

Mr. Koussevitzky in his two programs, both of which were beautifully played, be it said, gave some curious and interesting music, though none of it was really arresting in content. The Boccherini Symphony, composed in 1775, had a certain interest, though it is a journeyman work of a composer who ground out six in a year, and hence could hardly be expected to grind out six masterpieces. Dukas "Danced Poem" "La Peri" was also given, and though the orchestration provoked admiration, the melodic content of the piece was not startling.

NEWCOMERS TO BOSTON

Mar. 19 — Trans.

Three Parisian Composers Enter the Lists at the Symphony Concerts of the Week—Fresco in Tones—Intoxication of Movement—Orchestral Merriment

THERE ARE new names on the program for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday—Roland-Manuel, Borchard, André Caplet. True, Monsieur Caplet knew his passing Bostonian hour when this town nurtured an opera company wherein he was a conductor. As composer, however, he has flourished only of recent years in Paris; while "Epiphany," the piece in which he will return to these parts, is no older than Christmas of 1923. It was then played at the Colonne Concerts as "Fresco for Violoncello and Orchestra after Ethiopian Legend." The program also quoted a note by the composer as clew to the music:

> Melchior, the black and gold king, made his way in gorgeous procession to Bethlehem. There, greatly affected, he was enraptured, and to honor the King of the World, he bade his little negroes dance.

By these signs, Monsieur Caplet has painted his tonal "Fresco" out of the legends of the three Kings of Orient who did homage to Jesus in the manger at Bethlehem. By report in Paris, the composer has become in middle years a pietist and a mystic. He would draw inspiration from the Gospels, from the legends festooned about them, from the deeds, words and visions of the fathers of Holy Church. Furthermore: he would have his music suggest the line and color, the simple realism and naive emotion, of altar-pieces by primitive painters. Elsewhere than in "Epiphany" he has found voice for these new faiths and impulses. More particularly, that piece falls into three divisions: "The Procession," wherein we hear the progress of the Ethiopian King and his train and know their splendor; "The Ecstasy," wherein the saintly monarch kneels in pious rapture before the Holy Manger; "The Dance"—of the little black boys. The cadenza, which releases "The Ecstasy," is played by the solo-violoncello, improvising, as it were, while a tambourine insistently and monotonously marks the rhythm.

In turn, Monsieur Adolphe Borchard is composer and pianist of the newer Parisian generation. If memory runs true, he once visited the United States as virtuoso—coming and going almost unheeded. The Parisians lend him more attentive ear. Did he not descend upon them loaded with first prizes from the Conservatory—in counterpoint, in fugue, upon the piano? Has he not also written for them a tone-poem, "On the Margins of Shakespeare"; an Ode for Piano, Orchestra and a Singing Voice within its ranks; another tone-poem, "Eseual Herria," for Piano and Orchestra; songs and other trifles? Here in Boston Monsieur Borchard will emerge in a piece named "L'Elan" and bearing upon the fly-leaf these lines from the poet, Henri de Regnier—the translation is free:

> I have seen you surging before me; you were beautiful.
> The setting sun reddened you, from your head to your sabots
> With a savage splendor.
> Ardent was your speed and upright your course
> You threw back upon the bloody sky behind you
> Man and horse, the double effort of your transport!

As a Parisian program-book further explains: "These verses are but a sort of illustration for the musical text which stays independent of any literary fiction. In "L'Elan" the composer endeavors to express the drunkenness of movement, by that gesture in which man stretches his hands toward the infinite."

From all sides in Paris come good words for Monsieur Roland-Manuel. He is a composer of the youngest generation. For the most part, he has busied himself, thus far, with music for the theater—for the lighter stage, indeed, of operetta and the dance. Two months ago this department described a piece that he had written for the Swedish Ballet; while on Saturday next it will reprint an article from him about Ravel in the eyes and ears of his juniors (For Monsieur Roland-Manuel is also writer upon music and musicians.) The Sinfonia or Overture which will introduce him to Bostonian ears is prelude to an opéra-bouffe, "Isabelle et Pantalon," originally produced at the Trianon-Lyrique in Paris two seasons ago.

Continued on Page Twelve

Amusements

LOEW'S ORPHEU
Continuous 9.15 A. M. to 10.30 P. M.
METRO-GOLDWYN offers | VAUDEVILLE

NEWCOMERS TO BOSTON

Continued from Page Ten

was there scored for the small orchestra a theater. Even then, however, e foresighted composer had rewrit n it for the full orchestra of the ncert-hall, and in this version it vill be played tomorrow. The "book" of Monsieur Roland-Manuel's operetta assembles the personages of old Italian folk-comedy. Each has a motiv, and these motivs pursue each other through the Sinfonia. When it was played at the Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris, the composer wrote in the program:

> Without departing from the classical plan of the overture, the Sinfonia to "Isabelle et Pantalon" anticipates the situations of the farce. After a lively introduction, the motiv of Doctor Pantalon, the old gallant, is announced by the trumpet. To this motiv is opposed the sentimental motiv of the languorous Isabelle, the impatient captive of a crafty old dotard. These two primordial elements contend with each other according to the traditional rites of the sonata-form; while the short motif of Harlequin, the beloved one, seeks to insinuate itself into the "symphony." It does not succeed until a peroration of majestic character proclaims the triumph of the lovers at last united.

Pieces in Prospect

In Symphony Hall on Sunday evening next, Mr. Carlos Salzedo, the imaginative and innovating harpist, above any other in these days and regions, will play from the ancients a Saraband of Couperin; a Gigue of Corelli; a Solfeggietto of Emanuel Bach; and, with an ensemble of six other harps, a French Suite of the paternal Johann Sebastian. From the moderns, with the same ensemble, he will be heard in transcriptions of Debussy's "Danseuses de Delphes," "La Danse de Puck," "La Cathédrale Engloutie"; and in two pieces of his own. Finally, as pianist, and with his pupil, Miss Miller, as harpist, he will try an experiment which of late has engaged him—chamber-music for harp and piano. Not in his own Sonata for the two instruments, but in a Chorale and Variations by the Parisian, Widor, will they be heard.

For the time, Mr. Arthur Whiting will end his "Expositions of Chamber Music" to the youth of Harvard with a concert next Wednesday evening in Paine Hall. With him will come the Lenox String Quartet of New York to play Ravel's Quartet; Schumann's Quintet in E-flat for Piano and Strings; two movements of a Divertimento of Mozart for the same instruments.

At his concert in Jordan Hall next Wednesday evening Mr. Julius Risman, the violinist, will play three pieces by Ernest Bloch, hitherto unheard in Boston. They are titled in Hebrew, which, being interpreted, signifies "Three Pictures of Religious Life; Contrition; Improvisation Rejoicing." From the heart as well as the mind the composer writes such music.

Trans Mar 19

een

Pleasures at Hand

Skriabin's "Prometheus" and the Polovtsian Dances, with Chorus, in Near Prospect

FOR THE Symphony Concerts of next week, on Friday afternoon, March 27, and Saturday evening, March 28, Mr. Koussevitzky proposes a program to waken anticipation. It contains "Prometheus: The Poem of Fire"—the piece with which Skriabin believed he had sounded and capped his symphonic music. Seldom is it heard anywhere; never before has it been announced for performance in Boston; while Skriabin sounds at Mr. Koussevitzky's will. On the list also stand the Polovtsian Dances out of Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." Alike from the Diaghylev Ballet and the Symphony Orchestra, they have hitherto been heard in Boston without the interspersed choruses. Next week at Symphony Hall, The Cecilia will sing them. Only dancers—the more the pity—will be lacking. The Cecilia will also join the orchestra through sundry pages of "Prometheus," and Mr. Alexander Steinert will take a passing place in the band to play the piano part. A Concerto Grosso of Handel—number Five in D major—will begin the concerts, with solo-parts for the leaders of the string choir. Into the midst of all this promise. Mr. Koussevitzky strangely thrusts a repetition of Monsieur Rabaud's tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne." Why this tepid tedium of sugary Gounod and watery Wagner should be imposed on the public twice within a few weeks is past finding out. H. T. P.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 19 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Interest in the approaching concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this City mounts with the passing of the days, and indications are that attendance at this event will be phenomenally large. Increasing numbers of reservations from out-of-town will take up large portions of City Hall Auditorium, where the concert is to be held. Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, will lead the Boston Symphony in Portland. Koussevitzky is offering a program that shows his remarkable orchestra at its best, and that runs the gamut

---

BANGOR
ME.
COMMERCIAL

MAR 19 1925

Koussevitzky Responsible For Introducing Famous Composers to America

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is credited with having introduced to the western world the compositions of Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, two of the most noted of Russian composers.

The two were little known outside Russia until Koussevitsky began to feature their music at his concerts in the various European capitals. Excerpts frfom the music of these two composers will make up a part of the program for his Portland concert at City Hall March 25.

The principal monuments of the genius of Moussorgsky are the operas Boris Godunov and Khovantchina.

The prelude to the latter will be played in Portland. This depicts the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow, and has its distinct color and mood suggestive of the subject. It is an interesting sample of Russian music. As a native Russian Koussevitsky is perhaps at his best in the interpretation of Russian music, and there will be much interest in his interpretation of this prelude and The Flight of the Bumble Bee, a scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, Tsar Saltan, which is quite as different in mood from the other selection as may be imagined, and shows the Russian composer in lighter mood.

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening announces the performance of some unfamiliar works. The "Sinfonia" from Roland Manuel's opera-bouffe "Isabelle and Pantalon" is really an overture, for in going back to the old Italian comedy the composer remembered that the word "symphony" was applied to any instrumental movement in lyric composition. Adolphe Borchard's symphonic poem, "L'Elan," was suggested by some lines of Henri de Regnier. The 'Dance' of Debussy, written for the piano, was orchestrated with a "Sarabande" by Ravel for one of Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris. Andre Caplet is a name well known here, for he conducted performances at the Boston Opera House in the years 1910-14 and disported himself in other ways. He has busied himself in Paris as conductor and composer. As a composer he has written much sacred music. His "Epiphany" for the violoncello and orchestra (the excellent Mr. Bedetti will be the soloist) was inspired—if "inspired" will turn out to be the fitting word—by an Ethiopian legend in which Melchior, one of the three royal wise men at the cradle in Bethlehem, makes his little negroes dance to amuse the Divine Child. The piece is in three movements; the procession, the ecstasy (of Melchior seeing the Infant Jesus) and the dance. The "ecstasy" is in the form of a cadenza. Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony is also included. It has not been played at a subscription concert of this orchestra in Boston since December, 1910.

The program of the concerts of next week, as now arranged, will comprise a Concerto Grosso by Locatelli, Scriabin's "Prometheus," the dances with chorus from Barodin's "Prince Igor" and Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession," which was performed earlier in the season. The Cecilia Society will furnish the singers.

---

made his way in gorgeous procession to Bethlehem. There, greatly affected, he was enraptured, and to honor the King of the world, he bade his little Negroes dance." A suggestive programme, indeed, yet all that Mr. Caplet has achieved is labored contrivance. There is fine command of musical means; the part for the solo violoncello, admirably played yesterday by Jean Bedetti, is expertly written. But save in the opening measures and in the ingenious form of the middle section—a lengthy cadenza for the sole instrument accompanied by a tambourine and a sustained tone in the double basses—the music seems devoid of true intensiveness. Its entire rformance was, however, excellent, d a triumph for Mr. Bedetti, who was plauded loud and long.

COURIER

MAR

day, March

GEORGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Noted Boston Symphony Conductor To Be In Portland Concert.

George Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is credited with having introduced to the western world the compositions of Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, two of the most noted of Russian composers.

The two were little known outside Russia until Koussevitsky began to feature their music at his concerts in the various European capitals. Excerpts from the music of these two composers will make up a part of the program for his Portland concert at City Hall, March 25.

The principal monuments of the genius of Moussorgsky are the operas Boris Godunov and Khovantchina.

The prelude to the latter will be played in Portland. This depicts the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow, and has its distinct color and mood suggestive of the subject. It is an interesting sample of Russian music. As a native Russian Koussevitsky is perhaps at his best in the interpretation of Russian music, and there will be much interest in his interpretation of this prelude and The Flight of the Bumble Bee, a scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, Tsar Saltan, which is quite as different in mood from the other selection as may be imagined, and shows the Russian composer in lighter mood.

63

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 19 1925

Out-of-Town Music Clubs Will Attend Symphony Concert

The program presented by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at City Hall next Wednesday will prove of tremendous interest to music students. That they appreciate the fact is indicated by the large number of seats that have been reserved by music clubs and students of music in outlying cities and towns who will come in delegations of considerable size to attend the concert.

They will see Koussevitzky in a variety of moods, for his numbers will include the romantic, the Wagnerian, and the modern with a selection which more nearly approaches classic vein as an added interesting feature. With modern Russian composers. Directed by one in the music world today it is interesting to note that the program contains two selections by modern Russion composers. Directed by one of the greatest conductors in the world, and played by one of the greatest orchestras in the world these will be a revelation to the concert-goer.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
MAR 20 1925

Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes will have as her house guests during their stay in Providence, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, and Mrs. Koussevitzky. The orchestra is to give the program in the third and last concert at the Albee Theatre, Sunday afternoon, under the auspices of the Providence Music League.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAR 20 1925

Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes will have as her week-end guests Mr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Koussevitzky is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 20 1925

Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes will have as her week-end guests Mr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Koussevitzky is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TIMES
[illegible]
MAR 20 1925

WOMAN MUSICIAN GRANTED EXTENSION OF STAY IN AMERICA

BOSTON, March 20.—While facing compulsory departure from this country after a six months' stay, Mme. Lydia Savitzkaya, second harpist in the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the ~~only woman~~ member of that organization, has obtained a special ruling from the immigration authorities by which she may remain here six months more.

The ruling, issued from the Department of Labor at Washington, comes as a great relief to Mme. Savitzkaya, who had been worried over her future, she having expended considerable time during the last two months trying to convince the immigration authorities, both here and in Washington, of the merits of her plea for a further extension of time.

Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who summoned Mme. Savitzkaya from Paris at the opening of the concert season, also was keenly interested in the outcome. Under the terms of the "visitor's" permit, under which the harpist was allowed to enter this country for a six months' stay, she was supposed to leave the United States by April 16. This would have precluded her remaining even to the end of the present concert season. The new ruling allows her to stay until Oct. 16.

A Russian of aristocratic lineage, Mme. Savitzkaya was admitted to this country last October as a "non-alien," the quota of Russia already having been filled. But the permit and her vise were granted previously in Paris only after she had satisfied the American embassy officials of her high character and integrity, and had produced evidence of her contract with Mr. Koussevitzky.

Having glimpsed America and learned of its opportunities for furthering her career, Mme. Savitzkaya is desirous of remaining for some time longer and hopes to be able to gain a still further extension of the time now allotted her by the immigration authorities. Her husband, formerly a captain of artillery in the Russian army and subsequently adjutant military attache at the Russian embassy in Holland, to which country he escaped from captivity in Germany during the war, is now in Paris, but he hopes to be able to join her here as soon as a new quota is to be admitted.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 21 1925

SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE TO-MORROW

Last of Providence Music League Concerts to Be Given in Albee Theatre.

PERFORMANCE AT 3 O'CLOCK

Boston Orchestra of 104 Pieces Under Direction of Serge Koussevitzky Will Present Varied Programme

To-morrow afternoon at 3 o'clock in the E. F. Albee Theatre, the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians will give the final concert under the auspices of the Providence Music League.

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of this ~~world-famous~~ orchestra, who is generally considered one of the greatest leaders, has arranged a programme of beauty and direct appeal for the occasion. It will open with Weber's Overture to "Oberon," fairy music abounding with melody and with a strikingly brilliant close.

Two Russian numbers which the Russian conductor has virtually introduced to America will be Moussorgsky's Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," and Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee." The latter piece in particular was so delightful in its humorous suggestion of the buzzing bee that it has caused the breaking of the traditional rule of no encores at the Symphony concerts.

Music more familiar will be the suite from Grieg's Incidental Music to "Peer Gynt," including Morning Mood, Aase's Death, Anitra's Dance, and In the Troll King's Grotto. The programme will conclude with three notable excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner—"The Ride of the Valkyries," in which the warrior maidens are described musically as they gallop through the heavens on their winged horses, each with a slain hero across her saddle. There will also be the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Rienzi."

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
MAR 20 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

"Koussevitzky vitalizes everything he touches."

In that fashion does Penfield Roberts of the Boston Globe speak of the world famous conductor who is to visit this City next week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And Portland people will have admirable opportunity to test the truth of this statement in next week's concert, which features selections in a variety of moods, and touches the classic, the romantic and the modern. It has been said of Koussevitzky that he infuses with emotion even selections that under other conductors have seemed dull and lacking in vitality, while to hear him in selections glowing with life and color is a vibrant emotional experience.—Advertisement.

VARIED PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Tchaikovsky's Fifth and French Novelties

Globe Mar 21

Mr Koussevitzky chose a varied program for this week's Symphony concerts. Before the intermission yesterday various French novelties were played, only to be eclipsed later by a superb performance of the finest of Tchaikovsky's symphonies, his Fifth, in E minor. The listener was almost persuaded against his cooler judgment that Tchaikovsky was a composer of the highest order. But a really superb performance such as this can glorify music far more vulgar than Tchaikovsky's symphonies.

The French novelties were of various genres. The first number, the overture to Roland-Manuel's opera buffa "Isabel and Pantalon," is light music written with conscious cleverness, in a rather labored mixture of the archaic and the ultra modern idioms. The latest Parisian fashion in music seems to be the blending of the 20th and 17th centuries. M Roland-Manuel calls his overture a "sinfonia," thus mystifying everyone unaware of the historic fact that 150 years ago overtures were always so entitled. His music uses too much percussion and has too little thematic originality to be first-rate light music.

The next number, played for the first time anywhere yesterday, but composed in 1923 and presumably refused by Paris orchestras, was "L'Elan" by Adolphe Borchard, a pianist and composer now living in Paris. The piece has a motto, verses by Henri de Regnier. M Borchard, according to a note in the programs yesterday, has endeavored to express "the intoxication of movement," "the gesture of one stretching hands toward the infinite.

This music is quite as noisy and almost as dissonant as the louder portions of Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring." Listening as sympathetically as possible, all that was discoverable in it was an unholy racket about nothing. This may be the "music of the future," but one could detect in it nothing but inane, inept themes toyed with in conventionally aimless succession. The only emotional impression was sheer boredom.

As to the reasons why a hearer thrilled by Stravinsky and Honegger and not opposed to modern music on principle or prejudice should get so negative a reaction from M Borchard's piece, possibly future generations may see them as clearly as we see why people who liked Wagner's music did not always like that of his followers.

Ravel's orchestral version of Debussy's piano piece "Danse," published in 1890 in its original form, was made for Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris. Revel has changed the character of the music, made it harder, more shallow. But to orchestrate Debussy's piano works seems more difficult and quite as needless as to orchestrate those of Chopin.

"Epiphanie" a "Fresco" for violoncello and orchestra by Andre Caplet, who used to be one of the conductors of the Boston Opera, gave Jean Bedetti a chance to display his notable abilities as soloist. In this piece, the composer's posing for the gallery, for the art-struck women and idle men whose fickle adulation is not worth the winning, is irritating. The title, the program note ascribed to "An Ethiopian Legend," the freakish orchestration, all annoy. Who has ever, or will ever again, express "ecstacy" by a very long cadenza for solo cello accompanied only by a pedal point in the double basses and a monotonously ticking tambourine, as here?

Tchaikovsky's familiar symphony in a remarkably brilliant performance seemed both sincere and noble by comparison with what had gone before. But it does not seem so beside Beethoven and Wagner. Mr Koussevitzky labored not wholly with success to do justice to this modern French miscellany. But one could not help wondering whether he were not at this concert redeeming in a bunch all the promises he in moments of expansiveness made his Paris acquaintances about playing their works here.

P. R.

PAEAN FOR SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

Post Mar 21

Tribute to Genius of Koussevitzky Paid by Hearers

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Not since Mr. Koussevitzky's first appearance here has a Friday afternoon audience at the Symphony Concerts bestowed upon him and upon the orchestra applause more hearty than that which yesterday greeted the performance of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

And this ovation, like the performance itself exciting to hear, was tribute richly deserved.

RUSSIA'S MUSICAL CROWN

Last autumn at the Pension Fund concert, Mr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra through this symphony, and it was a matter of general agreement that not in many a year, if ever before, had the piece come to such eloquent performance in this city. Yesterday even that performance was surpassed in one or another detail: here and there instrumental strokes were sharpened and intensified, melodies were sung with even greater warmth and passion. And again the final climax was irresistible, overwhelming.

Hearing this Symphony yesterday it was easy to believe it not only Tchaikovsky's masterpiece but the crown of Russian instrumental music. Yet at the hands of other conductors the piece has seemed distinctly less impressive. Here, then, would appear to be proof positive of Mr. Koussevitzky's genius. Only to the greatest conductors is it given so to transfigure a composition that the listener may not be quite sure where the composer's achievement ends and the conductor's begins. Yesterday, indeed, Tchaikovsky, Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were as one; for the time his Symphony was music of supreme power and eloquence; and that was sufficient.

First American Performance

Contrast, not unity, marks this programme of the 19th pair of concerts; contrast that is not without a touch of irony since Tchaikovsky is not greatly esteemed as composer by the Parisians, and it is from the hands of modern or contemporary Frenchmen that the remaining pieces all are sprung.

To head the list comes a "Sinfonia," from Roland-Manuel's comic opera "Isabelle et Pantalon," the first American performance of the piece and the first appearance of its composer's name upon the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Plainly Roland-Manuel has both skill and talent. His "Sinfonia" breathes the spirit of comedy; it epitomizes the spirit of the sprightly opera from which it is dra It is fresh, assurant and well ma and it expresses individuality with straining after effect.

To this diverting composition succee a symphonic poem, "L'Tlan," Adolphe Borchard, hitherto unpe formed. Borchard, who has been hear in Boston as pianist (in 1910), but who virtually unknown here as compose has in this "Elan" written music considerable originality and force. Th piece, which begins in the depths of t orchestra against clanging bells, ca tures the attention at the outset, a holds it till the final chord. A pity th the composer might no. hear a perform ance that must have been all-reveali of his intention and that yesterday w enthusiastically received.

Andre Caplet's Contribution

With light interlude of Debussy early piano-piece "Danse," in Ravel ingenious orchestration, also new Boston, there followed yet another no elty, and this time one which yesterda proved distinctly disappointing. Fro the hand of Andre Caplet, one-time co ductor of the Boston Opera Compan comes this music, by full tit "Epiphanie," Fresco for Violoncello Orchestra (after an Ethiopian Lege

Mr. Caplet would have give expressi to this argument, printed in the scor "Melchior, the black and gold kin

---

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 21 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had ~~a succession~~ of Conductors, George Henschel, Wilhelm Hericke, Arthur Mikusch, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteaux followed by Serge Koussevitsky. Well, at the present time Russians are the fashion. They sing differently, act differently, write differently, compose differently and shortly we will see if they conduct differently. People who attend the Boston Symphony Concert at City Hall, March 25th, will see in Serge Koussevitsky, the most striking figure ~~and dominant~~ personality among orchestral conductors with "a volcanic temperament under marvelous control." In an article by Winthrop P. Tryon he says: "Kousseevitsy is another Nikisch with a stout red fist, instead of a white hand. And when he undoubles and opens out that left fist of his, he shows such spread of fingers as never before signaled diminuendo to violins and such crook of index as never before summoned sign from flute. That is saying nothing of his right hand and its vast range of movements, from the merest shiver to the complete triangular swing of down, out and up. He is another Toscanini, in that he knows his scores by heart, backward and forward. And yet, he shows the good judgment to keep the book before him on the desk and to turn the pages as studiously as in rehearsal. He is a conservative musician, in that he tends to moderate tempi. Which means that he is a conscientious one, making every element in the composer's structure clear to the listener."

Transcript
Mar 21

Orchestral

FOR the Symphony Concerts of next week, Mr. Koussevitzky proposes a program to waken anticipation. It contains "Prometheus: The Poem of Fire"—the piece with which Skriabin believed he had rounded and capped his symphonic music. Seldom is it heard anywhere; never before has it been announced for performance in Boston; while Skriabin sounds at Mr. Koussevitzky's will. On the list also stand the Polovtsian Dances out of Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." Alike from the Diaghylev Ballet and the Symphony Orchestra, they have hitherto been heard in Boston without the interspersed choruses. Next week at Symphony Hall, The Cecilia will sing them. Only dancers—the more the pity—will be lacking. The Cecilia will also join the orchestra through a few pages of "Prometheus," and Mr. Alexander Steinert will take a passing place in the band to play the piano-part. A Concerto Grosso of Handel—Number Five in D major—will begin the concerts, with solo-parts for the leaders of the string choir. Into the midst of all this promise, Mr. Koussevitzky strangely thrusts a repetition of Monsieur Rabaud's tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne."

New Music Played

[illegible] Mar 21

French Novelties Heard at Symphony Concerts

Four of the five numbers on the Symphony program played yesterday were new to Boston, all four of them being French.

S. Koussevitzky

Adolphe Borchard's symphonic poem, "Ardor," had its first performance anywhere. Serge Koussevitzky conducted a brilliant performance of it and the piece was warmly applauded. Roland-Manuel's "Isabelle and Pantalon," comedy overture, half French and half Italian, and Andre Caplet's "Epiphanie," an exotic, long-winded tone picture with a 'cello solo peformed in masterly style by Jean Bedetti, were heard yesterday for the first time in this country. Ravel's arrangement of Debussy's "Danse," a delightful trifle, took its place for the first time on a Symphony program.

Mr. Koussevitzky also gave an intensely poetic and dramatic reading of Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony, which has not been played at Symphony concerts for many years.

American
Mar 21

The twentieth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 27 and 28, in Symphony Hall with two choral numbers, the Cecilia Society assisting as a feature of the program. These numbers will be the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera "Prince Igor," and Scriabin's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," which is to have its first Boston performance.

63

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 1 9 1925

Out-of-Town Music Clubs Will Attend Symphony Concert

The program presented by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at City Hall next Wednesday will prove of tremendous interest to music students. That they appreciate the fact is indicated by the large number of seats that have been reserved by music clubs and students of music in outlying cities and towns who will come in delegations of considerable size to attend the concert.

They will see Koussevitzky in a variety of moods, for his numbers will include the romantic, the Wagnerian, and the modern with a selection which more nearly approaches classic vein as an added interesting feature. With modern Russian composers. Directed by one in the music world today it is interesting to note that the program contains two selections by modern Russion composers. Directed by one of the greatest conductors in the world, and played by one of the greatest orchestras in the world these will be a revelation to the concert-goer.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
MAR 2 0 1925

Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes will have as her house guests during their stay in Providence, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, and Mrs. Koussevitsky. The orchestra is to give the program in the third and last concert at the Albee Theatre, Sunday afternoon, under the auspices of the Providence Music League.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAR 2 0 1925

Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes will have as her week-end guests Mr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Koussevitzky is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 2 0 1925

TIMES
MAR 2 0 1925

Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes will have as her week-end guests Mr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Koussevitzky is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WOMAN MUSICIAN GRANTED EXTENSION OF STAY IN AMERICA

BOSTON, March 20.—While facing compulsory departure from this country after a six months' stay, Mme. Lydia Savitzkaya, second harpist in the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the only woman member of that organization, has obtained a special ruling from the immigration authorities by which she may remain here six months more.

The ruling, issued from the Department of Labor at Washington, comes as a great relief to Mme. Savitzkaya, who had been worried over her future, she having expended considerable time during the last two months trying to convince the immigration authorities, both here and in Washington, of the merits of her plea for a further extension of time.

Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who summoned Mme. Savitzkaya from Paris at the opening of the concert season, also was keenly interested in the outcome. Under the terms of the "visitor's" permit, under which the harpist was allowed to enter this country for a six months' stay, she was supposed to leave the United States by April 16. This would have precluded her remaining even to the end of the present concert season. The new ruling allows her to stay until Oct. 16.

A Russian of aristocratic lineage, Mme. Savitzkaya was admitted to this country last October as a "non-alien," the quota of Russia already having been filled. But the permit and her vise were granted previously in Paris only after she had satisfied the American embassy officials of her high character and integrity, and had produced evidence of her contract with Mr. Koussevitzky.

Having glimpsed America and learned of its opportunities for furthering her career, Mme. Savitzkaya is desirous of remaining for some time longer and hopes to be able to gain a still further extension of the time now allotted her by the immigration authorities. Her husband, formerly a captain of artillery in the Russian army and subsequently adjutant military attache at the Russian embassy in Holland, to which country he escaped from captivity in Germany during the war, is now in Paris, but he hopes to be able to join her here as soon as a new quota is to be admitted.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS
MAR 2 0 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

"Koussevitzky vitalizes everything he touches."

In that fashion does Penfield Roberts of the Boston Globe speak of the world famous conductor who is to visit this City next week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And Portland people will have admirable opportunity to test the truth of this statement in next week's concert, which features selections in a variety of moods, and touches the classic, the romantic and the modern. It has been said of Koussevitzky that he infuses with emotion even selections that under other conductors have seemed dull and lacking in vitality, while to hear him in selections glowing with life and color is a vibrant emotional experience.—Advertisement.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 2 1 1925

SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE TO-MORROW

Last of Providence Music League Concerts to Be Given in Albee Theatre.

PERFORMANCE AT 3 O'CLOCK

Boston Orchestra of 104 Pieces Under Direction of Serge Koussevitzky Will Present Varied Programme

To-morrow afternoon at 3 o'clock in the E. F. Albee Theatre, the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians will give the final concert under the auspices of the Providence Music League.

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of this ~~world-famous~~ orchestra, who is generally considered one of the greatest leaders, has arranged a programme of beauty and direct appeal for the occasion. It will open with Weber's Overture to "Oberon," fairy music abounding with melody and with a strikingly brilliant close.

Two Russian numbers which the Russian conductor has virtually introduced to America will be Moussorgsky's Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," and Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee." The latter piece in particular was so delightful in its humorous suggestion of the buzzing bee that it has caused the breaking of the traditional rule of no encores at the Symphony concerts.

Music more familiar will be the suite from Grieg's Incidental Music to "Peer Gynt," including Morning Mood, Aase's Death, Anitra's Dance, and In the Troll King's Grotto. The programme will conclude with three notable excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner—"The Ride of the Valkyries," in which the warrior maidens are described musically as they gallop through the heavens on their winged horses, each with a slain hero across her saddle. There will also be the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Rienzi."

VARIED PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Tchaikovsky's Fifth and French Novelties

Mr Koussevitzky chose a varied program for this week's Symphony concerts. Before the intermission yesterday various French novelties were played, only to be eclipsed later by a superb performance of the finest of Tchaikovsky's symphonies, his Fifth, in E minor. The listener was almost persuaded against his cooler judgment that Tchaikovsky was a composer of the highest order. But a really superb performance such as this can glorify music far more vulgar than Tchaikovsky's symphonies.

The French novelties were of various genres. The first number, the overture to Roland-Manuel's opera buffa "Isabel and Pantalon," is light music written with conscious cleverness, in a rather labored mixture of the archaic and the ultra modern idioms. The latest Parisian fashion in music seems to be the blending of the 20th and 17th centuries. M Roland-Manuel calls his overture a "sinfonia," thus mystifying everyone unaware of the historic fact that 150 years ago overtures were always so entitled. His music uses too much percussion and has too little thematic originality to be first-rate light music.

The next number, played for the first time anywhere yesterday, but composed in 1923 and presumably refused by Paris orchestras, was "L'Elan" by Adolphe Borchard, a pianist and composer now living in Paris. The piece has a motto, verses by Henri de Regnier. M Borchard, according to a note in the programs yesterday, has endeavored to express "the intoxication of movement," "the gesture of one stretching hands toward the infinite.

This music is quite as noisy and almost as dissonant as the louder portions of Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring." Listening as sympathetically as possible, all that was discoverable in it was an unholy racket about nothing. This may be the "music of the future," but one could detect in it nothing but inane, inept themes toyed with in conventionally aimless succession. The only emotional impression was sheer boredom.

As to the reasons why a hearer thrilled by Stravinsky and Honegger and not opposed to modern music on principle or prejudice should get so negative a reaction from M Borchard's piece, possibly future generations may see them as clearly as we see why people who liked Wagner's music did not always like that of his followers.

Ravel's orchestral version of Debusy's piano piece "Danse," published in 1890 in its original form, was made for Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris. Revel has changed the character of the music, made it harder, more shallow. But to orchestrate Debussy's piano works seems more difficult and quite as needless as to orchestrate those of Chopin.

"Epiphanie" a "Fresco" for violoncello and orchestra by Andre Caplet, who used to be one of the conductors of the Boston Opera, gave Jean Bedetti a chance to display his notable abilities as soloist. In this piece, the composer's posing for the gallery, for the art-struck women and idle men whose fickle adulation is not worth the winning, is irritating. The title, the program note ascribed to "An Ethiopian Legend," the freakish orchestration, all annoy. Who has ever, or will ever again, express "ecstacy" by a very long cadenza for solo cello accompanied only by a pedal point in the double basses and a monotonously ticking tambourine, as here?

Tchaikovsky's familiar symphony in a remarkably brilliant performance seemed both sincere and noble by comparison with what had gone before. But it does not seem so beside Beethoven and Wagner. Mr Koussevitzky labored not wholly with success to do justice to this modern French miscellany. But one could not help wondering whether he were not at this concert redeeming in a bunch all the promises he in moments of expansiveness made his Paris acquaintances about playing their works here.

P. R.

PAEAN FOR SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

Tribute to Genius of Koussevitzky Paid by Hearers

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Not since Mr. Koussevitzky's first appearance here has a Friday afternoon audience at the Symphony Concerts bestowed upon him and upon the orchestra applause more hearty than that which yesterday greeted the performance of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

And this ovation, like the performance itself exciting to hear, was tribute richly deserved.

RUSSIA'S MUSICAL CROWN

Last autumn at the Pension Fund concert, Mr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra through this symphony, and it was a matter of general agreement that not in many a year, if ever before, had the piece come to such eloquent performance in this city. Yesterday even that performance was surpassed in one or another detail: here and there instrumental strokes were sharpened and intensified, melodies were sung with even greater warmth and passion. And again the final climax was irresistible, overwhelming.

Hearing this Symphony yesterday it was easy to believe it not only Tchaikovsky's masterpiece but the crown of Russian instrumental music. Yet at the hands of other conductors the piece has seemed distinctly less impressive. Here, then, would appear to be proof positive of Mr. Koussevitzky's genius. Only to the greatest conductors is it given so to transfigure a composition that the listener may not be quite sure where the composer's achievement ends and the conductor's begins. Yesterday, indeed, Tchaikovsky, Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were as one; for the time his Symphony was music of supreme power and eloquence; and that was sufficient.

First American Performance

Contrast, not unity, marks this programme of the 19th pair of concerts; contrast that is not without a touch of irony since Tchaikovsky is not greatly esteemed as composer by the Parisians, and it is from the hands of modern or contemporary Frenchmen that the remaining pieces all are sprung.

To head the list comes a "Sinfonia," from Roland-Manuel's comic opera "Isabelle et Pantalon," the first American performance of the piece and the first appearance of its composer's name upon the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Plainly Roland-Manuel has both skill and talent. His "Sinfonia" breathes the spirit of comedy; it epitomizes the spirit of the sprightly opera from which it is dra[illegible] It is fresh, assurant and well ma[illegible] and it expresses individuality with[illegible] straining after effect.

To this diverting composition succee[illegible] a symphonic poem, "L'Tlan," [illegible] Adolphe Borchard, hitherto unpe[illegible] formed. Borchard, who has been hear[illegible] in Boston as pianist (in 1910), but who [illegible] virtually unknown here as compose[illegible] has in this "Elan" written music [illegible] considerable originality and force. The piece, which begins in the depths of the orchestra against clanging bells, captures the attention at the outset, and holds it till the final chord. A pity th[illegible] the composer might not hear a performance that must have been all-reveali[illegible] of his intention and that yesterday w[illegible] enthusiastically received.

Andre Caplet's Contribution

With light interlude of Debussy['s] early piano-piece "Danse," in Ravel['s] ingenious orchestration, also new [to] Boston, there followed yet another novelty, and this time one which yesterd[ay] proved distinctly disappointing. Fro[m] the hand of Andre Caplet, one-time co[n]ductor of the Boston Opera Compan[y] comes this music, by full tit[le] "Epiphanie," Fresco for Violoncello [and] Orchestra (after an Ethiopian Lege[nd]).

Mr. Caplet would have give expressi[on] to this argument, printed in the scor[e]: "Melchior, the black and gold kin[illegible]

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 2 1 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had a succession of Conductors. George Henschel, Wilhelm Hericke, Arthur Mikusch, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteaux followed by Serge Koussevitsky. Well, at the present time Russians are the fashion. They sing differently, act differently, write differently, compose differently and shortly we will see if they conduct differently. People who attend the Boston Symphony Concert at City Hall, March 25th, will see in Serge Koussevitsky, the most striking figure and dominant personality among orchestral conductors with "a volcanic temperament under marvelous control." In an article by Winthrop P. Tryon he says: "Kousevitsy is another Nikisch with a stout red fist, instead of a white hand. And when he undoubles and opens out that left fist of his, he shows such spread of fingers as never before signaled diminuendo to violins and such crook of index as never before summoned sign from flute. That is saying nothing of his right hand and its vast range of movements, from the merest shiver to the complete triangular swing of down, out and up. He is another Toscanini, in that he knows his scores by heart, backward and forward. And yet, he shows the good judgment to keep the book before him on the desk and to turn the pages as studiously as in rehearsal. He is a conservative musician, in that he tends to moderate tempi. Which means that he is a conscientious one, making every element in the composer's structure clear to the listener."

Transcript
Mar - 21

Orchestral

FOR the Symphony Concerts of next week, Mr. Koussevitzky proposes a program to waken anticipation. It contains "Prometheus: The Poem of Fire"—the piece with which Skriabin believed he had rounded and capped his symphonic music. Seldom is it heard anywhere; never before has it been announced for performance in Boston; while Skriabin sounds at Mr. Koussevitzky's will. On the list also stand the Polovtsian Dances out of Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." Alike from the Diaghylev Ballet and the Symphony Orchestra, they have hitherto been heard in Boston without the interspersed choruses. Next week at Symphony Hall, The Cecilia will sing them. Only dancers—the more the pity—will be lacking. The Cecilia will also join the orchestra through a few pages of "Prometheus," and Mr. Alexander Steinert will take a passing place in the band to play the piano-part. A Concerto Grosso of Handel—Number Five in D major—will begin the concerts, with solo-parts for the leaders of the string choir. Into the midst of all this promise, Mr. Koussevitzky strangely thrusts a repetition of Monsieur Rabaud's tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne."

New Music Played

French Novelties Heard at Symphony Concerts

Four of the five numbers on the Symphony program played yesterday were new to Boston, all four of them being French.

S. Koussevitzky

Adolphe Borchard's symphonic poem, "Ardor," had its first performance anywhere. Serge Koussevitzky conducted a brilliant performance of it and the piece was warmly applauded. Roland-Manuel's "Isabelle and Pantalon," comedy overture, half French and half Italian, and Andre Caplet's "Epiphanie," an exotic, long-winded tone picture with a 'cello solo peformed in masterly style by Jean Bedetti, were heard yesterday for the first time in this country. Ravel's arrangement of Debussy's "Danse," a delightful trifle, took its place for the first time on a Symphony program.

Mr. Koussevitzky also gave an intensely poetic and dramatic reading of Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony, which has not been played at Symphony concerts for many years.

The twentieth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 27 and 28, in Symphony Hall with two choral numbers, the Cecilia Society assisting as a feature of the program. These numbers will be the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera "Prince Igor," and Scriabin's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," which is to have its first Boston performance.

REDUCTION

RATIO

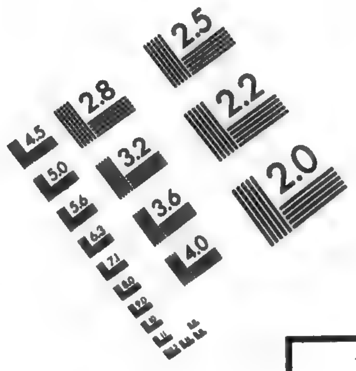
13x

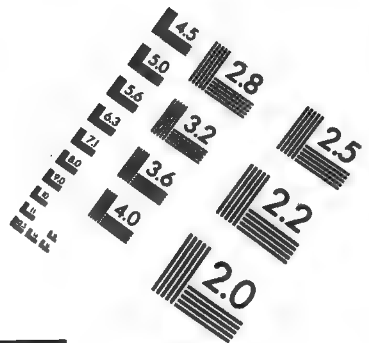
REDUCTION

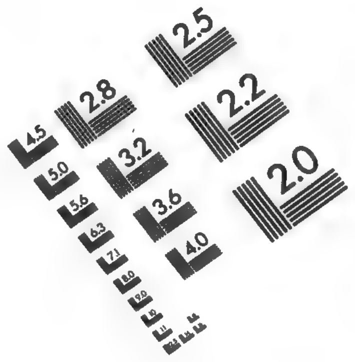
RATIO

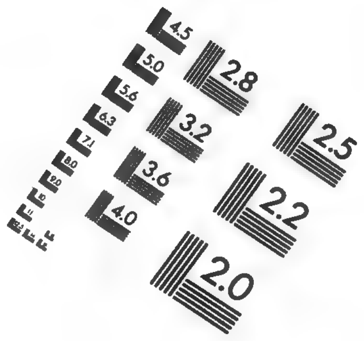
13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





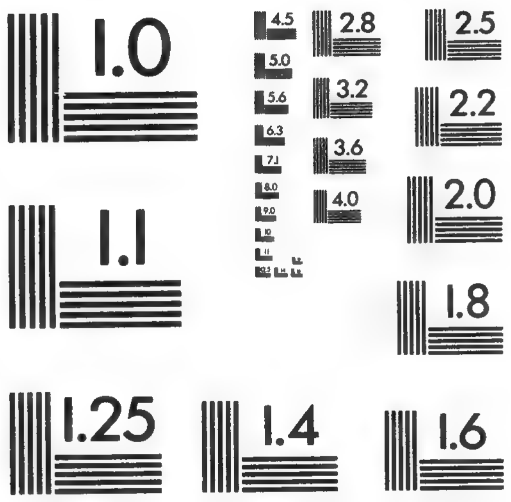




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

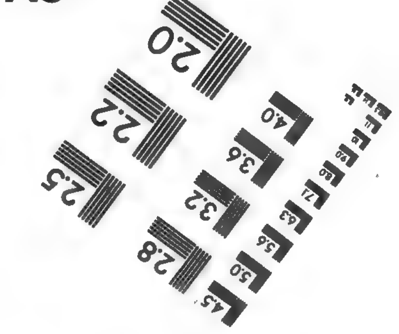
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

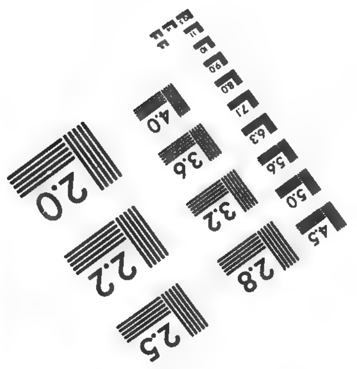
2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

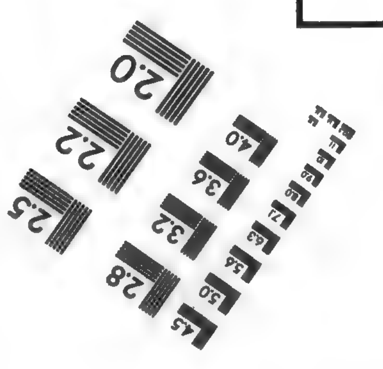
A5

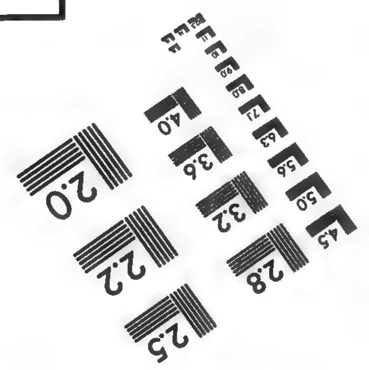




A4

A3





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

64

Herald
Mar 22

Weekly Comment

Some, they are not a few, are seriously disturbed, not to say vexed because Mr. Koussevitzky has introduced works of the ultra-modern school, is continuing to produce them, and, we earnestly hope, will go on producing them.

That there is a revolt is not surprising. Free discussion should be encouraged, when the arguments pro and con are reasonable, when the disputants argue with some show of intelligence and are not like the peppery gentleman who shouted: "I ain't arguin', I'm tellin' yer." Some one said of deep thinking but disputatious Germans years ago that when two of them entered into an argument, one at least should be tied securely to his chair.

The composers, unknown here before Mr. Koussevitzky's arrival, and now under the ban, are called by the poker-backed listeners revolutionaries, anarchists. No leader of a progressive movement has escaped blazing hostility. It is not necessary to go back to Monteverde. Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, Berlioz, Chopin, Liszt, Wagner were in turn roundly abused as dangerous fellows. But this is ancient history.

Here in Boston when the amiable second symphony of Johannes Brahms was performed for the first time (1879) many agreed with John S. Dwight, then one of the leading critics in Boston. He declared that he could conceive of Sterndale Bennett writing a better symphony.

When Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" was first played here at a Symphony concert (1896) there were letters of protest, and a prominent critic, a well-grounded musician who had studied in Germany, accused in his review the composer of being insane.

When Cesar Franck's symphony was produced here (1899) there were still angrier protests. Mr. Gericke was harshly condemned for putting it on the program. There were persons who for some years refused to attend any concert in which a work by Franck was performed.

And was not Debussy at first characterized as an insolent poseur, a man who having been denied the gift of melody hoped by musical eccentricity to attract attention? Did Ravel at first fare much better?

When Mr. Ellis brought out Puccini's "La Boheme" at the Boston Theatre old opera goers could not see anything in it. "There are no tunes," was the opinion of the great majority that night drawn to the theatre by Mme. Melba, not by the wish to hear a new opera.

We do not say that the men whose music has been heard at Symphony concerts this season are embryo Strausses, Francks, Debussys, Ravels. We do not say that the music has always been of a high order. There were one or two pieces that we found pretentious, laboriously eccentric and dull. Other performances might weaken, might even remove this impression. But in nearly all the instances the composer had a right to be heard.

① Mr. Koussevitzky would be unfaithful to his trust if he did not acquaint us with the works of contemporaneous composers, especially those of the Europeans who are influenced by contemporaneous life and opinions and are honestly seeking new forms of expression.

Stravinsky's piano concerto; Arthur Bliss's concerto for two pianos and wind instruments; and Copland's symphony excited particular hostility. These pieces were certainly out of the common, often disagreeable to the ears, that is to ears as yet not accustomed to new idioms. It was very easy for anyone to say: "I don't like them." It is also easy to say, as some have said: "We pay our money to hear music that will please us. We don't wish to hear music that is freakish, full of discords."

How many of these objectors would agree on a program to be handed in to Mr. Koussevitzky? Would they agree even on Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" or Raff's "Lenore" symphony, pieces that would be surely demanded by some?

There are many in every town who, attending concerts, would like to hear only the music they have known from childhood. They would like to hear eight symphonies of Beethoven every season. (The ninth is to them still a stumbling block.) If they go to a song recital they feel safe when they see the names of Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, and a few American composers on the program. They shake their heads and are uncomfortable, when Gabriel Faure, Duparc, Debussy, Bax, or some Frenchman or Italian, now living but utterly unknown to them are represented. So it is with piano recitals. These hearers fear for the worst.

These praisers of times past, patrons and admirers of dead composers, insist that at concerts nothing unusual, nothing surprising should shake their equanimity. They would agree to the dictum of Athenaeus: "Music softens moroseness of temper; for it dissipates sadness and produces affability and a sort of gentlemanlike joy."

They might change "gentlemanlike" to "ladylike."

Many who cry out against this "new" music are pleased by pictures that would have distressed their parents. They read and discuss extremely "modern" novels and plays, they even wax enthusiastic in praise, but they draw the line at music.

They are honest in their disapproval and dislike, and for this are no doubt to be respected. Unfortunately they have no wish to become more intimately acquainted with new musical thought.

It has been said of a little mutual admiration of writers in New York that they sit at a lunch table and solemnly declare that nothing worth while in art, literature, the theatre, music occurred before 1914. There are many in Boston, as in New York and London, who really believe that there has been no progress in music since the death of Johannes Brahms.

There is so much music that they do not wish to hear for the first time.

~~Yet their objections and this dissension are not to be deplored.~~ Without controversy art is stagnant. Once in Paris a duel was fought over Sarah Bernhardt's portrayal of Hamlet and her expressed opinion that the Prince of Denmark was in reality a woman.

It would be a pleasure to find two subscribers to Symphony concerts entertaining opposite views, fighting with rapiers, or exhanging shots on Boston Common, say at high noon so that pretty shop girls could enliven the scene; whose bright eyes would "rain influence." What a glorious death to die, sword in hand, or even an axe in hand, defending the good old conservatives, expiring with the name of Mendelssohn on one's lips!

The negro preacher at Richmond, Va., exclaimed: "The sun do move." The musical world has moved, is moving, will move.

No work of genuine strength or beauty will die. No work that is impotently pretentious will live, no matter if for a time it soothes the ears of complacent conservatives. We are creatures of our time and environment. We must hear music of our time, as well as the music of glorious masters of the past, who speak to us as from another planet.

If Stravinsky is putting too much importance on unusual rhythmic devices, his sin will surely find him out; his very extravagance may benefit composers to come, who, not following him blindly, will find a freer and more eloquent expression.

As for Mr. Bliss there were pages of genuine beauty in his wild and whirring concerto.

Is Mr. Copland, then, a hopeless case? Is his symphony the abomination of desolation spoken of by the Hebrew prophet? Mr. Koussevitzky has thought of a second performance, for he regards the composer as a man of pronounced talent. If there is a second performance, it might occur at the end of a regular concert, so that those who did not wish to hear it, might leave, and others might stay. Mr. Monteux thus arranged the second performance of "Sacre du Printemps." But those going out should not scowl, make threatening gestures, stamp on the floor, or curse loudly composer, conductor, and those who remain.

P. H.

Providence Journal
Mar 22

Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky Gives Providence Music League Concert at Albee Theatre This Afternoon

Mme. Schumann-Heink Coming.

Through the beneficence of the Providence Music League, subscribers to its concerts will hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky, for about 13 cents this afternoon at the Albee Theatre. Subscribers to the orchestra's regular series here at Infantry Hall pay something more than that. Though it may seem mercenary to speak of art in terms of cash, the monetary contrast is sufficiently startling to be worthy of note.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his players will offer some of the works they have presented here this season. The programme will include Weber's Overture to "Oberon;" Moussorgsky's Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina;" Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee;" Grieg's Suite No. 1 from the incidental music to "Peer Gynt," and three Wagnerian excerpts—"The Ride of the Valkyries," Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Rienzi."

This is a programme of great variety and tested popularity, good music and melodious. The opportunity to see Koussevitzky, the Boston orchestra's new leader, and listen to an organization that is considered second to none among symphonic bands in this country, is a fitting climax to the concerts given under the auspices of the Providence Music League this season. The programme is scheduled to commence at 3 o'clock.

* * *

nade Club next Thursday morning at 11 o'clock in Froebel Hall, at which Miss Loretta C. O'Hara will be hostess. The numbers have been arranged as follows: "Coming Home," Willerby; "Lilac Time," Willerby; "Don't Care," Carpenter, Mrs. George H. Lomas, Miss Ruth Tripp at the piano. Sonata for Violin and Piano, op. 45, Grieg; Allegro molto ed appassionata, Allegretto espressivo alla romanzo, Allegro animato, Mrs. Evelyn Fellowes Offers, Mrs. Edward H. Scattergood. "Time and I," Cadman; Pastoral, Veraccini

©Balmoral

Lucy Marsh Gordon

Assisting Soloist at Monday Morning Musical Club Concert in Memorial Hall Next Friday Night

Serge Koussevitzky

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Providence Music League Concert This Afternoon at E. F Albee Theatre

---

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
MAR 2 2 1925

The appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at City Hall next Wednesday evening will be an event of great magnificence. From the seat sale, it seems as if City Hall would be packed. Of course the fact that the orchestra will be led by Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor, lends added interest to the concert, though no inducement is needed to urge people to hear this organization, which is one of the finest in the world. For many seasons, Portland has hailed the appearance of this orchestra as a great event, and the concert this week will be one of the most notable ever given here.

An especially low price arranged by the Music Commission will give everyone an opportunity of hearing this superb body of musicians.

A portion of a description of Koussevitzky's debut with the Boston Symphony last October will be interesting to the large number who intend to be present at the concert next Wednesday evening:—

BOSTON, Oct. 14.—Serge Koussevitzky made his first appearances before expectant audiences at the pair of concerts which opened the Boston Symphony's forty-fourth season, on Oct. 10 and 11, in Symphony Hall. His dignified entrance made the occasion a courteous demonstration of welcome by both audience and orchestra. With little ado, Mr. Koussevitzky launched into the first work on his program, Vivaldi's Concerto in D Minor for Orchestra and Organ, edited by Siloti, played for the first time in America. From the moment he raised his arms as if invoking attention, Mr. Koussevitzky revealed himself a master of dramatic values. The lyric phrases of the concerto were chiseled with meticulous regard for their inherent expressiveness. At no moment was the music permitted to mark time. In the final Allegro, the conductor showed his fondness for incisive rhythms and sparkling colors.

In Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, the conductor once more disclosed his skill in delineation of phrase and his felicity of stroke in telling details.

The much discussed "Pacific 231," an "orchestral movement" by Arthur Honegger, was then given its first American performance. It was first performed in Paris last Spring at Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
_ 2 1925

The "Pacific 2-3-1."

"Unquestionably the greatest sensation in orchestral music in America during the present season was the playing of Arthur Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1" by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the first appearance of Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor. Arguments pro and con have been many any vigorous, but there can be no question that the work is one of the most interesting products of the new school of composition in France. It describes a railway locomotive, and anyone who maintains that this is not a suitable subject for art is referred to Rudyard Kipling's poem on the subject.

"Mr. Spalding, the soloist, is well known to St. Paul audiences, and is one of the musicians of whom America is most justly proud. Born in Chicago in 1888, he received his musical training first in New York and then in Florence and Paris. Since 1905 he has appeared in practically every important musical center in Europe and America, and in addition to his fame as a violinist he has won considerable renown as a composer. During the war he served as a lieutenant in the aviation corps of the United States Signal Service.

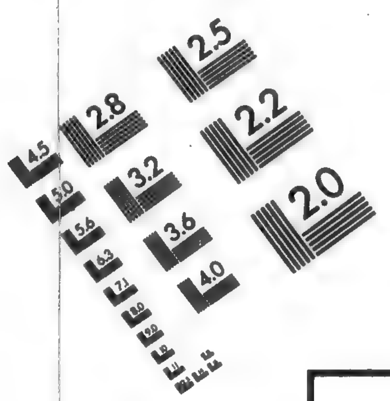
"The next symphony concert will be given on April 9, and will be devoted to Mendelssohn's "Elijah," with Mary Mellish, Agnes Rast Snyder, Judson House and Bernard Ferguson as the soloists, and with the symphony chorus in support of the orchestra."

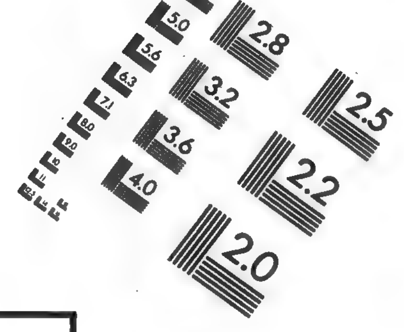
SYMPHONY PROGRAM

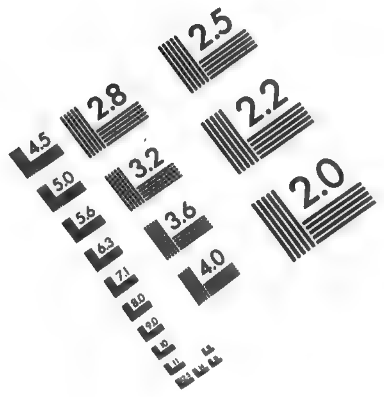
The Cecilia Society, trained by Malcolm Lang, will assist in two choral numbers at the 20th regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 27 and 28. These numbers will be Borodin's Polovtsian Dances from his opera, "Prince Igor," and Scriabin's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," which has not yet been heard in Boston. Mr. Koussevitzky will open the concert with Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5, D major for string orchestra. He will also repeat Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne

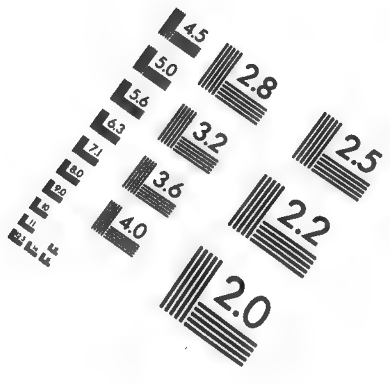
REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





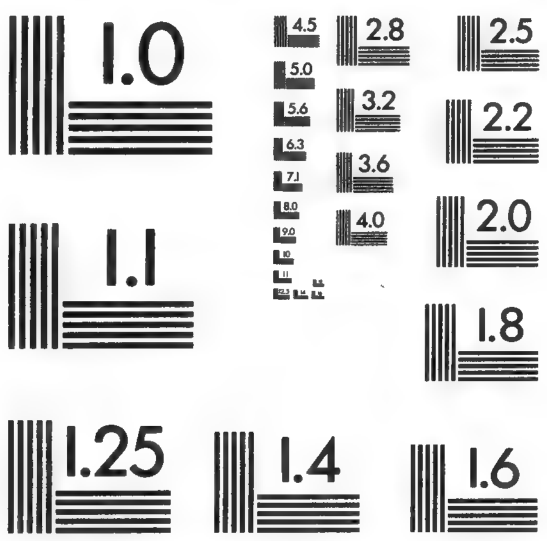




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

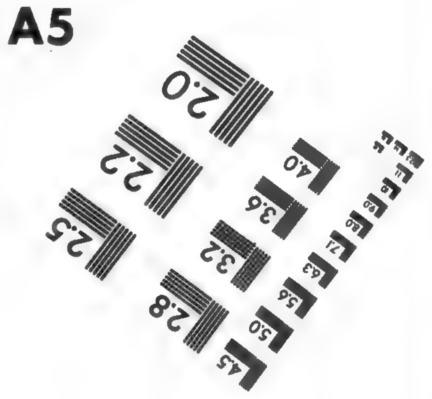
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

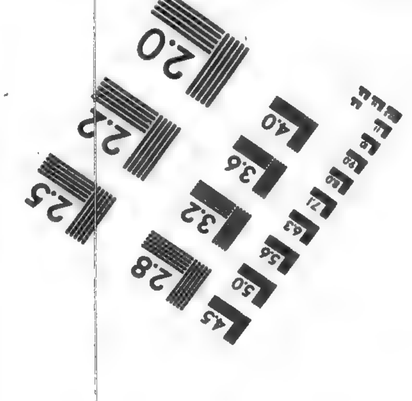
2.5 mm

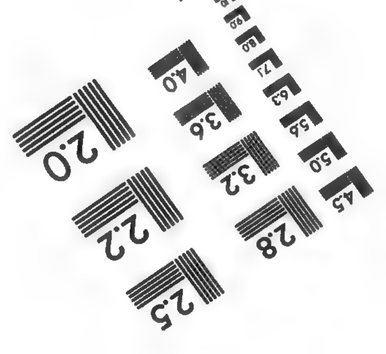
A5



A4

A3





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

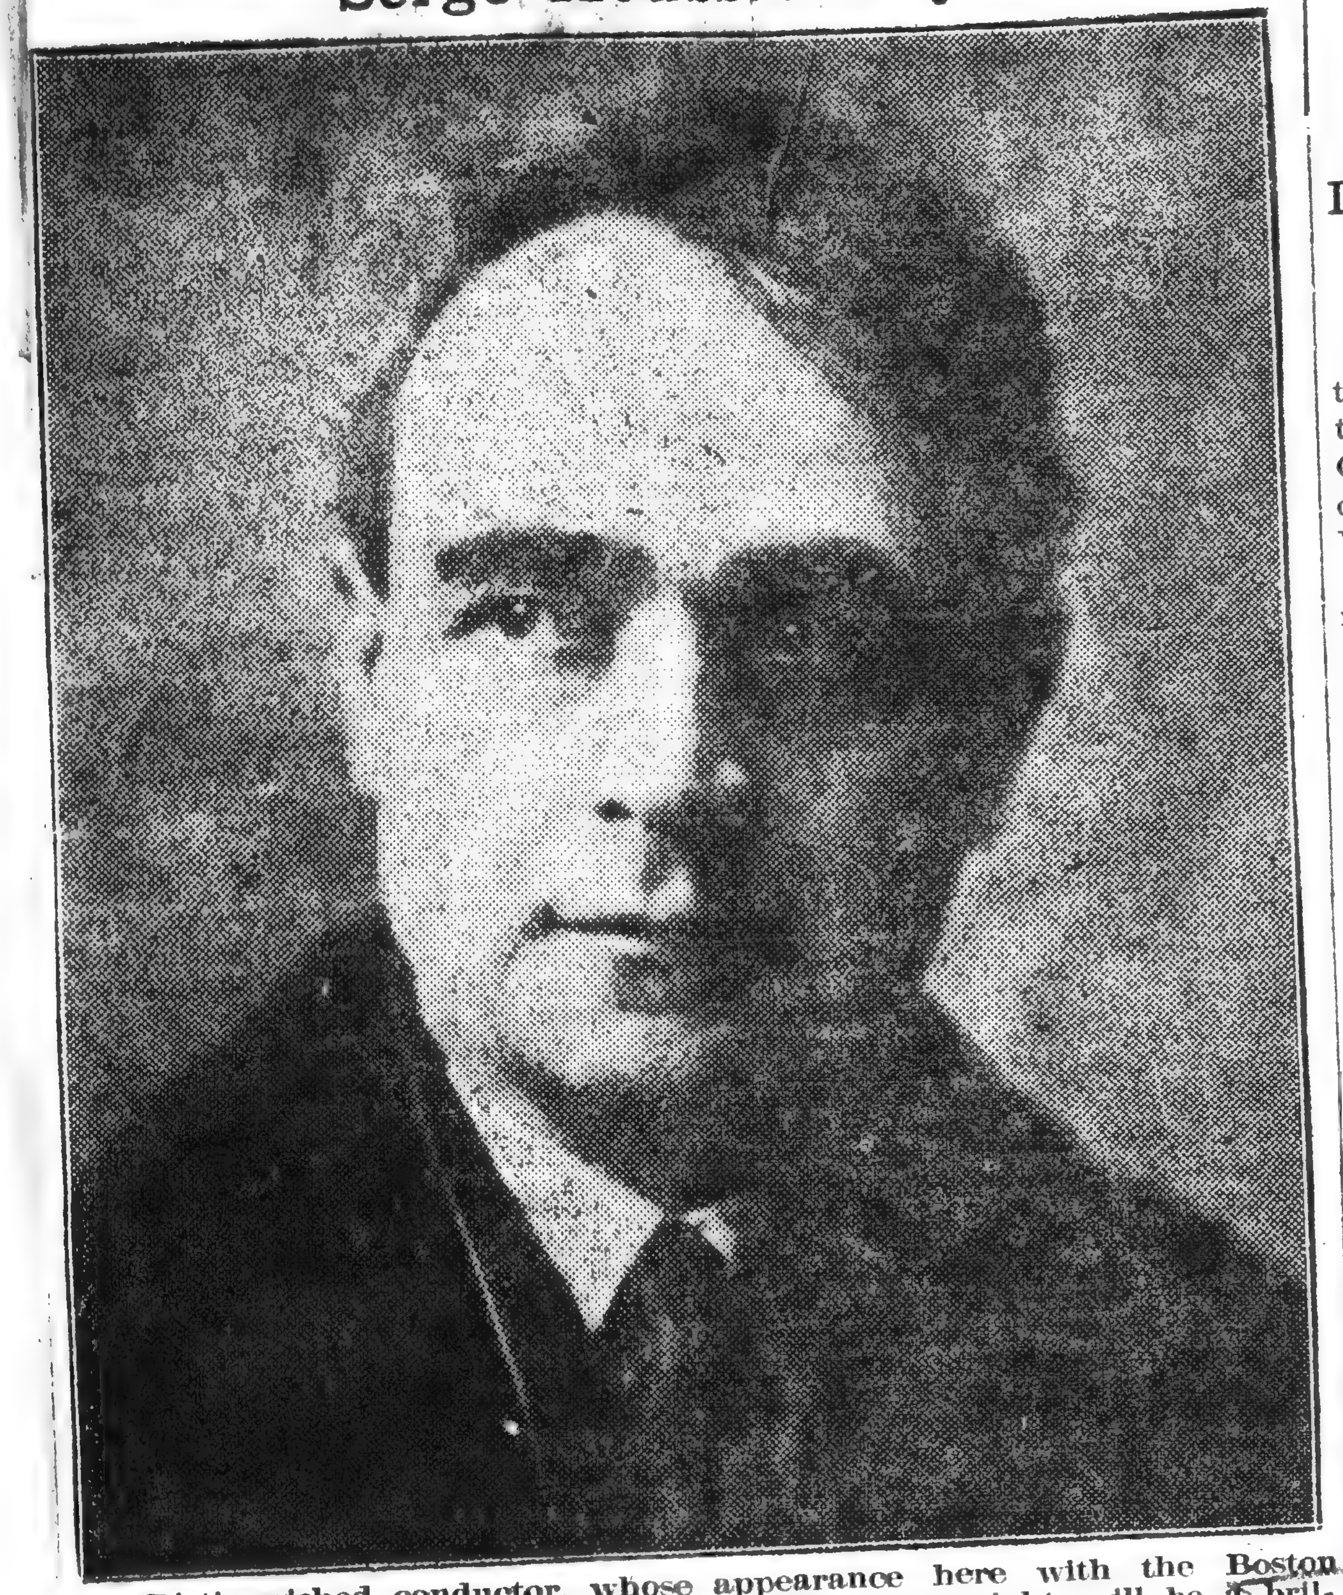
Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

INFORMATION OBSCURED

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
MAR 2 2 1925

Serge Koussevitzky



Distinguished conductor, whose appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians Wednesday night, will be a brilliant climax to the music events of the winter.

PROGRAM OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCH. CONCERT MARCH 25

Director Koussevitzky Plans to Appeal to All Tastes

Standing out pre-eminent among the concert events of the Winter is the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the City Hall Auditorium Wednesday evening.

This event gains interest from many sources. One of these is the fact that it is the only incursion into the concert field that has been made this Winter by the Portland Music Commission. Large numbers of people in this City have been subscribers each year to the municipal music course, and this year when the course has narrowed down to a single concert they are sure to be out in large numbers to attend the Boston Symphony concert.

Again the concert of interest because it offers Portland and Maine people their first opportunity to greet that great genius of the baton, Serge Koussevitzky, whose name has been ringing the length and breadth of the American music world throughout the Winter.

A man who has attained the brilliant worldwide reputation of Koussevitzky cannot but be the object of interest and even curiosity when he pays his first visit to a section.

Again the concert is of interest because the Boston Symphony Orchestra is said to have gained phenominally under Koussevitzky's direction till it is capable of attaining effects that in spite of its reputation and achievements it never gained before.

Koussevitzky's concert is therefore of absorbing interest from a musical and from an emotional angle, for with the wizardry of his baton the famous conductor is sure to evoke emotional response to the playing of his orchestra.

Koussevitzky has selected the program for his Portland engagement with great care, and it reveals him in varied moods.

As an interpreter of Russian music and particularly of modern Russian music, he is far famed. As a Wagnerian conductor he is almost equally noted. There will be two modern Russian numbers, two Wagnerian numbers, and the remainder of the program will incline to the gay and the brilliant.

The program will allow an intermission of 10 minutes and the two Wagner numbers will follow this intermission. In the early part of the program will be given, the Roman Carnival Overture of Berlioz, and the two Russian selections, which are quite different in mood, one, from Rimsky-Korsakov, being a scherzo of the lightest and daintiest order, while the other from Moussorgsky is of the exotic and colorful type. Other selections more attuned to the classic will round out an interesting program.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN
MAR 2 2 1925

At the Boston symphony orchestra concert Koussewitsky played an uninspired symphony by Glazounov, a symphonic poem by Rabaud called "La Procession Nocturne" (a not very modern work of some emotional beauty) and Strauss' "Dance of Salome." But for me the crux of the afternoon was Albert Spalding's exquisite playing of Bach's concerto in E major for violin and orchestra. Rarely beautiful and reposeful was the adagio, with the lovely deliberative phrases of the solo instrument singing gravely over the reiterated figure in the accompaniment. The first and last movements were lucid and vigorous, with clearly-defined rhythmical patterns. Spalding's deep-throated tone throughout was a panacea for the ills of existence. Here is an American who is attaining his majority as a ripe artist and coming into his own in public appreciation. The audience acclaimed his playing with warmest enthusiasm.

It is hard to understand why a country which spends so much money on music as America does should acknowledge native artists so tardily and foreign ones so eagerly. As I listened to a Philharmonic concert today I remembered that Teodore Spiering conducted the Philharmonic orchestra for a third of a season at the time of Mahler's breakdown. Spiering, at that time concert master, stepped into the breach so successfully that there was no dissenting voice among the critics as to his fitness for the place. [illegible] he was an American and the directors had not the courage to appoint him permanently. So he went abroad and got an orchestra and a reputation. Spiering is recognized as a distinguished musical personality. He is, moreover, a man of culture and high ideals—and he is an American.

NEW YORK
TIMES
MAR 2 2 1925

Final visits for the season are scheduled by the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall on April 9 and 11 and by the Philadelphia Orchestra on April 14.

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
[illegible] 3 1925

Interest Is Great In Symphony Concert

Serge Koussevitzky And Boston Orchestra To Appear Here Wednesday

The appearance of Serge Koussevitsky, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city Wednesday is anticipated with keenest interest.

Never was the advent of a conductor in this country awaited with greater eagerness than was Koussevitsky's last Fall, and expectations regarding him have been fully realized. His success, indeed, has been so great as to be absolutely unprecedented.

His greatest fame has been won in the interpretation of such composers as Wagner and Berlioz, and both are to be included in his local program.

Koussevitsky has a triple fame in the scope of his interpretations. Some praise him most highly for his readings of the classical masters, which are fresh and engrossing. No one can instill a more vivid and beautiful life in the music of the 18th century. Koussevitsky, the romanticist, also is irresistible. The fervors of Wagner or Berlioz or Tohaikevsky flame gloriously under his baton. Then there is the third angle to his striking achievements—his flair for the music of the modern schools.

SAN DIEGO, CAL.
UNION
MAR 2 2 1925

MUSIC PARADE

New York surely does not stint the public in its supply of music. What a quantity, and how infinite the variety! The Philharmonic, New York, Philadelphia and Boston symphony orchestra have been playing away during recent days with almost no cessation. And mostly it has been music worth hearing, and superlatively played. Mengelberg, Walter and Stokowski are sterling musicians and conductors; I cannot enthuse so much over Koussevitsky.

HOUSTON, TEXAS
CHRONICLE
MAR 2 2 1925

◆ ◆ ◆

The Music Parade.

New York surely does not stint the public in its supply of music. What a quantity, and how infinite the variety! The Philharmonic, New York, Philadelphia and Boston symphony orchestras have been playing away during recent days with almost no cessation. And mostly it has been music worth hearing, and superlatively played. Mengelberg, Walter and Stokowski are sterling musicians and conductors; I can not enthuse so much over Koussevitzy.

Then Wanda Landowska gave us a harpischord program of aristocratic beauty and elegance; tinkly music interpreted with flawless technique and equally flawless taste. Cecilia Hansen's violin recital left pleasureable recollections, for this young artiste is maturing steadily and must be pronounced one of the foremost in her art.

I discovered some novel effects in the new Stringwood Ensemble (a body of instrumentalists composed, as the title suggests, of strings and woodwinds); a fine bit of playing was heard during the Elshuco Trio concert, and Louis Graveure delighted my sense of good singing by his finished vocalism and authoritative style.

Dainty Maria Ivogun also appeared and, as usual with her, she charmed her listeners. If this soprano would adhere more to a smooth vocal line and concede less to what she recognizes as the "popular demand" she could take with me a higher place than I now accord her. Still, she "gets" her audiences. Which prompts me to wonder what is to become of our singing greatness . . . if those who are capable of it will not insist on doing what they readily can do.

(Copyright, 1925, by P. V. R. Key.)

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 2 3 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

As a fitting climax to the concerts under the auspices of the Providence Music League, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, yesterday afternoon concluded the series at the E. F. Albee Theatre.

Designed to assist in the development of musical appreciation in this community among the many who ordinarily do not attend concerts which provide highest attainment in vocal and instrumental music, the series has proved an unqualified success.

This is the third year of the Music League's activities in cultural work and, as in preceding seasons, public response has been extremely gratifying to the sponsors of the movement. Audiences which filled the big theatre have thoroughly enjoyed and enthusiastically applauded programmes arranged to please the average musical taste and at the same time feature music by the greatest composers of vocal and instrumental music.

Yesterday's programme did not include a symphony; in place of this usual number at Boston Symphony concerts Conductor Koussevitzky played the well-known Grieg "Peer Gynt" suite. With this, the Weber overture to "Oberon," pieces by Russian composers and excerpts from Wagnerian operas formed a list of numbers which offered excellent variety.

The programme was played as follows:

Weber..................Overture to "Oberon"
Moussorgsky..............................
......Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina"
Rimsky-Korsakov.."The Flight of the Bumble
Bee," Scherzo, from the "Tsar Saltan"
Grieg...............................Suite No. 1
from the incidental music to "Peer Gynt"
Morning Mood.
Aase's Death.
Anitra's Dance.
In the Troll King's Grotto.
Wagner..............................."The Ride
of the Valkyries," from "The Valkyrie"
Wagner................Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Wagner................Overture to "Rienzi"

Mr. Koussevitzky's players were present in full strength, although but one number, "The Ride of the Valykries," called for the entire orchestral force. The "Oberon" overture and Rimsky-Korsakov's little descriptive piece, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," were repetitions of numbers played by the Boston orchestra at previous appearances at these concerts.

Whtaever Koussevitzky elects to play is made thoroughly enjoyable by the splendid technical finish he exacts of his men. Whether in the nimble finger work required in the violins in picturing the bumble bee's rapid flight or in the measures of Wagner where the entire orchestra joins in a storm of harmony, there is splendid unanimity of effort. This, however, is but the foundation upon which the imaginative Russian builds. It is his sense of beauty, of proportion, of fine contrast, that grips one's attention and carries the delighted listener through eac musical story.

The Grieg suite offers an example this artistic ability. Koussevitzky's reading of this work is one of keen appreciation of contrasted moods. Unlike conceptions of this popular suite at the hand of many conductors, Koussevitzky's reading is extremely delicate in the use o tonal contrast. He paints in colors tha charm by their softness, their effectiv blending. This, of course, is particularl noticeable in the first three movements.

The "Morning Mood" pictured the fres sweetness of flowers upon which gentl fall the sun's first rays. The quiet stirring of nature, newly awakened, was delicately traced in lovely tonal tints, and delicious breath of summer morning a came in the soft harmony which rose a the command of his baton.

At the final notes of "Aase's Death" on scarcely could tell when the mus ceased, so perfect was the gradual decrescendo. "Anitra's Dance" was mad light, shadowy, and the chase in the ha of the mountain king, which concludes th suite, was played with finely proportione accelerando and crescendo to the fin climax.

In Wagnerian music Koussevitzky give vent to his temperamental qualities. Th "Ride of the Valkyries," with its expression of storm violence, the prelude t "Lohengrin," presenting a total contras in the approach to earth of angels bearing the Holy Grail, and the final overture to "Rienzi," of grand, martial character, gave the conductor opportunities which were richly realized. At the concert's close Koussevitzky and orchestra received an ovation.

A. F. P.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAR 2 3 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCLUDES SERIES

Providence Music League Concerts Have Fitting Climax.

As a fitting climax to the concerts under the auspices of the Providence Music League, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, yesterday afternoon concluded the series at the E. F. Albee Theatre.

Designed to assist in the development of musical appreciation in this community among the many who ordinarily do not attend concerts which provide highest attainment in vocal and instrumental music, the series has proved an unqualified success.

This is the third year of the Music League's activities in cultural work and, as in preceding seasons, public response has been extremely gratifying to the sponsors of the movement. Audiences which filled the big theatre have thoroughly enjoyed and enthusiastically applauded programmes arranged to please the average musical taste and at the same time feature music by the greatest composers of vocal and instrumental music.

Yesterday's programme did not include a symphony; in place of this usual number at Boston Symphony concerts Conductor Koussevitzky played the well-known Grieg "Peer Gynt" suite. With this, the Weber overture to "Oberon," pieces by Russian composers and excerpts from Wagnerian operas formed a list of numbers which offered excellent variety.

The programme was played as follows:

Weber..................Overture to "Oberon"
Moussorgsky..............................
......Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina"
Rimsky-Korsakov.."The Flight of the Bumble
Bee," Scherzo, from the "Tsar Saltan"
Grieg...............................Suite No. 1
from the incidental music to "Peer Gynt"
Morning Mood.
Aase's Death.
Anitra's Dance.
In the Troll King's Grotto.
Wagner..............................."The Ride
of the Valkyries," from "The Valkyrie"
Wagner................Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Wagner................Overture to "Rienzi"

Mr. Koussevitzky's players were present in full strength, although but one number, "The Ride of the Valykries," called for the entire orchestral force. The "Oberon" overture and Rimsky-Korsakov's little descriptive piece, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," were repetitions of numbers played by the Boston orchestra at previous appearances at these concerts.

Whatever Koussevitzky elects to play is made thoroughly enjoyable by the splendid technical finish he exacts of his men. Whether in the nimble finger work required in the violins in picturing the bumble bee's rapid flight or in the measures of Wagner where the entire orchestra joins in a storm of harmony, there is splendid unanimity of effort. This, however, is but the foundation upon which the imaginative Russian builds. It is his sense of beauty, of proportion, of fine contrast, that grips one's attention and carries the delighted listener through each musical story.

The Grieg suite offers an example of this artistic ability. Koussevitzky's reading of this work is one of keen appreciation of contrasted moods. Unlike conceptions of this popular suite at the hands of many conductors, Koussevitzky's reading is extremely delicate in the use of tonal contrast. He paints in colors that charm by their softness, their effective blending. This, of course, is particularly noticeable in the first three movements.

The "Morning Mood" pictured the fresh sweetness of flowers upon which gently fall the sun's first rays. The quiet stirring of nature, newly awakened, was delicately traced in lovely tonal tints, and a delicious breath of summer morning air came in the soft harmony which rose at the command of his baton.

At the final notes of "Aase's Death" one scarcely could tell when the music ceased, so perfect was the gradual decrescendo. "Anitra's Dance" was made light, shadowy, and the chase in the hall of the mountain king, which concludes the suite, was played with finely proportioned accelerando and crescendo to the final climax.

In Wagnerian music Koussevitzky gives ent to his temperamental qualities. The Ride of the Valkyries," with its expreson of storm violence, the prelude to Lohengrin," presenting a total contrast the approach to earth of angels bearing the Holy Grail, and the final overture to "Rienzi," of grand, martial character, gave the conductor opportunities which were richly realized. At the concert's close Koussevitzky and orchestra received an ovation.

A. F. P.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 2 2 1925

Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes has as her week-end guests Mr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Koussevitzky is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
MAR 22 1925

Serge Koussevitzky

Distinguished conductor, whose appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians Wednesday night, will be a brilliant climax to the music events of the winter.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN
MAR 22 1925

At the Boston symphony orchestra concert Koussewitsky played an uninspired symphony by Glazounov, a symphonic poem by Rabaud called "La Procession Nocturne" (a not very modern work of some emotional beauty) and Strauss' "Dance of Salome." But for me the crux of the afternoon was Albert Spalding's exquisite playing of Bach's concerto in E major for violin and orchestra. Rarely beautiful and reposeful was the adagio, with the lovely deliberative phrases of the solo instrument singing gravely over the reiterated figure in the accompaniment. The first and last movements were lucid and vigorous, with clearly-defined rhythmical patterns. Spalding's deep-throated tone throughout was a panacea for the ills of existence. Here is an American who is attaining his majority as a ripe artist and coming into his own in public appreciation. The audience acclaimed his playing with warmest enthusiasm.

It is hard to understand why a country which spends so much money on music as America does should acknowledge native artists so tardily and foreign ones so eagerly. As I listened to a Philharmonic concert today I remembered that Teodore Spiering conducted the Philharmonic orchestra for a third of a season at the time of Mahler's breakdown. Spiering, at that time concert master, stepped into the breach so successfully that there was no dissenting voice among the critics as to his fitness for the place. [illegible] he was an American and the di- [illegible] had not the courage to appoint him permanently. So he went abroad and got an orchestra and a reputation. Spiering is recognised as a distinguished musical personality. He is, moreover, a man of culture and high ideals—and he is an American.

SAN DIEGO, CAL.
UNION
MAR 22 1925

MUSIC PARADE

New York surely does not stint the public in its supply of music. What a quantity, and how infinite the variety! The Philharmonic, New York, Philadelphia and Boston symphony orchestra have been playing away during recent days with almost no cessation. And mostly it has been music worth hearing, and superlatively played. Mengelberg, Walter and Stokowski are sterling musicians and conductors; I cannot enthuse so much over Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK
TIMES
MAR 22 1925

Final visits for the season are scheduled by the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall on April 9 and 11 and by the Philadelphia Orchestra on April 14.

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 23 1925

Interest Is Great In Symphony Concert

Serge Koussevitzky And Boston Orchestra To Appear Here Wednesday

The appearance of Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city Wednesday is anticipated with keenest interest.

Never was the advent of a conductor in this country awaited with greater eagerness than was Koussevitzky's last Fall, and expectations regarding him have been fully realized. His success, indeed, has been so great as to be absolutely unprecedented.

His greatest fame has been won in the interpretation of such composers as Wagner and Berlioz, and both are to be included in his local program.

Koussevitzky has a triple fame in the scope of his interpretations. Some praise him most highly for his readings of the classical masters, which are fresh and engrossing. No one can instill a more vivid and beautiful life in the music of the 18th century. Koussevitzky, the romanticist, also is irresistible. The fervors of Wagner or Berlioz or Tohaikevsky flame gloriously under his baton. Then there is the third angle to his striking achievements—his flair for the music of the modern schools.

PROGRAM OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCH. CONCERT MARCH 25

Director Koussevitzky Plans to Appeal to All Tastes

Standing out pre-eminent among the concert events of the Winter is the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the City Hall Auditorium Wednesday evening.

This event gains interest from many sources. One of these is the fact that it is the only incursion into the concert field that has been made this Winter by the Portland Music Commission. Large numbers of people in this City have been subscribers each year to the municipal music course, and this year when the course has narrowed down to a single concert they are sure to be out in large numbers to attend the Boston Symphony concert.

Again the concert of interest because it offers Portland and Maine people their first opportunity to greet that great genius of the baton, Serge Koussevitzky, whose name has been ringing the length and breadth of the American music world throughout the Winter.

A man who has attained the brilliant worldwide reputation of Koussevitzky cannot but be the object of interest and even curiosity when he pays his first visit to a section.

Again the concert is of interest because the Boston Symphony Orchestra is said to have gained phenomnally under Koussevitzky's direction till it is capable of attaining effects that in spite of its reputation and achievements it never gained before.

Koussevitzky's concert is therefore of absorbing interest from a musical and from an emotional angle, for with the wizardry of his baton the famous conductor is sure to evoke emotional response to the playing of his orchestra.

Koussevitzky has selected the program for his Portland engagement with great care, and it reveals him in varied moods.

As an interpreter of Russian music and particularly of modern Russian music, he is far famed. As a Wagnerian conductor he is almost equally noted. There will be two modern Russian numbers, two Wagnerian numbers, and the remainder of the program will incline to the gay and the brilliant.

The program will allow an intermission of 10 minutes and the two Wagner numbers will follow this intermission. In the early part of the program will be given, the Roman Carnival Overture of Berlioz, and the two Russian selections, which are quite different in mood, one, from Rimsky-Korsakov, being a scherzo of the lightest and daintiest order, while the other from Moussorgsky is of the exotic and colorful type. Other selections more attuned to the classic will round out an interesting program.

HOUSTON, TEXAS
CHRONICLE
MAR 22 1925

The Music Parade.

New York surely does not stint the public in its supply of music. What a quantity, and how infinite the variety! The Philharmonic, New York, Philadelphia and Boston symphony orchestras have been playing away during recent days with almost no cessation. And mostly it has been music worth hearing, and superlatively played. Mengelberg, Walter and Stokowski are sterling musicians and conductors; I can not enthuse so much over Koussevitzy.

Then Wanda Landowska gave us a harpischord program of aristocratic beauty and elegance; tinkly music interpreted with flawless technique and equally flawless taste. Cecilia Hansen's violin recital left pleasureable recollections, for this young artiste is maturing steadily and must be pronounced one of the foremost in her art.

I discovered some novel effects in the new Stringwood Ensemble (a body of instrumentalists composed, as the title suggests, of strings and woodwinds); a fine bit of playing was heard during the Elshuco Trio concert, and Louis Graveure delighted my sense of good singing by his finished vocalism and authoritative style.

Dainty Maria Ivogun also appeared and, as usual with her, she charmed her listeners. If this soprano would adhere more to a smooth vocal line and concede less to what she recognizes as the "popular demand" she could take with me a higher place than I now accord her. Still, she "gets" her audiences. Which prompts me to wonder what is to become of our singing greatness . . . . if those who are capable of it will not insist on doing what they readily can do.

(Copyright, 1925, by P. V. R. Key.)

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 23 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

As a fitting climax to the concerts under the auspices of the Providence Music League, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, yesterday afternoon concluded the series at the E. F. Albee Theatre.

Designed to assist in the development of musical appreciation in this community among the many who ordinarily do not attend concerts which provide highest attainment in vocal and instrumental music, the series has proved an unqualified success.

This is the third year of the Music League's activities in cultural work and, as in preceding seasons, public response has been extremely gratifying to the sponsors of the movement. Audiences which filled the big theatre have thoroughly enjoyed and enthusiastically applauded programmes arranged to please the average musical taste and at the same time feature music by the greatest composers of vocal and instrumental music.

Yesterday's programme did not include a symphony; in place of this usual number at Boston Symphony concerts Conductor Koussevitzky played the well-known Grieg "Peer Gynt" suite. With this, the Weber overture to "Oberon," pieces by Russian composers and excerpts from Wagnerian operas formed a list of numbers which offered excellent variety.

The programme was played as follows:

Weber..................Overture to "Oberon"
Moussorgsky..............................
......Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina"
Rimsky-Korsakov.."The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo, from the "Tsar Saltan"
Grieg.................................Suite No. 1
from the incidental music to "Peer Gynt"
Morning Mood.
Aase's Death.
Anitra's Dance.
In the Troll King's Grotto.
Wagner................................"The Ride of the Valkyries," from "The Valkyrie"
Wagner...............Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Wagner.................Overture to "Rienzi"

Mr. Koussevitzky's players were present in full strength, although but one number, "The Ride of the Valykries," called for the entire orchestral force. The "Oberon" overture and Rimsky-Korsakov's little descriptive piece, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," were repetitions of numbers played by the Boston orchestra at previous appearances at these concerts.

Whtaever Koussevitzky elects to play is made thoroughly enjoyable by the splendid technical finish he exacts of his men. Whether in the nimble finger work required in the violins in picturing the bumble bee's rapid flight or in the measures of Wagner where the entire orchestra joins in a storm of harmony, there is splendid unanimity of effort. This, however, is but the foundation upon which the imaginative Russian builds. It is his sense of beauty, of proportion, of fine contrast, that grips one's attention and carries the delighted listener through each musical story.

The Grieg suite offers an example this artistic ability. Koussevitzky's rea ing of this work is one of keen apprecia tion of contrasted moods. Unlike concep tions of this popular suite at the hand of many conductors, Koussevitzky's read ing is extremely delicate in the use o tonal contrast. He paints in colors tha charm by their softness, their effectiv blending. This, of course, is particularl noticeable in the first three movements.

The "Morning Mood" pictured the fres sweetness of flowers upon which gentl fall the sun's first rays. The quiet sti ring of nature, newly awakened, was deli cately traced in lovely tonal tints, and delicious breath of summer morning a came in the soft harmony which rose a the command of his baton.

At the final notes of "Aase's Death" on scarcely could tell when the mus ceased, so perfect was the gradual d crescendo. "Anitra's Dance" was mad light, shadowy, and the chase in the ha of the mountain king, which concludes th suite, was played with finely proportione accelerando and crescendo to the fin climax.

In Wagnerian music Koussevitzky give vent to his temperamental qualities. Th "Ride of the Valkyries," with its expres sion of storm violence, the prelude t "Lohengrin," presenting a total contras in the approach to earth of angels bear ing the Holy Grail, and the final over ture to "Rienzi," of grand, martial char acter, gave the conductor opportunities which were richly realized. At the concert's close Koussevitzky and orchestra received an ovation.

A. F. P.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAR 23 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCLUDES SERIES

Providence Music League Concerts Have Fitting Climax.

As a fitting climax to the concerts under the auspices of the Providence Music League, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, yesterday afternoon concluded the series at the E. F. Albee Theatre.

Designed to assist in the development of musical appreciation in this community among the many who ordinarily do not attend concerts which provide highest attainment in vocal and instrumental music, the series has proved an unqualified success.

This is the third year of the Music League's activities in cultural work and, as in preceding seasons, public response has been extremely gratifying to the sponsors of the movement. Audiences which filled the big theatre have thoroughly enjoyed and enthusiastically applauded programmes arranged to please the average musical taste and at the same time feature music by the greatest composers of vocal and instrumental music.

Yesterday's programme did not include a symphony; in place of this usual number at Boston Symphony concerts Conductor Koussevitzky played the well-known Grieg "Peer Gynt" suite. With this, the Weber overture to "Oberon," pieces by Russian composers and excerpts from Wagnerian operas formed a list of numbers which offered excellent variety.

The programme was played as follows:

Weber..................Overture to "Oberon"
Moussorgsky..............................
......Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina"
Rimsky-Korsakov.."The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo, from the "Tsar Saltan"
Grieg.................................Suite No. 1
from the incidental music to "Peer Gynt"
Morning Mood.
Aase's Death.
Anitra's Dance.
In the Troll King's Grotto.
Wagner................................"The Ride of the Valkyries," from "The Valkyrie"
Wagner...............Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Wagner.................Overture to "Rienzi"

Mr. Koussevitzky's players were present in full strength, although but one number, "The Ride of the Valykries," called for the entire orchestral force. The "Oberon" overture and Rimsky-Korsakov's little descriptive piece, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," were repetitions of numbers played by the Boston orchestra at previous appearances at these concerts.

Whatever Koussevitzky elects to play is made thoroughly enjoyable by the splendid technical finish he exacts of his men. Whether in the nimble finger work required in the violins in picturing the bumble bee's rapid flight or in the measures of Wagner where the entire orchestra joins in a storm of harmony, there is splendid unanimity of effort. This, however, is but the foundation upon which the imaginative Russian builds. It is his sense of beauty, of proportion, of fine contrast, that grips one's attention and carries the delighted listener through each musical story.

The Grieg suite offers an example of this artistic ability. Koussevitzky's reading of this work is one of keen appreciation of contrasted moods. Unlike conceptions of this popular suite at the hands of many conductors, Koussevitzky's reading is extremely delicate in the use of tonal contrast. He paints in colors that charm by their softness, their effective blending. This, of course, is particularly noticeable in the first three movements.

The "Morning Mood" pictured the fresh sweetness of flowers upon which gently fall the sun's first rays. The quiet stirring of nature, newly awakened, was delicately traced in lovely tonal tints, and a delicious breath of summer morning air came in the soft harmony which rose at the command of his baton.

At the final notes of "Aase's Death" one scarcely could tell when the music ceased, so perfect was the gradual decrescendo. "Anitra's Dance" was made light, shadowy, and the chase in the hall of the mountain king, which concludes the suite, was played with finely proportioned accelerando and crescendo to the final climax.

In Wagnerian music Koussevitzky gives ent to his temperamental qualities. The Ride of the Valkyries," with its expreson of storm violence, the prelude to ohengrin," presenting a total contrast the approach to earth of angels bearing the Holy Grail, and the final overture to "Rienzi," of grand, martial character, gave the conductor opportunities which were richly realized. At the concert's close Koussevitzky and orchestra received an ovation.

A. F. P.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 22 1925

Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes has as her week-end guests Mr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Koussevitzky is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

66

BANGOR
ME.
COMMERCIAL
MAR 23 1925

nearly [illegible] dead Sunday, with the village never will be re-built.

Boston Symphony Always Has Widespread Appeal

A striking and unusual feature of a Boston Symphony concert is the fact that it makes an appeal to practically everybody. Many excellent types of concerts appeal only to a limited few who have a considerable degree of technical musical education. Not so, however, with the symphony. Even the non-musical find it interesting.

There is, for instance, no better example afforded of perfection of control and restraint than that which may be gained by watching the director of a great orchestra conduct a concert. The business executive who attends the concert given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in Portland Wednesday evening of this week cannot fail to be impressed with this fact.

Every one of Koussevitzky's 104 musicians must be en rapport with his leader, must be instantly responsive to his baton, or to his word of command. The morale which he gains would be invaluable in the condust of a big business enterprise. Yet how many men exercise this perfection of control?

When one of Koussevitzky's musicions fails to comprehend his meaning, or is unable at first attempt to get the effect he desires, Koussevitzky cannot storm and rave. He must work steadily and painstakingly with him until finally his difficulties are conquered. And this absence of temperamentality in one who is supposed to be following a temperamental profession will again present a lesson to the business man that he cannot ignore.

Koussevitzky and his musicians will present in Portland Wednesday evening a program somewhat more on the popular order than many they play with two of the best loved of Wagner selections for good measure.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS
MAR 24 1925

BRIEF GOSSIP

All tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert which have been reserved but are unpaid for, and are not called for by tonight will be placed on sale at the City Hall box office Wednesday morning.

The numbers will include Hayden's Symphony in G. Major, the Roman Carnival Overature of Berlioz, Moussorgsky's Prelude to Khovantchina, Rimsky-Korsakov's The Flight of the Bumble Bee from Tsar Saltan, Bacchanale from Wagner's Tannhuaser, and Prelude to Wagner's Mastersingers of Nuremberg.

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS
MAR 23 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Delights Audience

Hundreds of Providence music lovers, who were delighted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today agreed that Sunday's concert was a fitting climax to the series given in the Albee Theatre this season under the auspices of the Providence Music League.

The league, designed to assist in the development of musical appreciation in this community, has achieved unqualified success, as in the past two years public response to the league's activities in cultural work has been gratifying.

The Symphony Orchestra yesterday was under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. His players were present in full strength although but one number called for the efforts of the entire orchestral force.

The programme was played as follows: Overture to "Oberon," Weber; prelude to opera "Khovantchina," "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo, from the "Tsar Saltan," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Suite No. 1," Grieg, from the incidental music to "Peer Gynt," "Morning Mood," "Aase's Death," "Anitra's Dance," "In the Troll King's Grotto," Grieg; "The Ride of the Valkyries," from "The Valkyrie," Wagner; prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; overture to "Rienzi," Wagner.

BANGOR
ME.
NEWS
MAR 23 1925

RUSSIAN MUSIC IS SYMPHONY FEATURE

A program which will present tremendous appeal not only to hundreds of music students throughout the state, but to the general public as well will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at its concert in Portland Wednesday.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Koussevitzky has been dubbed a master of program building, and never did he better demonstrate it than for his Maine engagement.

His program includes Haydn's Symphony in G Major, which is suave, graceful, lively and sure to have tremendous popular appeal; two modern Russian numbers in the interpretation of which the great conductor is said to be particularly happy, two Wagner selections, and the brilliant Roman Carnival Overture of Berlioz.

Haydn ....
Symphony in G Major (B. & H. No. 13)
I. Adagio Allegro.
II. Largo
III. enuetto; Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito.
Berlioz ....
Overture, The Roman Carnival, Op. 9
Moussorgsky ....
.........Prelude to Khovantchina
Rimsky-Korsakov ....
..The Flight of the Bumble Bee
......Scherzo from Tsar Saltan
Wagner ....
..Bacchanale from Tannhauser
Wagner ....
Prelude to the Mastersingers of Nuremberg.

With a proposal of marriage for every year of her 18 years of life, Margaret Hepburn, of Jamaica, L. I., is planning a party and will invite all her suitors with the view of looking them over.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS
MAR 23 1925

GREAT INTEREST IN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

On the eve of the Boston Symphony concert interest is rapidly mounting in the appearance of Serge Koussevitzky and his 104 musicians in this City.

From other cities continue to come laudations of the great Russian conductor, and the program he has chosen for his Portland engagement is spoken of with great enthusiasm.

The second number on this Portland program of Koussevitzky's will be Berlioz's Roman Carnival Overture which was played at Koussevitzky's debut concert in Boston.

At that time Warren Storey-Smith referred to it in the Boston Post as "a performance that for expressiveness and corruscating brilliance must have come to each individual in the hall as a revelation both of the potentialities of Berlioz's thrice familiar music and of the powers and the prowess of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Throughout the season it has been repeatedly demonstrated that Koussevitzky has the power of taking a selection that seemed dull under other conductors and bringing out in it a life and beauty that even musicians had not suspected lurked there. This means that there is never a dull moment on any Koussevitzky program, no matter what its make-up.

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS
MAR 24 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY IS OPEN TO JUDGMENT IN CHOICE MUSIC

Neither Modernist Nor Classicist, Symphony Leader Explains

Before Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who comes to Portland for a concert on Wednesday evening, arrived in this Country to take up the Boston Symphony baton, he gave an interview to an American music critic in Paris in which he outlined his belief with regard to programs.

"I would like to make it clear," he said, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done.

"As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time."

Koussevitzky faithfully lives up to these doctrines in the concert program he is presenting in Portland. It will have a bit of the classic mood in a Haydn symphony; it will have a touch of the romantic in Berlioz's Roman Carnival Overture; it will have the modern in Rimsky-Korsakov's Flight of the Bumble Bee and Moussorgsky's Prelude to Khovantchina; and it will have the drama and colorful gorgeousness of Wagner in the Bacchanale from Tannhauser and the Prelude to Die Meisteriners.

Koussevitzky and the 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra come to Portland under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission in its only concert of the winter season for which admission has been charged.

LEWISTON,
ME.
JOURNAL
MAR 24 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS INTERESTING PROGRAM

Conductor Koussevitzky Has Something to Please All in Portland Concert

A striking and unusual feature of a Boston Symphony concert is the fact that it makes an appeal to practically everybody. Many excellent types of concerts appeal only to a limited few who have a considerable degree of technical musical education. Not so, however, with the smyphony. Even the non-musical find it interesting.

There is, for instance, no better example afforded of perfection of control and restraint than that which may be gained by watching the director of a great orchestra conduct a concert. The business executive who attends the concert given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in Portland Wednesday evening of this week cannot fail to be impressed with this fact.

Every one of Koussevitzky's 104 musicians must be en rapport with his leader, must be instantly responsive to his baton, or to his word of command. The morale which he gains would be invaluable in the conduct of a big business enterprise. Yet how many men exercise this perfection of control?

When one of Koussevitzky's musicians fails to comprehend his meaning, or is unable at first attempt to get the effect he desires, Koussevitzky cannot storm and rave. He must work steadily and painstakingly with him until finally his difficulties are conquered. And this absence of temperamentality in one who is supposed to be following a temperamental profession will again present a lesson to the business man that he cannot ignore.

Koussevitzky and his musicians will present in Portland Wednesday evening a program somewhat more on the popular order than many they play, with two of the best loved of Wagner selections for good measure. The numbers will include Haydn's Symphony in G Major, the Roman Carnival Overture of Berlioz, Moussorgsky's Prelude to Khovantchina, Rimsky-Korsakov's The Flight of the Bumble Bee from Tsar Saltan, Bacchanale from Wagner's Tannhauser, and Prelude to Wagner's Mastersingers of Nuremberg.

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 24 1925

Koussevitzky Free From Traditions In Conducting Boston Symphony

With Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to appear in this city tomorrow night, it is interesting to read some of Koussevitzky's comments upon the interpretative art. That his interpretations are distinctive is agreed generally. Why they are distinctive will be conveyed in the following quotation from him:

"As for interpreting the classics, I will tell you at once that often I cannot accept with sincerity traditional practices. I think tradition has often been very destructive to masterpieces of earlier periods than ours.

"I have known, for example, more than one great German conductor deliberately to make changes of instrumentation in Beethoven which were not proportionate nor characteristic of the score. Such an instance is the doubling of the horns in the trio of the scherzo of the Er Symphony. I do not agree with at all. It is not in tonal proportio the rest of that mysterious and ous movement.

"I do not do this. I do other thi which may be further from accej conventions. After careful study a score I can only express my victions in my performances."

This departure from traditio one of the things that always sures an interesting performanc the Boston Symphony when Ko vitzky wields the baton. An thing that makes him interestin a conductor is the fact that he wedded to any one school.

"I am neither modernist classicist in my musical prefere he says. "The works of the classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me as a musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them but I. But music is not a static art. And it is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done."

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS
MAR 24 1925

ANNOUNCE PROGRAM BOSTON SYMPHONY

Much interest will greet the announcement for the first time today of the program of the concert to be given in this City tomorrow evening at City Hall Auditorium by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

The program opens with a Haydn symphony, gives two Russian and two Wagnerian numbers, and a selection from Berlioz.

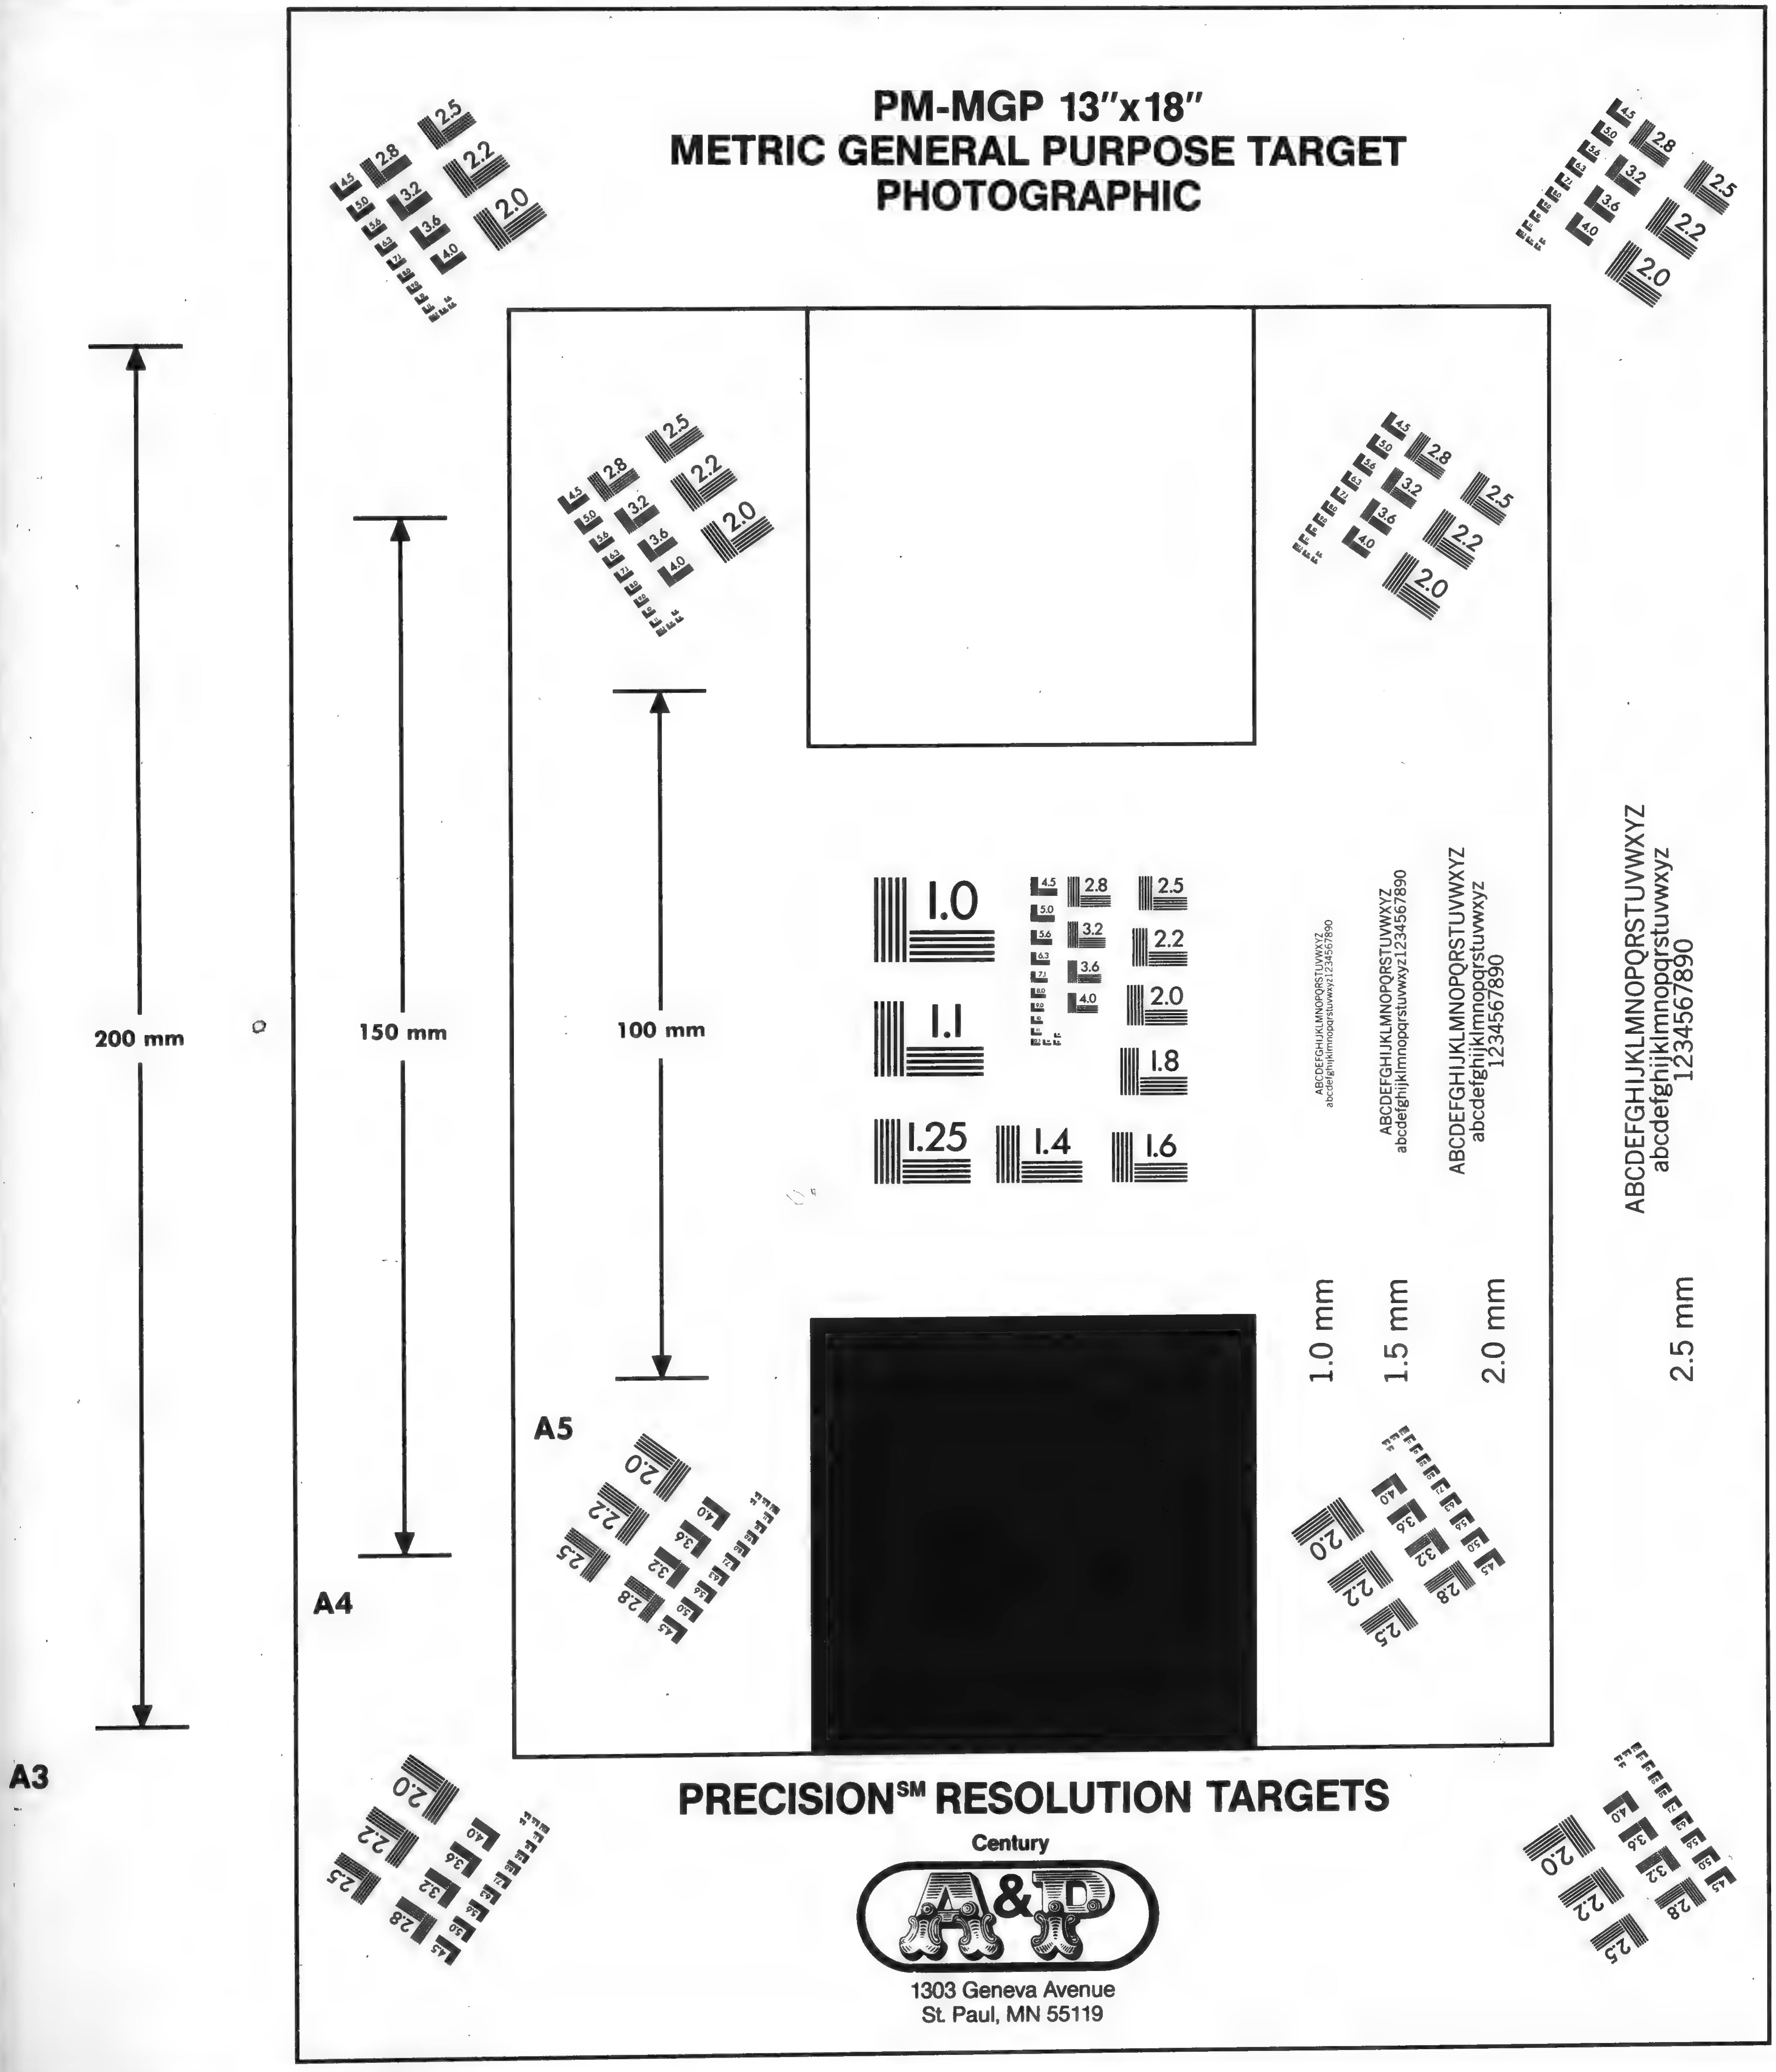
The arrangement is as follows:

Haydn ....
Symphony in G Major (B. & H. No. 13).
I. Adagio Allegro
II. Largo
III. Menuetto: Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito.
Berlioz ....
Overture, The Roman Carnival, Op. 9
Moussorgsky ....
.... Prelude to Khovantchina
Rimsky-Korsakov ....
The Flight of the Bumble Bee, Scherzo from Tsar Saltan.
Intermission of 10 Minutes
Wagner ....
.... Bacchanale from Tannhauser
Wagner ....
Prelude to The Mastersingers of Nuremberg.

REDUCTION RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS
MAR 2 5 1925

Boston Music Critics Lavish High Praise on Koussevitzky's Program

Leadership of Symphony Orchestra and Brilliant Performance of Musicians Lauded to High Degree For Same Performance to Be Heard in City Hall This Evening

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Famous Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Just what Portland concert-goers may expect from Serge Koussevitzky and the 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight is eloquently revealed by Boston's criticisms on the very program he is to present here. These criticisms cannot but lead one to the conclusion that an evening of rare delight is to be anticipated.

Philip Hale, commenting on the opening number, Haydn's Symphony in G Major, says:

"Haydn's Symphony is one of a set written for the Concert de la Loge Olympique in Paris. The orchestration of this society was famous for its precision of attack. Haydn wrote, no doubt, with a view to French taste, having in mind grace, suavity and liveliness. The performances yesterday were a constant pleasure to the ear. The composer's gayety was not merely careless rollicking. There were subtle and effective nuances in the interpretation of the opening quick movements and the Finale. The second movement was taken at so deliberate a pace that one feared at first consequent tedium, but the richly sonorous song was made vital; there was sustained interest, and the tempo chosen gave the needed contrast to the preceding and following movements. The trio in the minuet was charming in itself and delightfully played, reminding one of musettes so dear to the French composers in the 18th century."

The second number on the Portland program, Berlioz's Roman Carnival Overture, figured on Koussevitzky's debut concert in Boston, when Warren Storey-Smith called it, in the Boston Post, "a performance that for expressiveness and corruscating brilliance must have come to each individual in the hall as a revelation both of the potentialities of Berlioz's thrice-familiar music and of the powers and the prowess of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

The two Russian numbers of Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov were thus described by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald, October 25:

"Then came the Prelude to Khovantchina, noteworthy for exotic melody and "atmosphere." And just before the Suite was The Flight of the Bumble Bee, which in Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera rises from the sea to buzz around the Swan-maiden; a dazzling virtuoso piece, played brilliantly by the orchestra, with Mr. Laurent noteworthy in solo passages. It was a great afternoon for Russia.

The coming concert will end with Wagnerian excerpts from Tannhauser and The Mastersingers. Among Koussevitzky's most impressive interpretations are his readings of this master as attested by Penfield Roberts in his description of the Mastersinger's Prelude in the Boston Globe, March 1st:

"The Meistersingers prelude is one of the most gorgeous bits of musical tapestry in existence. Koussevitzky brought out the color in every thread of the polyphony. He remembered, and made his hearers remember with him, the dramatic values in the comedy foreshadowed by the music of the prelude. He, as is his wont, grasped the large outlines of the piece without slurring over a single detail. So to transfigure one of the most familiar numbers in the orchestral repertory that a performance of it is an event to the most callous of listeners is the height of a conductor's achievement."

PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
25 1925

Boston Symphony To Play Here Tonight

Will Be Portland Debut of Serge Koussevitzky, The Leader

"The fervors of Wagner or Berlioz flame gloriously under his baton," is said of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra who makes his Portland debut in a concert at City Hall Auditorium tonight under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission.

But there is another angle to Koussevitsky's achievements. No one can instill a more vivid and beautiful life into the music of the 18th century. Nor for that matter does any conductor scrutinize more eagerly nor champion more staunchly and understandingly the truly important music of today and tomorrow.

Koussevitsky in these three roles: romanticist (with music from Wagner and Berlioz); classicist (with music from Haydn), and modernist (with music from Rimsky-Korsakov and Moussorgsky) will be revealed to the huge audience at City Hall tonight.

Koussevitsky's fame has preceded him, and there is every reason to believe that in a program of unusual worth he will attract the concert-going public en toto.

Through the courtesy of the Chief of the fire department, automobile parking for attendants at the Boston Symphony concert will be allowed on Market, Pearl and Federal Street sides of the Central Fire Station lot.

Transcript
Mar. 26

om Mr. Koussevitzky for the supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening next in Symphony Hall:

Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" .... Chaikovsky
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in G major, No. 4 .... Beethoven
Scherzo from the Incidental Music to Shakspeare's Play, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Prelude to the Opera, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Salome's Dance from the Opera, "Salome" .... Strauss

In the concerto, Miss Myra Hess, playing for the first time in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra, will take the piano-part. Hence no small inquiry for tickets to a concert at which subscribers leave not a vacant place.

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, April 3, and Saturday evening, April 4, in Symphony Hall:

Suite in E major for String Orchestra ... Foote
Chinese Legend: A Dance Poem ...... Eichheim
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra ... Schumann
Concerto in D major for Piano and Orchestra .... Tailleferre
Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman." .... Franck

Mr. Foote's Suite is a remembered and grateful music timely revived. Mr. Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" is his newest experiment in the adaptation of oriental scales, harmonies, dissonances and timbres to an occidental orchestra. Mr. Bolm's Ballet In time mimed the tale in Chicago last December to the music played, in reduced version by Mr. de Lamarter's Chamber Orchestra. In January the performance was described in these columns. For both Concertos, Mr. Cortot will be pianist. Mademoiselle Tailleferre's is a recent piece by the ingénue of the Parisian "Six."

From Mr. Heifetz, the violinist, returning to Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon next, with Mr. Achron for pianist:

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS
MAR 2 6 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra With New Leader Delights Portland

Koussevitzky Has Brought Organization to Its Full Eloquence—Enraptured Audience Enjoys Program Classics, Modern Works and Interesting Novelties

The long anticipated concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now an affair of the past and it is safe to say that City Hall never held a more enraptured audience than that which filed away from the hall last evening at just before the hour of 10, after nearly two hours of wonderful musicianship. The audience was a very large one, though the house was not entirely sold out. The program given was a very wonderful one — one chosen with skill and of a variety which included classics, modern works and interesting novelties.

The orchestra was never in finer form and, though no inducement was needed to tempt people to a feast of this order, there was of course great interest and curiosity regarding the brilliant Russian conductor, Koussevitzky, who last Autumn took up his baton with the orchestra at the beginning of its 44th season.

A beautiful symphony by Haydn, which brought surpassing enjoyment; an unusual arrangement of "Tannhauser" music (the Paris version of the "Bacchanale"); a beautiful descriptive Russian piece; one dainty novelty, the "Bumble Bee" scherzo; a brilliant standard overture, "The Roman Carnival", by Berlioz, and a superb "Meistersingers" Prelude made up this rare treat in high class orchestral music. There was a wealth of exquisite melody in the program and the audience was the most applausive in years and was of the calibre to appreciate the merit and beauty of the evening's offering.

At the close, the hearers were still unsatisfied and would gladly have lingered an hour longer to revel in more of this splendid melody. It is superfluous to speak of the musicianly qualifications of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which long ago attained a standing with the renowned organizations of the world. Each player is a solo artist and the ensemble is marked by the authority which comes from perfect ease and assurance.

Koussevitzky a Great Power With the Orchestra

Portland has for many seasons taken rare delight in the visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, famed as one of the great orchestral organizations of the world. Higginson, orchestral benefactor for a long period, made the financial end secure, and, throughout its career of 44 years, the orchestra has maintained great prestige. Through all its vicissitudes, under its various conductors the standard has been high and now it remains for the brilliant young Russian leader to free this noted band of the shackles of conventionality, of certain limitations induced by narrow directorship, and give scope to untrameled thought, unrestricted feeling and the lure of the modern. There is evolution in music as in every other field and, under Koussevitzky's daring and contempt for tradition, the orchestra has reached its full eloquence.

The handsome, forceful and magnetic Russian conductor, who has made such a profound impression since arriving in this Country last October, was a great power in his own land and in European countries for many seasons before sailing to take up his baton with the Boston organization. He organized orchestras and traveled to remote parts of Russia to spread music through the country. He has been an honored guest conductor with the famous orchestras of Europe. His whole career has been one of remarkable distinction and, as an orchestral leader, as well as a courteous gentleman who wins respect in all quarters, Serge Koussevitzky occupies an enviable position in the regard of the world today.

Destroys "No-Encore" Precedent

In his style of conducting Koussevitzky breaks away from routine and destroys precedent. He brings out new beauties in familiar passages and is a most marvelous interpreter. He has even been known to play an encore as in the first instance of Rimsky-Karsakov's "Flight of the Bumble Bee," given so brilliantly last evening. This happened at one of the early concerts in Boston Symphony Hall, when, after the captivating performance of this novelty, the applause was so intense and so long continued that, after stilling the audience with a gesture, the bumble bee was once more put in flight, destroying a no-encore precedent of 43 years.

Koussevitzky's brilliant Paris concerts were in progress when he was called to this Country.

Portland has for many years regarded the coming of the Symphony as an annual feast but it is safe to say that the magnificence of last night's occasion has never been equalled.

Orchestra Traveled by Special Train

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Portland by special train and returned directly after the concert. There was no lingering in the lobbies and Portlanders were not permitted a personal glimpse of the forceful and famous Russian conductor, who made such a splendid impression at the concert last evening. Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony, advanced on the stage shortly after 8 o'clock, and made his way unobtrusively through the orchestral places with an appearance of extreme dignity. Slightly older in looks, than his pictures show, Koussevitzky's hair is tinged with gray, but his bearing is erect, his figure finely proportioned and, in every way, he exerted a most fascinating influence. The Russian leader conducts with incisive directness, the motions of his body and the waving movements of his arms carrying on the air in as realistic a manner as the waves of melody which come from the instruments. With a pointed hand he picks out passages from the various groups of instruments and new beauties are brought out under his marvelous leadership.

Haydn Symphony Opens Program

The work chosen to open this splendid concert was Haydn's Symphony in G Minor and this performance gave the rarest pleasure. Here the extremely beautiful "Largo," rich in melody, made strong appeal and the other movements, the Adagio and Allegro, the Menuetto with Trio, and the Finale were given with a breadth and a sweep and a brilliancy that held the big audience spellbound.

Berlioz' Overture, "The Roman Carnival," the second programmed number has striking color contrasts, strongly emphasized rhythm, dramatic brilliance and a tremendous fortissimo finale that brought round after round of applause. This work has been one of the gems of the first-season repertoire under Kousevitsky and, after its initial performance in Boston, has been chosen for orchestra programs in cities visited, always with great success. The Russian conductor is the last word in generosity and invariably insists that his musicians share with him the applause, as was th ecase in this and every instance of the evening.

Mr. Koussevitsky received many recalls and repeatedly bowed in his courtly manner, acknowledging the wild tributes of enthusiasm which would not be stilled. Throughout the evening there was a succession of "thrills."

Russian Music Superb Offering.

The Prelude to Khowantchina, an opera by Moussorgsky, colorful and fascinating, describes the coming of dawn in the Kremlin at Moscow. The theme is depicted with much realism and here the finale is given almost pianissimo, ending with a single note, a most unusual writing.

The descriptive phrase used by most reviewers in writing of the much discussed Flight of the Bumble Bee, by Rimsky-Korsakov, is "elegant lightness," and in this style was the scherzo from this "Fairy Tale of Tsar Sultan" performed. The virtuosity of the orchestra was strikingly displayed in this quite remarkable little piece which was about three minutes in duration. This was repeated after vociferous applause on the part of the audience.

Portland was privileged to hear last evening the Paris version of the "Bacchanale" from Tannhauser (Wagner) and a masterly and inspired performance was given. A note says that Koussevitzky has a "a volcanic temperament under marvelous control."

Here the volcano seemed in evidence and the grand climaxes of the great music drama were marvelous things. The first strains, with the illusive "Venus" motif, plunged the audience into pure enjoyment and, later, the "Dance of the Bacchantes," with its wild revelry, was intoxicating, while the exquisite finale, depicting a scene of mists and pale moonlight, the "Siren Song," with the harp, adding charm, was indescribable in its effect. Here the conducting was wonderful and the love episodes in the drama were given their fullest meaning.

Wagner Lovers Happy.

Wagnerian enthusiasts were made happy by the two performances following intermission, the first being the Tannhauser work described above and the second—and final number on the program—being the superb Meistersingers music, including the famous and familiar Prize Song from the opera, the brilliant Prelude forming a fitting climax to this splendid evening of orchestral compositions — Portland's musical treat of the season.

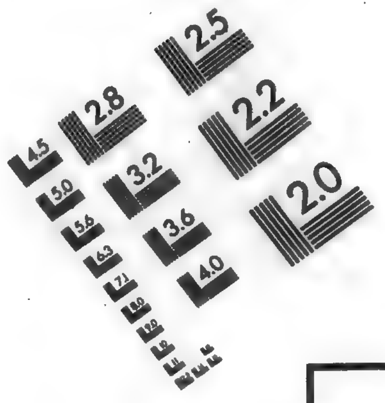
The concert lasted but a little over 1½ hours, and as was before stated, a longer program would have been welcomed by a most appreciative and applausive audience.

Note—In regard to encores in past years given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one woman in last night's audience positively stated that she heard Handel's Largo repeated in the old Boston Music Hall many years ago when Henschel was conducting the orchestra.

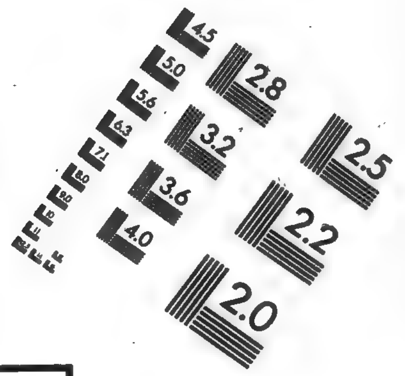
The reviewer recalls a concert in City Hall when the pretty little waltz, Loin de Bal, was encored, Mr. Gericke playing this favorite again at the insistent request of the audience. The no-encore rule, however, (as accounts state), has seldom been broken in the 44 years of the Boston orchestra's existence but it remains to be seen what new rule will will be established by the present leader with his advanced vision.

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

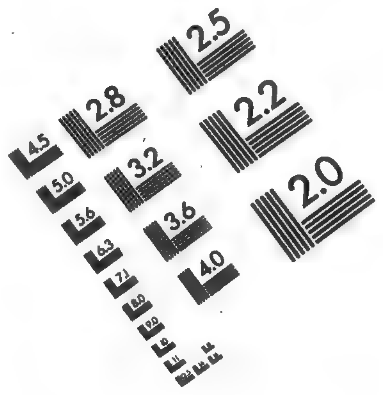
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



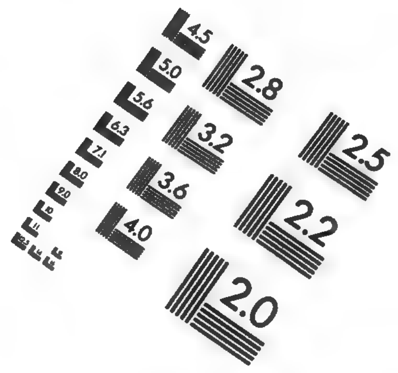
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0



4.5
5.0
2.8
5.6
3.2
2.5
6.3
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0

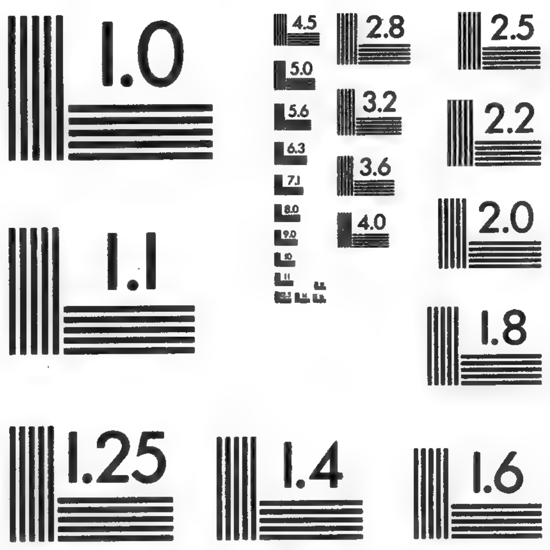


4.5
5.0
2.8
5.6
3.2
2.5
6.3
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
5.6
3.2
2.2
6.3
7.1
3.6
8.0
4.0
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

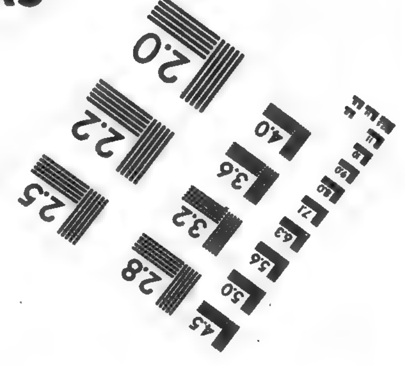
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

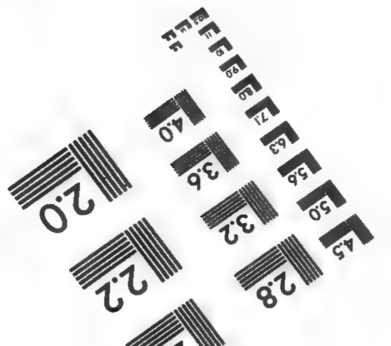
2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5



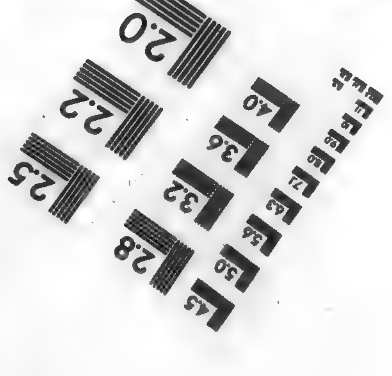
2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5



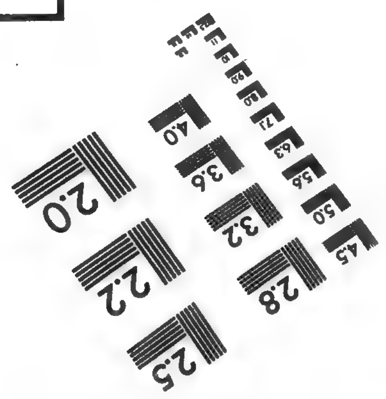
4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
5.0
2.2
2.8
4.5
2.5

A4

A3



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5



4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
5.0
2.2
2.8
4.5
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

68 Transcript
Mar 26

REMOTE COMPOSER, MYSTICAL STAVES, HEEDLESS WORLD

SKRIABIN'S "PROMETHEUS" FROM MR. KOUSSEVITZKY

"The Poem of Fire," Seldom Heard Outside Russia, in New Revelation—A Piece at Odds with Present Times—Substance, Course, Spirit and Suggestion—The Will Within, the Means Without—Subjective Always

FOR the first times in Boston, "Prometheus: The Poem of Fire," Skriabin's final and crowning symphonic music, will be heard at the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday. Save one, every instrument that the composer prescribed will have place in the performance—the vast orchestra, the significant piano, a chorus in passing obbligato. Only the "keyboard of light," devised by Skriabin and originally included in the score, will be put aside. In his later years he conceived a vision of unified media and means of expression. While sound addressed the ear, color should engage the eye; even the nostril might receive the impression of heightening and well timed perfumes. By way of beginning, Skriabin designed for "Prometheus" a "clavier à lumières," manipulated from a keyboard and projecting colors upon a screen. The course and interplay of these colors were to synchronize with the progress of the music, enforcing and illuminating the poetic and idealistic content. In fact, upon the first stave of each page in the score are written the color-notes.

In Moscow, in German cities, in New York, electricians have put together and even improved upon Skriabin's "light-piano." At sundry performances of the tone-poem, expert hands have undertaken to play upon it. Usually the mechanism has failed, or the pianist become confused and bungling. Even when they both did their office, this music of color has distracted more than it impressed. It has seemed arbitrarily imposed, without suggestion to those that saw and heard; more clouding than illuminating a music in itself both clear-voiced and lambent. Long since, by common consent, it was discarded. In the few performances of "Prometheus" in America, the "clavier à lumières" was used only, and impotently, by the Russian Symphony Orchestra in New York ten years ago. Like Mr. Stock in Chicago and Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia, Mr. Koussevitzky is content with an orchestra, a pianist and a choir.

Voice Out of Season

Every Russian leaving his own country to dwell in the Western World [wrote Mr. Boris de Schloezer, the Russian essayist about music now settled in Paris] is amazed at the complete lack of recognition for Skriabin. There is neither curiosity nor debate, praise or blame—only profound indifference. Yet in Russia the influence of Skriabin is so far-reaching that there is scarcely one young composer who has escaped it. Many copy him directly; others seek new fields along the road taken by him late in life; still others attempt to react against him, trying to create in an opposite direction, and yet, proclaiming their "anti-Skriabinism," and invoking Rakhmaninov or Medtner, even they cannot deny the composer of "Prometheus."

Skriabin's power in Russia has many sources, two of which seem to me to be outstanding. First, of all, his effect lies in the spirit, the ecstatic joy which permeates his work, its sorrow, exaltation and madness. His music acts as a sublimation for those forces in our subjective life which, stirred to a high state of tension, sweep us forward in frenzied whirl. And emanating from his music is a mystic atmosphere of philosophic preoccupation, the aura of a new religion. There is a natural and close sympathy between such an art and the apocalyptic dreams that have always held Russia in thrall, and, particularly with the aspirations, the outlook of intellectual Russia today which, thoroughly roused by the Revolution, beholds the collapse of the old world and the birth of a new one.

Those forces which have made Skriabin the unquestionable master of young Russia, also account for the paralysis of his effect elsewhere. The spirit of his music finds no alliance with the spirit of post-war America where one perceives the need of calm, stability, a desire for order, a fear of experiments in every field, in politics, literature, poetry and music. The reigning tendency is traditionalist in the largest sense of that word, embracing nearly all the arts, providing a setting in which Skriabin appears old-fashioned, a démodé anarchist. His supreme fervor is out of season today. His restlessness, his over-reaching desire, his "ecstaticism" are felt as vain agitation, weakness and lack of discipline.

What could be further from the tendencies of the time than the spirit of Skriabin who believes in music as a special magic, and who dreams of a god-like art, the function of which is to re-make man and transfigure nature? The art of Skriabin is profoundly revolutionary, especially in relation to the general culture of the Occident which he both opposes and denies in "Prometheus." Art for him, as for all romanticists, is but a means to intensify life. He does not wish to create things, mere material possessing independent reality, but to achieve a life larger in scope, richer and more powerful. With him it is not a question of increasing mankind's æsthetic patrimony by adding symphony upon symphony, opera upon opera, as one builds houses to fill out the length of a street, or enlarges railway systems by adding a new line, but of developing the subjective life. Could he have achieved this greater life by working through other channels, or by the magic avenue of will-power, Skriabin would have renounced creative art. Moreover, with him, as with Novalis, art tends to fuse completely with the religious ritual. It is well known that the "mystery" of which Skriabin dreamed all his life, and for which he considered his work a mere preparation, was a sort of liturgical act which had for aim the annihilation of humanity in a beatitude of cosmic ecstasy.

"It is obvious that in our life today there is no place for a conception of this kind, not even in the form of a distant dream. But, one might well ask, though the religious and Hindu spirit of Skriabin's art is foreign to modern Europe, why should the artist remain a stranger? His style and musical language, it is true, are conditioned by this spirit, but can one not disassociate the musician from the mystic? Skriabin tends toward an absorption of the melody by the harmony and to a rhythmic suppleness which constantly fuses the most varied meters and avoids all accentuation not heavily marked. In his later music, Skriabin's harmony also loses all tonal character. He does not dream of limiting himself. He chooses to charm and to command, and his themes are either caresses, incantations, commands or rites. But the fundamental divergence between him and the composers of Europe rests in the fact that he attempts to escape the confines of the tempered scale which to him represents merely a last resort, an imperfect means of realizing musical ideas that actually belong to the ultra-chromatic plan. Skriabin, on the other hand, with an harmonic system based on the scale, C, D, E, F-sharp, G, A, B-flat, which reflects, though imperfectly, the series of over-tones, chooses, more or less consciously to voyage on the sea of ultra-chromatics. His experiments, followed to their logical conclusion, would lead either to the sub-division of the semi-tone, or to a transformation even more radical of the present system of acoustics, necessitating new instruments and a new notation. These fundamental hostilities keep Skriabin a stranger to Europe. To be potent, his spirit, and whole method of writing must prevail.

Background and Idea

"Prometheus: The Poem of Fire," succeeding and cumulating Skriabin's "Divine Poem" and his "Poem of Ecstasy," was heard for the first time in any concert-hall at Moscow on March 15, 1911. Two years later, Mrs. Rosa Newmarch, a diligent and sympathetic student of Russian music, wrote of it at length in The Russian Review of London, now swept away in the exhaustless wreckage of the German war. "The Promethean myth," she begins, "is one of the most ancient and suggestive of traditional allegories. The forms are many and the interpretations endless. It was related by Hesiod; but it is far older than the Greeks themselves, and belongs to the dawn of human consciousness. It is most familiar to us through the medium of the 'Prometheus Bound' of Æschylus, and also in Shelley's version of the legend. We most of us think of Prometheus as represented by one or another of the poets, as the hero who in his love and pity for mortals groaning under the hatred of Zeus conveyed to them the gift of fire and taught them arts whereby they might prosper. For his temerity he was afterward horribly punished by the implacable deity whom he had helped to make 'Lord of Gods and of Men.' But it is a very different version of the legend that Scriabin treats in his 'Poem of Fire.' A glance at the design on the cover of the score by Jean Delville, the leader of the Theosophist cult in Belgium, shows us no ordinary conception of the Titan, 'rock-rivetted and chained in height and cold' with the vultures perpetually gnawing at his vitals, but one of that class of adepts symbolized by the Greeks under the name of Prometheans. These 'Sons of the Flame of Wisdom,' who had nothing to do with the physical body, yet everything to do with the purely spiritual man, were alone able to impart to him that sacred spark which expands into the blossom of human intelligence and self-consciousness.

"According to the teaching of theosophy, the nascent races of mankind, not as yet illumined by the gift of Prometheus, were physically incomplete, possessing only the shadow of bodies, sinless because devoid of conscious personality (in theosophical terms 'without Karma'). From this condition of nebulous darkness Prometheus delivered humanity by means of the spark of enlightenment which awakened man's conscious creative power. Those who were most prepared to receive it understood its value, and practised it on the highest spiritual plane. They became the Arhats or Sages, of succeeding generations. Those less highly organized turned it to material uses. Thus the Promethean gift assumed a dual aspect; on the one side it proved a boon; on the other a curse. The music of Skriabin's Prometheus can be heard with interest apart from their esoteric program; but it is difficult to see how anyone can really enter fully into the composer's intentions and follow the complex winding of his thoughts without some knowledge of the sources of his inspiration."

As the Music Passes

"'Prometheus' opens Lento in an atmosphere indicated in the score as 'nebulous' with the characteristic 'mystical' chord G, C-sharp, [illegible]harp, F-sharp, B, A. Sustained tremolos for strings, long-drawn notes for wood-wind and the roll of drums suggest the immaterial, 'Karma-less' condition of primitive humanity. From this somber background emerges an important theme for the horns, marked 'calm and contemplative.' This shadowy, invertebrate state of primordial chaos persists for a while, after which the will of the creative spirit rings out imperiously in a motiv given to the trumpets. Afterwards the brooding atmosphere creeps back, but now it becomes gradually informed with an increasing animation. The theme of contemplation begins to alternate with the imperious motive of creative will, which by this time has passed to the piano. For that instrument, Skriabin writes an important and difficult part in the idiom of his later piano-pieces. As some say, it is [illegible] Voice of Man, answering the orchestra as Voice of the Cosmos.

"The awakening process has begun, and presently a still more joyous figure is heard from the piano, to be played 'in a delicate, crystalline way.' We follow the gradual stirrings of self-consciousness in sexless, Karma-less humanity. But no sooner does Man learn the meaning of this clear, crystalline gladness than he begins to experience languor, and a vague thirst for a more intense vitality, indicated by passages derived from the theme of creative will.

"Human love and desire follow in the wake of the gift of 'Manas' (the Promethean spark). Joy is soon mingled with pain; for the struggle between the physical, and the psychical begins almost at once. The piano expresses this in a passage labelled 'voluptuous, almost with anguish.' To this succeed phrases of 'delight' and of ardent desire.' These are often interrupted by the return of the contemplative theme in varied forms. Another significant motiv proceeds, as 'in a rapture of emotion,' from the flutes and English horn accompanied by trills for the violins. Developed, the effect is veiled and mysterious, especially when we hear the motiv passed to and fro in the wood-wind group against the soft trills of the strings, while kettle-drum and bass drum answer each other in muffled tones.

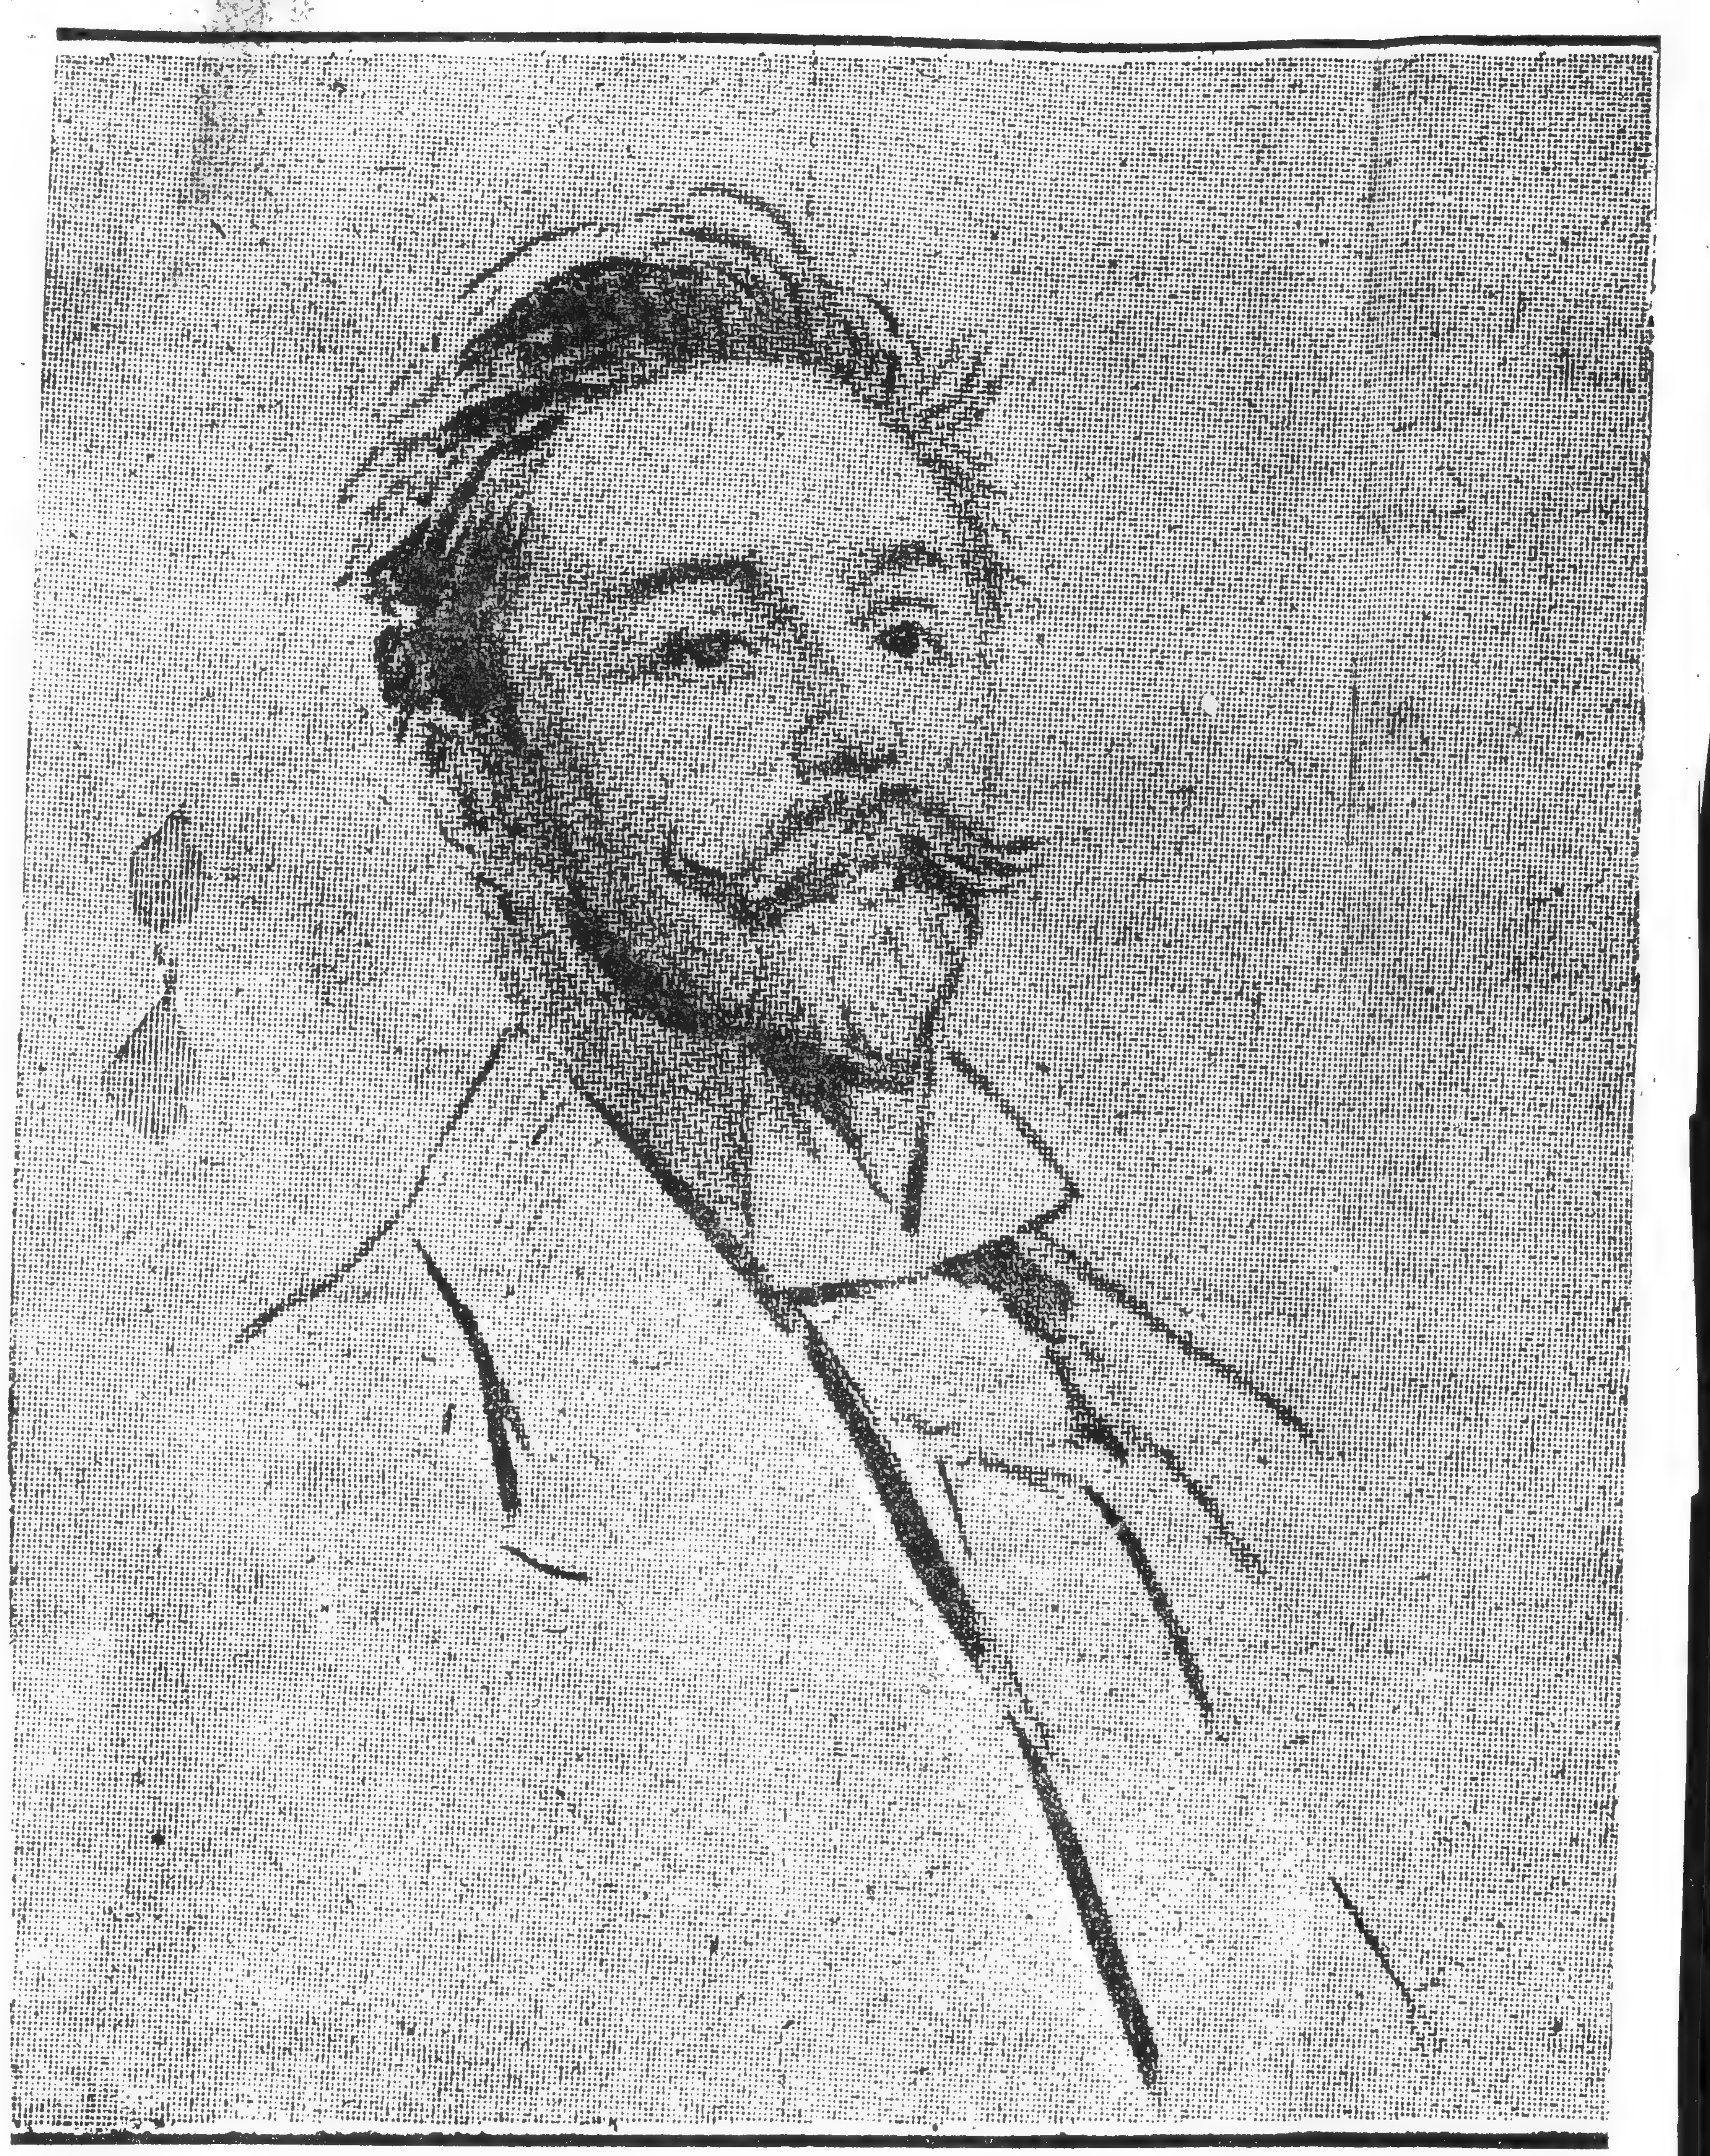
"Another clear and limpid section is suddenly interrupted by a sinister call from the horn, and a dull menacing tremolo in the strings. The piano replies with the motiv of 'rapturous emotion' which is now heard in a new, fitful ryhthm, giving the impression of something 'strange and fascinated.' The recurrence of the motiv of 'creative will' almost invariably heralds some marked emotional change in the music. By-and-by it ushers in the theme of 'rapturous emotion' which now assumes a 'sudden sense of joy and gentleness'; a mood that quickly gives way to a stormy climax, which subsides in its turn in a suggestion of restrained terror. It is impossible to follow in words the many metamorphoses of the thematic material of 'Prometheus.' Moments of rapture alternate with phases of mystery and tenderness, and these moods are subject to sudden interruptions; piercing cries of agony; hints of unearthly horror. But exaltation and bliss increase as the music proceeds. 'Radiant,' 'lambent,' 'piercing,' 'fulgurant,' 'flooding' are Skriabin's guiding words. At last we reach the final ecstasy, and here the chorus enters with what appears to the uninitiated a series of meaningless syllables introduced for mere purpose of vocalization. These syllables (Oeaohoo) form the occult name of the seven-vowelled, ever present manifestation of the Universal Principle. From this point the music becomes a vertiginous dance of rapture, symbolizing probably the merging of the human phase of development in the divine. The symphony ends upon the only simple triad to be found in the score."

Mr. Newman Sums Up

In 1913, at the invitation of Sir Henry Wood, Skriabin visited London and "Prometheus" was twice played by the Queen's Hall Orchestra, with the composer taking the piano-part. Now in those days, Mr. Ernest Newman was not the elderly reactionary with a closed mind who has lately been amusing himself in New York. He was receptive to all that was new, strange, provocative and promising in music, and wrote accordingly. Of "Prometheus," in The Nation, he then said: "One could foresee that 'Prometheus' would be a poser to the plain music lover, whose education has stopped short at Wagner and Strauss. But in truth the tone-poem is often a difficult problem even for those of us who believe that music can no more cease its evolution with Wagner and Strauss than with Bach and Beethoven and who keep our ears always astrain for any authentic new note that may be [illegible] to us on the wind. It is absurd for any of us to dogmatize about a piece that aims at carrying the idiom and the vision of music to a point as far beyond Strauss as Strauss is beyond Chaikovsky. Yet the more confidently any critic tries to sweep it off the board as the mere effusion of a musical lunatic, the more certainly he writes himself down as a superficial duffer, intrepidly denying the existence of things simply because he cannot see them.

"I do not contend that everything in 'Prometheus' is clear even at a second hearing, or that there may not be a good deal in it to which no number of hearings would reconcile us. But I do urge that to a listener with an imagination it mostly talks in a perfectly lucid language of things that have never been expressed in music before. Skriabin has developed as naturally as Beethoven or Wagner or Strauss, beginning, as they did, with his roots in the past, and gradually evolving a highly individual style of his own as his personality developed. Whatever may be thought of his later style, there is no affectation in it on the musical side, and there is no fumbling. What struck some of us in the 'Prometheus' was the almost infallible certainty of the adaptation of the means to the end throughout. Only a composer who is at once master of his ideas and of his technic can work so surely as this. Whether, however, the brain as a whole is evolving harmoniously; whether it may not be developing a strain of excessive idealism, losing itself somewhat in the void of the thought that lies in the far beyond of the other side of music; failing to see its vision not merely with theosophical but with musical clearness; failing to find the firm enclosing line that alone can make the vision as real to us as it is to [illegible] these points one cannot be wholly [illegible] truth probably is that [illegible] parts [illegible] will never [illegible] clear [illegible] because they were never quite clear [illegible] composer, either because he has not [illegible]ght his way exactly enough through subtleties he is envisaging, or because [illegible] means of expression are not yet equal [illegible] the task he imposes on them. I cheerfully present these parts of 'Prometheus' to the ordinary objector for him to make what capital he likes out of them. But [illegible] the rest—and that much the greater pa —I firmly pin my faith. 'Prometheus' the one piece I have ever heard that se to me to approach the new territory that music will some day make its own. Its thematic texture may not always be distinguished, and the piano part may, as I believe, be mostly an error; but the fact remains that here is an imagination of extraordinary subtlety and scope, and a most remarkable faculty of musical expression."

Faith, Ardor, Vision



Alexander Skriabin

Who Counted "Prometheus" His Master-Work

(From a Russian Photograph)

69

Transcript
Mar 26

STRANGE PARISIANS, FAMILIAR RUSSIANS, GRAPHIC CONTRASTS

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY AT THE TOP OF HIS BENT

The Snare-Drum Indispensable—Placid Monsieur Caplet, Tumultuous Monsieur Borchard—Ravel the Adept, and Roland-Manuel Bright, Crisp and Witty—Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony as Never Before Upon Bostonian Ears

IT IS RELATED of an eminent reviewer of concerts in a Boston of an earlier day that, sitting in the old Music Hall upon a winter afternoon, he found little to interest him in the conductor's numbers. In one piece, however, possibly from Beethoven or Chaikovsky, the composer made unusual and significant use of the drums. Thereupon the reviewer returned to his desk; cited the piece aforesaid; devoted a full column in his newspaper to an essay in little about the drum. For him—and for his readers—all else at the concert in question might not have been. Even in these times, Mr. Ernest Newman, whose years and repute permit him to be wayward, sometimes follows this precedent. Only last winter, he expatiated through half a column of The Evening Post about an inflection that Mr. Koussevitzky laid upon a few measures of Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. He did not, however, quite neglect other aspects of the concert.

Similar temptation returned yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, as ear and eye noted the dependence of the assembled French composers, not upon the tympani, but upon the snare-drum. From the elder, the middle and the younger Parisian generation Mr. Koussevitzky had gathered them. There was Monsieur Ravel, transfering an early Dance of Debussy from piano to orchestra, and most nearly escaping the prevailing infection. There was Monsieur André Caplet writing a tonal "Fresco," by title "Epiphany," and undergoing a discoverable but relatively mild attack. There also were Messieurs Adolphe Borchard and Roland-Manuel, to both of whom rhythm seemed often to connote a sprightly or a vigorous smiting of the snare-drum. Upon it Monsieur Borchard, in his tone-poem, "L'Elan," sometimes hammered, as it were for salvation. From moment to moment, the snap and the crackle of it was music in the ears of Monsieur Roland-Manuel. Without it, the listener was half-sure, neither would have been composer at ease. Audibly, if not so insistently, it traveled in the instrumental baggage of Monsieur Caplet's Ethiopian King. Only Monsieur Ravel really "got on" without it, and he is a resourceful, practised hand with rhythms and timbres. "No snare-drum, no music," may yet be the watchword of the younger Parisian composers. Or they may ask the bestowal of the Palmes Académiques upon a consecrated instrument.

Truth to tell, not even a covey of snare-drums could have animated Monsieur Caplet's "Fresco." Time and again it subsided into a patently pallid, a curiously placid music. Not that the composer sought warmly colored or vividly plastic measures. He meditated, it seems, upon an old legend of The Nativity—how Melchior, who was King of Ethiopia, came with a princely train to do homage before his new-born Lord; how he drew near to the manger at Bethlehem and knelt beside it in pious ecstasy ineffable; how, knowing no other outlet to rapture and to duty, he bade his little negroes dance a dance of honor. Into music Monsieur Caplet would channel the matter and the mood of his meditations. Making it, he would gain a certain manner and aspect to the ear, like the manner and the aspect of primitive painting upon the eye. In this "Fresco for Violoncello and Orchestra," he would achieve spare, simple, direct line; subdued coloring not without deep glows and smooth lusters—the black and gold of King Melchior's royal state; considered workmanship; an appreciable quaintness (as the modern word is) of vision and suggestion.

The design praises the composer's reflection and imagination. Yet only twice did he bring it near to accomplishment. The violoncello—yesterday in Mr. Bedetti's able, sensitive, applauded hands—plays its cadenza of gentle rapture—and cadenzas in the elder, or an ideal, music are presumed to be the voice of rhapsody. Far in the offing falls the soft, monotonous beat of a tambourine above a low drone of the basses. On the instant, the "Fresco" is tonally painted. The sumptuous King, transported and transfigured as he kneels before the Sovereign Babe, in the dim and distant background, his waiting, faintly stirring train. Again, between violoncello and orchestra, Monsieur Caplet's dance wreathes into gliding figures, meeting and parting, twining and untwining. There are arabesques of sound. Softly and steadily beats the rhythm. So primitive painters in another medium might have imagined and limned the dancing boys. Elsewhere the music is labored, lifeless, without interest or illusion. A faint Oriental suggestion exhales from it; or in pale hint passes the kingly train. Debussy seemed occasionally to be guest. Now and then Monsieur Ravel was audibly running along side. Possibly, between Signor Respighi of the Concerto Gregoriano and Monsieur Caplet of "Epiphany," there has been tonal piety enough for one season of Symphony Concerts.

To the other extreme ran Monsieur Borchard in his music of "Ardor." Yet again the suggestion was, or would be, pictorial. In the years immediately before the late war, it was German custom to enclose not a little music in covers that bore some design of mighty, valorous, striding men. Their bodies were tense with emotion. To the heavens above they upturned faces, uplifted arms. Exultation and exaltation were sometimes upon them. They often shook the earth with their tread. Some such vision and emotion seem to course through Monsieur Borchard's piece. It is written for full orchestra in which few voices seldom rest. It piles sonority upon sonority; the tonal coloring sizzles and flames; timbre cuts into timbre. The rhythms drive forward; the transitions cleave the air. Along the course, the measures tramp or toss; fling forth; sweep onward. There are passion and flood of sound; a veritable frenzy to evoke the tensions, ardors and splendors of motion. Yet this surge and din leave room for no other impression. The vigors pass as riddles unread. Monsieur Borchard seems younger as composer than his forty-odd years as man.

Earth-bound, worldly, Parisian, Monsieur Ravel and Monsieur Roland-Manuel yet prevailed. The elder composer, indeed, was veritable conjuror. From the piano-pieces of Debussy's earlier years, he had taken a "Dance," fine of line, suffused with melody, subtle of rhythm, enmeshed in streaming harmonies. He had scored it for orchestra; and lo! it sounded with the voice of Monsieur Ravel. His precision now defined it; upon its surfaces was his glint; a certain dryness, briefly haunted it. If the master seemed several shades too masterful in these processes, the pupil was irresistible. In an opéra-bouffe, Monsieur Roland-Manuel and the librettist set anew figures from the old Italian popular comedy. Once more they play through amorous rivalry, ruse, intrigue. The overture, become concert-piece, summons this and that personage, catches at mood and atmosphere. The music is brisk, gay, brightly colored, keenly pointed. The motivs for the characters lack neither pith nor contrast. Monsieur Roland-Manuel writes with a cool head, a deft hand, in the highest of spirits. He bends the shape of a classic overture to his sportive purpose; he polishes accents and 'modulations, harmonies and timbres. His motives go to and fro, lithe and fluent. A flourish at the beginning, a flourish at the end; between a smiling animation, means ready and means apt. A new talent, a lively temperament, a scintillant skill—all three good to discover. The trick of dappling an ancient form with modern sparkle has seldom been better done. A crisp tonal wit has Monsieur Roland-Manuel.'

The Parisians dismissed, to a Russian Mr. Koussevitzky returned. Through fifteen years, the Fifth Symphony of Chaikovsky has been overlooked at the regular Symphony Concerts. Dr. Muck's mistrust, Mr. Rabaud's indifference, Mr. Monteux's disinclination, bound it fast to the shelves. Only at concerts for special purpose might it be heard, and there but seldom. Like a new and novel music it returned to Symphony Hall, transformed and transfigured, illuminated and intensified as never before upon Bostonian ears. Last autumn at a matinée for the Pension Fund, conductor and orchestra first set hands to it. Yesterday they were thrice as familiar and four times as possessed. They drained the music, that it might flood those that heard. Or above themselves, they mounted and held firm. The tension upon the stage became the emotion of the auditorium. Out of it welled applause that was both tribute and relief. Believably the zenith of the year was touched and passed.

The ominous beginning sounded with Chaikovsky's musical power and Mr. Koussevitzky's answering imagination. The first movement tossed from mood to mood till impatience and weariness stilled it—and every flux of feeling beat musically high. The long-drawn song of the Andante entered, unfolded, deepened, returned, piercing the shadows. Audibly the conductor prepared the way; almost visibly to the last drop he wrung it. Yet with a passion of longing was it drenched; while quenchless was the beauty. The human desire, the musical release and revelation were as one, blended, interpenetrated. A fantasmal music was the melancholy waltz that never waltzes. Ghostly upon it were the tone of the orchestra, the pace and the shadings of the conductor.

Then the transformation of the Finale. The stride and the sonority of the music scaled the luminous heights; dispersed was the nether darkness. Full and deep, radiant tone was the vesture; elate was the progress; exultant the climax; by the fervors of strength upborne. Again the conductor proclaimed Chaikovsky's power as twice and thrice he had opened his beauty. Four-square stood the Symphony, upbuilt, sustained, cumulated. In the glories were the blemishes melted and consumed. Less out of himself than out of life, Chaikovsky had written a music that strove and was wearied; that remembered and was haunted; that longed and was comforted; that took heart and in triumph sang. At the hands of one Russian, another had touched and opened universal human springs.

H. T. P.

A PIANIST HAMPERED

LEWISTON,
ME.
JOURNAL
MAR 26 1925

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY IMPRESSES PORTLAND AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

New Boston Symphony Conductor Receives Great Ovation—City Hall Filled

First Encore Ever Given by the Orchestra in Portland

PORTLAND, Mar. 26 (Special).—Such an ovation as was never before given here to a Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor—or any other orchestra conductor for that matter; an encore, unprecedented in the ten years or so this orchestra has been coming to Portland, an auditorium practically filled, a program generally pronounced the best the orchestra has ever presented here and enthusiasm unlimited—these were the distinguishing features of the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in City Hall, Wednesday evening, under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission.

The whole audience was alert with expectation at the first appearance of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, whose first visit to Portland it was, but whose fame has preceded him. It left no doubt as to its estimate.

Mr. Koussevitzky impresses one at first sight, by his presence; at first hearing by his musicianship. He is of commanding figure and magnetic personality. He seemed to have magnetized his orchestra. Never, the audience were agreed, had the tones been so beautifully rounded, the unity so perfect, the interpretations so satisfying. Koussevitzky has the scholarliness, the classical perfection and precision of Dr. Muck, the first conductor to come with the Boston Symphony to Portland, but he has in addition a warmth and ardor equal to Toscanini. He is Russian in feeling and he has the greatness and the strength of the Russian masters of music.

So perfectly he gets the spirit of the composition he might himself have inspired it. When the movement is light and graceful he moves in graceful unison with it, if the theme is of sorrow and despair, dejection seems to settle upon him, in fiery passages his movements are galvanic. Sometimes he doesn't move at all. Thru whole passages, when simple and smoothly running, no gesture was perceptible to the audience. Koussevitzky makes no meaningless or superfluous motions.

Mr. Koussevitzky is a master at program-making. No Boston Symphony concert here has been so varied, so finely balanced, without a dull or uninteresting moment. The Symphony (by Haydn, in G Major) was melodious and its four movements were short. The three following numbers were very short. The closing two numbers of Wagner—the enraptured audience hardly noted whether they were long or short, but only knew they wanted more.

This symphony was in a happier vein than most that are presented. An outstanding feature was the Largo, a beautiful melody, sung by the master oboe player, Longy, and the cellos, with an undertone of violas, double basses, bassoon and horn. The finale was most cheerful, a gay rondo built on the theme of a peasant country dance. Gorgeously colorful was the "Roman Carnival" overture, by Berlioz, played by the full orchestra. It had an exquisite opening of horn solo, the air then taken up by the violas. The carnival spirit worked up in flamboyant display of pagan jubilation with fascinating effects of tambourines, cymbals and triangle, and the kettledrums never too much in evidence. Koussevitzky certainly knows how to conduct a triumphant climax.

While the "Carnival" was in rich and glowing colors, Moussorgsky's "Prelude to Khowantchina," which followed it, was a tone picture in pastels, depicting in delicate tones and subtle shadings, with soft lovely undertones, the coming of dawn. Wind instruments and strings predominated, with dainty harp arpeggios, and an instrument new to most of the audience, a tam-tam. It conveyed with subtle magi wonderment and awe which panies the daily miracle of t rise.

It was "The Flight of the Bee," from the "Fairy Tale
Saltan," by Rimsky-Korsako
Conductor Koussevitzky res to the overwhelming applaus gave an encore. The same happened recently in Boston he broke a Boston Symphon cedent of forty years. It is o fanciful, rather than be but a truly wonderful bit of cal description. The various ments, mingled in sound im the bee, seemed to come fro composite instrument.

Over the two Wagnerian numbers, one might enthuse to great length. Mr. Koussevitzky is equally at home with the old masters and the very modern composers, but he impressed many Wednesday evening as the ideal interpreter of Wagner. With lavish prodigality of instrumental color and sound he gave rein to the wild revelry and tumultuous seductions of the "Bacchanale" from "Tannhauser," conducting, with consummate art, the transition indicating the victory of the Graces over mad passions.

His crowning achievement was an inspiring presentation of the Prelude from the "Meistersingers," with all the splendor of the full orchesta of more than a hundred players and a conductor who loses not a bit of the nobility of theme and grandeur of form. All thru it ran the love theme, one of the most beautiful lyrical melodies Wagner has written, voiced by oboe, clarinet, flute and horn, alternating with pompous episodes, and breaking forth into a thunderous explosion of the brasses, with martial rhythm. And this mighty fanfare brought the concert to a close in one of the most spontaneous outbursts of applause ever heard here.

Special cars to Lewiston and Auburn and other outlying towns, took home delighted crowds of patrons who were of unanimous opinion that this was the best concert the Boston Symphony has ever given in Portland.

Herald
Mar 26

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Scriabin's "Prometheus: A Poem of Fire," for orchestra, chorus, piano and organ, will be performed for the first time in Boston at the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night. Mr. Koussevitzky, who was closely associated with Scriabin, brought out this tone-poem at Moscow on March 15, 1911. The first performance in the United States was by the Chicago orchestra on March 5, 1915. Scriabin wished the music to be accompanied by a color keyboard; that is to say, colored lights were to be thrown on a screen in conjunction with the music. Thus note C was to be represented by the color red; G by rosy orange, D by yellow, etc. At Moscow this keyboard was not ready, or it refused to work. The first use of it was in New York, when the Russian Symphony orchestra performed "Prometheus" on March 20, 1915. The result was not effective. To watch the colors and hear the music at the same time was distracting. "Prometheus" was written when Scriabin was a confirmed mystic, and wished to compose music in theosophic terms. His hero is not the Prometheus of Aeschylus or Shelley.

For this performance the piano will be played by Alexander Lang Steinert; the organ by Mr. Snow of the Symphony orchestra, and the wordless chorus will be sung by the Cecilia Society.

This society will also sing the various choruses of the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." The choruses have been performed in Boston, but not at the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The other pieces on the program are Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 5, D major, and Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession," which has already been performed this season.

⁂

The Symphony program for next week comprises Foote's Suite, E major, for strings; Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" (about 600 A. D.); Schumann's Piano Concerto, Germaine Tailleferre's Concerto for piano and orchestra, Franck's "Wild Huntsman." The pianist will be that admirable artist, Alfred Cortot.

⁂

Myra Hess will play Beethoven's piano concerto in G major at the fourth extra concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Monday night. The program will also include Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Dance of the Seven Veils, from Strauss's "Salome."

⁂

For the concert of this orchestra in Cambridge next Thursday night (April 2) is this program: Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony; Franck's "Wild Huntsman"; the Prelude to "Lohengrin," Salome's Dance.

⁂

Notes and Lines:

I am from the country. I live in Concord, Mass. I went to the Symphony concert in Boston last week. I liked it. I should not say that Mr. Koussevitzky was a conductor. The man with gold on his cap and coat who took the tickets at the door seemed to me more like a conductor. Koussevitzky, who made the orchestra start and stop and turned on the electric juice was the motor man. I may be wrong.

C. H. P.

⁂

Transcript
Mar. 27

Programs in Prospect

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater at Cambridge on Thursday evening next:

Symphony in F major, No. 6, "The Pastoral" .... Beethoven
Scherzo from the Incidental Music to Shakspeare's Play, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Prelude to the Opera, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Salome's Dance from the Opera, "Salome," Strauss

From Mr. Koussevitzky for two concerts of the Symphony Orchestra to young people at Symphony Hall on Monday and Tuesday afternoons, April 6 and 7:

Overture to the Opera, "Figaro's Wedding" Mozart
Allegretto Scherzando from the Eighth Symphony .... Beethoven Procession to the Cathedral from the Opera, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner Dance of the Blessed Spirits from the Opera, "Orpheus" .... Gluck (Flute: Mr. Laurent)
Three Numbers—Chinese Dance; Dance of the Sugar-Plum Fairy; Trepak—from the Ballet, "Nutcracker" .... Chaikovsky
Fantasia for Harp .... Saint-Saëns (Harpist: Mr. Holy)
Tone Poem, "Finlandia" .... Sibelius

From Mr. Martino for the concert of ancient music played by the Eighteenth Century Symphony Orchestra in Jordan Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 5:

Concerto da Chiesa .... Dall' Abaco
(Piano, Organ, Orchestra)
Sonata .... Scarlatti
Gavotte .... Bach
Sonata for Flute and Piano .... Bigaglia
Concerto for Organ and Orchestra, No. 9. Handel
(Organist: R. G. Appel)
Suite, "Dolorosa" .... Scheidt
Pastorale Veriée .... Mozart
Gavotte .... Martini
Sonata for Flute, Oboe, Bassoon and Piano, Marini
Largo from "Xerxes"—Hallalujah Chorus from "The Messiah" .... Handel

INFORMATION OBSCURED

69

Transcript
Mar 26

STRANGE PARISIANS, FAMILIAR RUSSIANS, GRAPHIC CONTRASTS

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY AT THE TOP OF HIS BENT

The Snare-Drum Indispensable—Placid Monsieur Caplet, Tumultuous Monsieur Borchard—Ravel the Adept, and Roland-Manuel Bright, Crisp and Witty—Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony as Never Before Upon Bostonian Ears

IT IS RELATED of an eminent reviewer of concerts in a Boston of an earlier day that, sitting in the old Music Hall upon a winter afternoon, he found little to interest him in the conductor's numbers. In one piece, however, possibly from Beethoven or Chaikovsky, the composer made unusual and significant use of the drums. Thereupon the reviewer returned to his desk; cited the piece aforesaid; devoted a full column in his newspaper to an essay in little about the drum. For him—and for his readers—all else at the concert in question might not have been. Even in these times, Mr. Ernest Newman, whose years and repute permit him to be wayward, sometimes follows this precedent. Only last winter, he expatiated through half a column of The Evening Post about an inflection that Mr. Koussevitzky laid upon a few measures of Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. He did not, however, quite neglect other aspects of the concert.

Similar temptation returned yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, as ear and eye noted the dependence of the assembled French composers, not upon the tympani, but upon the snare-drum. From the elder, the middle and the younger Parisian generation Mr. Koussevitzky had gathered them. There was Monsieur Ravel, transfering an early Dance of Debussy from piano to orchestra, and most nearly escaping the prevailing infection. There was Monsieur André Caplet writing a tonal "Fresco," by title "Epiphany," and undergoing a discoverable but relatively mild attack. There also were Messieurs Adolphe Borchard and Roland-Manuel, to both of whom rhythm seemed often to connote a sprightly or a vigorous smiting of the snare-drum. Upon it Monsieur Borchard, in his tone-poem, "L'Elan," sometimes hammered, as it were for salvation. From moment to moment, the snap and the crackle of it was music in the ears of Monsieur Roland-Manuel. Without it, the listener was half-sure, neither would have been composer at ease. Audibly, if not so insistently, it traveled in the instrumental baggage of Monsieur Caplet's Ethiopian King. Only Monsieur Ravel really "got on" without it, and he is a resourceful, practised hand with rhythms and timbres. "No snare-drum, no music," may yet be the watchword of the younger Parisian composers. Or they may ask the bestowal of the Palmes Académiques upon a consecrated instrument.

Truth to tell, not even a covey of snare-drums could have animated Monsieur Caplet's "Fresco." Time and again it subsided into a patently pallid, a curiously placid music. Not that the composer sought warmly colored or vividly plastic measures. He meditated, it seems, upon an old legend of The Nativity—how Melchior, who was King of Ethiopia, came with a princely train to do homage before his new-born Lord; how he drew near to the manger at Bethlehem and knelt beside it in pious ecstasy ineffable; how, knowing no other outlet to rapture and to duty, he bade his little negroes dance a dance of honor. Into music Monsieur Caplet would channel the matter and the mood of his meditations. Making it, he would gain a certain manner and aspect to the ear, like the manner and the aspect of primitive painting upon the eye. In this "Fresco for Violoncello and Orchestra," he would achieve spare, simple, direct line; subdued coloring not without deep glows and smooth lusters—the black and gold of King Melchior's royal state; considered workmanship; an appreciable quaintness (as the modern word is) of vision and suggestion.

The design praises the composer's reflection and imagination. Yet only twice did he bring it near to accomplishment. The violoncello—yesterday in Mr. Bedetti's able, sensitive, applauded hands—plays its cadenza of gentle rapture—and cadenzas in the elder, or an ideal, music are presumed to be the voice of rhapsody. Far in the offing falls the soft, monotonous beat of a tambourine above a low drone of the basses. On the instant, the "Fresco" is tonally painted. The sumptuous King, transported and transfigured as he kneels before the Sovereign Babe; in the dim and distant background, his waiting, faintly stirring train. Again, between violoncello and orchestra, Monsieur Caplet's dance wreathes into gliding figures, meeting and parting, twining and untwining. There are arabesques of sound. Softly and steadily beats the rhythm. So primitive painters in another medium might have imagined and limned the dancing boys. Elsewhere the music is labored, lifeless, without interest or illusion. A faint Oriental suggestion exhales from it; or in pale hint passes the kingly train. Debussy seemed occasionally to be guest. Now and then Monsieur Ravel was audibly running along side. Possibly, between Signor Respighi of the Concerto Gregoriano and Monsieur Caplet of "Epiphany," there has been tonal piety enough for one season of Symphony Concerts.

To the other extreme ran Monsieur Borchard in his music of "Ardor." Yet again the suggestion was, or would be, pictorial. In the years immediately before the late war, it was German custom to enclose not a little music in covers that bore some design of mighty, valorous, striding men. Their bodies were tense with emotion. To the heavens above they upturned faces, uplifted arms. Exultation and exaltation were sometimes upon them. They often shook the earth with their tread. Some such vision and emotion seem to course through Monsieur Borchard's piece. It is written for full orchestra in which few voices seldom rest. It piles sonority upon sonority; the tonal coloring sizzles and flames; timbre cuts into timbre. The rhythms drive forward; the transitions cleave the air. Along the course, the measures tramp or toss; fling forth; sweep onward. There are passion and flood of sound; a veritable frenzy to evoke the tensions, ardors and splendors of motion. Yet this surge and din leave room for no other impression. The vigors pass as riddles unread. Monsieur Borchard seems younger as composer than his forty-odd years as man.

Earth-bound, worldly, Parisian, Monsieur Ravel and Monsieur Roland-Manuel yet prevailed. The elder composer, indeed, was veritable conjuror. From the piano-pieces of Debussy's earlier years, he had taken a "Dance," fine of line, suffused with melody, subtle of rhythm, enmeshed in streaming harmonies. He had scored it for orchestra; and lo! it sounded with the voice of Monsieur Ravel. His precision now defined it; upon its surfaces was his glint; a certain dryness, briefly haunted it. If the master seemed several shades too masterful in these processes, the pupil was irresistible. In an opéra-bouffe, Monsieur Roland-Manuel and the librettist set anew figures from the old Italian popular comedy. Once more they play through amorous rivalry, ruse, intrigue. The overture, become concert-piece, summons this and that personage, catches at mood and atmosphere. The music is brisk, gay, brightly colored, keenly pointed. The motivs for the characters lack neither pith nor contrast. Monsieur Roland-Manuel writes with a cool head, a deft hand, in the highest of spirits. He bends the shape of a classic overture to his sportive purpose; he polishes accents and 'modulations, harmonies and timbres. His motives go to and fro, lithe and fluent. A flourish at the beginning, a flourish at the end; between a smiling animation, means ready and means apt. A new talent, a lively temperament, a scintillant skill—all three good to discover. The trick of dappling an ancient form with modern sparkle has seldom been better done. A crisp tonal wit has Monsieur Roland-Manuel.'

The Parisians dismissed, to a Russian Mr. Koussevitzky returned. Through fifteen years, the Fifth Symphony of Chaikovsky has been overlooked at the regular Symphony Concerts. Dr. Muck's mistrust, Mr. Rabaud's indifference, Mr. Monteux's disinclination, bound it fast to the shelves. Only at concerts for special purpose might it be heard, and there but seldom. Like a new and novel music it returned to Symphony Hall, transformed and transfigured, illuminated and intensified as never before upon Bostonian ears. Last autumn at a matinée for the Pension Fund, conductor and orchestra first set hands to it. Yesterday they were thrice as familiar and four times as possessed. They drained the music, that it might flood those that heard. Or above themselves, they mounted and held firm. The tension upon the stage became the emotion of the auditorium. Out of it welled applause that was both tribute and relief. Believably the zenith of the year was touched and passed.

The ominous beginning sounded with Chaikovsky's musical power and Mr. Koussevitzky's answering imagination. The first movement tossed from mood to mood till impatience and weariness stilled it—and every flux of feeling beat musically high. The long-drawn song of the Andante entered, unfolded, deepened, returned, piercing the shadows. Audibly the conductor prepared the way; almost visibly to the last drop he wrung it. Yet with a passion of longing was it drenched; while quenchless was the beauty. The human desire, the musical release and revelation were as one, blended, interpenetrated. A fantasmal music was the melancholy waltz that never waltzes. Ghostly upon it were the tone of the orchestra, the pace and the shadings of the conductor.

Then the transformation of the Finale. The stride and the sonority of the music scaled the luminous heights; dispersed was the nether darkness. Full and deep, radiant tone was the vesture; elate was the progress; exultant the climax; by the fervors of strength upborne. Again the conductor proclaimed Chaikovsky's power as twice and thrice he had opened his beauty. Four-square stood the Symphony, upbuilt, sustained, cumulated. In the glories were the blemishes melted and consumed. Less out of himself than out of life, Chaikovsky had written a music that strove and was wearied; that remembered and was haunted; that longed and was comforted; that took heart and in triumph sang. At the hands of one Russian, another had touched and opened universal human springs.

H. T. P.

A PIANIST HAMPERED

LEWISTON,
ME.
JOURNAL
MAR 26 1925

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY IMPRESSES PORTLAND AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

New Boston Symphony Conductor Receives Great Ovation—City Hall Filled

First Encore Ever Given by the Orchestra in Portland

PORTLAND, Mar. 26 (Special).—Such an ovation as was never before given here to a Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor—or any other orchestra conductor for that matter; an encore, unprecedented in the ten years or so this orchestra has been coming to Portland, an auditorium practically filled, a program generally pronounced the best the orchestra has ever presented here and enthusiasm unlimited—these were the distinguishing features of the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in City Hall, Wednesday evening, under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission.

The whole audience was alert with expectation at the first appearance of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, whose first visit to Portland it was, but whose fame has preceded him. It left no doubt as to its estimate.

Mr. Koussevitzky impresses one at first sight, by his presence; at first hearing by his musicianship. He is of commanding figure and magnetic personality. He seemed to have magnetized his orchestra. Never, the audience were agreed, had the tones been so beautifully rounded, the unity so perfect, the interpretations so satisfying. Koussevitzky has the scholarliness, the classical perfection and precision of Dr. Muck, the first conductor to come with the Boston Symphony to Portland, but he has in addition a warmth and ardor equal to Toscanini. He is Russian in feeling and he has the greatness and the strength of the Russian masters of music.

